

Heptameron: or, Magical Elements of Peter de Abano, philosopher

In the former book, which is the fourth book of Agrippa, it is sufficiently spoken concerning Magical Ceremonies, and Initiations.

But because he seemeth to have written to the learned, and well-experienced in this art; because he doth not specially treat of the Ceremonies, but rather speaketh of them in general, it was therefore thought good to adde hereunto the Magical Elements of Peter de Abano: that those who are hitherto ignorant, and have not tasted of Magical Superstitions, may have them in readiness, how they may exercise themselves therein. For we see in this book, as it were a certain introduction of Magical vanity; and, as if they were in present exercise, they may behold the distinct functions of spirits, how they may be drawn to discourse and communication; what is to be done every day, and every hour; and how they shall be read, as if they were described sillable by sillable.

In brief, in this book are kept the principles of Magical conveyances. But because the greatest power is attributed to the Circles; (For they are certain fortresses to defend the operators safe from the evil Spirits;) In the first place we will treat concerning the composition of a Circle.

Of the Circle, and the Composition Thereof.

The form of Circles is not alwaies one and the same; but useth to be changed, according to the order of the Spirits that are to be called, their places, times, daies and hours. For in making a Circle, it ought to be considered in what time of the year, what day, and what hour, that you make the Circle; what Spirits you would call, to what Star and Region they do belong, and what functions they have. Therefore let there be made three Circles of the latitude of nine foot, and let them be distant one from another a hands breadth; and in the middle Circle, first, write the name of the hour wherein you do the work. In the second place, Write the name of the Angel of the hour. In the third place, The Sigil of the Angel of the hour. Fourthly, The name of the Angel that ruleth that day wherein you do the work, and the names of his ministers. In the fifth place, The name of the present time. Sixthly, The name of the Spirits ruling in that part of time, and their Presidents. Seventhly, The name of the head of the Signe ruling in that part of time wherein you work. Eighthly, The name of the earth, according to that part of time wherein you work. Ninthly, and for the compleating of the middle Circle, Write the name of the Sun and of the Moon, according to the said rule of time; for as the time is changed, so the names are to be altered. And in the outermost Circle, let there be drawn in the four Angles, the names of the presidential Angels of the Air, that day wherein you would do this work; to wit, the name of the King and his three Ministers. Without the Circle, in four Angles, let Pen- tagones be made. In the inner Circle let there be written four divine names with crosses interposed in the middle of the Circle; to wit, towards the East let there be written Alpha, and towards the West let there be written Omega; and let a cross divide the middle of the Circle. When the Circle is thus finished, according to the rule now before written, you shall proceed.

Heptameron

Of the Names of the Hours, and the Angels ruling them.

It is also to be known, that the Angels do rule the hours in a successive order, according to the course of the heavens, and Planets unto which they are subject; so that that Spirit which governeth the day, ruleth also the first hour of the day; the second from this governeth the second hour; the third; the third hour, and so consequentkly: and when seven Planets and hours have made their revolution, it returneth again to the first which ruleth the day. Therefore we shall first speak of the names of the hours.

Hours of the day.

1. Yayn.
2. Janor.
3. Nasnia.
4. Salla.
5. Sadedali.
6. Thamur.
7. Ourer.
8. Thamic.
9. Neron.
10. Jayon.
11. Abai.
12. Natalon.

Hours of the night.

1. Beron.
2. Barol.
3. Thanu.
4. Athir.
5. Mathon.
6. Rana.
7. Netos.
8. Tafrac.
9. Sassur.
10. Aglo.
11. Calerna.
12. Salam.

Of the names of the Angels and their Sigils, it shall be spoken in their proper places. Now let us take a view of the names of the times. A year therefore is fourfold, and is divided into the Spring, Summer, Harvest and Winter; the names whereof are these.

The Spring.

Talvi.

The Summer.

Casmaran.

Autumne.

Ardarael.

Winter.

Farlas.

Heptameron

THE ANGELS OF THE SPRING.

Caratasa.
Core.
Amatiel.
Commissoros.

THE HEAD OF THE SIGNE OF THE SPRING.

Spugliguel.

THE NAME OF THE EARTH IN THE SPRING.

Amadai.

THE NAMES OF THE SUN AND MOON IN THE SPRING.

The Sun.	The Moon.
Abaym.	Agusita.

THE ANGELS OF THE SUMMER.

Gargatel.
Tariel.
Gaviel.

THE HEAD OF THE SIGNE OF THE SUMMER.

Tubiel.

THE NAME OF THE EARTH IN SUMMER.

Festativi.

THE NAMES OF THE SUN AND MOON IN SUMMER.

The Sun.	The Moon.
Athemay.	Armatus.

THE ANGELS OF AUTUMNE.

Tarquam.
Guabarel.

THE HEAD OF THE SIGNE OF AUTUMNE.

Tarquaret.

THE NAME OF THE EARTH IN AUTUMNE.

Rabianara.

Heptameron

THE NAMES OF THE SUN AND MOON IN AUTUMNE.

The Sun.	The Moon.
Abragini.	Matasignais.

THE ANGELS OF WINTER.

Amabael.
Ctarari.

THE HEAD OF THE SIGNE OF WINTER.

Altarib.

THE NAME OF THE EARTH IN WINTER.

Geremiah.

THE NAMES OF THE SUN AND MOON IN WINTER.

The Sun.	The Moon.
Commutaff.	Affaterim.

The Consecrations and Benedictions: and first of the Benediction of the Circle.

When the Circle is ritely perfected, sprinkle the same with holy or purging water, and say, Thou shalt purge me with hysop, (O Lord,) and I shall be clean: Thou shalt wash me, and I shall be whiter then snow.

The Benediction of perfumes.

The God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob, bless here the creatures of these kindes, that they may fill up the power and vertue of their odours; so that neither the enemy, nor any false imagination, may be able to enter into them: through our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. Then let them be sprinkled with holy water.

The Exorcisme of the fire upon which the perfumes are to be put.

The fire which is to be used for suffumigations, is to be in a new vessel of earth or iron; and let it be exorcised after this manner. I exorcise thee, O thou creature of fire, by him by whom all things are made, that forthwith thou cast away every phantasme from thee, that it shall not be able to do any hurt in any thing. Then say, Bless, O Lord, this creature of fire, and sanctifie it, that it may be blessed to set forth the praise of thy holy name, that no hurt may come to the Exorcisers or Spectators: through our Lord Jesus Christ, &c.

Heptameron

Of the Garment and Pentacle.

Let it be a Priests Garment, if it can be had, let it be of linen, and clean. Then take this Pentacle made in the day and hour of Mercury, the Moon increasing, written in parchment made of a kids skin. But first let there be said over it the Mass of the holy Ghost, and let it be sprinkled with water of baptism.

An Oration to be said, when the Vesture is put on.

Ancor, Amacor, Amides, Theodonias, Anitor, by the merits of thy Angel, O Lord, I will put on the Garments of Salvation, that this which I desire I may bring to effect: through thee the most holy Adonay, whose kingdom endureth for ever and ever. Amen.

Of the manner of working.

Let the Moon be increasing and equal, if it may then be done, and let her not be combust.

The Operator ought to be clean and purified by the space of nine daies before the beginning of the work, and to be confessed, and receive the holy Communion. Let him have ready the perfume appropriated to the day wherein he would perform the work. He ought also to have holy water from a Priest, and a new earthen vessel with fire, a Vesture and a Pentacle; and let all these things be rightly and duly consecrated and prepared. Let one of the servants carry the earthen vessel full of fire, and the perfumes, and let another bear the book, another the Garment and Pentacle, and let the master carry the Sword; over which there must be said one mass of the Holy Ghost; and on the middle of the Sword, let there be written this name Agla +, and on the other side thereof, this name + On +. And as he goeth to the consecrated place, let him continually read Letanies, the servants answering. And when he cometh to the place where he will erect the Circle, let him draw the lines of the Circle, as we have before taught: and after he hath made it, let him sprinkle the Circle with holy water, saying, Asperges me Domine, &c. [Wash me O Lord, &c.]

Heptameron

The Master therefore ought to be purified with fasting, chastity, and abstinency from all luxury the space of three whole dayes before the day of the operation. And on the day that he would do the work, being clothed with pure garments, and furnished with Pentacles, Perfumes, and other things necessary hereunto, let him enter the Circle, and call the Angels from the four parts of the world, which do govern the seven Planets the seven dayes of the week, Colours and Metals; whose name you shall see in their places. And with bended knees invoking the said Angels particularly, let him say, O Angels supradicti, estote adjutores meæ petitioni, & in adjutorium mihi, in meis rebus & petitionibus.

Then let him call the Angels from the four parts of the world, that ruke the Air the same day wherein he doth the work or experiment. And having implored specially all the Names and Spirits written in the Circle, let him say, O vos omnes, adjuro atque contestor per sedem Adonay, per Hagios, ò Theos, Ischyros, Athanatos, Paracletos, Alpha & Omega, & per hæc tria nomina secreta, Agla, On, Tetragrammaton, quòd hodie debeatis adimplere quod cupio.

These things being performed, let him read the Conjunction assigned for the day wherein he maketh the experiments, as we have before spoken; but if they shall be pertinacious and refractory, and will not yield themselves obedient, neither to the Conjunction assigned to the day, nor to the prayers before made, then use the Conjunctions and Exorcismes following.

An Exorcisme of the Spirits of the Air.

Nos facti ad imaginem Dei, & ejus facti voluntate, per potentissimum & corroboratum nomen Dei El, forte & admirabile vos exorcizamus (here he shall name the Spirits he would have appear, of what order soever they be) & imperamus per eum qui dixit, & factum est, & per omnia nomina Dei, & per nomen Adonay, El, Elohim, Elohe, Zebaoth, Elion, Escerchie, Jah, Tetragrammaton, Sadai, Dominus Deus, excelsus, exorcizamus vos, atque potenter imperamus, ut appareatis statim nobis hic juxta Circulum in pulchra forma, videlicet humana, & sine deformitate & tortuositate aliqua. Venite vos omnes tales, quia vobis imperamus, per nomen Y & V quod Adam audivit, & locutus est: & per nomen Dei Agla, quod Loth audivit, & factus salvus cum sua familia: & per nomen Joth, quod Jacob audivit ab Angelo secum luctantes, & liberatus est de manu fratris sui Esau: and by the name Anephexeton, quot Aaron audivit, & loquens, & sapiens factus est: & per nomen Zebaoth, quod Moses nominavit, & omnia flumina & paludes de terra Ægypti, versæ fuerunt in sanguinem: & per nomen Ecerchie Oriston, quod Moses nominavit, & omnes flu vis ebullierunt ranas, & ascenderunt in domos Ægyptiorum, omnia destruentes: & per nomen Elion, quod Moses nominavit, & fuit grando talis, qualis non fuit ab initio mundi: & per nomen Adonay, quod Moses nominavit, & fuerunt locusta, & apparuerunt super terram Ægyptiorum, & comederunt quæ residua erant grandint: & per nomen Schemes amathia, quod Joshua vocavit, & remoratus est Sol cursum: & per nomen Alpha & Omega, quod Daniel nominavit, & destruxit Beel, & Draconem interfecit: & in nomine Emmanuel, quod tres pueri, Sidrach, Misach & Abednago, in camino ignis ardentis, cantaverunt, & liberati

Heptameron

fuerunt: & per nomen Hagios, & sedem Adonay, & per ò Theos, Iscytos, Athanatos, Paracletus; & per hæc tria secreta nomina, Agla, On, Tetragrammaton, adjuro, contestor, & per hæc nomina, & per alia nomina Domini nostri Dei Omnipotentis, vivi & veri, vos qui vestra culpa de Coelis ejeçti fuistis usque ad infernum locum, exorcizamus, & viriliter imperamus, per eum qui dixit, & factum est, cui omnes obediunt creaturæ, & per illud tremendum Dei judicium: & per mare omnibus incertum, vitreum, quod est ante conspectum divinæ majestatis gradientis, & potestiale: & per quatuor divina animalia T. aniè sedem divinæ majestatis gradientia, & oculos ante & retrò habentia: & per ignem ante ejus thronum circumstantem: & per sanctos Angelos Cælorum, T. & per eam quæ Ecclesia Dei nominatur: & per summam sapientiam Omnipotentis Dei viriliter exorcizamus, ut nobis hic ante Circulum appareatis, ut faciendam nostram voluntatem, in omnibus prout placuerit nobis: per sedem Baldachie, & per hoc nomen Primeumaton, quod Moses nominavit, & in cavernis abyssi fuerunt profundati vel absorpti, Datan, Corah & Abiron: & in virtute istius nominis Primeumaton, tota Coeli militia compellente, maledicimus vos, privamus vos omni officio, loco & gaudio vestro, esque in profundum abyssi, & usque ad ultimum diem judicii vos ponimus, & relegamus in ignem æternum, & in stagnum ignis & sulphuris, nisi statim appareatis hic coram nobis, ante Circulum, ad faciendum voluntatem nostram. In omnibus venite per hæc nomina, Adonay Zebaoth, Adonay, Amioram. Venite, venite, imperat vobis Adonay, Saday, Rex regum potentissimus & tremendissimus, cujus vires nulla subterfugere potest creatura vobis pertinacissimis futuris nisi obedieritis, & appareatis ante hunc Circulum, affabiles subito, tandem ruina flebilis miserabilisque, & ignis perpetuum inextinguibilis vos manet. Venite ergo in nomine Adonay Zebaoth, Adonay Amioram: venite, venite, quid tardatis? festinate imperat vobis Adonay, Saday, Rex regum, El, Aty, Titeip, Azia, Hyn, Jen, Minosel, Achadan: Vay, Vaa, Ey, Haa, Eye, Exe, à, El, El, El, à, Hy, Hau, Hau, Hau, Va, Va, Va, Va.

A Prayer to God, to be said in the four parts of the world, in the Circle.

A Morule, Taneha, Latisten, Rabur, Taneha, Latisten. Escha, Aladia, Alpha & Omega, Leyste, Oriston, Adonay: O my most merciful heavenly Father, have mercy upon me, although a sinner; make appear the arm of thy power in me this day (although thy unworthy child) against these obstinate and pernicious Spirits, that I by thy will may be made a contemplator of thy divine works, and may be illustrated with all wisdom, and alwaies worship and glorifie thy name. I humbly implore and beseech thee, that these Spirits which I call by thy judgement, may be bound and constrained to come, and give true and perfect answers to those things which I shall ask them, and that they may declare and shew unto us those things which by me or us shall be commanded them, not hurting any creature, neither injuring nor terrifying me or my fellows, nor hurting any other creature, and affrighting no man; but let them be obedient to my requests, in all these things which I command them. Then let him stand in the middle of the Circle, and hold his hand towards the Pentacle, and say, Per Pentaculum Salomonis advocavi, dent mihi responsum verum.

Then let him say, Beralanensis, Baldachiensis, Paumachie & Apologie sedes, per Reges potestaiesià magnanimas, ac principes præpotentes, genio Liachidæ, ministri tartareæ sedes: Primac, hic princeps sedis Apologie nona cohorte: Ego vos invoco, & invocando vos conjure, atque supernæ Majestatis munitus virtute, potenter impero, per eum qui dixit, & factum est, & cui obediunt omnes creaturæ: & per hoc nomen ineffabile, Tetragrammaton יהוה Jehovah, in quo est plasmatum omne seculum, quo audito elementa corruunt, aër concutitur, mare retrograditur, ignis exinguitur, tera tremat, omnesque exercitus Coelestium, Terrestrium, & Infernorum tremunt, turbantur & corruunt: quatenus citò & sine mora & omni occasione remota, ab universis mundi partibus veniatis, & rationabiliter de omnibus quæcunque interrogavero, respondeatis vos, & veniatis pacifice, visibiles, & affabiles: nunc & sine mora manifestantes quod cupimus: conjurati per nomen æterni vivi & veri Dei Helioren, & mandata nostra per ficientes, persistentes semper usque ad finem, & intentionem meam, visibiles nobis, & affabiles, clara voce nobis, intelligibile, & sine omni ambiguitate.

Heptameron

Visions and Apparitions.

Quibus ritè peractis, apparebunt infinitæ visiones, & phantasmata pulsantia organa & omnis generis instrumenta musica, idque sit à spiritibus, ut terrore compulsi socii abeant à Circulo, quia nihil adversus migistrum possunt. Post hæc videbis infinitos sagittarios cum infinita multitudine bestiarum horribilem: quæ ita se componunt, ac si vellent devorare socios: & tamen nil timeant. Tunc Sacerdos sive Magister, adhibent manum Pentaculo, dicat: Fugiat hinc iniquitas vestra, virtute vexilli Dei.

Et tunc Spiritus obedire migistro coguntur, & socii nil amilius videbunt.

Then let the Exorcist say, stretching out his hand to the Pentacle, Ecce Pentaculum Salomonis, quod ante vestram adduxi præsentiam: ecce personam exorcizatoris on medio Exorcismi, qui est optimà à Deo munitus, intrepidus, providus, qui viribus potens vos exorcizando invocavit & vocat. Venite ergo cum festinatione in virtute nominum istorum, Aye, Saraye, Aye, Saraye, Aye Saraye, ne differatis venire, per nomina æterna Dei vivi & veri Eloy, Archima, Rabur: & per hoc præsens Pentaculum, quod super vos potenter imperat: & per virtutem coelestium Spirituum dominorum vestrorum: & per personam exorcizatoris, conjurati, festinati venire & obedire præceptori vestro, qui vocatur Ostinomos. Hisperactis, sibiles in quatuor angulis mundi. Et videbis immediate magnos motus: & cum videris, dicas: Quid tardatis? quid moramini? quid facitis? præparate vos & obedite præceptori vestro, in nomine Domini Bathat, vel Vachat super Abrac ruens, super veniens, Abeor super Aberer.

Tunc immediatè venient in sua forma propria. Et quando videbis eos juxta Circulum, ostende illis Pentaculum coopertum syndone sacro, & discooperiatur, & dicat: Ecce conclusionem vestram, nolite fieri inobedientes. Et subito videbis eos in pacifica forma: & dicent tibi, Pete quid vis, quia nos sumus parati complere omnia mandata tua, quia dominus ad hæc nos subjugavit. Cum autem apparuerint Spiritus, tunc dicas, Bene veneritis Spiritus, vel reges nobilissimi, quia vos vocavi per illum cui omne genuflectitur, coelestium, terrestrium & infernorum: cujus in manu omnia regna regum sunt, nec est qui suæ contrarius esse possit Majestati. Quatenus constringo vos, ut hic ante circulum visibes, affabiles permanetis, tamdiu tamque constantes, nec sint licentia mea recedatis, donec meam sine fallacia aliqua & veredicè perficiatis voluntatem, per potentie illius virtutem, qui mare posuit terminum suum, quem præterire non potest, & lege illius potentie, non periransit fines suos, Dei scilicet altissimi, regis, domini, qui cuncta creavit, Amen.

Then command what you will, and it shall be done. Afterwards license them thus:

+ In nomine Patris, + Filii, & + Spiritus sancti, ite in pace ad loca vestra: & pax sit inter nos & vos, parati sitis venire vocati.

These are the things which Peter de Abano hath spoken concerning Magical Elements.

But that you may the better know the manner of composing a Circle, I will set down one Scheme; so that if any one would make a Circle in Spring-time for the first hour of Lords day, it must be in the same manner as is the figure following.

Heptameron

The figure of a Circle for the first hour of the Lords day, in Spring-time.

It remaineth now, That we explain the week, the several dayes thereof: and first of the Lords day.

Heptameron

Considerations of the Lords day

The Angel of the Lords day, his Sigil, Planet, the Signe of the Planet, and the name of the fourth heaven.

THE ANGELS OF THE LORDS DAY.

Michael, Dardiel, Huratapol.

THE ANGELS OF THE AIR RULING ON THE LORDS DAY.

Varcan, King.

HIS MINISTERS.

Tus, Andas, Cynabal.

THE WINDE WHICH THE ANGELS OF THE AIR ABOVE SAID ARE UNDER.

The North-winde.

THE ANGEL OF THE FOURTH HEAVEN, RULING ON THE LORDS DAY, WHICH OUGHT TO BE CALLED FROM THE FOUR PARTS OF THE WORLD.

AT THE EAST.

Samael. Baciell. Atel. Gabriel. Vionairaba.

AT THE WEST.

Anael. Pabel. Ustael. Burchat. Suceratos. Capabili.

AT THE NORTH.

Aiel. Aniel, vel Aquiel. Masgabriel. Sapiel. Matuyel.

AT THE SOUTH.

Haludiel. Machasiel. Charsiel. Uriel. Naromiel.

THE PERFUME OF THE LORDS DAY.

Red Wheat.

The Conjuraton of the Lords day.

Conjuro & confirmo super vos Angeli fortes Dei, & sancti, in nomine Adonay, Eye, Eye, Eye, qui est ille, qui fuit, est & erit, Eye, Abraye: & in nomine Saday, Cados, Cados, Cados, alie sententis super Cherubin, & per nomen magnum ipsius Dei fortis & potentis, exaltatique super omnes coelos, Eye, Saraye, plasmatoris seculorum, qui creavit mundum, coelum, terram, mare, & omnia quæ in eis sunt in primo die, & sigillavit ea sancto nomine suo Phaa: & per nomina sanctorum Angelorum, qui dominantur in quarto exercitu, & serviunt coram potentissimo Salamia, Angelo magno & honorato: & per nomen stellæ, quæ est Sol, & per signum, & per immensum nomen Dei vivi, & per nomina omnia prædicta, conjuro te Michael angele magne, qui es præpositus Diei Dominicæ: & per nomen Adona, Dei Israel, qui creavit mundum & quicquid in eo est, quod pro melabores, & ad moleas omnem meam petitionem, juxta meum velle & votum meum, in negotio & causa mea. And here thou shalt declare thy cause and business, and for what thing thou makest this Conjunction.

Heptameron

The Spirits of the Air of the Lords day, are under the North-winde; their nature is to procure Gold, Gemmes, Carbuncles, Riches; to cause one to obtain favour and benevolence; to dissolve the enmities of men; to raise men to honors; to carry or take away infirmities. But in what manner they appear, it's spoken already in the former book of Magical Ceremonies.

Considerations of Monday.

The Angel of Munday, his Sigil, Planet, the Signe of the Planet, and name of the first heaven.

THE ANGELS OF MUNDAY.

Gabriel, Michael, Samael.

THE ANGELS OF THE AIR RULING ON MUNDAY.

Arcan, King.

HIS MINISTERS.

Bilet, Missabu, Abuzaha.

THE WINDE WHICH THE SAID ANGELS OF THE AIR ARE SUBJECT TO.

The West-winde.

THE ANGELS OF THE FIRST HEAVEN, RULING ON MUNDAY, WHICH OUGHT TO BE CALLED FROM THE FOUR PARTS OF THE WORLD.

FROM THE EAST.

Gabriel. Gabrael. Madiel. Deamiel. Janael.

FROM THE WEST.

Sachiel. Zaniel. Habaiel. Bachanael. Corabael.

Heptameron

FROM THE NORTH.

Mael. Vuel. Valnum. Baliel. Balay. Humastrau.

FROM THE SOUTH.

Curaniel. Dabriel. Darquiel. Hanun. Anayl. Vetuel.

THE PERFUME OF MUNDAY.

Aloes.

The Conjuraton of Munday.

Conjuro & confirmo super vos Angeli fortes & boni, in nomine Adonay, Adonay, Adonay, Eie, Eie, Eie, Cados, Cados, Cados, Achim, Achim, Ja, Ja, Fortis, Ja, qui apparuis monte Sinai, cum glorificatione regis Adonay, Saday, Zebaoth, Anathay, Ya, Ya, Ya, Marinata, Abim, Jeia, qui maria creavit stagna & omnes aquas in secundo die, quasdam super coelos, & quosdam in terra. Sigillavit mare in alio nomine suo, & terminum, quam sibi posuit, non præter b t: & per nomina Angelorum, qui dominantur in primo exercitu, qui serviunt Orphaniel Angelo magno, precioso & honorato: & per nomen Stellæ, quæ est Luna: & per nomina prædicta, super te conjuro, scilicet Gabriel, qui es præpositus diei. Lunæ secundo quod pro me labores & adimpleas, &c. As in the Conjuraton of Sunday.

The Spirits of the Air of Munday, are subject to the West-winde, which is the winde of the Moon: their nature is to give silver; to convey things from place to place; to make horses swift, and to disclose the secrets of persons both present and future: but in what manner they appear, you may see in the former book.

Considerations of Tuesday.

The Angel of Tuesday, his sigil, his Planet, the Signe governing that Planet, and the name of the fifth heaven.

The image displays two distinct magical symbols. On the left is the sigil of Samael, featuring the name 'Samael..' in a stylized, calligraphic font above a complex arrangement of geometric and organic shapes, including a cross-like figure and various loops. On the right is the sigil of Machon, showing the name 'Machon.' in a similar calligraphic style above a series of interconnected circles and lines that form a more abstract, circular pattern.

THE ANGELS OF TUESDAY.

Samael. Satael. Amabiel.

THE ANGELS OF THE AIR RULING ON TUESDAY.

Samax, King.

HIS MINISTERS.

Carmax, Ismoli, Paffran.

THE WINDE TO WHICH THE SAID ANGELS ARE SUBJECT.

The East-winde.

Heptameron

THE ANGELS OF THE FIFTH HEAVEN RULING ON TUESDAY, WHICH OUGHT TO BE CALLED FROM THE FOUR PARTS OF THE WORLD.

AT THE EAST.

Friagne. Grael. Damael. Calzas. Arragon.

AT THE WEST.

Lama. Astagna. Lobquin. Soncas. Jazel. Isiael. Irel.

AT THE NORTH.

Rahumel. Hyniel. Rayel. Seraphiel. Mathiel. Fraciel.

AT THE SOUTH.

Sacriel. Janiel. Galdel. Osaël. Vianuel. Zaliel.

THE PERFUME OF TUESDAY.

Pepper.

The Conjunction of Tuesday.

Conjuro & confirmo super vos, Angeli fortes & sancti, per nomen Ya, Ya, Ya, He, He, He, Va, Hy, Hy, Ha, Ha, Ha, Va, Va, Va, An, An, An, Aie, Aie, Aie, El, Ay, Elibra, Eloim, Eloim: & per nomina ipsius alti Dei, qui secit aquam aridam apparere, & vocavit terram, & produxit arbores, & herbas de ea, & sigillavit super eam cum precioso, honorato, metuendo & sancto nomine suo: & per nomen angelorum dominantium in quinto exercitu, qui serviunt Acimoy Angelo magno, forti, potenti, & honorato: & per nomen Stellæ, quæ est Mars: & per nomina prædicta conjuro super te Samael, Angele magne, qui præpositus es diei Martis: & per nomina Adonay, Dei vivi & veri, quod pro me labores, & adimpleas, &c. As in the Conjunction of Sunday.

The Spirits of the Air of Tuesday are under the East-winde: their nature is to cause wars, mortality, death and combustions; and to give two thousand Souldiers at a time; to bring death, infirmities or health. The manner of their appearing you may see in the former book.

Considerations of Wednesday.

The Angel of Wednesday, his Sigil, Planet, the Signe governing that Planet, and the name of the second heaven.

THE ANGELS OF WEDNESDAY.

Raphael. Miel. Seraphiel.

Heptameron

THE ANGELS OF THE AIR RULING ON WEDNESDAY.

Mediat, or Modiat, King.

MINISTERS.

Suquinos, Sallales.

THE WINDE TO WHICH THE SAID ANGELS OF THE AIR ARE SUBJECT.

The Southwest-winde.

THE ANGELS OF THE SECOND HEAVEN GOVERN WEDNESDAY, WHICH OUGHT TO BE CALLED FROM THE FOUR PARTS OF THE WORLD.

AT THE EAST.

Mathlai. Tarmiel. Baraborat.

AT THE WEST.

Jeresous. Mitraton.

AT THE NORTH.

Thiel. Rael. Jariabel. Venabel. Velel. Abuiori. Ucirnuel.

AT THE SOUTH.

Milliel. Nelapa. Babel. Caluel. Vel. Laquel.

THE FUMIGATION OF WEDNESDAY.

Mastick.

The Conjurat[i]on of Wednesday.

Conjuro & confirmo vos angeli fortes, sancti & potentes, in nomine fortis, metuendissimi & benedicti Ja, Adonay, Eloim, Saday, Saday, Saday, Eie, Eie, Eie, Asamie, Asaraie: & in nomine Adonay Dei Israel, qui creavit luminaria magna, ad distinguendum diem à nocte: & per nomen omnium Angelorum deservientium in exercitu secundo coram Tetra Angelo majori, atque forti & potenti: & per nomen Stellæ, quæ est Mercurius: & per nomen Sigilli, quæ sigillatur a Deo fortissimo & honoratio: per omnia prædicta super te Raphael Angele magne, conjuro, qui es præpositus die: quartæ: & per nomen sanctum quod erat scriptum in fronte Aaron sacerdotis altissimi creatoris: & per nomina Angelorum qui in gratiam Salvatoris confirmati sunt: & per nomen sedis Animalium, habentium senas alas, quod pro me labo, et, &c. As in the Conjurat[i]on of Sunday.

The Spirits of the Air of Wednesday are subject to the South-west-winde: their nature is to give all Metals; to reveal all earthly things past, present and to come; to pacifie judges, to give victories in war, to re-edifie, and teach experiments and all decayed Sciences, and to change bodies mixt of Elements conditionally out of one into another; to give infirmities or health; to raise the poor, and cast down the high ones; to binde or lose Spirits; to open locks or bolts: such-kinde of Spirits have the operation of others, but not in their perfect power, but in virtue or knowledge. The what manner they appear, it is before spoken.

Heptameron

Considerations of Thursday.

The Angel of Thursday, his Sigil, Planet, the Signe of the Planet, and the name of the sixth heaven.

THE ANGELS OF THURSDAY.

Sachiel. Castiel. Asasiel.

THE ANGELS OF THE AIR GOVERNING THURSDAY.

Suth, Rex.

MINISTERS.

Maguth, Gutrix.

THE WINDE WHICH THE SAID ANGELS OF THE AIR ARE UNDER.

The South-winde.

BUT BECAUSE THERE ARE NO ANGELS OF THE AIR TO BE FOUND ABOVE THE FIFTH HEAVEN, THEREFORE ON THURSDAY SAY THE PRAYERS FOLLOWING IN THE FOUR PARTS OF THE WORLD.

AT THE EAST.

O Deus magne & excelse, & honorate, per infinita secula.

AT THE WEST.

O Deus sapiens, & clare, & juste, ac divina clementia: ego rogo te piissime Pater, quòd meam petitionem, quòd meum opus, & meum laborem hodie debeam complere, & perfectè intelligere. Tu qui vivis & regnas per infinita secula seculorum, Amen.

AT THE NORTH.

O Deus potens, fortis, & sine principio.

AT THE SOUTH.

O Deus potens & Misericors.

THE PERFUME OF THURSDAY.

Saffron.

Heptameron

The Conjuraton of Thursday.

Conjuro & confirmo super vos, Angeli sancti, per nomen, Cados, Cados, Cados, Eschereie, Eschereie, Eschereie, Hatim ya, fortis firmator seculorum, Cantine, Jaym, Janic, Anic, Calbat, Sabbac, Berifay, Alnaym: & per nomen Adonay, qui creavit pisces reptilia in aquis, & aves super faciem terræ, volantes versus coelos die quinto: & per nomina Angelorum serventium in sexto exercitu coram pastore Angelo sancto & magno & potenti principe: & per nomen stellæ, quæ est Jupiter: & per nomen Sigilli sui: & per nomen Adonay, summi Dei, omnium creatoris: & per nomen omnium stellarum, & per vim & virtutem earum: & per nomina prædicta, conjuro te Sachiel Angele magne, qui es præpositus dici Jovis, ut pro me labores, &c. As in the Conjuraton of the Lords day.

The Spirits of the Air of Thursday, are subject to the South-winde; their nature is to procure the love of woman; to cause men to be merry and joyful; to pacifie strife and contentions; to appease enemies; to heal the diseased, and to disease the whole; and procureth losses, or taketh them away. Their manner of appearing is spoken of already.

Considerations of Friday.

The Angel of Friday, his Sigil, his Planet, the Signe governing that Planet, and name of the third heaven.

THE ANGELS OF FRIDAY.

Anael. Rachiel. Sachiel.

THE ANGELS OF THE AIR REIGNING ON FRIDAY.

Sarabotes, King.

MINISTERS.

Amabiel. Aba. Abalidoth. Flaef.

THE WINDE WHICH THE SAID ANGELS OF THE AIR ARE UNDER.

The West-winde.

ANGELS OF THE THIRD HEAVEN, RULING ON FRIDAY, WHICH ARE TO BE CALLED FROM THE FOUR PARTS OF THE WORLD.

AT THE EAST.

Setchiel. Chedusitaniel. Corat. Tamael. Tenaciel.

AT THE WEST.

Turiel. Coniel. Babel. Kadie. Maltiel. Huphaltiel.

Heptameron

AT THE NORTH.

Peniel. Pemaël. Penat. Raphael. Raniel. Doremiel.

AT THE SOUTH.

Porna. Sachiel. Chermiel. Samael. Santanael. Famiel.

THE PERFUME OF FRIDAY.

Pepperwort.

The Conjunction of Friday.

Conjuro & confirmo super vos Angeli fortes, sancti atque potentes, in nomine On, Hey, Heya, Ja, Je, Adonay, Saday, & in nomine Saday, qui creavit quadrupedia & anamalia reptilia, & homines in sexto die, & Adæ dedit potestatem super omnia animalia: unde benedictum sit nomen creatoris in loco suo: & per nomina Angelorum servientium in tertio exercitu, coram Dagiel Angelo magno, principe forti atque potenti: & per nomen Stellæ quæ est Venus: & per Sigillum ejus, quod quidem est sanctum: & per nomina prædicta conjuro super te Anael, qui es præpositus diei sextæ, ut pro me labores, &c. As before in the Conjunction of Sunday.

The Spirits of the Air of Friday are subject to the West-winde; their nature is to give silver: to excite men, and incline them to luxury; to reconcile enemies through luxury; and to make marriages; to allure men to love women; to cause, or take away infirmities; and to do all things which have motion.

Considerations of Saturday, or the Sabbath day.

The Angel of Saturday, his Seal, his Planet, and the Signe governing the Planet.

THE ANGELS OF SATURDAY.

Cassiel. Machatan. Uriel.

THE ANGELS OF THE AIR RULING ON SATURDAY.

Maymon, King.

MINISTERS.

Abumalith. Assaibi. Balidet.

THE WINDE WHICH THE SAID ANGELS OF THE AIR AFORESAID ARE UNDER.
The Southwest-winde.

THE FUMIGATION OF FRIDAY.

Sulphur.

Heptameron

It is already declared in the Consideration of Thursday, That there are no Angels ruling the Air, above the fifth heaven: therefore in the four Angles of the world, use those Orations which you see applied to that purpose on Thursday.

The Conjuraton of Saturday.

Conjuro & confirmo super vos Caphriel vel Cassiel, Machatori, & Seraquiel Angeli fortes & potentes: & per nomen Adonay, Adonay, Adonay, Eie, Eie, Eie, Acim, Acim, Acin, Cados, Cados, Ina vel Ima, Ima, Saclay, Ja, Sar, Domini formatoris seculorum, qui in septimo die quie ut: & per illum qui in beneplacito suo filiis Israel in hereditatem observandum dedit, ut eum firmiter custodirent, & sanctificarent, ad habendam inde bonam in alio seculo remunerationem: & per nomina Angelorum servientium in exercitu septimo Poel Angelo magno & potenti principi: & per nomen stellæ quæ est Saturnus: & per sanctum Sigillum ejus: & per nomina prædicta conjuro super te Caphriel, qui præpositus es diei septimæ, quæ est dies Sabbati, quòd pro me labores, &c. As is set down in the Conjuraton of the Lords day.

The Spirits of the Air of Saturday are subject to the Southwest-winde: the nature of them is to sow discordes, hatred, evil thoughts and cogitations; to give leave freely, to slay and kill every one, and to lame or maim every member. Their manner of appearing is declared in the former book.

Heptameron

Tables of the Angels of the Hours, according to the course of the dayes.

SUNDAY.

Hours of the day.	Angels of the hours.	Hours of the day.	Angels of the hours.
1. Yayn.	Michael.	7. Ourer.	Samael.
2. Janor.	Anael.	8. Tanic.	Michael.
3. Nasnia.	Raphael.	9. Neron.	Anael.
4. Salla.	Gabriel.	10. Jayon.	Raphael.
5. Sadedali.	Cassiel.	11. Abay.	Gabriel.
6. Thamur.	Sachiel.	12. Natalon.	Cassiel.

SUNDAY NIGHT

Hours of the night.	Angels of the hours.	Hours of the night.	Angels of the hours.
1. Beron.	Sachiel.	7. Netos.	Cassiel.
2. Barol.	Samael.	8. Tafrac.	Sachiel.
3. Thanu.	Michael.	9. Saffur.	Samael.
4. Athir.	Anael.	10. Aglo.	Michael.
5. Mathun.	Raphael.	11. Calerna.	Anael.
6. Rana.	Gabriel.	12. Salam.	Raphael.

Heptameron

MUNDAY.

Hours of the day.	Angels of the hours.	Hours of the night.	Angels of the hours.
1. Yayn.	Gabriel.	1. Beron.	Anael.
2. Janor.	Cassiel.	2. Barol.	Raphael.
3. Nasnia.	Sachiel.	3. Thanu.	Gabriel.
4. Salla.	Samael.	4. Athir.	Cassiel.
5. Sadedali.	Michael.	5. Mathon.	Sachiel.
6. Thamur.	Anael.	6. Rana.	Samael.
7. Ourer.	Raphael.	7. Netos.	Michael.
8. Tanic.	Gabriel.	8. Tafrac.	Anael.
9. Neron.	Cassiel.	9. Sassur.	Raphael.
10. Jayon.	Sachiel.	10. Aglo.	Gabriel.
11. Abay.	Samael.	11. Calerna.	Cassiel.
12. Natalon.	Michael.	12. Salam.	Sachiel.

TUESDAY.

Hours of the day.	Angels of the hours.	Hours of the night.	Angels of the hours.
1. Yayn.	Samael.	1. Beron.	Cassiel.
2. Janor.	Michael.	2. Barol.	Sachiel.
3. Nasnia.	Anael.	3. Thanu.	Samael.
4. Salla.	Raphael.	4. Athir.	Michael.
5. Sadedali.	Gabriel.	5. Mathon.	Anael.
6. Thamur.	Cassiel.	6. Rana.	Raphael.
7. Ourer.	Sachiel.	7. Netos.	Gabriel.
8. Tanic.	Samael.	8. Tafrac.	Cassiel.
9. Neron.	Michael.	9. Sassur.	Sachiel.
10. Jayon.	Anael.	10. Aglo.	Samael.
11. Abay.	Raphael.	11. Calerna.	Michael.
12. Natalon.	Gabriel.	12. Salam.	Anael.

Heptameron

WEDNESDAY.

Hours of the day.	Angels of the hours.	Hours of the night.	Angels of the hours.
1. Yayn.	Raphael.	1. Beron.	Michael.
2. Janor.	Gabriel.	2. Barol.	Anael.
3. Nasnia.	Cassiel.	3. Thanu.	Raphael.
4. Salla.	Sachael.	4. Athir.	Gabriel.
5. Sadedali.	Samael.	5. Mathon.	Cassiel.
6. Thamur.	Michael.	6. Rana.	Sachiel.
7. Ourer.	Anael.	7. Netos.	Samael.
8. Tanic.	Raphael.	8. Tafrac.	Michael.
9. Neron.	Gabriel.	9. Sassur.	Anael.
10. Jayon.	Cassiel.	10. Aglo.	Raphael.
11. Abay.	Sachiel.	11. Calerna.	Gabriel.
12. Natalon.	Samael.	12. Salam.	Cassiel.

THURSDAY.

Hours of the day.	Angels of the hours.	Hours of the night.	Angels of the hours.
1. Yayn.	Sachiel.	1. Beron.	Gabriel.
2. Janor.	Samael.	2. Barol.	Cassiel.
3. Nasnia.	Michael.	3. Thanu.	Sachiel.
4. Salla.	Anael.	4. Athir.	Samael.
5. Sadedali.	Raphael.	5. Mathon.	Michael.
6. Thamur.	Gabriel.	6. Rana.	Anael.
7. Ourer.	Cassiel.	7. Netos.	Raphael.
8. Tanic.	Sachiel.	8. Tafrac.	Gabriel.
9. Neron.	Samael.	9. Sassur.	Cassiel.
10. Jayon.	Michael.	10. Aglo.	Sachiel.
11. Abay.	Anael.	11. Calerna.	Samael.
12. Natalon.	Raphael.	12. Salam.	Michael.

Heptameron

FRIDAY.

Hours of the day.	Angels of the hours.	Hours of the night.	Angels of the hours.
1. Yayn.	Anael.	1. Beron.	Samael.
2. Janor.	Raphael.	2. Barol.	Michael.
3. Nasnia.	Gabriel.	3. Thanu.	Anael.
4. Salla.	Cassiel.	4. Athir.	Raphael.
5. Sadedali.	Sachiel.	5. Mathon.	Gabriel.
6. Thamur.	Samael.	6. Rana.	Cassiel.
7. Ourer.	Michael.	7. Netos.	Sachiel.
8. Tanic.	Anael.	8. Tafrac.	Samael.
9. Neron.	Raphael.	9. Sassur.	Michael.
10. Jayon.	Gabriel.	10. Aglo.	Anael.
11. Abay.	Cassiel.	11. Calerna.	Raphael.
12. Natalon.	Sachiel.	12. Salam.	Gabriel.

SATURDAY.

Hours of the day.	Angels of the hours.	Hours of the night.	Angels of the hours.
1. Yayn.	Cassiel.	1. Beron.	Raphael.
2. Janor.	Sachiel.	2. Barol.	Gabriel.
3. Nasnia.	Samael.	3. Thanu.	Cassiel.
4. Salla.	Michael.	4. Athir.	Sachiel.
5. Sadedali.	Anael.	5. Mathon.	Samael.
6. Thamur.	Raphael.	6. Rana.	Michael.
7. Ourer.	Gabriel.	7. Netos.	Anael.
8. Tanic.	Cassiel.	8. Tafrac.	Raphael.
9. Neron.	Sachiel.	9. Sassur.	Gabriel.
10. Jayon.	Samael.	10. Aglo.	Cassiel.
11. Abay.	Michael.	11. Calerna.	Sachiel.
12. Natalon.	Anael.	12. Salam.	Samael.

Heptameron

But this is to be observed by the way, that the first hour of the day, of every Country, and in every season whatsoever, is to be assigned to the Sun-rising, when he first appeareth arising in the horizon: and the first hour of the night is to be the thirteenth hour, from the first hour of the day. But of these things it is sufficiently spoken.

FINIS.

The Heptameron of Peter de Abano.

Transcribed from the 1657 edition of The Fourth Book of Occult Philosophy, translated and edited by Robert Turner.

Adobe Acrobat edition created by Benjamin Rowe, July 1, 2000.

NOTE: This document is optimized for printing on a laser or inkjet printer. The illustrations may appear “jagged” when viewed onscreen with certain displays. They will print at the full resolution of your printer.

UNIVERSITY OF ST. MICHAEL'S COLLEGE

3 1761 02182091 5

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

THE HEPTAMERON.

THE HEPTAMERON

OF THE TALES OF

MARGARET, QUEEN OF NAVARRE

(Newly translated into English)

FROM THE AUTHENTIC TEXT, BASED ON THE MSS. IN THE POSSESSION OF THE SOCIÉTÉ DES BIBLIOPHILES FRANÇAIS

EDITED BY

M. LE ROUX DE LINCY

SUPPLEMENTED WITH THE VALUABLE EXPLANATORY NOTES OF THE BEST FRENCH EDITION

GIVING ALSO

A SUPPOSITITIOUS KEY OF THE PERSONAGES OF THE TALES, THE PEDIGREES OF MARGARET OF ANGOULÊME AND OF THE HOUSE OF ORLEANS, AND MUCH ADDITIONAL HISTORICAL DATA OF GREAT INTEREST, PREVIOUSLY UNPUBLISHED, AND THEREFORE NOT INCLUDED IN ANY OTHER ENGLISH EDITION; AND CONTAINING

A MEMOIR OF THE AUTHOR AND OF HER MOTHER
LOUISE OF SAVOY

WITH AN ESSAY ON

THE BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE HEPTAMERON

BY

ERNEST A. VIZETELLY

Etc.

PRINTED FOR THE BIBLIOPHILIST LIBRARY

Copyright, 1902, by D. Tremor.

THE FORTUNATE LOVERS

(The Heptameron).

EIGHT DAYS' ENTERTAINMENT.

SYNOPSIS OF EACH DAY'S STORY-TELLING.

ON THE FIRST DAY ARE RECOUNTED THE BAD TURNS DONE BY WOMEN TO MEN, AND BY MEN TO WOMEN.

ON THE SECOND DAY EACH ONE TELLS THE FIRST CONCEIT THAT RISETH IN HIS BRAIN.

ON THE THIRD DAY RELATION IS MADE OF THE LADIES THAT HAVE HAD NO AIM BUT HONOR; AND OF THE ABOMINABLE HYPOCRISY OF THE MONKS.

ON THE FOURTH DAY RELATION IS MADE FOR THE MOST PART OF THE VIRTUOUS PATIENCE AND LONG-SUFFERING OF WOMEN TO WIN THEIR HUSBANDS; AND OF THE PRUDENCE USED OF MEN TOWARDS THEIR WIVES FOR THE PRESERVING OF THE HONOR OF THEIR HOUSES AND LINEAGE.

ON THE FIFTH DAY RELATION IS MADE OF THE VIRTUOUSNESS OF SUCH MAIDS AND WIVES OF WHOM HONOR HATH BEEN PREFERRED BEFORE PLEASURE; OF THEM LIKEWISE WHO HAVE DONE THE CONTRARY THERETO; AND THE SIMPLENESS OF CERTAIN OTHERS.

ON THE SIXTH DAY RELATION IS MADE OF THE DECEITS BETWEEN MAN AND WOMAN, THROUGH COVETOUSNESS, VENGEANCE, AND CRAFTINESS.

ON THE SEVENTH DAY RELATION IS MADE OF THEM THAT HAVE DONE WHAT THEY LEAST DESIRED.

THE EIGHTH DAY WAS TO HAVE BEEN DEVOTED TO RELATING "THE GREATEST FOLLIES WE CAN THINK OF, THE SAME BEING REALLY TRUE;" BUT ONLY TWO STORIES ARE GIVEN, THE MANUSCRIPT FOR THE REMAINDER NOT HAVING BEEN DISCOVERED AFTER THE DEATH OF QUEEN MARGARET.

JOHN THE GOOD,
King of France, d. 1364.

1349
JEANNE DE BOURBON = CHARLES V. King of France.
(1337-1380).

ISABELLA OF BAVARIA—CHARLES VI.
King of France,
died 1422.

(several children)

CHARLES VII.
King of France,
died 1461.

ISABELLE,
mar.
RICHARD,
King of England.
MARRIED 1406
died 1409

LOUIS I., Duke of Orleans, Luxembourg, Aquitaine, Count of Valois, Beaumont, Blois, Dreux, Soissons, Périgord, &c., &c., murdered 1407.
*Jean Dunois, Bastard of Orleans,
b. 1402, of Mariette de Canny, and by his wife Marie d'Harcourt, founder of the Ducs de Longueville.*

CHARLES, Duke of Orleans, born 1393, b. 1394, d. 1394.

JOHN, Count of Angoulême, b. 1404, Captive in England, 1412-1444. Contracted during his captivity 1431 to Jeanne de Rohan. He married after his release her 1449 sister Marguerite, and had issue.

PHILIPPE, Count of Vertus, born 1396. Contracted. 1408, to Catherine of Burgundy, he repudiated her, 1410; died without issue, 1420.

JOHN, Count of Angoulême, b. 1404, Cap-
tive in England, 1412-1444. Contracted during his captivity 1431 to Jeanne de Rohan. He married after his release her 1449 sister Marguerite, and had issue.

MARGARET, born—RICHARD OF BRITTANY, 1406, died in the Abbaye de la Guiche, April 24, 1466.

LOUIS XI., King of France, died 1483, married Charlotte of Savoy.

MARY OF CLEVES.

1440 married. He died 1465.

JOHN, Count of Angoulême, b. 1404, Captive in England, 1412-1444. Contracted during his captivity 1431 to Jeanne de Rohan. He married after his release her 1449 sister Marguerite, and had issue.

MARGUERITE, dau. of Alain IX. de Rohan.

CHARLES VII., King of France, ob. s. p. 1498.

1473 = LOUIS II., Duke of Orleans, imprisoned 1488-1491, married in childhood to Jeanne of France. Ascended the throne of France, 1498, as Louis XII., and married the widowed Queen Anne, 1498 Duchess of Brittany, his cousin.

JEANNE, divorced 1498.

FRANCIS II., Duke of Brittany, died 1488.

LOUISE, married circa 1500, CHARLES I. de la Trémouille. [This brings the arms of Orleans and Milan into the coat of De la Trémouille.]

ANNE, Duchess of Brittany, wife of King Charles VIII., and King Louis XII. of France, d. 1513.

ISABELLE, Countess of Vertus, afterwards Duke of Milan.

1360 = GIANGALEAZZO VISCONTI, afterwards Duke of Milan.

1389 = VALENTINE VISCONTI, Countess of Asti and Vertus, with pretensions to Milan, b. 1366, d. 1408.

JOHN, Count of Angoulême, b. 1404, Cap-
tive in England, 1412-1444. Contracted during his captivity 1431 to Jeanne de Rohan. He married after his release her 1449 sister Marguerite, and had issue.

MARGARET, born—RICHARD OF BRITTANY, 1406, died in the Abbaye de la Guiche, April 24, 1466.

MARGUERITE, dau. of Alain IX. de Rohan.

FRANCIS II., Duke of Brittany, died 1488.

LOUISE, married circa 1500, CHARLES I. de la Trémouille. [This brings the arms of Orleans and Milan into the coat of De la Trémouille.]

ANNE, Duchess of Brittany, wife of King Charles VIII., and King Louis XII. of France, d. 1513.

CLAUDE, Duchess of Brittany and Orleans, 1499-1523, b. 1494, d. 1547.

FRANCIS I. of France, MARGARET OF ANGOULÊME, b. 1492, d. 1549.

PEDIGREE OF MARGARET OF ANGOULÊME.^A

ON THE BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE HEPTAMERON.

(CONDENSED FROM MR. VIZETELLY'S ESSAY AND FROM THE WRITINGS OF OTHER CRITICAL AUTHORITIES.)

THE first published version of the famous Tales of Margaret of Navarre, issued in Paris in the year 1558 under the title of Histoires des Amans Fortunez, was extremely faulty and imperfect. It comprises but sixty-seven of the seventy-two tales written by the royal author; and the editor, Pierre Boaistuau, not merely changed the order of those narratives which he did print, but suppressed numerous passages in them, besides modifying much of Margaret's phraseology. A somewhat similar course was adopted by Claude Gruget, who a year later produced what claimed to be a complete version of the stories, to which he gave the general title of The Heptameron, a name which they have ever since retained. Although he retained the majority of the tales in their proper sequence he still suppressed several of them, and also modified the Queen's language after the fashion set by Boaistuau.

Despite its imperfections, however, Gruget's version was frequently reprinted down to the beginning of the eighteenth century, when it served as the basis of the numerous editions of the Heptameron in beau langage, as the French phrased it. It served, moreover, in the one or the other form, for the English and other translations of the work, and down to our own time was accepted as the standard version of the Queen of Navarre's celebrated tales. Although it was known that various contemporary MSS. were preserved at the French National Library in Paris, no attempt was made to compare Gruget's faulty version with the originals until 1853, when the Société des Bibliophiles Français entrusted this delicate task to M. Le Roux de Lincy, whose labors led to some most valuable discoveries, enabling him to produce a really authentic version of Margaret's admirable masterpiece, with the suppressed tales restored, the omitted passages reinstated, and the Queen's real language given for the first time in all its simple gracefulness.

It is from the authentic text furnished by M. Le Roux de Lincy that the present translation has been made, without the slightest suppression or abridgment. The work, moreover, contains all of the really valuable notes to be found in the best French editions of the Heptameron, as well as numerous others from original sources, and includes a resumé of the various suggestions made by MM. Felix Frank, Le Roux de Lincy, Paul Lacroix, and A. de Montaignon toward the identification of the principal actors in them with well-known historical personages of the time.

Miniature courts were held by Margaret at Nérac and Pau, which yielded to none in Europe in the intellectual brilliancy of their frequenters. Margaret was at once one of the chief patronesses of letters that France possessed and the chief refuge and defender of advocates of the Reformed doctrines. Around her gathered Marot, Bonaventure, Desperiers, Denisot, Peletier, Brodeau, and many other men of letters, while she protected Rabelais, Dolet, etc. For a time her influence with her brother, Francis I., King of France, was effectual, but later political rather than religious considerations made him discourage Lutheranism, and a fierce persecution was begun against both Protestants and freethinkers, a persecution which drove Desperiers to suicide and brought Dolet to the stake. Margaret herself, however, was protected by her brother, and her personal inclinations seem to have been rather toward a mystical pietism than toward dogmatic Protestant sentiments.

The Heptameron, constructed, as its name indicates, on the lines of the Decameron of Boccaccio, consists of seventy-two short stories told to each other by a company of ladies and gentlemen who were delayed on the journey homeward from Cauterets, a fashionable watering-place, by the swelling of a river. Margaret died in 1549. In 1558, about ten years after the author's death, the Heptameron was first printed. It is a delightful book, and strongly characteristic of the French Renaissance. The sensuality which characterized the period appears in it, but in less coarse form than in the great work of Rabelais.

It has been claimed by some critics that internal evidence is strongly in favor of its having been a joint work in which more than one of the men of letters who composed Margaret's household took part; but against this supposition we may place the positive testimony of Brantôme. The Queen of Navarre, he says, "composed most of these novels in her litter as she travelled, for her hours of retirement were employed in affairs of importance. I have heard this account from my grandmother, who always went with her in her litter as her lady of honor and held her ink-horn for her; and she wrote them down as quickly and readily, or rather more so, than if they had been dictated to her."

It is to the literal truth of the tales of the Heptameron that we must attribute its immediate success at court and in subsequently holding the attention of so many successive generations of readers. These tales were not only true, but they were about people with whom everyone was acquainted. The real salt of the book lies in this naive, unconsidered, and unpremeditated realism. A great many details, quite absurd and trivial in themselves, which Queen Margaret introduced merely because they so happened, surprise and delight us with their fresh veracity. We are plunged into a strange world of contrasts—a world of beautiful light-minded ladies, to whom the life or death of common people is a trivial alternative. These exquisite creatures ("si divines et délicates," as Margaret herself wrote of Madame d'Estampes) spend their time in broidering in open-work, red silken counterpanes, in reading (they all know it by heart) La Belle Dame sans Merci, in devising interviews with their lovers, or in visiting the fashionable magician of the town in order to observe the wasting of the waxen images of those whom they design to make away with! Torture was still used in civic trials of Alençon, where the Duke had absolute power of life or death like any other duke in Shakespeare's plays. We are gratified to learn that ten crowns was the proper fee for a hired assassin, and that, although sanctuary was still given to these gentry in palaces and churches, the ends of justice were sometimes secured by starving out the refugees.

The Heptameron is the best known and the most popular of all the old collections of tales in the French language. It has been the delight of the unlearned, scholars have warmly commended it, and men of talent and genius have borrowed from its pages. Brantôme speaks of it with enthusiasm, and quotes it repeatedly; Lafontaine, the conteur par excellence, acknowledges his obligations to it; Montaigne calls it un gentil livre pour son étoffe—"a nice book for its matter;" and Bayle says it is "after the manner of Boccace's novels," and "has some beauties in that kind which are surprising." The book, too, has had its enemies as well as its admirers, for it abounds with reflections on religious topics which accord with the author's known leaning to the cause of the Reformers; and through the whole work the monks, especially the Cordeliers, are treated with much severity, and are represented as committing, and sometimes with impunity even when discovered, the most cruel, deceitful, and immoral actions.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE.
PROLOGUE TO THE HEPTAMERON.....	I

FIRST DAY.

NOVEL I.

A woman of Alençon having two lovers, one for her pleasure and the other for her profit, caused that one of the two to be slain who was the first to discover her gallantries—She obtained her pardon and that of her husband, who had fled the country, and who afterwards, in order to save some money, applied to a necromancer—The matter was found out and punished.....	13
---	----

NOVEL II.

Chaste and lamentable death of the wife of one of the Queen of Navarre's muleteers.....	22
---	----

NOVEL III.

A king of Naples, having debauched the wife of a gentleman, at last wears horns himself.....	27
--	----

NOVEL IV.

Presumptuous attempt of a gentleman upon a Princess of Flanders, and the shame it brought upon him.....	34
---	----

NOVEL V.

A boatwoman escapes from two Cordeliers, who wanted to force her, and exposes them to public derision.....	43
--	----

(vii)

NOVEL VI.

- Stratagem by which a woman enables her gallant to escape, when her husband, who was blind of an eye, thought to surprise them together... .. 47

NOVEL VII.

- Trick put by a mercer of Paris upon an old woman to conceal his intrigue with her daughter..... .. 50

NOVEL VIII.

- A man having lain with his wife, believing that he was in bed with his servant, sends his friend to do the same thing; and the friend makes a cuckold of him without the wife being aware of it..... .. 53

NOVEL IX.

- Deplorable death of a lover in consequence of his knowing too late that he was beloved by his mistress.... .. 61

NOVEL X.

- The loves of Amadour and Florida, wherein are seen several stratagems and dissimulations, and the exemplary chastity of Florida..... .. 68

SECOND DAY.

NOVEL XI.

- An odorous adventure which befell Madame de Roncex at the Franciscan Monastery of Thouars..... .. 107
Facetious sayings of a Cordelier in his sermons.... .. 109

NOVEL XII.

- Incontinence and tyranny of a Duke of Florence—Just punishment of his wickedness..... .. 113

NOVEL XIII.

- A captain of a galley, under the cloak of devotion, fell in love with a demoiselle—What happened in consequence..... .. 123

NOVEL XIV.

Subtlety of a lover, who, counterfeiting the real favourite, found means to recompense himself for his past troubles... 134

NOVEL XV.

A lady of the court, seeing herself neglected by her husband, whose love was bestowed elsewhere, retaliated upon him... 142

NOVEL XVI.

A Milanese lady tested her lover's courage, and afterwards loved him heartily..... 158

NOVEL XVII.

King Francis gives a signal proof of his courage in the case of Count Guillaume, who designed his death..... 165

NOVEL XVIII.

A lady tests the fidelity of a young student, her lover, before granting him her favours..... 169

NOVEL XIX.

Two lovers, in despair at being hindered from marrying, turn monk and nun..... 176

NOVEL XX.

A gentleman finds his cruel fair one in the arms of her groom, and is cured at once of his love..... 186

THIRD DAY.

NOVEL XXI.

Virtuous love of a young lady of quality and a bastard of an illustrious house—Hinderance of their marriage by a queen —Sage reply of the demoiselle to the queen—Her subsequent marriage..... 192

NOVEL XXII.

PAGE.

- A hypocritical prior tries every means to seduce a nun, but at last his villainy is discovered 215

NOVEL XXIII.

- A Cordelier who was the cause of three murders, that of husband, wife, and child 228

NOVEL XXIV.

- Ingenious device of a Castilian in order to make a declaration of love to a queen, and what came of it 237

NOVEL XXV.

- Cunning contrivance of a young prince to enjoy the wife of an advocate of Paris 248

NOVEL XXVI.

- By the advice and sisterly affection of a virtuous lady, the lord of Avannes was weaned from his dissolute amours with a lady of Pampeluna 255

NOVEL XXVII.

- A secretary had the impudence to solicit the favours of his host's wife, and had only the shame for his pains 272

NOVEL XXVIII.

- A secretary, thinking to dupe a certain person, was himself duped 275

NOVEL XXIX.

- A villager, whose wife intrigued with the parish priest, suffered himself to be easily deceived 278

NOVEL XXX.

- Notable example of human frailty in a lady who, to conceal an evil, commits a still greater one 281

FOURTH DAY.

NOVEL XXXI.

PAGE.

A monastery of Cordeliers was burned, and the monks in it, in perpetual memory of the cruelty of one of them who was in love with a lady. 292

NOVEL XXXII.

A husband surprises his wife in flagrante delicto, and subjects her to a punishment more terrible than death itself. 298

NOVEL XXXIII.

Incest of a priest, who got his sister with child under the cloak of sanctity, and how it was punished. 305

NOVEL XXXIV.

Two over-inquisitive Cordeliers had a great fright, which had like to cost them their lives. 310

NOVEL XXXV.

Contrivance of a sensible husband to cure his wife of her passion for a Cordelier. 315

NOVEL XXXVI.

A President of Grenoble, becoming aware of his wife's irregularities, took his measures so wisely that he revenged himself without any public exposure of his dishonour. 324

NOVEL XXXVII.

Judicious proceedings of a wife to withdraw her husband from a low intrigue with which he was infatuated. 331

NOVEL XXXVIII.

Memorable charity of a lady of Tours with regard to her faithless husband. 336

	PAGE.
NOVEL XXXIX.
Secret for driving away the hobgoblin.....	340
NOVEL XL.
The Count de Jossebelin has his brother-in-law put to death, not knowing the relationship.....	342
FIFTH DAY.
NOVEL XLI.
Strange and novel penance imposed by a Cordelier confessor on a young lady..	353
NOVEL XLII.
Chaste perseverance of a maiden, who resisted the obstinate pursuit of one of the greatest lords in France—Agreeable issue of the affair for the demoiselle.....	358
NOVEL XLIII.
Hypocrisy of a court lady discovered by the dénouement of her amours, which she wished to conceal	370
NOVEL XLIV.
A Cordelier received a double alms for telling the plain truth.	378
How two lovers cleverly consummated their amours, the issue of which was happy.....	381
NOVEL XLV.
A husband, giving the Innocents to his servant girl, plays upon his wife's simplicity	390
NOVEL XLVI.
A sanctimonious Cordelier attempts to debauch the wife of a judge, and actually ravishes a young lady, whose mother had foolishly authorised him to chastise her for lying too late in bed ..	397

A Cordelier's sermons on the subject of husbands beating their wives.....	401
---	-----

NOVEL XLVII.

A gentleman of the Pays du Perche, distrusting his friend, obliges him to do him the mischief of which he has falsely suspected him	405
--	-----

NOVEL XLVIII.

A Cordelier took the husband's place on his wedding-night, while the latter was dancing with the bridal party.....	410
--	-----

NOVEL XLIX.

Of a countess who diverted herself adroitly with love sport, and how her game was discovered.....	413
---	-----

NOVEL L.

A lover, after a blood-letting, receives favours from his mistress, dies in consequence, and is followed by the fair one, who sinks under her grief	421
---	-----

SIXTH DAY.

NOVEL LI.

Perfidy and cruelty of an Italian duke.....	427
---	-----

NOVEL LII.

A nasty breakfast given to an advocate and a gentleman by an apothecary's man.....	432
--	-----

NOVEL LIII.

Madame de Neufchastel, by her dissimulation, forced the Prince of Belhoste to put her to such a proof as turned to her dishonour.....	436
---	-----

NOVEL LIV.

A lady laughed to see her husband kissing her servant, and,
---	--

being asked the reason, replied that she laughed at her shadow	PAGE 444
--	-------------

NOVEL LV.

Cunning Advice of a Spanish widow to defraud the Mendicant Friars of a testamentary bequest made to them by her husband....	447
---	-----

NOVEL LVI.

A pious lady having asked a Cordelier to provide a good husband for her daughter, he marries another Cordelier to the young lady, and possesses himself of her dowry—The cheat is discovered and punished...	451
--	-----

NOVEL LVII.

Of a ridiculous milord who wore a lady's glove on his dress-coat.....	458
---	-----

NOVEL LVIII.

How a lady of the court pleasantly revenged herself on her faithless lover.....	462
---	-----

NOVEL LIX.

The same lady, whose husband was jealous of her without just cause, contrives to detect him in such a position with one of her women that he is obliged to humble himself, and allow his wife to live as she pleases...	466
---	-----

NOVEL LX.

A woman of Paris quits her husband for one of the king's chanters, counterfeits death, and is buried, but secretly disinterred alive and well—Her husband marries another wife, and fifteen years afterwards is obliged to repudiate her, and take back his first wife.....	474
---	-----

SEVENTH DAY.

PAGE.

NOVEL LXI.

A husband became reconciled to his wife after she had lived fourteen or fifteen years with a canon. 481

NOVEL LXII.

A lady recounting an adventure of gallantry that had occurred to herself, and speaking in the third person, inadvertently betrayed her own secret. 489

NOVEL LXIII.

Notable chastity of a French lord. 493

NOVEL LXIV.

A gentleman, having been unable to marry a person he loves, becomes a Cordelier in despite—Sore distress of his mistress thereat. 497

NOVEL LXV.

Simplicity of an old woman, who presented a lighted candle to Saint Jean de Lyon, and wanted to fasten it on the forehead of a soldier who was sleeping on a tomb—What happened in consequence. 502

NOVEL LXVI.

Amusing adventure of Monsieur de Vendome and the Princess of Navarre. 505

NOVEL LXVII.

Love and extreme hardships of a woman in a foreign land. . . . 509

NOVEL LXVIII.

A woman gives her husband powder of cantharides to make him love her, and goes near to killing him. 513

NOVEL LXIX.

An Italian suffered himself to be duped by his servant maid, and was caught by his wife bolting meal in place of the girl..... 516

NOVEL LXX.

The horrible incontinence and malice of a Duchess of Burgundy was the cause of her death, and of that of two persons who fondly loved each other 520

EIGHTH DAY.

NOVEL LXXI.

A woman at the point of death flew into such a violent passion at seeing her husband kiss her servant that she recovered. . 547

NOVEL LXXII.

Continual repentance of a nun who had lost her virginity without violence and without love..... 550

MEMOIR OF LOUISE OF SAVOY, DUCHESS OF ANGOULÊME, AND OF HER DAUGHTER,
MARGARET, QUEEN OF NAVARRE.

Two children were born of the marriage of Charles of Orleans, Count of Angoulême, a prince of the blood royal of France, and Louise, the daughter of Philip, Duke of Savoy, and Margaret of Bourbon. The elder of the two was Margaret, the principal subject of this memoir, born on the 11th of April, 1492; the younger, born on the 12th of September, 1494, was the prince who succeeded Louis XII. on the throne of France, February, 1515, under the name of Francis I.

Married when she was little more than eleven years old, Louise of Savoy was left a widow before she had completed her eighteenth year, and thenceforth devoted herself with exemplary assiduity to the care of her children, who repaid her solicitude by the warm affection they always felt for their mother and for each other. She was a woman of remarkable beauty and capacity, and her character and conduct were deserving, in many respects, of the eulogies which her daughter never wearied of lavishing upon them; but less partial writers have convicted her of criminal acts which brought disasters upon her son and her country. In the first year of his reign, Francis I. committed the regency of the kingdom to his mother, and set out on his expedition to Italy. He was absent but a few months; nevertheless, this first regency enabled Louise of Savoy to fill the most important offices with men entirely devoted to her interests, and even to her caprices, and to gratify by any and every means the insatiable thirst for money with which she was cursed.

In the beginning of the year 1522, Lautrec, one of the king's favourites, who commanded his forces in Italy, lost in a few days all the advantages which Francis had gained by the victory of Marignano. He returned to Paris with only two attendants, and sought an audience of the king, who refused at first to receive him. Finally, at the intercession of the Constable of Bourbon, Francis allowed Lautrec to appear before him, and, after loading him with reproaches, demanded what excuse he could offer for himself. Lautrec calmly replied, "The troops I commanded, not having been paid, refused to follow me, and I was left alone."—"What!" said the king, "I sent you four hundred thousand crowns to Genoa, and Semblançay, the superintendent of finance, forwarded you three hundred thousand."—"Sire, I have received nothing."—Semblançay being summoned to the presence, "Father," said the king (who addressed him in that way on account of his great age), "come hither and tell us if you have not, in pursuance of my order, sent M. de Lautrec the sum of three hundred thousand crowns?"—"Sire," replied the superintendent, "I am prepared to prove that I delivered the sum to the duchess your mother, that she might employ it as you say."—"Very well," said the king, and went into his mother's room to question her. Louise of Savoy threw the whole blame on Semblançay, who was immediately confronted with her. He persisted in his first statement, and the duchess was forced to confess that she had received the greater part of the sum in question, but she alleged that the money was due to her by the superintendent, and she did not see why her private income should be applied to the Italian expedition. Francis most bitterly upbraided his mother for thus embezzling the money of the state, but his wrath fell more heavily on the minister, whom he found to have been guilty of culpable complaisance towards her. The unfortunate Semblançay was arrested, commissioners were appointed to examine his accounts, and, being condemned by their report, he was hung on the gibbet at Monfaucon, on the 9th of August, 1527.

Louise of Savoy was deeply implicated in a still fouler transaction, which was attended with the most terrible consequences. This was the iniquitous lawsuit brought against the Constable of Bourbon, which was followed by his desertion and treason. According to all historians, the insensate love of the Duchess of Angoulême, then aged forty-four, for the constable, who was but thirty-two, was the sole cause of this suit; but her cupidity, and the secret jealousy with which Francis I. regarded one of the handsomest, wealthiest, and bravest men in his kingdom, also contributed to that result. The object of the suit was to wrest from the constable the lordships bequeathed to him by Suzanne de Beaujeu, one of the richest heiresses in Europe, and to which Louise of Savoy laid claim as next of kin to the deceased. She did so at the instigation of the Chancellor Duprat, whose reasonings on this subject we are enabled to give in his own words, as follows:—

“The marriage of M. Charles de Bourbon with Madame Suzanne was nothing else than a mere shift to stop the action at law which the said lord was ready to move against Madame de Bourbon and her daughter, on account of the estates of appanage and others entailed on the marriage of Jean de Bourbon and Maria of Berry. The mere apprehension of this contest made the said Madame de Bourbon condescend thereto, and to that end she dissolved the contract passed between M. d’Alençon and Madame Suzanne. Hence there is a likelihood that a similar apprehension of a suit to be promoted for the whole inheritance of the house by two stronger parties than was then the said Lord of Bourbon, who was neither old enough nor strong enough to prosecute it, as the king and his mother will be, may cause some overtures to be made on the one side or the other to compromise and allay this difference.

“M. de Bourbon is now but thirty-two, and Madame, the king’s mother, cannot be more than forty at most, which is not too disproportioned an age for so great a lady, handsome, rich, and so highly qualified. Should the said Lord of Bourbon agree to this marriage, why there she is at the point she desires, Duchess of Bourbonnais and Auvergne, and lady of that great heritage. If, on the contrary, he refuses, it will be necessary to bring this action, prosecute it vigorously, employ in it the authority of the king and my lady his mother, and spare nought to further it. This will make him bethink himself, however intractable he may be, and he will be very glad to return into favour by this means. If not, as he is a courageous prince, when he finds himself threatened with the loss of all his possessions, titles, and dignities, he will do something extraordinary, and will choose rather to abandon his country (as M. du Bellay says) than to live in it in a necessitous condition. He will withdraw out of the realm, and by so doing he will confiscate all. So that he cannot fail to do what is desired, be it how it may.”*

The Constable of Bourbon having rejected, and even it is said with disdain, the offer of marriage made to him, the suit was brought before the parliament, and was decided in favour of the Duchess of Angoulême. But the pleasure brought her by this triumph over her haughty adversary was not of long duration. A few months after he was despoiled of all his estates, Charles of Bourbon quitted France, and entered the service of Charles V. In the following year, 1524, he drove the French out of Italy, and on the 24th of February, 1525, he defeated them in the famous battle of Pavia, in which Francis I. was taken prisoner, after receiving five wounds. The Duchess of Angoulême, as Regent of France, displayed great courage and ability under this heavy calamity. She soon received from her captive son the letter containing that memorable phrase—“De toutes choses ne m'est demeuré que l'honneur, et la vie qui est sauve”—“I have lost all but honour and life.” This letter was a great joy to her. Margaret wrote respecting it to her brother, “Your letter has had such an effect of Madame, and of all those who love you, that it has been to us a Holy Ghost after the sorrow of the passion. . . . Madame has felt her strength so greatly redoubled, that all day and evening not a minute is lost for your affairs, so that you need not have any pain or care about your realm and your children."

* Histoire de Bourbon, p. 226 r°. Des desseins des professions nobles et publiques, &c., &c. Par Ant. de Laval. Paris, 1605.

After taking all necessary measures for the internal defence of the kingdom, the regent and her daughter took up their residence at Lyon, for the purpose of the more readily receiving news from Italy. There they learned that Charles V. had removed his prisoner to Madrid, and that he was becoming more and more exacting in the conditions for his release. Francis I. wrote to his mother that he was very ill, and begged her to come to him ; but in spite of her love for her son, she felt that she could not comply with his request, for it would have been risking the fate of the monarchy to put the regent along with the King of France into the Emperor's hands. Sacrificing, therefore, her feelings as a mother to the requirements of the state, she sent her daughter Margaret instead of herself to Madrid.

After she had done her part to the utmost for her son's release, and in the negotiations for the treaty of peace which was concluded at Cambria on the 5th of August, 1529, the Duchess of Angoulême took no further share in the government of the realm. She had repaired, as far as it was possible for her, the misfortunes earned by her conduct with regard to the constable. Her labours as regent, during her son's captivity, had completely ruined her health, which had begun to fail before that event. In September, 1531, she was at Fontainebleau with her daughter and all the other ladies of her court ; the plague was raging in the neighbourhood, and Louise, who had a great dread of death, was incessantly occupied with medicine and new receipts against disorders of all kinds. Her spirits were very low, and her countenance so changed as scarcely to be recognized by her daughter. "If you would like to know her pastime," Margaret writes to her brother, "it is that, after dinner, when she has given audience, instead of doing her customary works, she sends for all those who have any malady, whether in the legs, arms or breasts, and with her own hand she dresses them by way of trying an ointment she has, which is very singular." This horror at the thought of death was common to both mother and daughter. Brantôme says of the former, "She was in her time, as I have heard many say who have seen and known her, a very fine lady, but very worldly withal, and was the same in her declining age, and hated to hear discourse of death, even from preachers in their sermons : as if, said she, we did not know well enough that we must all die some time or other ; and these preachers, when they have nothing else to say in their sermons, like ignorant persons, fall to talking of death. The late Queen of Navarre, her daughter, liked no more than her mother these repetitions and preachings concerning death." *

A few days after the date of the letter quoted in the last paragraph, Louise of Savoy quitted Fontainebleau for change of air, but was obliged to stop at Grès, a little village of the Gâtinais, where she died on the 22d of September, 1531. We now turn to her daughter's history.

Charles of Austria, Count of Flanders, afterwards the Emperor Charles V., was residing at the court of Louis XII. when Margaret of Angoulême appeared there accompanying her brother on his entrance into public life. The Count of Flanders was much struck by her appearance and her accomplishments, and eagerly sought her in marriage. But Louis XII. refused to bestow upon him the sister of the heir presumptive of the throne of France, and chose rather to marry her in the following year, December, 1509, to Charles, Duke of Alençon, a prince of the royal family.

Historians have treated the memory of Margaret's first husband with excessive severity. He had the misfortune to escape unwounded from the fatal battle of Pavia, while endeavouring to save the remains of the routed army ; and it has been alleged that on his arrival at Lyon, where he found his wife and mother-in-law, he was received by them both with the most contumelious reproaches, and that, unable to endure his shame and remorse, he died a few days after. That is not true. The battle of Pavia was fought on the 24th of February, 1525, and the Duke of Alençon did not die until the 11th of April, that is to say, more than a month after his arrival in Lyon. It appears from the testimony of an eye-witness, brought to light by the last editors of the Heptameron, that he was carried off by a pleurisy in five days, that he was comforted on his death-bed by his wife and her mother, that he spoke with profound regret of the king's misfortune, but that nothing escaped his own lips or those of the two ladies to indicate the faintest idea on either side that he had not done his duty at Pavia.

The first five years of Margaret's wedded life were passed in privacy in her duchy of Alençon, but from the date of her brother's accession to the throne, in January, 1515, her talents were employed with advantage in affairs of state. "Such was her discourse," says Brantôme, "that the ambassadors who addressed her were extremely taken with it, and gave a high character of it to their countrymen on their return, and by this she became a good assistant to the king her brother; for they always waited on her after their principal audience, and frequently, when he had affairs of importance, he referred them entirely to her determination, she so well knowing how to engage and entertain them with her fine speeches, and being very artful and dexterous in pumping out their secrets: these qualifications the king would often say made her of great use to him in facilitating his affairs. So that I have heard there was an emulation between the two sisters who should serve her brother best; the one—the Queen of Hungary—her brother the emperor, the other, her brother King Francis; but the former by war and force, the latter by the activity of her fine wit and complaisance. . . . During the imprisonment of the king her brother, she was of great assistance to the regent her mother in governing the kingdom, keeping the princes and grandees quiet, and gaining upon the nobility; for she was of very easy access, and won the hearts of all people by the fine accomplishments she was mistress of." *

The death of her husband, without children, six weeks after the battle of Pavia, left Margaret free to act as became her intense affection for her mother and her brother, who both had the most urgent need of her help. With the emperor's permission she embarked at Aigues Mortes for Spain, in spite of contrary winds, on the 27th of August, 1525; hastened to Madrid, "and found her brother in so wretched a condition that had she not come he had died; because she understood his temper and constitution better than all his physicians could do, and caused him to be treated accordingly, which entirely recovered him: so that the king would often say that without her he must have died; and that he was so much obliged to her for it that he should for ever acknowledge it, and love her (as he did) to his dying day." †

The task which Margaret had to accomplish at Madrid was one of great difficulty. In spite of the apparent cordiality with which she was universally treated at the imperial court, and the very favourable disposition Charles V. always evinced in words, she soon perceived the hollowness of his friendly protestations. "Everyone tells me that he likes the king," she says in one of her letters, "but the experience thereof is small. If I had to do with good men, who understood what honour is, I should not care; but it is the reverse." Fortunately she was not one to give way before the first difficulties. She tried in the beginning to win over some great personages in the imperial court, but afterwards perceiving that the men always avoided talking with her upon any serious topic, she took care to address herself to their mothers, wives, or daughters. In a letter to Marshal de Montmorency she says of the Duke de Infantado, who had invited her to his castle of Guadalaxara, "You will tell the king that the duke has been warned from the court, that as he desires to please the emperor, neither he nor his son is to speak to me; but the ladies are not forbidden me, and I shall speak to them doubly."

* Brantôme, Dames Illustres.

† Ibid.

As for Margaret's behaviour towards Charles V., let us again have recourse to Brantôme, whom we shall quote as often as we can: "She spoke so bravely and so handsomely to the emperor concerning his bad treatment of the king her brother that he was quite astonished, setting before him his ingratitude and felony wherewith he, the vassal, dealt towards his lord on account of Flanders; then she reproached him with the hardness of his heart for being so devoid of pity with regard to so great and so good a king; and said that acting in that manner was not the way to win a heart so noble and royal and so sovereign as that of the king her brother; and that, should he die in consequence of his rigorous treatment, his death would not remain unpunished, for he had children who would be grown up some day, and would take signal vengeance. These words, pronounced so bravely, and with so much passion, made the emperor bethink himself, so that he moderated his behaviour, and visited the king, and promised him many fine things, which he did not, however, perform for that time. But if this queen spoke so well to the emperor, she did still more so to those of his council, where she had audience, and where she triumphed with her fine speaking and graceful manner, of which she had no lack."

Margaret took great pains to hasten the conclusion of the marriage between Francis I. and Eleonore of Austria, widow of the King of Portugal, rightly regarding the alliance as the surest means of a prompt deliverance. Though the royal widow had been promised to the Constable of Bourbon, the emperor did not hesitate to sacrifice his engagement with the illustrious deserter to the interests of his policy. He himself, fascinated by Margaret's talent and graces, entertained for a moment the idea of a union with her, and sent a letter to the regent containing a distinct proposal to that effect. In the same letter the emperor said, with reference to the Constable of Bourbon, that "there were good marriages in France, and quite enough for him; naming Madame Renée with, whom he might content himself." These words have been understood to imply that there had been some question of a marriage between the Duchess of Alençon and the constable, but there is no evidence to warrant such a conjecture. There is no mention of anything of the sort in any of the diplomatic pieces exchanged between France and Spain on the subject of the king's liberation. They stipulate that the constable shall be restored to all his possessions, and even that a wife shall be procured for him in France ; but Margaret's name nowhere appears in them, nor does she herself ever speak of the constable in any of her numerous letters. The story of an amour between those two persons, which is told by Varillas in his Histoire de François I., and which forms the main subject of a fictitious Histoire de Marguerite, published in 1696, is totally without foundation.

After three months and a half of negotiations, Margaret and her brother saw the necessity of providing for the safety of the crown and government of France in case the king's captivity should be perpetual ; and Francis signed an edict, in 1525, by which he ordained that the young dauphin should be immediately crowned ; that the regency should remain in his mother's hands, but that in case of her being disabled by sickness or other impediment, or by death, from exercising it, then it should devolve upon his "most dear and most beloved and only sister, Margaret of France, Duchess of Alençon and Berry."

It has been erroneously asserted that Margaret carried with her this act of abdication when she quitted Spain, and that because the emperor was aware of this fact he gave orders that she should be arrested the very moment her safe-conduct expired. It was Marshal de Montmorency who carried the act of abdication to France, and, in designing to seize the person of the princess, Charles V. had no other object in view than to secure himself a fresh hostage in case the treaty should not be executed. At her brother's instance, Margaret applied to the imperial court for permission to quit Spain. It was granted her, but in such a manner as plainly showed her there was more wish to retard her journey than to speed her upon it. She left Madrid in the beginning of December, and travelled at first by easy stages, until word was sent her by her brother that she should hasten ; for the emperor, hoping that on the 25th of the month—on which day her safe-conduct was to expire—she would be still in Spain, had given orders for her arrest. Thereupon she quitted her litter, got on horseback, and, making as much way in one day as she had previously done in four, she arrived at Salses, where some French lords awaited her, one hour before the expiry of the safe-conduct.

In return for all Margaret's pains to hasten his deliverance, Francis I. could not do less than procure for her a fit husband. Negotiations were opened on the subject with Henry VIII. of England, but happily they came to nothing. There was at the court of France a young king—one, indeed, who was without a kingdom, but not without eminent advantages, both of mind and person. This was Henri d'Albret, Count of Béarn, legitimate sovereign of Navarre, which was withheld from him by Charles V., contrary to treaty. Henri had been taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, and had made his escape after a captivity of about two months, by letting himself down from the window by means of a rope. Having lived some time at the court of France, he was well known to Margaret, and there is every reason to believe that the marriage was one of inclination—on her side, at least. It was celebrated, therefore, notwithstanding a considerable disparity of age, at Saint Germain en Laye, in January, 1527.

Henri d'Albret received as his wife's portion the duchies of Alençon and Berry, and the counties of Armagnac and Perche, which Francis entailed on his sister's issue, whether male or female. He also pledged himself in the marriage contract to force the emperor immediately to restore Navarre to his brother-in-law. Margaret repeatedly urged him to fulfil this promise, and she speaks of it in many of her letters ; but political exigencies always prevailed against her ; and there was even a clause inserted in a protocol relative to the deliverance of the children of France, which ran thus : “ Item, the same king promises not to assist or favour the King of Navarre to reconquer his kingdom, albeit he has married his most beloved and only sister.”

The indifference of Francis I. with regard to the political fortunes of his brother-in-law, notwithstanding the numerous and signal services the latter had rendered him, disgusted the young prince, and he resolved to quit the court, where Montmorency, Brion, and several other persons, his declared enemies, were in the ascendant. He put his design into execution in 1529, after the conclusion of the treaty of Cambrai, and Margaret retired with him to Béarn, where she diligently applied herself, in conjunction with her husband, to all measures capable of raising their dominions to a more flourishing condition, as we learn from Hilarion de la Coste. “ This country,” he says, “ naturally good and fruitful, but lying in a bad state, uncultivated and barren, through the negligence of its inhabitants, quickly changed its face by their management. They invited husbandmen out of all the provinces of France, who occupied, improved, and fertilized the lands ; they caused the towns to be adorned and fortified, houses and castles to be built ; that of Pau among others, with the finest gardens which were then in Europe. After having fitted up a handsome place of residence, they gave orders about laws and good government, they established, for the differences of their subjects, a court to determine them without appeal ; and they reformed the common law of Oléron, which was used in that country, and which, since its last reformation in 1288, had been greatly corrupted. By their conversation and court they greatly civilized the people ; and, to guard themselves against a new usurpation from Spain, they covered themselves with Navarrins—a town upon one of the Gaves, which they fortified with strong ramparts, bastions, and half-moons, according to the art then in use.” “ This,” says Bayle, “ is one of the finest encomiums that could be bestowed on the Queen of Navarre.”

After the death of her first husband, Margaret retained full possession of the Duchy of Alençon, not only as regarded its revenues, but also its civil and political administration. She always watched over that principality with great solicitude. As she never could reside in it except for very brief intervals, she was careful to commit its government to able men, whose conduct fully justified her choice.

It was chiefly during her frequent and long residences in her principality of Béarn that the Queen of Navarre had opportunities of conferring with the advocates of the Reformation, and there many of them, including Andrew Melancthon, Gérard Roussel, Lefèvre d'Étaple, Pierre Calvi, Charles de Sainte Marthe, and Calvin himself, found a refuge with her from persecution. The question whether or not Margaret ever seriously entertained the thought of abjuring the Church of Rome has been much debated by historians ; but that she very much inclined to the opinions of the Reformers is not disputed either by Protestant or Catholic writers ; both sides confess the fact. Florimond de Remond says, in his History of the Birth and Progress of Heresy: "It is particularly observed by all the historians of both parties that this princess was the sole cause, without designing any ill, of the preservation of the French Lutherans, and that the church which afterwards took the name of Reformed, was not stifled in its cradle ; for, besides that she lent an ear to their discourses, which at first were specious, and not so bold as afterwards, she, with a good intention, maintained a great many of them in schools at her own expense, not only in France, but also in Germany. She took a wonderful care to preserve and secure those that were in danger for the Protestant religion, and to succour the refugees at Strasburg and Geneva. Thither she sent to the learned at one time a benefaction of four thousand livres. . . . In short, this good-natured princess had nothing more at heart for those nine or ten years than to procure the escape of such as the king exposed to the rigour of justice. She frequently talked to him of it, and by little touches endeavoured to impress on his soul some pity for the Lutherans.

Margaret's influence would perhaps have induced Francis to favour the Reformation if the extravagance of some hot-headed people who posted up certain placards in the year 1534, had not exasperated him to such a degree as to make him become afterwards a violent persecutor of Lutheranism—the name then given in France to what has since been called Calvinism. She was obliged, from that time, to act with great caution, and to conduct herself in such a manner as the Calvinists have highly condemned, and which gave occasion to the Papists to say that she perfectly renounced her errors. Brantôme, after saying that this Queen was suspected of Lutheranism, adds, that “out of respect and love to her brother, who loved her entirely, and always called her his darling, she never made any profession or appearance of it ; and if she believed it, she always kept it to herself with very great secrecy because the king violently hated it, declaring that this and every new sect tended more to the destruction of kingdoms, monarchies, and dominions, than to the edification of souls.” Others believe that it was not possible for Francis I. to be ignorant that the Queen of Navarre was a Lutheran in her heart ; her attachments to the party, and the protection she gave the fugitives for this cause, were not such things as could be concealed from the King of France ; he only affected not to know them. “The Constable de Montmorency, discoursing . . . one day with the king, made no difficulty or scruple to tell him that if he would quite exterminate the heretics of this kingdom, he must begin with his court and with his nearest relations, naming the queen his sister. To this the king answered, ‘Let us not speak of that ; she loves me too much ; she will never believe but what I believe, or take up a religion to the prejudice of my state.’” *

Catholic writers assert that some years before her death the Queen of Navarre acknowledged her religious errors ; and De Remond even goes so far as to imply that she denied on her death-bed having ever swerved from the standard of

* Brantôme Dames Illustres.

Roman orthodoxy. Bayle comments on the remarks of this writer in a singularly earnest and noble passage.

“I do not examine,” he says, “whether Florimond de Remond has it from good authority that she protested at her death that what she had done for the followers of the new opinions proceeded rather from compassion than from any ill-will to the ancient religion of her fathers. But, granting her protestation to be sincere, I maintain that there was something more heroic in her compassion and generosity than there would have been had she been persuaded that the fugitives she protected were orthodox. For a princess or any other woman to do good to those whom she takes to be of the household of the faith is no extraordinary thing, but the common effect of a moderate piety. But for a queen to grant her protection to people persecuted for opinions which she believes to be false ; to open a sanctuary to them ; to preserve them from the flames prepared for them ; to furnish them with a subsistence ; liberally to relieve the troubles and inconveniences of their exile, is an heroic magnanimity which has hardly any precedent ; it is the effect of superiority of reason and genius which very few can reach to ; it is the knowing how to pity the misfortune of those who err, and admire at the same time their constancy to the dictates of their conscience ; it is the knowing how to do justice to their good intentions, and to the zeal they express for truth in general ; it is the knowing that they are mistaken in the hypothesis, but that in the thesis they conform to the immutable and eternal laws of order, which require us to love the truth, and to sacrifice to that the temporal conveniences and pleasures of life ; it is, in a word, the knowing how to distinguish in one and the same person his opposition to particular truths which he does not know, and his love for truth in general ; a love which he evidences by his great zeal for the doctrines he believes to be true. Such was the judicious distinction the Queen of Navarre was able to make. It is difficult for all sorts of persons to arrive at this science ; but more especially difficult for a princess like her, who had been educated in the communion of Rome, where nothing has been talked of for many ages but fagots and gibbets for those who err. Family prejudices strongly fortified all the obstacles which education had laid in the way of this princess; for she entirely loved the king her brother, an implacable persecutor of those they called heretics, a people whom he caused to be burned without mercy wherever the indefatigable vigilance of informers discovered them. I cannot conceive by what method this Queen of Navarre raised herself to so high a pitch of equity, reason, and good sense; it was not through an indifference as to religion, since it is certain she had a great degree of piety, and studied the Scriptures with singular application. It must, therefore, have been the excellence of her genius, and the greatness of her soul, that discovered a path to her which scarcely anyone knows. It will be said, perhaps, that she needed only to consult the primitive and general ideas of order, which most clearly show that involuntary errors hinder not a man who entirely loves God, as he has been able to discover him after all possible inquiries, from being reckoned a servant of the true God, and that we ought to respect in him the rights of the true God. But I might immediately answer that this maxim is of itself subject to great disputes, so far is it from being clear and evident; besides that these primitive ideas hardly ever appear to our understanding without limitations and modifications which obscure them a hundred ways, according to the different prejudices contracted by education. The spirit of party, attachment to a sect, and even zeal for orthodoxy, produce a kind of ferment in the humours of our body; and hence the medium through which reason ought to behold those primitive ideas is clouded and obscured. These are infirmities which will attend our reason as long as it shall depend on the ministry of organs. It is the same thing to it as the low and middle region of the air, the seat of vapours and meteors. There are but very few persons who can rise above these clouds, and place themselves in a true serenity. If anyone could do it, we must say of him what Virgil said of Daphnis :

“Candidus insuetum miratur lumen Olympi, Sub pedibusque videt nubes et sidera Daphnis.”

We have seen how the Constable de Montmorency endeavoured to poison the mind of Francis I. against his sister. Margaret heard of this, and resented it the more strongly, as she had always behaved to Montmorency as a friend, and especially she had espoused his interests in opposition to those of his rival, Admiral Brion. The sequel of this affair, as related by Brantôme, is curious : “She never afterwards liked the constable, and she helped greatly towards his disgrace and banishment from court : insomuch that the day on which Madam the Princess of Navarre” (Margaret’s only daughter) “was married to the Duke of Cleves at Chasteleraud, as she was to be led to church, being so heavily laden with jewels, and cloth of gold and silver, that by reason of the weakness of her body she could not walk” (she was but twelve years old), “the king commanded the constable to take his little niece in his arms and carry her to the church ; at which the whole court was very much surprised, as being an office not suitable or honourable enough in such a ceremony for the constable, and which might have been given to some other ; where-with the Queen of Navarre seemed not at all displeased, and said, ‘There is a man who would ruin me with the king my brother, and who serves at present to carry my daughter to church.’ I have this story from the person I have mentioned, and also that the constable was much displeased with this office, and greatly mortified to be made such a spectacle to all the company, and said, ‘There is an end of all my favour ; farewell, host.’ And so it happened ; for after the entertainment and the wedding dinner he was dismissed, and departed immediately.”

Judging from several original portraits of Margaret

which are preserved in the libraries of France, her last editors infer that her beauty, so much celebrated by the poets of her time, consisted chiefly in the dignity of her deportment, and the sweet and cheerful expression of her countenance. Her eyes, nose, and mouth were large. She retained no marks of the small-pox with which she was attacked before middle age, and she preserved the freshness of her complexion to a late period. Like her brother, to whom she bore a strong likeness, she was tall and stately; but her imposing air was tempered by extreme affability and a merry humour. Her enthusiastic panegyrist, Sainte Marthe, says of her, "Seeing her humanely receive everybody, refuse none, and patiently listen to each, thou wouldst have promised thyself an easy access to her; but if she cast her eyes on thee, there was in her face I know not what divinity, that would have so confounded thee that thou wouldst have been unable, I do not say to walk one step, but even to stir one foot to approach her." Though conforming on special occasions to her brother's sumptuous tastes, Margaret's personal habits were remarkably simple. She dressed plainly, and, after the loss of her infant son, almost always in black. Brantôme, speaking of the extravagant pomp displayed by Cæsar Borgia when he visited France, remarks that the great Queen of Navarre never had more than "three sumpter mules and six for her litters, though she had three or four chariots for her ladies." Her biographers have generally asserted that this frugality was imposed on Margaret by the precarious state of her fortune; but it is rather to be attributed to her sober character and her munificent charity. The supposition that her means were inadequate to her rank is manifestly erroneous; for at the very time when they are said to have been lowest, we find her declining to receive from Henry II. payment, of a considerable sum lent five-and-twenty years before to his predecessor in a moment of financial difficulty, and desiring that the amount should be given to the sisters of her first husband, the Duke d'Alençon.

Distinguished as Margaret was by her mental powers and graces, she was still more admirable for the warmth and tenderness of her affections. These, it is to be feared, were but inadequately requited, and would have been a source of unhappiness to her, were it not for that precious prerogative which loving natures enjoy, to find pleasure in self-sacrifice and suffering. There was little community of feeling between her and the Duke d'Alençon, and their marriage was childless. The husband of her choice, Henry of Navarre, was a handsome, brave cavalier, of respectable capacity, and passably good-humoured, but he had little sympathy with his wife's literary and theological tastes, and the difference in their ages was not favourable to connubial concord. It is even said that he treated her at times with a roughness unworthy of a preux chevalier. Hilarion de la Coste says that Henry, "having been informed that there was used in his wife's chamber some form of prayer and instruction contrary to that of his fathers, entered it with a resolution to punish the minister, but, finding they had contrived his escape, the weight of his anger fell upon the queen, to whom he gave a box on the ear, saying to her, 'Madam, you want to be too knowing ;' and immediately gave advice of it to King Francis." Brantôme, having given some instances of matrimonial discord between princes, adds this : " And lately King Henry d'Albret, with Queen Margaret of Valois, as I have it from good hands, who treated her very ill, and would have done still worse had it not been for King Francis, her brother, who spoke home and roughly to him, and charged him with threats to honour the queen his sister in regard to the rank she bore." The whimsical behaviour of this King of Navarre on the occasion of the birth of his grandson, afterwards Henry IV. of France, may enable us to guess how far he was capable of tenderness and delicacy of feeling in his conduct to his wife. On hearing that his daughter was pregnant, he recalled her from Picardy, where she was residing with her husband. The princess arrived in Pau on the 4th of December, after a journey of twenty days, and nine days afterwards her child was born. Her father had promised that he would put his will into her hands as soon as she should be delivered, but on condition that in her labour she should sing a song: "To the end," said he; "that you may not bring me a crying and ill-humoured child." The princess promised that she would, and had so much courage and resolution that, in spite of the pains of labour, she sang, as she heard him enter her chamber, a Bearnish ditty, the burden of which was, Noste Donne deou cap deou pon, adjouda mi en aqeste heure—that is, "Our Lady of the bridge-end, help me at this hour." As soon as the child was born, his grandfather took him out of the midwife's hands, carried him into his cabinet, and there plentifully rubbed his lips and gums with garlic, by which horrible treatment the poor infant very narrowly escaped suffocation.

The intense affection which Margaret bestowed on her brother he returned as fully as it was in his nature to do. His conduct towards her was marked by that imperious egotism of which he gave so many unfortunate proofs in the most important circumstances of his life. He always called her ma mignonne, but he exacted unsparingly from "his darling" the surrender of her opinions, inclinations, and feelings to the claims of his policy or his caprice. He even took from her her only surviving child when it was but two years old, and had it brought into the château of Plessis les Tours, where the poor mother saw it only at long intervals during her unfrequent journeys in France. But Margaret was never weary of making sacrifices for the brother she idolized; and it is remarkable, not less as a characteristic of the age than of herself, that, notwithstanding the propriety of her personal conduct and her ardent piety, she was more than tolerant of the illicit amours to which her splendid brother openly addicted himself. She composed the devices for the jewels which Francis I. presented to Madame de Chateaubriant; she maintained a most friendly intercourse with Madame d'Etampes, and to her she presented her poem of Le Coche, or the Débat d'Amour, in which she pronounced a most pompous eulogy on the beauty and the virtues of that royal mistress.

The death, in April, 1547, of that brother whom she had loved so much, and to whose glory and welfare she had devoted her existence, was a heavy blow to Margaret.* She survived him but two years, and that brief remnant of her life was spent chiefly in seclusion and religious abstraction from the concerns of the world. Nevertheless, it is not correctly stated by a recent English writer † that during that period “no solicitations could induce the queen to emerge from her seclusion, or interest herself as formerly in literature or politics.” In the very next paragraph the same writer contradicts this loose assertion, by saying that Margaret “often solaced her grief by composing elegies and plaintive songs on her misfortune.” Besides this, it is certain that the Queen of Navarre was occupied but a few months before her death in the composition of her book of tales; for the 66th novel of her Heptameron recounts a ludicrous adventure which befel her daughter, Joanne d'Albret, and the Duke de Vendôme, shortly after their marriage in October, 1548. Margaret's health began to decline in the summer of the following year, and she expired at the chateau of Audos, in Bigorre, on the 21st of December, 1549, in her 57th year.

Amidst the multifarious occupations of her well-filled life, the Queen of Navarre found leisure to compose a great number of literary works, besides carrying on a voluminous correspondence with her brother, his ministers, and many other persons. Her productions in verse, the greater part of which have been printed, consist of eight long poems on sacred,

* “In his last sickness,” says Brantôme, “I have heard that she spoke to this purpose: ‘Should the courier who brings me news of the king my brother's recovery, be he ever so tired, harassed, mud-bespattered, and dirty, I would embrace and kiss him as the finest prince and gentleman of France; and should he want a bed, and not be able to find one to repose himself, I would give him mine, and gladly lie on the ground, for sake of the good news he brought.’ ” amorous, or historical subjects ; eight dramatic pieces, including four mysteries, two moralities, and two farces ; poetical epistles to her brother, her mother, and the King of Navarre ; and rondeaux, dixains, songs, and other small pieces. According to the last editors of the Heptameron, some of Margaret's fugitive pieces, published by them for the first time, are superior as literary works to her more serious compositions, and in them alone are to be found the gayety and grace for which she has been so much celebrated by her contemporaries. There is one among them, of a graver character, which appears to us so remarkable for its impassioned force and its full and flowing rhythm that we gladly lay it before the reader :—

† The Life of Marguerite d'Angoulême, Queen of Navarre, &c. By Martha Walker Freer. 2 vols. London, 1854.

Souvieigne vous des lermes respandues,
 Qui par regret très grand furent rendues
 Sur vostre tant amyable visaige ;
 Souvieigne vous du dangereux oultraige
 Que vous cuida faire mon povre coeur, Pressé par trop d'une extreme douleur,
 Quand il forca la voix de satisfaire
 Au tres grand mal où ne scavois que faire,
 Tant qu'a peu pres la pleur fut entendu
 Souvieigne vous du sens qui fut perdu,
 Tant que raison, parole & contenance
 N'eurent pouvoir, ny force, ny puissance,
 De desclairer ma double passion.
 Ny aussi peu ma grand affection ;
 Souvieigne vous du coeur qui bondissoit
 Pour la tristesse en quoy il perissoit ;
 Souvieigne vous des souspirs très ardens
 Qui à la foule en despict de mes dentz
 Sortoient dehors, pour mieulx me soulaiger ;
 Souvieigne vous du peril & danger
 Ou nous estions, dont nous ne tenions compt
 Car vraye amour ne congnoist paour ny honte ;
 Souvieigne vous de nostre amour honneste,
 Dont ne devons pour nul baisser la teste,
 Car nous scavons tous deux certainement
 Qu'honneur & Dieu en sont le fondement ;
 Souvieigne vous du très chaste embrasser
 Dont vous ne moy ne nous pouvions laisser ;
 Souvieigne vous de vostre foy promise
 Par vostre main dedans la mienne mise ;
 Souvieigne vous de mes doubtes passées,

Que vous avez en une heure effassées,
 Prenant en vous si grande securété,
 Que je m'asseure en vostre fermeté ;
 Souvieigne vous que vous avez remis
 Du plus parfaict de voz meilleurs amys
 Le coeur, l'esprit & le corps en repos,
 Par vostre honneste & vertueux propos
 Auquel je veulx adjouster telle foy,
 Que plus n'aura doubte pouvoir sus moy ;
 Souvieigne vous que je n'ay plus de paine Que ceste là que avecques moy je maine :
 C'est le regret de perdre vostre veue,
 Par qui souvent tant de joye ay receue ;
 Souvieigne vous du regard de vostre oeil,
 Dont t'esloingner me faict mourir de dueil ;
 Souvieigne vous du lieu tres mal paré
 Ou fust de moy trop de bien séparé ;
 Souvieigne vous des heures qui sonnoient,
 Et du regret qu'en sonnans me donnoient,
 Voyant le temps & l'heure s'avancer
 Du despartir ou ne fays que penser ;
 Souvieigne vous de l'adieu redoublé
 A chascun pas, de l'esperit troublé,
 Du coeur trancy & du corps affoibly,
 Et ne mettez le triste oeil en oubly ;
 Souvieigne vous de la parfaite amour,
 Qui durera sans cesser nuyct & jour,
 Qui a dens moy si bien painct vostre ymaige,
 Que je n'ay riens sinon vostre visaige,
 Vostre parler, vostre regard tant doulx
 Devant mes yeulx ; bref, je n'y ay que vous,
 Vous suppliant, o amye estimée,
 Plus que nulle aultre & de moy tant aymée,
 Souvieigne vous d'immortel souvenir
 De vostre amy, & le vueillés tenir
 Dens vostre coeur seul amy & parfaict,
 Ainsi que vous dedens le sien il faict.

On the whole, the Queen of Navarre has been far more successful in the poetical treatment of secular than of sacred subjects, and for obvious reasons. We cannot speak from personal knowledge of her efforts in the latter field, but we are very well disposed to accept the judgment pronounced upon them by the Bibliophiles Français, that they are barren of poetry, and brimful of tediousness, consisting, as they do, of long paraphrases of Scripture, theological dissertations, and metaphysico-devotional rhapsodies. One of them, however, deserves more special mention, as marking the author's dissent from the religion of Rome. "The mirror of the sinful soul" (Miroir de l'ame pecheresse) "was composed in a strain very unusual in the Church of Rome, there being no mention made in it either of male or female saints, or of merits, or of any other purgatory than the blood of Jesus Christ." * The work was consequently assailed with fierce denunciations from the orthodox pulpits. A comedy was acted by the students of the College of Navarre, in which the queen was represented as a Fury of Hell, and the Sorbonne decreed at least, if it did not promulgate, a censure upon her heretical production. Margaret complained to her brother, and the result was that Nicolas Cop, rector of the Sorbonne, expressly disowned the censure pronounced by the body over which he presided; the student-comedians, and the most intemperate of the preachers, were committed to prison; and Noel Beda, syndic of the faculty of theology, who had been the most ardent promoter of the attacks on the king's sister, died in confinement at Mont Saint Michel.

The Heptameron is, of all Margaret's works, the one on which her literary reputation has mainly rested since her death. We have sketched its bibliographical history in our preface, and it now remains for us to speak of its composition. Dunlop, who may be considered as expressing the general opinion of literary historians, says that "few of the tales composed in it are original; for, except about half-a-dozen which are historically true, and are mentioned as having fallen under the knowledge and observation of the Queen of Navarre, they may all be traced to the Fabliaux, the Italian novels, and the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles." On the contrary, the last editors of the Heptameron allege that "its distinctive character is, that it reproduces, under a tolerably transparent veil, real events which happened at the court of France, especially in the reigns of Louis XI., Charles VIII., Louis XII., and Francis I. Of the seventy-two tales which compose the Heptameron, we know but five or six which are evidently borrowed from the French conteurs of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries. This character of truth, which has not even been suspected by the majority of those who have spoken of this collection, may be demonstrated in the most evident manner." This opinion very nearly agrees with the Queen of Navarre's own statement in her prologue, that all the tales she was about to relate were founded on fact, and it is corroborated by many evidences direct and indirect. Brantôme, for instance, tells us that "his mother knew some secrets of the novels, and that she was one of the confabulators" (une des devisantes). He analyzes many of the tales in the Heptameron, certifies the authenticity of some of them, and makes known to us the real names of certain persons whom Margaret has introduced into them. From him we learn that, under the title of a Princess of Flanders, the Queen has portrayed herself, and related the audacious attempt made upon her chastity by Admiral de Bonnivet. Another notable verification of the Heptameron is supplied by the Bibliophiles Français. The first novel relates a murder committed by a proctor at Alençon, and mentions that the murderer obtained letters of pardon from the King of France at the intercession of the King of England. The Bibliophiles have discovered these very letters in the French archives, and found them to agree perfectly with the Queen of Navarre's narrative.

* Beza Hist. Ecclesiast, book i. p. 5.

The more closely to imitate her Florentine model, she introduces her tales by describing a remarkable accident of nature by which the supposed narrators are thrown together for a season and driven to seek for some device to while away the time. Certainly there is no comparison between the fine description of the plague at Florence, which opens the Decameron, and that multiplicity of little events which the Queen has accumulated in her prologue; nevertheless, the contrivance of the latter is sufficiently ingenious, and bears a considerable resemblance to the frame of the Canterbury Tales. Ten French ladies and gentlemen, intercepted by a perilous inundation on their return from the baths of Cauterrets, take shelter in a monastery of the Pyrenees, where they are forced to remain till a bridge should be thrown over an impassable stream, and amuse themselves meanwhile by relating stories in a beautiful meadow on the banks of the Gave. As to the persons into whose mouths Margaret has put her stories, it is natural enough to suppose that she chose them from her own family, and from among the lords and ladies who were usually about her. Madame Oisille, for instance, appears to be Margaret's mother, that name being almost an anagram of Louise. She is represented as an aged widow of great experience, who is as a mother to the other ladies. The rest of the company call each other simply by their respective names, but in addressing Oisille they always say Madame. Many of the novels which turn on the debauchery and wickedness of the Franciscans or Cordeliers are related by Oisille. The tone in which she speaks of them accords with the concluding passage of the journal of Louise of Savoy: "In the year 1522, in December, my son and I, by the grace of the Holy Ghost, began to know the hypocrites white, black, grey, smoky, and of all colours, from whom God in his infinite mercy and goodness preserve and defend us, for if Jesus Christ is not a liar, there is not among all mankind a more dangerous generation."

Hircan, another of the ten interlocutors, may very probably represent one of Margaret's two husbands, but which of the two we are not prepared to say. The Bibliophiles infer that it is the Duke d'Alençon, from the deference with which he is treated by the rest of the gentlemen; but surely this would apply quite as well to the King of Navarre. In the prologue, Hircan says to Simontault, "Since you have been the first to speak, it is right that you should take the lead, for in sport we are all equal." Hircan's wife, Parlamente, who was never idle or melancholy, is no doubt Margaret herself; and if Hircan is the Duke d'Alençon, then Simontault is probably the King of Navarre, or vice versa. With respect to the other six persons, the Bibliophiles Français offer no conjectures, or only such as seem to us of little weight.

The conversations in the Heptameron on the characters and incidents of the last related tale, and which generally introduce the subject of the new one, are much longer than in the Italian novels, and indeed occupy nearly one-half of the work. Some of the remarks are quaint and comical, others are remarkable for their naïvete, while a few breathe the conceits of the Italian sonneteers ; for example, "It is said that jealousy is love, but I deny it ; for though jealousy be produced by love as ashes are by fire, yet jealousy extinguishes love, as ashes smother the flame." These epilogues are well worthy of attention, as embodying the author's personal views on sundry important topics, such as friendship, love, and conjugal fidelity ; and also as a curious model of conversation among persons of quality in the first half of the sixteenth century. Especially curious is it to observe in them how stories and comments of a very ticklish character are mingled with reflections imbued with the most exalted piety ; how the company prepare themselves by devotional exercises for telling tales which are often anything but edifying ; and how, when the day's work is done, they duly praise the Lord for giving them the grace to spend their time so pleasantly. Margaret's contemporaries were by no means shocked at these incongruities, as our more skeptical age would be. The causes of this difference would be an interesting subject of inquiry, but here we can only note the fact. To give another instance of it : When Clement Marot published his poetical versions of some of the Psalms, they quickly superseded all other songs throughout the country. The press could not throw off copies fast enough to supply the demand. Each of the princes and courtiers appropriated a psalm, and sang it to such a tune as he thought fit. Henry II. chose the psalm, Ainsi qu'on oyt le cerf braire, and made a hunting song of it. His mistress, Diane de Poitiers, jiggged out Du fond de ma pensee to the popular dance tune, Le branle de Poitou ; and Catherine de Medici, in allusion to her husband's infidelities, profanely appropriated Ne veuillez pas, ô Sire, set to the air, Des bouffons.

We have alluded to the questionable morality of the Heptameron, and certainly we will not endorse the argument of its new editors, who combat the common opinion that it should be classed among licentious books, upon the plea that "the Queen of Navarre excels in winding up a tale of extreme gallantry with moral reflections of the most rigorous kind." The best apology for the book is, that its author has not exceeded the allowed license of good society in her own age, and that she is not to be judged by the standard of ours. Free as her language must often appear to us, it will be found, upon closer scrutiny, to be always controlled by certain conventional rules of propriety. Some grossly obscene passages, for which she has incurred unmerited censure, prove now to have been the work of those manifold offenders, her first editors.

PROLOGUE TO
THE HEPTAMERON OF THE TALES OF THE QUEEN OF NAVARRE.

TABLE OF PERSONAGES.

		AUTHORITIES.
Oisille,	Louise de Savoie.	Franck, Génin, Lacroix, Le Roux de Lincy.
Parlamente,	Margaret of Angoulême.	Same authorities.
Hircan,	Henry of Navarre.	Franck. M. Le Roux de Lincy suggested Charles of Alençon, but the arguments of M. Franck carry conviction.
Longarine,	Aimée Motier de la Fayette.	Franck. M. Le Roux suggested Mme. de Châtillon, who is obviously far too old. M. Montaiglon gives his vote to the daughter of Aimée: Françoise de Silly.
Ennasuite,	Anne de Vivonne, Mme. de Bourdeille.	Le Roux de Lincy, followed by all authorities.
Simontault,	François de Bourdeille.	Franck, followed by Montaiglon. There is no ground for supposing with Le Roux that Simontault represents Henri d'Albret.
Dagoucin,	Nicolas Dangu, Abbé de Juilly.	Franck. Lacroix has declared for the Comte D'Agoust.
Geburon,	M. de Burye.	Franck and Montaiglon.
Nomerfide,	Isabeau d'Albret.	Mary Robinson. Le Roux declared for Mme. de Châteaubriand, Franck for Mme. de Montpézat.
Saffredent,	René de Rohan.	Mary Robinson. Franck interprets this character as Montpézat (a score of years too old), Le Roux as Bonnivét, to whom the same objection must be made.

PROLOGUE.

AT the beginning of September, when the baths of the Pyrenees commenced to have effect, several persons from France, Spain, and other countries were assembled at those of Cauterets, some to drink the waters, others to bathe in them, or to be treated with mud ; remedies so marvellous, that the sick abandoned by physicians go home cured from Cauterets. My intention is not to declare either the situation or the virtue of the baths ; but only to relate what is pertinent to the matter I am about to describe. The patients remained at these baths until they found themselves sufficiently improved in health ; but then, as they were preparing to return home, there fell such excessive and extraordinary rains, that it seemed as though God had forgotten His promise to Noah, and was again about to destroy the world with water. The houses of Cauterets were so flooded that it was impossible to abide in them. Those who had come from Spain returned over the mountains the best way they could. But the French lords and ladies, thinking to return to Tarbes as easily as they came, found the rivulets so swollen as to be scarcely fordable ; and when they arrived at the Bearnese Gave, which was not two feet deep when they crossed it on their way to the baths, they found it so swollen and so impetuous that they were forced to turn out of their direct course and look for bridges. These, however, being only of wood, had been carried away by the violence of the current. Some attempted to ford the stream by crossing it several together in one body ;

but they were swept away with such rapidity that the rest had no inclination to follow their example. They separated, therefore, either to look for another route or because they were not of the same way of thinking. Some crossed the mountains, and, passing through Aragon, arrived in the county of Roussillon, and from there to Narbonne. Others went straight to Barcelona, and thence by sea to Marseilles or to Aigues-mortes.

But a widow of long experience, named Oisille, determined to banish from her mind the fear of bad roads, and repair to Notre Dame de Serrance ; not that she was so superstitious as to suppose that the glorious Virgin would quit her place at her son's right hand to come and dwell in a desert land, but only because she wished to see the holy place, of which she had heard so much ; and also because she was assured that if there were any means of escaping from a danger, the monks were sure to find it out. She met with no end of difficulties ; but at last she arrived, after having passed through places almost impracticable, and so difficult to climb and descend that, notwithstanding her age and her weight, she was compelled to perform the greater part of the journey on foot. But the most piteous thing was that most of her servants and horses died on the way, so that she arrived at Serrance attended by one man and one woman only. She was, however, charitably received by the monks.

There were also among the French party two gentlemen, who had gone to the baths rather to accompany the ladies they loved than for any need they themselves had to use the waters. These gentlemen, seeing that the company was breaking up, and that the husbands of their mistresses were taking them away, thought proper to follow them at a distance, without acquainting anyone with their purpose. The two married gentlemen and their wives arrived one evening at the house of a man who was more a bandit than a peasant. The two young gentlemen lodged at a cottage hard by, and hearing a great noise about midnight, they rose with their varlets, and inquired of their host what was all that tumult. The poor man, who was in a great fright, told them it was some robbers who were come to share the booty that was in the house of their comrade the bandit. The gentlemen instantly seized their arms, and hastened with their varlets to the aid of the ladies, holding it a far happier fate to die with them than to live without them. On reaching the bandit's house, they found the first gate broken open, and the two gentlemen and their servants defending themselves valorously ; but as they were outnumbered by the bandits, and the married gentlemen were much wounded, they were beginning to give way, having already lost a great number of their servants. The two gentlemen, looking in at the windows, saw the two ladies weeping and crying so hard that their hearts swelled with pity and love, and falling on the bandits like two enraged bears from the mountains, they laid about them with such fury that a great number of the bandits fell, and the rest fled for safety to a place well known to them. The gentlemen having defeated these villains, the owner of the house being among the slain, and having learnt that the wife was still worse than himself, despatched her after him with a sword-thrust. They then entered a room on the basement, where they found one of the married gentlemen breathing his last. The other had not been hurt, only his clothes had been pierced and his sword broken ; and seeing the aid which the two had rendered him, he embraced and thanked them, and begged they would continue to stand by him, to which they assented with great good-will. After having seen the deceased buried, and consoled the wife as well as they could, they departed under the guidance of Providence, not knowing whither they were going.

If you would know the names of the three gentlemen, that of the married one was Hircan, and his wife's Parlamente. The widow's name was Longarine. One of the young gentlemen was called Dagoucín, and the other Saffredent. They were in the saddle all day, and towards evening they descried a belfry, to which they made the best of their way, not with out toil and trouble, and were humanely welcomed by the abbot and the monks. The abbey is called St. Savin's. The abbot, who was of a very good house, lodged them honourably, and on the way to their lodgings begged them to acquaint him with their adventures. After they had recounted them, he told them they were not the only persons who had been unfortunate, for there were in another room two ladies who had escaped as great a danger, or worse, inasmuch as they had encountered not men but beasts; for these poor ladies met a bear from the mountain half a league this side of Peyrchite, and fled from it with such speed that their horses dropped dead under them as they entered the abbey gates. Two of their women, who arrived long after them, reported that the bear had killed all their men-servants. The two ladies and the three gentlemen then went into the ladies' chamber, where they found them in tears, and saw they were Nomerfide and Ennasuite. They all embraced, and after mutually recounting their adventures, they began to be comforted through the sage exhortations of the abbot, counting it a great consolation to have so happily met again; and next day they heard mass with much devotion, and gave thanks to God for that he had delivered them out of such perils.

Whilst they were all at mass, a man came running into the church in his shirt, and shouting for help, as if some one was close at his heels. Hircan and the other gentlemen hastened to him to see what was the matter, and saw two men pursuing him, sword in hand. The latter would have fled upon seeing so many people, but Hircan and his party were too swift for them, and they lost their lives. On his return, Hircan discovered that the man in his shirt was one of their companions named Geburon. His story was that, being at a cottage near Peyrchite, he had been surprised in his bed by three men. Springing out in his shirt he had seized his sword, and mortally wounded one of them; and whilst the two others were busy succouring their comrade, Geburon, seeing that the odds were two to one against him, and that he was naked whilst they wore armour, thought his safest course was to take to his heels, especially as his clothes would not impede his running. He too praised God for his deliverance, and he thanked those who had revenged him.

After the company had heard mass and dined, they sent to see if it were possible to pass the Gave river, and were in consternation at hearing that the thing was impracticable, at which the abbot entreated them many times to remain with him until the waters had abated. This they agreed to for that day, and in the evening, when they were about to go to bed, there arrived an old monk who used to come regularly every September to our Lady of Serrance. Being asked news of his journey, he stated that, in consequence of the flood, he had come by the mountains, and travelled over the worst roads he had ever seen in his life. He had beheld a very sad spectacle. A gentleman named Simontault, tired of waiting till the river should subside, had resolved to attempt the passage, relying on the goodness of his horse. He had made his domestics place themselves round him to break the force of the current ; but when they reached the middle of the stream, the worst mounted were swept away and were seen no more. Thereupon the gentleman made again for the bank he had quitted. His horse, good as it was, failed him at his need ; but by God's will this happened so near the bank that the gentleman was able at last to scramble on all fours to the land, not without having drunk a good deal of water, and so exhausted that he could hardly sustain himself. Happily for him, a shepherd, leading back his sheep to the fields in the evening, found him seated on the stones, dripping wet, and deploring the loss of his people, who had perished before his eyes. The shepherd, who understood his need both from his appearance and his words, took him by the hand and led him to his cabin, where he made a little fire, and dried him as well as he could. That same evening, Providence conducted to the cabin the old monk, who told him the way to Our Lady of Serrance, and assured him that he would be better lodged there than elsewhere, and that he would find there an aged widow named Oisille, who had met with an adventure as distressing as his own.

The company testified extreme joy at hearing the names of the good dame Oisille and the gentle knight Simontault; and everyone praised God for having saved the master and mistress after the loss of the servants. Parlamente especially gave hearty thanks to God, for she had long had a most affectionate servant in Simontault. They inquired carefully about the road to Serrance, and though the good old man represented it to them as very difficult, nothing could stop them from setting out that very day, so well provided with all things necessary that nothing was left them to wish for. The abbot supplied them with the best horses in Lavedan, good Bearnese cloaks, wine, and plenty of victuals, and a good escort to conduct them in safety across the mountains. They traversed them more on foot than on horseback, and arrived at last, after many toils, at Our Lady of Serrance. Though the abbot was churlish enough, he durst not refuse to lodge them, for fear of disobliging the lord of Bearn, by whom he knew they were held in consideration; but, like a true hypocrite as he was, he showed them the best possible countenance, and took them to see the lady Oisille and the gentleman Simontault. All were equally delighted to find themselves so miraculously reassembled, and the night was spent in praising God for the grace he had vouchsafed them. After taking a little rest, towards morning they went to hear mass, and receive the holy sacrament of union, by means of which all Christians are united as one, and to beg of God, who had reassembled them through his goodness, the grace to complete their journey for his glory.

After dinner they sent to know if the waters were fallen, but finding, on the contrary, that they were still higher, and that it would be a long time before they could pass safely, they resolved to have a bridge made, abutting on two rocks very near each other, and on which there still are planks used by people on foot, who, coming from Oleron, wish to pass the Gave. The abbot, very well pleased at their incurring an expense which would increase the number of pilgrims, furnished them with workmen ; but he was so miserly that he would not contribute a farthing of his own. The workmen, however, having declared that it would take at least ten or twelve days to construct the bridge, the company began to grow tired. Parlamente, the wife of Hircan, always active and never melancholy, having asked her husband's permission to speak, said to old dame Oisille, "I am surprised, madam, that you, who have so much experience that you fill the place of a mother to the rest of us women, do not devise some amusement to mitigate the annoyance we shall suffer from so long a delay ; for unless we have something agreeable and virtuous to occupy us, we are in danger of falling sick."

"What is still worse," said Longarine, the young widow, "we shall grow cross, which is an incurable malady ; the more so as there is not one of us but has cause to be extremely sad, considering our several losses."

"Everyone has not lost her husband like you," said Ennasuite, laughing. "To have lost servants is not a matter to break one's heart, since they can easily be replaced. However, I am decidedly of opinion that we should pass the time away as agreeably as we can."

Nomerfide, her companion, said it was a very good idea, and that if she passed one day without amusement, she should be dead the next. The gentlemen all warmly approved of the proposal, and begged dame Oisille to direct what was to be done.

"You ask a thing of me, my children," replied the old lady, "which I find very difficult. You want me to invent an amusement which shall dissipate your ennui. I have been in search of such a remedy all my life long, and I have never found but one, which is the reading of Holy Writ. It is in such reading that the mind finds its true and perfect joy whence proceed the repose and the health of the body. If you ask me what I do to be so cheerful and so healthy at so advanced an age, it is that as soon as I rise I read the Holy Scriptures. I see and contemplate the will of God, who sent his Son on earth to announce to us that holy word and that good news which promises the pardon of all sins, and the payment of all debts, by the gift he has made us of his love, passion, and merits. This idea affords me such joy that I take my psalter, and sing with my heart and pronounce with my lips, as humbly as I can, the beautiful canticles with which the Holy Spirit inspired David and other sacred authors. The pleasure I derive from them is so ravishing that I regard as blessings the evils which befall me every day, because I have in my heart through faith Him who has suffered all these evils for me. Before supper, I retire in like manner to feed my soul with reading. In the evening I review all I have done in the day ; I ask pardon for my faults ; I thank God for his graces, and lie down in his love, fear, and peace, assured against all evils. This, my children, is what has long been my amusement, after having searched well, and found none more solid and more satisfying. It seems to me, then, that if you will give yourselves every morning for an hour to reading, and say your prayers devoutly during mass, you will find in this solitude all the charms which cities could afford. In fact, he who knows God finds all things fair in him, and without him everything ugly and disagreeable. Take my advice, therefore, I entreat you, if you wish to find happiness in life."

"Those who have read the Holy Scriptures," said Hircan, "as I believe we have done, will confess, madam, that what you have said is true. But you must also consider that we are not yet so mortified but that we have need of some amusement and corporeal pastime. When we are at home we have the chase and hawking, which make us forget a thousand bad thoughts ; the ladies have their household affairs, their needlework, and sometimes dancing, wherein they find laudable exercise. I propose, then, on the part of the men, that you as the eldest lady, read to us in the morning the history of the life of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the great and wondrous things he has done for us. After dinner until vespers we must choose some pastime which may be agreeable to the body and not prejudicial to the soul. By this means we shall pass the day cheerfully."

Dame Oisille replied that she had so much difficulty in forgetting vanities, that she was afraid she should succeed ill in the choice of such a pastime; also, that the matter should be referred to the majority of voices. "And you, monsieur," she said to Hircan, "shall give your opinion first."

"If I thought," replied Hircan, "that the diversion I should like to propose would be as agreeable to a certain lady in this company as to myself, my choice would be soon announced; but as I am afraid this would not be the case, I have nothing to say, but will submit to the decision of the rest."

His wife Parlamente colored up at these words, believing they were meant for her. "Perhaps, Hircan," she said, a little angrily and half-laughing, "the lady you think hardest to please could find means to content herself if she had a mind. But let us say no more of the pastime in which only two can take part, and think of one in which everybody can share."

"Since my wife has so well comprehended my views," observed Hircan to the other ladies, "and a private diversion is not to her taste, I believe she is the best person to invent an amusement which will give satisfaction to us all. I declare, therefore, beforehand, that I assent to her proposal."

The whole company spoke to the same effect, and Parlamente, seeing that she was appointed mistress of the sports, thus addressed the company: "Were I conscious of possessing as much capacity as the ancients who invented the arts, I would contrive an amusement which should fulfil the obligation you lay upon me; but as I know myself, and am aware that I find it difficult even to recollect the ingenious inven tions of others, I shall think myself lucky if I can closely follow those who have already done what you desire. I believe there is not one of you but has read the novels of Boccaccio, recently translated into French, and which the most Christian King, Francis I. of that name, Monseigneur le Dauphin, Madame la Dauphine, and Madame Marguerite prized so highly, that if Boccaccio could hear them, the praises bestowed on him by those illustrious persons would surely raise him from the dead. I can certify that the two ladies I have named, and several other personages of the court, resolved to imitate Boccaccio, except in one thing—namely, in writing nothing but what was true. Monseigneur and the two ladies arranged at first that they would each write ten tales, and that they would assemble a party of ten persons, selecting for it those whom they thought most capable of telling a story with grace, and expressly excluding men of letters; for Monseigneur did not wish that there should be any intrusion of art into the matter, and was afraid lest the flowers of rhetoric should be in some manner prejudicial to the truth of history. But the great affairs in which the king afterwards became involved, the peace concluded between the sovereign and the King of England, the accouchement of Madame la Dauphine, and several other affairs of a nature to occupy the whole court, caused this project to be forgotten; but as we have time to spare we will put it into execution whilst waiting for the completion of our bridge. If you think proper, we will go from noon till four o'clock into that fine meadow along the Gave river, where the trees form so thick a screen that the sun cannot pierce it, or incommode us with its heat. There, seated at our ease, we will each relate what we have seen or been told by persons worthy of belief. Ten days will suffice to make up the hundred. If it please God that our work prove worthy of being seen by the lords and ladies I have named, we will present it to them on our return, in lieu of images and paternosters, and I am convinced that such an offering will not be displeasing to them. At the same time, if anyone can suggest something more agreeable, I am ready to fall in with his ideas."

The whole company declared they could not imagine anything better, and everyone looked forward with impatience for the morrow. As soon as the morning broke they all went to the chamber of Madame Oisille, whom they found already at prayers. She read to them for a good hour, after which they heard mass, and at ten o'clock they went to dinner. Everyone then retired to his own chamber, and attended to what he had to do. At noon all were punctually assembled in the meadow, which was so beautiful and agreeable, that it would need a Boccaccio to depict all its charms: enough for us to say that there never was its like.

The company being seated on the green turf, so soft and delicate that no one had need of floor or carpet, "Which of us," said Simontault, "shall have the command over the rest?"

"Since you have been the first to speak," said Hircan, "it is right you should have the command; for in sport all are equals."

"God knows," replied Simontault, "I could desire nothing better in the world than to command such a company."

Parlamente, who knew very well what that meant, began to cough, so that Hircan did not perceive she had changed color, and told Simontault to begin his tale, for all were ready to hear him. The same request being urged by the whole company, Simontault said, "I have been so ill-requited for my long services, ladies, that to revenge myself on love and on the fair one who treats me with so much cruelty, I am about to make a collection of misdeeds done by women to men, in the whole of which I will relate nothing but the simple truth."

THE HEPTAMERON
OF THE QUEEN OF NAVARRE.

NOVEL I.

Woman of Alençon having two lovers, one for her pleasure and the other for her profit, caused that one of the two to be slain who was the first to discover her gallantries—She obtained her pardon and that of her husband, who had fled the country, and who afterwards, in order to save some money, applied to a necromancer—The matter was found out and punished.

IN the lifetime of the last Duke Charles there was at Alençon a proctor named St. Aignan, who had married a gentlewoman of that country more handsome than virtuous, who, for her beauty and her levity, was much courted by the Bishop of Sées. In order to accomplish his ends, this prelate took care to amuse the husband so well, that not only he took no notice of the doings of either of the pair, but even forgot the attachment he had always felt towards his masters. He passed from fidelity to perfidy, and finally went the length of practising sorceries to cause the death of the duchess. The prelate maintained a long correspondence with this unlucky woman, who intrigued with him rather from motives of interest than of love ; whereto she was also solicited by her husband. But she entertained such a passion for the son of the Lieutenant-General of Alençon, named Du Mesnil, that it half crazed her ; and she often made the prelate give her husband some commission or another, that she might see the lieutenant-general's son at her ease. This affair lasted a long while, the prelate being entertained for her purse, and the other for her pleasure. She vowed to Du Mesnil that, if she received the bishop well, it was only that she might be the more free to continue her caresses to himself ; and that, whatever she did, the bishop got nothing but words, and he might be assured nobody but himself should ever have anything else of her.

One day, when her husband had to wait upon the bishop, she asked leave of him to go to the country, alleging that the air of the city did not agree with her. No sooner had she arrived at his farm than she wrote to the lieutenant's son, bidding him not fail to visit her about ten o'clock at night. The poor young man did so ; but on his arrival the servant woman who usually let him in, met him and said, " Go elsewhere, my friend, for your place is filled." Du Mesnil, thinking that the husband had returned, asked the servant how all was going on. Seeing before her a handsome, well-bred young man, the girl could not help pitying him to think how much he loved, and how little he was loved in return. With this feeling, she resolved to acquaint him with her mistress's behaviour, believing that it would cure him of loving her so much. She told him that the Bishop of Sées had but just entered the house, and was in bed with her mistress, who had not expected him till the following day ; but having detained the husband at his own residence, he had stolen away by night to visit her. The lieutenant's son was thunderstruck at this disclosure, and could hardly bring himself to believe it.

To clear up his doubts, he secreted himself in a neighbouring house, where he remained on sentry till three o'clock in the morning, when he saw the bishop come out, and recognized him perfectly in spite of his disguise.

The young man returned in despair to Alençon, where his wicked mistress arrived soon after. Never doubting but that she should dupe him as usual, she lost no time in coming to see him, but he told her that since she had touched sacred things she was too holy to talk to a sinner like him, but a sinner so repentant that he hoped his sin would soon be forgiven. When she found she was discovered, and that excuses and promises never to offend in that way again were of no avail, she went off and complained to her bishop. After long pondering over the matter, she told her husband that she could no longer reside in Alençon because the lieutenant's son, whom he thought so much his friend, was incessantly importuning her, and she begged that in order to prevent all suspicion he would take a house at Argentan. The husband, who allowed himself to be led by her, easily consented.

They had been but a few days settled in Argentan, when this wretched woman sent word to the lieutenant's son that he was the most wicked of men, and that she was not ignorant that he publicly maligned her and the prelate, but that she would yet find means to make him repent of this. The young man, who had never spoken to any one but herself, and who was afraid of involving himself in a quarrel with the prelate, mounted his horse and rode to Argentan, attended only by two of his servants. He found the lady at the Jacobins, where she was hearing vespers, and having placed himself on his knees beside her, "I am come, Madam," he said, "to protest to you before God that I have never complained of you to any but yourself. You have behaved so vilely to me that what I have said to you is not half what you deserve. But if any man or woman says that I have publicly spoken ill of you, I am here to contradict them in your presence."

The proctor's wife, seeing that there were many people in the church, and that he was accompanied by two stout men, constrained herself, and spoke to him as civilly as she could. She told him she did not doubt the truth of what he said; that she believed him too upright to speak ill of anybody, and still less of her, who always loved him; but as something had come to her husband's ears, she begged he would say before him that he had never spoken as had been said, and that he did not believe a word of such tales. To this he readily consented, and took her by the arm to conduct her home; but she begged him not to do so, lest her husband should suppose that she had schooled him as to what he should say. Then taking one of his servants by the sleeve, she said, "Let this man come with me, and when it is time he shall bring you word. Meanwhile, you may remain quietly in your lodging." He, never dreaming of a conspiracy against him, made no objection to what she proposed.

She gave the servant she took home with her his supper, and when the man frequently asked her when would it be time to go for his master, she always replied that he would come soon enough.

At night she privily sent off one of her own domestics to fetch Du Mesnil, who, having no suspicion, accompanied the man to St. Aignan's house, having with him only one of his servants, the other being with the mistress of the house. As he entered the door, his

Leaning over the stair-head, she called out to her husband,
"Well! is it done?"

guide told him his mistress would be glad to say a few words to him before he spoke to her husband ; that she was waiting for him in a room with only one of his servants, and that he had better send away the other by the front door. This he accordingly did ; and as he was going up a narrow and very dark flight of stairs, the proctor, who had set men in ambush, hearing a voice, called out to know what it was. Some one replied it was a man who was making his way secretly into the house. Upon this, one Thomas Guerin, an assassin by profession, and hired by the proctor for the occasion, fell upon the poor young man, and gave him so many sword-wounds that at last he fell dead. Meanwhile, his servant, who was with the lady, said to her, " I hear my master's voice on the stairs. I will go to him." But she stopped him, saying, " Don't trouble yourself ; he will come soon enough." Soon afterwards, hearing his master cry out, " I am a dead man ! My God have mercy on me ! " he wanted to go to his aid, but again she stopped him. " Be quiet," she said ; " my husband is chastising him for his pranks. Let's go see." Leaning over the stair-head, she called out to her husband, " Well ! is it done ? " " Come and see," replied the husband ; " you are avenged on him who put you to such shame." And so saying, he struck his dagger ten or twelve times into the stomach of a man whom when living he dare not have assailed.

After the deed was done, and the two servants of the murdered man had fled with the sad tidings to his poor father, St. Aignan began to consider what steps he should next take. The servants of the murdered man could not be admitted to give evidence, and no one else had seen the deed besides the murderers, an old woman-servant, and a girl of fifteen. He endeavoured to secure the old woman ; but she found means of escape, and took refuge in the Jacobins. Her testimony was the best that was had respecting this crime. The young chambermaid remained some days in St. Aignan's house ; but contriving to have her suborned by one of the assassins, he had her taken to Paris, and placed in a house of ill-fame, in order to hinder her from being believed as a witness. That nothing else might remain to prove his guilt, he burned the body ; and the bones which the fire could not consume he had mixed with mortar, for he was then building. All this being done, he sent to the court to sue for his pardon, and set forth that having ascertained that the deceased was endeavouring to dishonour his wife, he had often forbid him his house ; that he had come notwithstanding by night, under suspicious circumstances, to speak with her, and that having found him at the door of his wife's chamber, he had killed him more in the heat of anger than deliberately. But in spite of his haste, before he had despatched his letter, the duke and duchess learned the whole truth, which they had from the father of the unfortunate young man, and made it known to the chancellor in order to hinder St. Aignan from obtaining his pardon. Seeing this, the wretch fled to England with his wife and several of her relations. Before his departure, he told the assassin he had employed that he had express orders from the king to arrest him and have him put to death ; but that, in consideration of the service he had rendered him, he would save his life. He gave him ten crowns to quit the realm, and the man has never been heard of since. The murder, however, was so well verified by the servants of the deceased, by the old woman who had fled to the Jacobins, and by the bones which were found in the mortar, that the criminal process was completed in the absence of St. Aignan and his wife, who were condemned to death as contumacious, to pay their victim's father fifteen hundred crowns for the cost of the process, and to have the rest of their property confiscated to the sovereign.

St. Aignan being in England, and finding himself condemned to death in France, so managed by his services to gain the goodwill of several great lords, and set his wife's relations to work to such purpose, that the King of England entreated the King of France to pardon him and to restore him to his possessions and his honours. The king having been informed of the atrocity of this affair, sent the details of the process to the King of England, and begged him to consider if the crime was one which could be pardoned; adding, that throughout his realm none but the Duke of Alençon alone had the privilege of granting grace in his duchy. The King of England did not yield to these representations, but so urgently solicited St. Aignan's pardon that at last he obtained it.

On his return home, to fill up the measure of his wickedness, the proctor made acquaintance with a sorcerer named Gallery, hoping to be put by him in a way to escape payment of the fifteen hundred crowns due by him to his victim's father. To this end, he and his wife went in disguise to Paris; but the wife, seeing how he often shut himself up for a long time with Gallery without saying a word to her, watched them one morning, and saw Gallery set before her husband five wooden images, three of which had their hands hanging down, and two had them raised. "We must have waxen images made like them," said Gallery to St. Aignan; "those which shall have their arms hanging down will be for the persons we shall cause to die; and those with raised arms will be for the persons whose goodwill we seek."

"Very well," said the proctor. "This one, then shall be for the king, by whom I would be favoured, and this one for Monsieur Brinon, Chancellor of Alençon."

"The images," said Gallery, "must be put under the altar, where they will hear mass, with certain words which I will teach you at the proper time."

The proctor coming then to the images with pendent arms, said that one was for Maître Gilles du Mesnil, father of the deceased, for he knew well that, as long as the old man lived, he would not cease to pursue the murderer of his son. One of the female figures with pendent arms was for my lady the Duchess of Alençon, the king's sister, because she was so fond of her old servant Du Mesnil, and had on so many occasions known the wickedness of the proctor, that unless she died he could not live. The second female figure of the same sort was for his wife, who, he said, was the cause of all his misfortunes, and who, he well knew, would never amend. His wife, who was peeping through the key-hole, and found herself on the list of victims, thought it high time to anticipate him. She had an uncle, named Neaufle, who was referendary to the Duke of Alençon, and going to him under the pretence of borrowing money, she related to him all she had seen and heard. The uncle, a good old servant of the duke's, went to the Chancellor of Alençon, and communicated to him what he had learnt from his niece. As the duke and duchess were not that day at court, the chancellor waited on Madame la Régente, the mother of the king and the duchess, who, as soon as she was informed of the matter, set La Barre, the Provost of Paris, to work at once. The provost did his duty so promptly and so well, that the proctor and the necromancer were both arrested

Neither torture nor constraint was required to make them avow their guilt, and on their own confession, judgment was completed and laid before the king. Some persons, who wished to save the lives of the culprits, represented to the king that they had no other intention in performing their enchantments than to secure his good graces ; but the king, to whom his sister's life was as dear as his own, commanded that they should be sentenced just as though they had been guilty against his own person. His sister, the Duchess of Alençon, nevertheless entreated the king to spare the proctor's life, and condemn him to a severe corporal punishment. Her request was granted, and St. Aignan and Gallery were sent to Saint Blancart's galleys at Marseilles, where they ended their days, and had leisure to reflect on the atrocity of their crimes. The proctor's wicked wife, after the loss of her husband, conducted herself worse than ever, and died miserably.*

Consider, ladies, I beseech you, what disorders a wicked woman occasions, and how many evils ensue from the sin of the one you have just heard of. Since Eve made Adam sin, it has been the business of women to torment, kill, and damn men. For my part, I have had so much experience of their cruelty, that I shall lay my death to nothing but the despair into which one of them has plunged me. And yet I am crazed enough to confess this hell is more agreeable to me, coming from her hand, than the paradise which another might bestow upon me.

* The events related in this novel, and the names of the persons, are all real. The last editors of the Heptameron (la Société des Bibliophiles Français, 1853) have published the writ of pardon granted by Francis I. to St. Aignan, the original of which is preserved in the Archives Nationales. The writ, as usual, recites the statement of the case made by the petitioner for pardon, and this agrees closely with the Queen of Navarre's narrative, allowance, of course, being made for the peculiar colouring which it was the murderer's interest to give to the facts.

Parlamente, affecting not to understand that it was of herself he spoke, replied, "If hell is as agreeable as you say, you can't be afraid of the devil who put you into it."

"If my devil," replied Simontault in a pet, "were to become as black as it has been cruel to me, it would cause this company as much fright as I feel pleasure in looking upon it. But the fire of love makes me forget the fire of that hell. So I will say no more about it, but call upon Madame Oisille, being assured that if she would speak of women as she knows them, she would corroborate my opinion."

The whole company turned to the old lady and begged her to begin, which she did with a smile, and with this little preamble: "It seems to me, ladies, that the last speaker has cast such a slur upon our sex by the true story he has narrated of a wretched woman, that I must run back through all the past years of my life in order to call to my mind one woman whose virtue was such as to belie the bad opinion he has of our sex. Happily I recollect one such woman, who deserves not to be forgotten, and will now relate her story to you."

NOVEL II.

Chaste and lamentable death of the wife of one of the Queen of Navarre's muleteers.

At Amboise there once lived a muleteer, who was in the service of the Queen of Navarre, sister of Francis

I. This princess being at Bois, where she was delivered of a son, the muleteer went thither to receive his quarterly payment, and left his wife at Amboise, where they lived, in a house beyond the bridges. There lived with them for a long time one of the muleteer's men, who had felt such a passion for her that at last he could not help declaring it ; but she, being a virtuous woman, reproved him so sharply, threatening to have him beaten and dismissed by her husband, that he never afterwards durst address her with such language. Nevertheless, the fire of his love, though smothered, was not extinguished. His master then being at Blois, and his mistress at vespers at St. Florentin, which is the church of the castle, very remote from the muleteer's house, in which he was left alone, he resolved to have by force what he could not obtain either by prayers or services. To this end he broke an opening through the boarded partition between his mistress's chamber and that in which he himself slept. This was not perceived, being covered by the curtains of the master's bed on one side, and by those of the men's bed on the other.

When the poor woman had gone to bed with a little girl of twelve years old, and was sleeping soundly, as one usually does in the first sleep, the man entered the room through the opening, in his shirt, with his sword in his hand, and got into the bed with her. The moment she felt him she sprang out of bed, and addressed such remonstrances to him as would occur to any woman of honour in the like case. He, whose love was but brutality, and who would better have understood the language of his mules than such virtuous pleadings, appeared more insensible to reason than the brutes with which he had long associated. Seeing that she ran so fast round a table that he could not catch her, and that, although he had twice laid hands on her, she had strength enough both times to break from his grasp, he despaired of ever taking her alive, and stabbed her in the loins, to see if pain would make her yield what fear and force had failed to extort from her. But it was quite the reverse; for as a brave soldier when he sees his own blood is the hotter to revenge himself on his enemies and acquire honour, so, her chaste heart gathering new strength, she ran faster than ever, to escape falling into the hands of that wretch, at the same time remonstrating with him in the best way she could, thinking by that means to make him conscious of his fault. But he was in such a frenzy that he was incapable of profiting by good advice. In spite of the speed with which she ran as long as her strength lasted, she received several more wounds, till at length, weakened by loss of blood, and feeling the approach of death, she raised her eyes and her clasped hands to heaven, and gave thanks to God, whom she called her strength, her virtue, her patience, and her chastity, beseeching him to accept the blood which, according to his commandment, was shed through respect for that of his son, wherein she was thoroughly assured that all sins are washed out, and effaced from the memory of his wrath. Then exclaiming "Lord, receive my soul which thy goodness has redeemed," she fell on her face, and received several more wounds from the villain, who, after she had lost the power of speech and motion, satisfied his lust, and fled with such speed that, in spite of all efforts to track him, he was never heard of afterwards.

The little girl who had been in bed with the poor woman had hid herself beneath it in her fright; but as soon as she saw that the man was gone, she went to her mistress, and finding her speechless and motionless, she called out through the window to the neighbours for help

Esteeming and liking the muleteer's wife as much as any woman in the town, they all hurried at once to her aid, and brought with them surgeons, who found that she had received twenty-five mortal wounds. They did all they could for her, but she was past saving. She lingered, however, for an hour, making signs with her eyes and hands, and showing thereby that she had not lost consciousness. A priest having asked her in what faith she died, she replied, by signs as unequivocal as speech, that she put her trust in the death of Jesus Christ, whom she hoped to see in his heavenly glory. And so, with a serene countenance and eyes uplifted to heaven, she surrendered her chaste body to the earth, and her soul to her Creator.

Her husband arrived just as they were about to carry her to the grave, and was shocked to see his wife dead before he had heard any news of her; but double cause he had to grieve when he was told how she had died; and so poignant was his sorrow that it had like to cost him his life. The martyr of chastity was buried in the church of St. Florentin, being attended to the grave by all the virtuous women of the place, who did all possible honour to her memory, deeming it a happiness to be the townswomen of one so virtuous. Those, too, who had led bad lives, seeing the honours paid to the deceased, amended their ways, and resolved to live better for the time to come.*

There, ladies, you have a true tale, and one which may well incite to chastity, which is so fine a virtue. Ought we not to die of shame, we who are of good birth, to feel our hearts full of the love of the world, since, to avoid it, a poor muleteer's wife did not fear so cruel a death? Therefore we must humble ourselves, for God does not bestow his graces on men because they are noble or rich; but, according as it pleases his goodness, which regards not the appearance of persons, He chooses whom He will. He honours with his virtues, and finally crowns with his glory, those whom He has elected; and often He chooses low and despised things to confound those which the world esteems high and honourable. Let us not rejoice in our virtues, as Jesus Christ says, but let us rejoice for that we are enrolled in the Book of Life.

* The tragedy here related is thought to have occurred after August, 1530, when Margaret was delivered of a son named Jean, who lived only two months.

The ladies were so touched by the sad and glorious death of the muleteer's wife, that there was not one of them but shed tears, and promised herself that she would strive to follow such an example should fortune expose her to a similar trial. At last, Madame Oisille, seeing they were losing time in praising the dead woman, said to Saffredent, "If you do not say something to make the company laugh, no one will forgive me for the fault I have committed in making them weep." Saffredent, who was really desirous to say something good and agreeable to the company, and especially to one of the ladies, replied that this honour was not due to him, and that there were others who were older and more capable than himself who ought to speak before him. "But since you will have it so," he said, "the best thing I can do is to despatch the matter at once, for the more good speakers precede me, the more difficult will my task be when my turn comes."

NOVEL III.

A King of Naples, having debauched the wife of a gentleman, at last wears horns himself.

As I have often wished I had shared the good fortune of one about whom I am going to tell you a tale, I must inform you that in the time of King Alfonso, the sceptre of whose realm was lasciviousness, there was at Naples a handsome, agreeable gentleman, in whom nature and education had combined so many perfections, that an old gentleman gave him his daughter, who for beauty and engaging qualities was in no respects inferior to her husband. Great was their mutual love during the first months of their marriage; but the carnival being come, and the king going masked into the houses, where everyone did his best to receive him well, he came to this gentleman's, where he met with a better reception than anywhere else. Confections, music, concerts, and other amusements were not forgotten; but what pleased the king most was the wife, the finest woman, to his thinking, he had ever seen. After the repast she sang with her husband, and that so pleasingly that she seemed more beautiful. The king, seeing so many perfections in one person, took much less pleasure in the sweet harmony of the husband and wife than in thinking how he might break it. Their mutual affection appeared to him a great obstacle to his design; therefore he concealed his passion as well as he could; but to solace it in some manner he frequently entertained the lords and ladies of Naples, and did not forget the husband and his wife.

As one readily believes what one desires, the king thought that the lady's eyes promised him something agreeable, if only those of the husband were not in the way. To put his conjecture to the proof, he sent the husband to Rome with a commission which would occupy him a fortnight or three weeks. When he was gone, his wife, who never before had lost sight of him, so to speak, was in the deepest affliction. The king went to see her frequently, and did his best to console her by obliging words and presents. In a word, he played his part so well that she was not only consoled, but even very well pleased with her husband's absence. Before the end of three weeks she was so much in love with the king that she was quite as distressed at her husband's return as she had been at his departure. That she might not be deprived of the king's presence, it was settled between them that whenever the husband went to the country she should give notice to the king, who then might come to see her in perfect security, and so secretly that her honour, which she respected more than her conscience, should not be hurt; a hope which the fair lady dwelt on with great pleasure.

The husband, on his return, was so well received by his wife, that even had he been told that the king fondled her during his absence, he never could have believed it. But in course of time this fire, which such pains were taken to conceal, began gradually to make itself visible, and became at last so glaring that the husband, justly alarmed, set him to observe, and with such effect that he had scarcely any room left for doubt. But as he was afraid that he who wronged him would do him a still worse mischief if he made any noise about the matter, he resolved to dissemble, thinking it better to live with grief at his heart, than to expose his life for a woman who did not love him. Nevertheless, he longed, in the bitterness of his resentment, to retaliate on the king, if it were possible ; and as he knew that spite will make a woman do more than love, especially such as are of a great and honourable spirit, he took the liberty one day to say to the queen how grieved he was that the king her husband treated her with indifference. The queen, who had heard of the king's amour with his wife, replied that she could not have honour and pleasure both together. " I know well," she added, " that I have the honour whereof another receives the pleasure ; but then she who has the pleasure has not the same honour as is mine."

Well knowing to whom these words applied, the gentleman responded, " Honour is born with you, madam. You are of so good a lineage that the rank of queen or empress could add nothing to your nobility ; but your beauty, your graces, and your winning deportment merit so much pleasure, that she who robs you of that which is your due does more harm to herself than to you, since for a glory which turns to shame she loses as much pleasure as you or any woman in the kingdom could enjoy. And I can tell you, madam, that the king, the crown apart, is not more capable than I of contenting a woman. Far from it, I am certain that to satisfy a woman of your merit the king ought to wish that he was of my temperament."

" Though the king is of a more delicate complexion than you," replied the queen, laughing, " the love he has for me gratifies me so much that I prefer it to any other thing."

" If that be so, madam," returned the gentleman, " I no longer pity you. I know that if the king had for you a love as pure as that you have for him, you would literally enjoy the gratification you speak of ; but God has determined that it should be otherwise, in order that, not finding in him what you desire, you should not make him your god on earth "

"I own to you," said the queen, "that the love I have for him is so great that no heart can love with such passion as mine."

"Allow me, if you please, to tell you, madam, that you have not fathomed the love in every heart. I dare assure you, madam, that there is one who loves you with a love so perfect and impassioned that what you feel for the king cannot be compared with it. His love grows stronger as that of the king grows weaker, and it only rests with yourself, madam, if you think proper, to be more than compensated for all you lose."

By this time the queen began to perceive, both from the gentleman's words and his manner, that his tongue was the interpreter of his heart. She now recollected that for a long time past he had been seeking opportunities to do her service, and seeking them with such eagerness that he had become quite melancholy. At first she had supposed that his wife was the cause of his sadness ; but now she made no doubt that it was all on her own account. As love never fails to make itself felt when it is real, the queen had no difficulty in unriddling what was a secret for everyone else. The gentleman, therefore, appearing to her more amiable than her husband, considering, besides, that he was forsaken by his wife, as she was by her husband, and animated with resentment and jealousy against her husband, "My God!" she exclaimed with a sigh, and with tears in her eyes, "must it be that vengeance shall effect upon me what love has never been able to effect?"

"Vengeance is sweet, madam," observed the now hopeful suitor, "when, instead of killing one's enemy, one bestows life on a real friend. It is high time, methinks, that the truth should cure you of an unreasonable love you entertain for a person who has none for you ; and that a just and well-founded love should expel the fear which is very ill-lodged in a heart so great and so virtuous as yours. Let us put out of consideration, madam, your royal quality, and let us contemplate the fact that you and I, of all persons in the world, are the two who are most basely duped and betrayed by those whom we have most perfectly loved. Let us avenge ourselves, madam, not so much for the sake of retaliation as for the satisfaction of love, which on my side is such that I could not bear more and live. If your heart is not harder than adamant, you must feel some spark of that fire which augments in proportion as I labour to conceal it, and if pity for me, who am dying of love for you, does not incite you to love me, at least you should do so out of resentment. Your merit is so great that it is worthy of the love of every honest heart ; yet you are despised and abandoned by him for whom you have abandoned all others."

These words caused the queen such violent transports that, in order to conceal the commotion of her spirits, she took the gentleman's arm, and went with him into a garden adjoining her chamber, where she walked up and down a long while without being able to speak a single word to him. But the gentleman, seeing her half-conquered, no sooner reached the end of an alley where no one could see them, than he plied her to good purpose with his long-concealed passion. Being both of one mind, they revenged themselves together ; and it was arranged between them that whenever the king went to visit the gentleman's wife, the gentleman should visit the queen. Thus, the cheaters being cheated, four would share the pleasure which two imagined they had all to themselves. When all was over, the queen retired to her chamber, and the gentleman went home, both of them so well contented that they thought no more of their past vexations. The gentleman, far from dreading lest the king should visit his wife, on the contrary desired nothing better; and to afford him opportunity for doing so, he went to the country oftener than he had been used. When the king knew that the gentleman was at his village, which was but half a league from the city, he went at once to the fair lady; whilst the gentleman repaired by night to the queen's chamber, where he did duty as the king's lieutenant so secretly that no one perceived it.

Things went on in this way for a long while; but whatever pains the king took to conceal his amour, all the world was aware of it. The gentleman was much pitied by all good-natured people, and ridiculed by the ill-natured, who used to make horns at him behind his back. He knew very well that they did so, and he laughed in his sleeve, for he thought his horns were as good as the king's crown. One day, when the royal gallant was at the gentleman's, casting his eyes on a pair of antlers hung up in the hall, he could not help saying, with a laugh, in the presence of the master of the house himself, "These antlers very well become this place." The gentleman, who had as much spirit as the king, had this inscription put up beneath the antlers after the king was gone:

Io porto le corna, ciascun lo vede;
Ma tal le porta, chi no lo crede.

I wear the horns as all men know;
He wears them too who thinks not so.

On his next visit the king observed this inscription, and asked the meaning of it. "If the stag," replied the gentleman, "does not know the king's secret, it is not just that the king should know the stag's secret. Be satisfied with knowing, sire, that it is not everyone who wears horns, who has his cap lifted off by them; some horns are so soft that a man may wear them without knowing it."

It was plain to the king from this reply that the gentleman knew something of his own affair, but he never suspected either him or the queen. That princess played her part extremely well; for the more pleased she was with her husband's conduct, the more she pretended to be dissatisfied. So they lived as good friends on both sides until old age put an end to their mutual pleasures. This, ladies, is a story which I have great pleasure in proposing to you by way of example, to the end that when your husbands give you horns you may do the same by them.*

"I am very well assured, Saffredent," said Ennasuite, laughing, "that if you were as much in love as you have formerly been, you would endure horns as big as oaks for the sake of bestowing a pair as you pleased; but now that your hair is beginning to turn grey, it is time to put a truce to your desires."

* The king who figures in this novel, it is thought, is Alfonso V., King of Aragon and Sicily, who supplanted King René on the throne of Naples in 1443, and remained in possession of it until his death in 1458. He married, in 1415, Maria, daughter of Henry III., King of Castile, and lived on very bad terms with that princess, who, according to the authors of l'Art de vérifier les Dates, never set foot in Italy. Queen Mary, who was married in 1415, must have been long past her bloom in 1443. For this reason the Bibliophiles Français are inclined to believe that the Queen of Navarre has here related, under borrowed names, a true story of her own times.

"Though she whom I love, mademoiselle, allows me no hope," replied Saffredent, "and age has exhausted my vigour, my desires remain still in full force. But since you reproach me with so seemly a passion, you will, if you please, relate to us the fourth novel; and we shall see if you can find some example which may refute me."

One of the ladies present, who knew that she who had taken Saffredent's words to herself was not the person he loved so much as to be willing to wear horns of her making, could not help laughing at the manner in which she had taken them up. Saffredent, who perceived that the laughing lady had guessed right, was very glad of it, and let Ennasuite talk on. "To prove, ladies," she said, "to Saffredent and all the company that all women are not like the queen of whom he has told us, and that the audacious are not always successful, I will relate to you the adventure of a lady who deemed that the vexation of falling in love was harder to bear than death itself. I shall not name the persons, because the story is so recent that I should be afraid of offending some of the near relations if I did so."

NOVEL IV.

Presumptuous attempt of a gentleman upon a Princess of Flanders, and the shame it brought upon him.

THERE was in Flanders a lady of such family that there was none better in the country. She was a widow, had been twice married, but had no children living. During her second widowhood she resided with her brother, who loved her much, and who was a very great lord, being married to one of the king's daughters. This young prince was much addicted to pleasure, and was fond of the chase, amusements, and the ladies, as usual with young people. He had a very ill-tempered wife, who was by no means well pleased with her husband's diversions ; wherefore, as his sister was the most lively and cheerful companion possible, she accompanied the prince to every place to which he took his wife. There was at the prince's court a gentleman who surpassed all the others in height, figure, and good looks, and who, seeing that his master's sister was a lively lady, and fond of laughing, thought he would try if a well-bred lover would be to her taste. But the result was quite contrary to what he had expected ; although she pardoned his audacity in consideration of his good looks and good breeding, and even let him know that she was not angry that he had spoken to her, only she desired that she might never hear the same language from him again. He promised this, that he might not lose the honour and pleasure of her society, but as his passion increased with time, he forgot his promise. He did not, however, have recourse to words, for experience had taught him that she knew how to make chaste replies ; but he flattered himself that being a widow, young, vigorous, and good-humoured, she would, perhaps, take pity on him and on herself if he could find her in a convenient place.

To this end he acquainted the prince that he had a house admirably situated for the chase, and that if he would come thither and hunt three or four stags in the month of May, he would have excellent sport. The prince promised he would do so, and he kept his word. He found a handsome house prepared for his reception, in the best order, as belonging to the richest nobleman in the country. Its owner lodged her whom he loved better than himself in an apartment opposite to that which he assigned to the prince and princess. Her bedroom was so well tapestried above, and so well matted below, that it was impossible to perceive a trap-door he had contrived in the alcove, and which led down into the room occupied by his aged and infirm mother. As the good old lady coughed a great deal, and was afraid of disturbing the princess, she exchanged bedrooms with her son. Not an evening passed that the old lady did not carry confections to the princess, on which occasions her son failed not to accompany her ; and as he was much liked by the brother, he was allowed to be present at the sister's coucher and lever, when he always found cause for the increase of his passion.

One night he stayed so late with the princess that, seeing she was falling asleep, he was obliged to leave her and return to his own chamber. He took the handsomest and best perfumed shirt he had, and a nightcap of the choicest kind ; then, looking at himself in the glass, he was so satisfied with his own appearance that he thought no lady could possibly withstand his good looks. Promising himself marvels therefore from his enterprise, he lay down on his bed, where he did not think he should stay long, for he expected to exchange it for one more honourable.

No sooner had he dismissed his attendants than he rose and locked the door, and listened for a long time to hear whether there was any noise in the princess's chamber, which, as already said, was above his own. When he had satisfied himself that all was quiet, he began to put his fine project in execution, and gradually let down the trap-door, which was so well made and so well covered with cloth that it did not make the least noise.

Then stealing up into the alcove where the princess was fast asleep, he got into bed to her without ceremony, regardless of her high birth and the obligations he was under to her, and without having in the first instance obtained her consent. The first intimation she had of his arrival was to find herself in his arms; but being a strong woman she broke loose from his grasp, and, demanding who he was, made such good use of her hands and nails that he tried to stuff the quilt into her mouth for fear she should cry out. But he never could accomplish his purpose, for as she found that he was doing his best to dishonour her, she did her best to defend herself, and called out to her lady of honour, an aged and very prudent woman, who slept in the same room, and she hastened in her shift to her mistress's aid.

The gentleman, finding he was discovered, was so much afraid of being recognized that he hurried away through his trap-door as fast as he could, no less overcome at the plight in which he returned from his enterprise than he had been keen-set and confident when he entered upon it. The candle was still burning on the table before his mirror, which showed his face all scratched and bitten, and the blood streaming from it over his fine shirt. "Thou art rightly served, pernicious beauty!" he said, apostrophising his own lacerated visage. "Thy vain promises set upon an impossible enterprise, and one which, far from increasing my good fortune, will, perhaps, bring upon me a world of trouble. What will become of me if she knows that I have committed this folly in violation of my promise? The least that can happen to me will be to be banished from her presence. Why did I employ fraud to steal what my birth and my good looks might have obtained for me by lawful ways? Could I expect to make myself master of her heart by violence? Ought I not have waited till love put me in possession of it in recompense for my patience and my long service? For without love all the merits and power of man are nothing."

The rest of the night was spent by the discomfited gallant in such reflections as these, mingled with tears, groans, and wailings indescribable. In the morning he feigned illness, to conceal the mangled state of his countenance, pretending all the while the company remained in the house that he could not endure the light. The lady, who was convinced that there was no one at the court capable of so audacious an act except the man who had the boldness to declare his love to her, searched the chamber with the lady of honour; but not finding a passage through which anyone could have entered, she broke into a towering passion. "Be assured," she said to the lady of honour, "that the lord of this mansion is the man, and that I will make such a report to-morrow morning to my brother that the culprit's head shall bear witness to my chastity."

"I am delighted, madam," said her wary attendant, who saw what a transport of rage she was in—"I am delighted that honour is so precious in your eyes that, for its sake, you would not spare the life of a man who has put it in jeopardy through excess of love. But in this, as in every other matter, one may fall backwards when thinking to advance. Therefore, tell me, madam, the plain truth. Has he had anything of you?"

"Nothing, I do assure you," replied the princess, "besides scratches and cuffs; and unless he has found a very clever surgeon, I am sure he will show the marks of them to-morrow."

"That being the case, madam, it strikes me you ought rather to praise God than think of vengeance

Since he has had the heart to make such an attempt, the vexation of having failed in it will be more poignant than even death itself. If you would be avenged on him, leave him to his love and to his shame, which will make him suffer more than anything you can do. Do not fall, madam, into the blunder he has committed. He promised himself the sweetest of all pleasures, and he has brought upon himself the most miserable torment. Profit by his example, madam, and do not diminish your glory in thinking to augment it. If you complain of the adventure, you will publish what is known to nobody; for you may be sure that on his part it will remain an everlasting secret. Suppose even my lord your brother does you the justice you demand, and that it costs the poor gentleman his life, people will say that he has had his will of you; and most people will find it hard to believe that he would have made such an attempt if you had not given him encouragement. You are handsome, young, and lively. All the court knows that you are graciously familiar with the gentleman you suspect; and so everyone will conclude that he only made this attempt because it was your wish that he should do so. Your honour, which has hitherto sustained no blemish, will become at least questionable wherever this story is told."

The princess yielded to the force of these judicious representations, and asked the lady of honour what she should do. "Since you are pleased to receive my counsel, madam," replied the lady, "seeing the affection from which it proceeds, I must say that, in my opinion, you ought to be heartily rejoiced that the handsomest and best-bred man I know has neither by fair means nor by foul been able to make you swerve from the path of virtue. For this, madam, you should feel bound to humble yourself before God, and acknowledge that it is His work and not your own. Many a woman, indeed, has maintained a more imposing air of gravity than you, who yet has yielded to a man less worth loving than this gentleman. You ought to be more on your guard than ever against everything in the shape of soft speeches, and be-think you that many have resisted a first attack who have yielded to a second. Remember, madam, that Love is blind, and that he makes people blind, so that they think they have nothing to fear when they are most in danger. It is my opinion, then, madam, that you ought not to tell anyone what has occurred to you, and that even if he should think of speaking to you on the subject, you should affect not to understand him. Thereby, you will avoid two bad things: one is vain-glory for the victory you have achieved; the other, the pleasure you might take in remembering things so agreeable to the flesh; for the chastest of our sex can hardly prevent themselves, strive as they will, from feeling something of the sort. Furthermore, madam, that he may not believe that what he has done accords in any way with your inclinations, I advise you to make him feel his folly by gradually withdrawing something of that friendly countenance you have been used to show him. He will also feel at the same time that you manifest great goodness of heart in contenting yourself with your victory and renouncing vengeance. God grant you the grace, madam, to persist in the virtue with which he has endowed you, and to love and serve him better than you have hitherto done, knowing that he is the source of all good things."

The princess followed her lady of honour's sage counsels, and slept calmly through the rest of the night, whilst the gentleman lay awake in bitter anguish of spirit. Next day, the prince, being about to take his departure, asked after his host, and was told he was so ill he could not bear to see the light or hear anyone speak. Surprised at this sudden malady, the prince would have gone to see him, but hearing that he was asleep, and not wishing to disturb him, he went away with his wife and sister without bidding him farewell. His sister, concluding that the gentleman's illness was only a pretence to avoid showing the marks she had left upon his face, was now assured beyond all doubt that it was he who had been her nightly assailant. The prince repeatedly sent word to him to return to court, but he did not obey until he had been thoroughly cured of all his wounds, except those which love and vexation had made in his heart. On his return to court, he could not sustain the presence of his victorious enemy without blushing. Though he had been possessed of more assurance than any man at court, he was so disconcerted that he often appeared before her quite abashed—a new proof that her suspicions were well founded. She broke with him, therefore, little by little. Adroitly as she did this, he failed not to perceive it, but durst not remonstrate for fear of worse. He kept his love concealed, and endured patiently a disgrace he had well merited.*

There, ladies, is a story which should strike fear into

* The princess and the gallant spoken of in this novel are none other than the Queen of Navarre herself and Guillaume de Bonnavet, Admiral of France, as we are informed by Brantôme (Dames Galantes, Discours iv. t. vii.). He states the fact upon the authority of his grandmother, who, as well as his mother, Anne de Vivonne, was about Margaret's person, and it is generally regarded as true. It is to be observed, however, that Margaret has purposely introduced into her narrative several circumstances calculated to disguise her own identity; the second widowhood, for instance, for the King of Navarre survived her, and the absence of children by both marriages, for Margaret had a surviving daughter by her second husband. The handsome and gallant Bonnavet figures repeatedly in the Heptameron.

those who would seize what does not belong to them, and which should inspire ladies with courage, considering the virtue of the young princess and the good sense of her lady of honour. Should a similar thing befall one of you, here you see how it is to be remedied.

"To my thinking," said Hircan, "the tall gentleman you have been telling us of had such a faint heart that he did not deserve the honour of having his adventure talked of. Having such a fine opportunity, nothing should have prevented him from profiting by it. His love, it must be owned, was not very great, since the fear of death and of shame found a place beside it in his heart."

"And what could the poor gentleman have done against two women?" said Nomerfide.

"He should have killed the old one," replied Hircan, "and the young one, seeing herself alone, would have been half vanquished."

"Killed!" exclaimed Nomerfide; "you would turn a lover into a murderer! It would be a terrible thing to fall into your hands, I see."

"If I had pushed matters so far," continued Hircan, "I should think myself ruined in reputation unless I went the whole way to the end."

"Do you think it matter for wonder," said Geburon, "that a princess trained to virtue proves too much for one man? What would you say, then, to one woman in low life escaping from two men!"

"Geburon," said Ennasuite, "I call upon you for the fifth novel. If I am not mistaken, you know one about this poor woman which will not be displeasing to the company."

"Be it so, then," said Geburon; "I will tell you a story which I know to be true, having examined into it on the spot. You will see from it that princesses are not the only prudent and the only virtuous of their sex, and that often those who are reputed very amorous and very sly are less so than is supposed."

NOVEL V.

A boatwoman escapes from two Cordeliers, who wanted to force her, and exposes them to public derision.

THERE was in the port of Coulon, near Niort, a boatwoman, who did nothing day and night but convey people from point to point. Two Cordeliers of Niort crossed the river alone with her. As it was one of the wildest ferries in France, they took it into their heads to make love to her, for fear she should grow dull by the way; she gave no more ear to them than they deserved; but the good fathers, who were neither fatigued by the labour of the passage, nor chilled by the coldness of the water, nor abashed by the woman's refusal, resolved to force her, or throw her into the river if she was refractory. But she was as good and as shrewd as they were wicked and witless, and said to them, "I am not so ill-natured as you might suppose; only grant me two things I have to beg of you, and you will see I am not more willing to satisfy you than you are to be satisfied." The Cordeliers swore by their good St. Francis there was nothing they would not grant her to have from her what they wanted. "Well, then," said she, "I ask you, in the first place, to promise and vow that living man shall never know from you what passes between us."

This they did with great readiness. "The second thing I ask is, that you will have to do with me one by one, for I should be too much ashamed if it was done in the presence of you both. Settle between yourselves which is to have me first." The Cordeliers thought that fair enough, and the younger of them yielded precedence to the elder.

Running the boat ashore at a little island, she said to the younger one, "Say your prayers there whilst your comrade and I go to another island. If he is satisfied with me when we come back, we will leave him, and you and I will go away together." The younger friar jumped ashore at once, and the boatwoman rowed away with his companion to another island. When they reached it, she pretended to be making her boat fast, whilst she said to the monk, "See if you can find a convenient spot." The Cordelier, like a booby, stepped out of the boat to do as she told him, and no sooner was he ashore than, setting her foot against a tree, she shot the boat out into the stream, and left the two good fathers in the lurch. "Wait there, my masters," said she, "till God's angels comes to console you, for you will get nothing from me." The duped Cordeliers went down on their knees, and begged her, for Heaven's sake, not to serve them so, but take them to the port, upon their solemn oath they would ask nothing of her. "A pretty fool I should be," she replied, still rowing away, "to put myself into your hands again once I have got out of them."

When she got home to the village, she told her husband what had occurred, and applied to the ministers of justice to come and capture those two wolves from whose fangs she had contrived to escape. The ministers of justice set out for the purpose, well accompanied, for there was no one, great or small, but was bent on taking part in this hunt. The poor friars, seeing such a multitude coming after them, hid themselves each on his island, as Adam did from the sight of God when he had eaten the apple. Half dead with shame and the fear of punishment, they were caught and led away prisoners, amid the jeers and hootings of men and women. "These good fathers," said one, "preach chastity to us and want to foul our wives." "They dare not touch money," said the husband, "but they are ready enough to handle women's thighs, which are far more dangerous." "They are sepulchres," said others, "whitened without, but full of rottenness within." "By their fruits you shall know the nature of these trees." In short, all the passages of Scripture against hypocrites were cast in the teeth of the poor prisoners. At last the warden came to the rescue. They were given up to him at his request, upon his assuring the magistrate that he would punish them more severely than secular justice itself could do, and that, by way of reparation to the offended parties, they should say as many masses and prayers as might be desired. As he was a worthy man, they were chaptered in such a manner that they never afterwards passed over the river without crossing themselves, and beseeching God to keep them out of all temptation.

If this boatwoman had the wit to trick two such bad men, what should they do who have seen and read of so many fine examples? If women who know nothing, who scarcely hear two good sermons in a year, and have no time to think of anything but earning their bread, do yet carefully guard their chastity, what ought not others of their sex to do who, having their livelihood secured, have nothing to do but to read the Holy Scriptures, hear sermons, and exercise themselves in all sorts of virtues? This is the test by which it is known that the heart is truly virtuous, for the more simple and unenlightened the individual, the greater are the works of God's spirit. Unhappy the lady who does not carefully preserve the treasure which does her so much honour when well kept, and so much dishonour when she keeps it ill!

"It strikes me, Geburon," said Longarine, "that it does not need much virtue to refuse a Cordelier. On the contrary, I should rather think it impossible to love such people."

"Those who are not accustomed to have such lovers as you have," replied Geburon, "do not think so contemptuously of Cordeliers. They are well-made, strapping fellows, can talk like angels, and are for the most part importunate as devils. Accordingly, the grisettes who escape out of their hands may fairly be called virtuous."

"O, by my faith!" exclaimed Nomerfide, raising her voice, "you may say what you will, but for my part I would rather be flung into the river than go to bed with a Cordelier."

"You can swim, then," retorted Oisille, laughing.

Nomerfide was piqued at this, and said with warmth, "There are those who have refused better men than Cordeliers, without making any flourish of trumpets about it, for all that."

"Or yet beating the drum about what they have done and granted," rejoined Oisille, who laughed to see her vexed.

"I perceive that Nomerfide has a mind to speak," said Geburon, "and I give my voice in her favour, that she may unburden her heart upon some good novel."

"The remarks which have just been made," said

Nomerfide, "concern me so little that they can give me neither pain nor pleasure. But as I have your voice, I beg you to hear mine, while I show you that, if one is sly for a good purpose, others are so for a bad one. We are vowed to speak the truth, and therefore I will not conceal it; for just as the boatwoman's virtue is no honour to other women if they do not resemble her in it, so the vice of another cannot dishonour them. Listen, then."

NOVEL VI.

Stratagem by which a woman enabled her gallant to escape, when her husband, who was blind of an eye, thought to surprise them together.

CHARLES, the last Duke of Alençon, had an old valet-de-chambre who was blind of an eye, and who was married to a woman much younger than himself. The duke and duchess liked this valet better than any other domestic of that order in their household, and the consequence was that he could not go and see his wife as often as he could have wished, whilst she, unable to accommodate herself to circumstances, so far forgot her honour and her conscience as to fall in love with a young gentleman of the neighbourhood. At last the affair got wind, and there was so much talk about it that it reached the ears of the husband, who could not believe it, so warm was the affection testified to him by his wife. One day, however, he made up his mind to know the truth of the matter, and to revenge himself, if he could, on the person who put this affront upon him. With this view he pretended to go for two or three days to a place at some little distance ; and no sooner had he taken his departure than his wife sent for her gallant. They had hardly been half an hour together, when the husband came and knocked loudly at the door. The wife, knowing but too well who it was, told her lover, who was so astounded that he could have wished he was still in his mother's womb. But while he was swearing, and confounding her and the intrigue which had brought him into such a perilous scrape, she told him not to be uneasy, for she would get him off without its costing him anything ; and that all he had to do was to dress himself as quickly as possible.

Meanwhile, the husband kept knocking, and calling to his wife as loud as he could bawl, but she pretended not to know him. "Why don't you get up," she cried to the people of the house, "and go and silence those who are making such a noise ? Is this a proper time to come to honest people's houses ? If my husband were here he would make you know better." The husband hearing her voice, shouted louder than ever : "Let me in, wife ; do you mean to keep me at the door till daylight ?" At last, when she saw that her lover was ready to slip out, "Oh, is that you, husband ?" she said ; "I am so glad you are come ! I was full of a dream I had that gave me the greatest pleasure I ever felt in my life. I thought you had recovered the sight of your eye." Here she opened the door, and catching her husband round the neck, kissed him, clapped one hand on his sound eye, and asked him if he did not see better than usual. Whilst the husband was thus blindfolded the gallant made his escape. The husband guessed how it was, but said, "I will watch you no more, wife. I thought to deceive you, but it is I who have been the dupe, and you have put the cunningest trick upon me that ever was invented. God mend you ! for it passes the act of man to bring back a wicked woman from her evil ways by any means short of putting her to death. But since the regard I have had for you has not availed to make you behave better, perhaps the contempt with which I shall henceforth look upon you will touch you more, and have a more wholesome effect." Therefore he went away, leaving her in great confusion. At last, however, he was prevailed upon, by the solicitations of relations and friends, and by the tears and excuses of his wife, to cohabit with her again.*

You see from this example, ladies, with what adroitness a woman can get herself out of a scrape. If she is prompt at finding an expedient to conceal a bad deed, I believe she would be still more prompt and ingenious in discovering means to hinder herself from doing a good one ; for, as I have heard say, good wit is always the stronger.

"You may boast of your cunning as much as you will," said Hircan, "but I believe if the same thing had happened to you, you could not have concealed it."

"I would as soon you told me flatly," said Nomerfide, "that I am the most stupid woman in the world."

"I do not say that," replied Hircan ; "but I look upon you as more likely to be alarmed at a rumour against you than to find an ingenious way of putting an end to it."

* Although Margaret asserts that this is a true story, and that the actors in it belonged to the household of her first husband, it is to be found in many previous collections ; as, for instance, the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles, where it occurs as the sixteenth novel, entitled Le Borgne Aveugle. It is the sixth fable of the first book of the Pantcha Tantra, a collection of Hindoo stories.

"You think that everyone is like yourself, who to get rid of one rumour set another afloat. You pass for a very cunning man, but if you think that you surpass woman in that way, I will give up my turn to you, that you may tell us some story in point. Of course you know plenty, of which you are yourself the hero."

"I am not here to make myself appear worse than I am," returned Hircan, "though there are some who give me a worse character than I desire to deserve," he added, looking at his wife.

"Don't let me hinder you from speaking the truth," said she. "I would rather hear you relate your sly tricks than see you play them. But be assured that nothing can diminish the love I have for you."

"For that reason," said Hircan, "I do not complain of the injustice with which you often judge me. And so, since we understand each other, there will be so much the more peace and quiet for the future. But I am not the man to tell a story of myself, the truth of which may be displeasing to you, but shall relate one of a person who was an intimate friend of mine."

NOVEL VII.

Trick put by a mercer of Paris upon an old woman, to conceal his intrigue with her daughter.

THERE was a mercer in Paris who was enamoured of a girl in his neighbourhood, or, to speak more properly, who was loved by her, rather than she by him, for he only pretended to be attached to her in order to conceal another amour with a more exalted object. For her part, she was very willing to be deceived, and loved him so much that she forgot all the usual coyness of her sex. After the mercer had long taken the trouble of going in search of her, he used afterwards to make her come to him wherever he pleased. The mother, who was a respectable woman, perceived this, and forbade her daughter ever to speak to the mercer, under pain of being sent to a convent; but the girl, who loved the mercer more than she feared her mother, behaved worse than ever. One day the mercer, finding her alone in a convenient place, began to entertain her on matters that ought not to be discussed before witnesses; but a servant, who had seen him come in, ran and told the mother, who hastened to the spot to put an end to the conversation. The daughter, hearing her footsteps, said, with tears in her eyes, "My love for you will cost me dear; here comes my mother, and she will now be convinced of what she always feared." The mercer, without losing his presence of mind, instantly quitted the girl, ran to meet her mother, threw his arms around the old woman's neck, hugged her with all his might, threw her on a little bed, and began to expend upon her all the rage her daughter had excited within him. The poor old woman, quite confounded at being treated in this way, could only exclaim, "What are you about? Are you mad?" But he no more desisted than if she had been the handsomest young girl in the world; and if her screams had not brought the servant men and maids to her assistance, she would have suffered the fate she apprehended so much for her daughter. The servants dragged the good woman by force out of the mercer's hands, without the poor creature ever knowing why she had been so worried. During the scuffle, the daughter escaped to a neighbour's house, where there was a wedding going on ; and she and the mercer often afterwards laughed at the expense of the old woman, who never detected their intercourse.

Here you have, ladies, an instance of a man having been cunning enough to deceive an old woman, and save the honour of a young one. If I were to name the persons, or if you had seen the countenance of the mercer and the surprise of the old woman, you must have had very tender consciences to keep from laughing. I have sufficiently proved to you by this example that men are not less ingenious than women in inventing at need expedients upon the spot ; and so, ladies, you need not be afraid of falling into their hands, for, should your own wit fail, you will find theirs ready to screen your honour.

"I own, Hircan," said Longarine, "that the story is comical and the stratagem well invented ; but, for all that, it does not follow that the example is one which ought to be imitated by girls. I have no doubt there are plenty whom you would wish to approve of it ; but you have too much sense to wish that your wife and your daughter, whose honour is dearer to you than pleasure, should play at such a game. I believe there is no one who would watch them more closely, and put a stop to such doings more promptly, than yourself."

"Upon my conscience," replied Hircan, "if my wife had done the same thing, I should not esteem her the less, provided I knew nothing about it. I don't know if some one has not played as good a trick at my expense, but, fortunately, as I know nothing, I give myself no concern."

"The wicked are always suspicious," said Parla-mente ; "but happy are they who give no cause of suspicion."

“I can’t say I ever saw a fire without some smoke,” said Longarine; “but I have certainly seen smoke without any fire. Those who have bad hearts suspect alike where there is mischief and where there is none.”

“You have so well supported the cause of ladies unjustly suspected,” said Hircan to Longarine, “that I call upon you for your novel. I hope you will not make us weep, as Madame Oisille has done, by too much praise of honest women.”

“Since you would have me make you laugh,” said Longarine, laughing with all her heart, “it shall not be at the expense of our sex. I will let you see how easy it is to cheat jealous wives who think they are wise enough to cheat their husbands.”

NOVEL VIII.

A man having lain with his wife, believing that he was in bed with his servant, sends his friend to do the same thing; and the friend makes a cuckold of him, without the wife being aware of it.

THERE was in the county of Allez a person named Bornet, who had married a virtuous wife, and held her honour and reputation dear, as is the case, I suppose, with all the husbands here present. Though he desired that his wife should be faithful to him, he did not choose to be equally bound to her; in fact, he made love to his servant, though all the good he could get by the change was the pleasure attending a diversity of viands. He had a neighbour, much of his own sort, named Sandras, a tailor by trade, with whom he was on terms of such close friendship that everything was common between them, except the wife. Accordingly, Bornet declared the design he had formed upon the servant-girl to his friend, who not only approved of it, but did what he could for its success, in hopes of having a finger in the pie. But the servant would not hear of such a thing, and finding herself persecuted on all sides, she complained to her mistress, and begged to be allowed to go home to her relations, as she could no longer endure her master's importunity. The mistress, who was very fond of her husband, and who even before this had been jealous of him, was very glad to have this opportunity of reproaching him, and showing that it was not without reason she had suspected him. With this view she induced the servant to finesse with her master, give him hopes by degrees, and finally promise to let him come to bed to her in her mistress's wardrobe. "The rest you may leave to me," she said. "I will take care that you shall not be troubled at all, provided you let me know the night he is to come to you, and that you do not breathe a syllable of the matter to anyone living."

The girl faithfully obeyed her mistress's instructions, and her master was so delighted that he hastened at once to impart this good news to his friend, who begged that, since he had been concerned in the bargain, he should also partake of the pleasure. This being agreed to, and the hour being come, the master went to bed, as he supposed, with the servant; but the mistress had taken her place, and received him, not as a wife, but as a bashful and frightened maid, and she played her part so well that he never suspected anything. I cannot tell you which of the two felt the greater satisfaction, he in the belief that he was cheating his wife, or she in the belief that she was cheating her husband.

After he had remained with her not so long as he wished, but as long as he could, for he showed symptoms of an old married man, he went out of doors to his friend, who was younger and more vigorous, and told him what a fine treat he had just had. "You know what you promised me," said the friend. "Well, be quick then," said the master, "for fear she gets up, or my wife wants her." The friend lost no time, but took the unoccupied place beside the supposed servant, who, thinking he was her husband, let him do whatever he liked, without a word said on either side. He made a much longer business of it than the husband, greatly to the surprise of the wife, who was not accustomed to be so well regaled. However, she took it all patiently, comforting herself with the thought of what she would say to him in the morning, and how she would make game of him. The friend got out of bed towards daybreak, but not without taking the stirrup-cup. During this ceremony he drew from her finger the ring with which her husband had wedded her, a thing which the women of that country preserve with great superstition, thinking highly of a woman who keeps it till death: on the other hand, one who has had the mischance to lose it is looked upon as having given her faith to another than her husband.

When the friend had rejoined the husband, the latter asked him what he thought of his bedfellow. "Never was a better," replied the friend; "and if I had not been afraid of being surprised by daylight, I should not have come away from her so soon." That said, they went to bed, and slept as quietly as they could. In the morning, when they were dressing, the husband perceived on his friend's finger the ring, which looked very like that he had given his wife when he married her. He asked who had given him that ring, and was astounded to hear that he had taken it from the servant's finger. "Oh Lord!

have I made a cuckold of myself, without my wife's knowing it?" cried the husband, knocking his head against the wall. The friend suggested for his consolation that possibly his wife might have given the ring overnight to the servant to keep.

Home goes the husband, and finds his wife looking handsomer and gayer than usual, delighted as she was to have hindered her servant from committing a sin, and to have convicted her husband without any more inconvenience to herself than having passed a night without sleeping. The husband, seeing her in such good spirits, said to himself, "She would not look so merry if she knew what has happened." Falling into chat with her upon indifferent matters, he took her hand, and saw that the ring she always wore was not on her finger. Aghast, and with a trembling voice, he asked her what she had done with it. This gave her the opportunity she was on the watch for to let loose upon him, and she seized it with avidity.

"Oh, you most abominable of men!" she said, "from whom do you suppose you took it? You thought you had it from the servant. You thought it was for her you did more than you ever did for me. The first time you came to bed to her, I thought you made as much of her as it was possible to do; but after you left the room and came again the second time, it seemed as though you were the very devil of incontinence. What infatuation has possessed you to praise me so much, you wretch? You have had me long enough, and never cared about me. Is it the beauty and plumpness of your servant that made the pleasure seem so sweet to you? No, base man, it is the fire of your own disorderly lust that makes you so blindly and madly in love with the servant, that in the furious fit you were in I believe you would have taken a she-goat with a nightcap on for a fine girl. It is high time, husband, that you should mend your ways, and content yourself with me, who am your wife, and, as you know, an honest woman, as much as you did when you mistook me for a vicious woman. My only object in the matter has been to withdraw you from vice, so that in our old days we may live in amity and repose of conscience ; for if you choose to continue the life you have led hitherto, I would rather we should separate than that I should see you daily treading the path that leads to hell, and at the same time using up your body and your substance. But if you resolve to behave better, and to fear God and keep his commandments, I am willing to forget the past, as I trust God will forgive the ingratitude I am guilty of in not loving him as much as I ought."

The poor husband was utterly confounded and horrified.

Photographed from Life
Copyright, 1902, by D. Trenor.

If ever a man was utterly confounded and horrified, it was the poor husband. It was bad enough to think that he had forsaken his wife, who was fair, chaste, and virtuous, and overflowing with affection for him, for a woman who did not love him ; but it was infinitely worse when he represented to himself that he had been so unlucky as to make her quit the path of virtue, in spite of herself and without knowing it, to share with another the pleasures which should have been his alone, and to have forged for himself the horns of perpetual mockery. Seeing, however, that his wife was already angry enough about his intended intrigue with the servant, he did not dare to tell her of the villainous trick he had played upon herself. He implored her pardon, promised to make amends for the past by the strictest propriety of conduct in future, and gave her back her ring, which he had taken from his friend, whom he begged not to say a word of what had happened. But as everything whispered in the ear is by-and-by proclaimed from the house-top, the adventure became public at last, and people called him a cuckold, without any regard for his wife's feelings.*

It strikes me, ladies, that if all those who have been guilty of similar infidelity to their wives were punished in the same way, Hircan and Saffredent would have great cause to fear.

"Why, Longarine?" said Saffredent. "Are Hircan and I the only married men in the company?"

"You are not the only married men," she replied. "but you are the only ones capable of playing such a trick."

"Who told you," returned Saffredent, "that we have sought to debauch our wives' servant-maids?"

"If those who are interested in the matter," she answered, "were to speak the truth, we should certainly hear of servant-maids dismissed before their time."

"This is pleasant, truly," observed Geburon; "you promised to make the company laugh, and instead of that you vex these gentlemen."

"It comes to the same thing," replied Longarine. "Provided they do not draw their swords, their anger will not fail to make us laugh."

"If our wives were to listen to this lady," said Hircan, "there is not a married couple in the company but she would set at variance."

"Nay," said Longarine, "I know before whom I speak. Your wives are so prudent, and love you so much, that though you were to make them bear horns as big as those of a deer, they would believe, and try to make others believe, that they were chaplets of roses."

* This tale is taken from the fabliau of Le Meunier d'Alens, and also occurs in the facetiæ of Poggio, in Sacchetti, and in the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles.

The whole company, including even the ladies concerned, laughed so heartily that the conversation would have ended there, if Dagoucin, who had not yet spoken, had not taken it into his head to say, "A man is surely very unreasonable who cannot content himself when he has the means. I have often known people who, thinking to better themselves, only made themselves much worse off, because they could not be satisfied in reason. Such people deserve no pity ; for, after all, inconstancy is unpardonable."

"But what would you do," inquired Simontault, "with those who have not found their true half ? Would you call it inconstancy on their part to seek it wherever it might be found ?"

"As it is impossible to know," replied Dagoucin, "where is that half so exactly like its counterpart that there is no difference between them, one should hold fast where love has once attached him, and change neither in heart nor will, happen what may. For if she you love is like you, and has but one will with you, it is yourself you will love, and not her."

"You will fall into a false opinion, Dagoucin," said Hircan, "as though we ought to love our wives without being loved."

"When one loves a woman, Hircan," said Dagoucin, "only because she has beauty, charming manners, and fortune, and the end he proposes to himself is pleasure, honours, or riches, such a love is not of long duration ; for when the principle that inspired it ceases, the love itself vanishes at once. I am then convinced that he who loves, and has no other end and desire than to love well, will die rather than cease to love."

"In good faith, Dagoucin," said Simontault, "I do not believe you have ever been really in love. Had you known what it is to be so, like other men, you would not now be picturing to us Plato's Republic, founded on fine phrases, and on little or no experience."

"You are mistaken," replied Dagoucin. "I have been in love ; I am so still, and shall be so as long as I live. But I am so much afraid that the demonstration of my passion would do injustice to the perfection of my love, that I shrink from making it known to her by whom I would be loved in equal measure. I dare not even think how I love her, lest my eyes should betray the secret of my heart ; for the more I conceal my flame, the more pleasure I feel in the consciousness that I love perfectly."

"Yet I suppose you would be very glad to be loved in return?" said Geburon.

"I own I should ; but as nothing could diminish my love, though I love much and am not loved, so it could not be augmented, even were I loved as much as I love."

"Take care, Dagoucin," said Parlamente, who disapproved of this fantastic sentiment. "I have known others who chose rather to die than to declare themselves."

"And they were happy, doubtless," returned Dagoucin.

"Yes," retorted Saffredent, "and worthy, moreover, of being classed with those innocents for whom the Church chants Non loquendo, sed moriendo confessi sunt. I have heard much of these languishing lovers, but I never yet saw one of them die for love. Since I myself have recovered, after much tribulation, I do not believe that any other man can ever die from that cause."

"Ah, Saffredent!" said Dagoucin, "how can you expect to be loved ! I know many instances of lovers who have died from nothing else than the intensity of their passion."

"Since that is the case, tell us one of those stories, and let it be a good one," said Longarine.

"Yes," said he ; "to confirm my doctrine by signs and miracles, I will tell you a story that happened three years ago."

NOVEL IX.

Deplorable death of a lover in consequence of his knowing too late that he was beloved by his mistress.

ON the confines of Dauphiné and Provence there lived a gentleman who was much better endowed with the gifts of nature and education than with those of fortune. He was passionately enamoured of a demoiselle whose name I will not mention, on account of her relations, who are of good and great houses ; but you may rely on the reality of the act. Not being of as good family as she was, he durst not declare his passion ; but though his inferior birth made him despair of ever being able to marry her, nevertheless the love he bore her was so pure and respectful that he would have died rather than ask of her anything which could compromise her honour. He loved her, then, only because he thought her perfectly lovable, and he loved her so long that at last she had some suspicion of the fact. Seeing, then, that his love for her was founded on virtue only, she deemed herself fortunate in being loved by so upright a man ; and she treated him with such affability that he, who aspired to nothing better than this, was transported with delight. But envy, the enemy of all quiet, could not suffer so innocent and so sweet an intercourse to continue. Some one told the girl's mother he was surprised the gentleman went so often to her house, that people saw it was her daughter's beauty that attracted him, and that they had often been seen together. The mother, who was thoroughly assured of the gentleman's probity, was greatly annoyed at finding that a bad interpretation was put upon his visits ; but in the end, dreading scandal and malicious gossip, she begged he would for some time cease to frequent her house. The gentleman was the more mortified at this, as the proper and respectful manner in which he had always behaved towards the daughter had deserved very different treatment. However, to put an end to the gossip about him, he discontinued his visits.

Absence, meanwhile, by no means diminished his love ; but one day, when he was paying a visit to his mistress, he heard it proposed that she should marry a gentleman not richer than himself, and whom, consequently, he thought no better entitled to have her. He began to take heart, and employed his friends to speak on his part in the hope that if the lady was allowed to choose, she would prefer him to his rival ; but as the latter was much the wealthier man, the young lady's mother and relations gave him the preference. The gentleman, who knew that his mistress was a loser as well as himself, was so grieved at being rejected that, without any malady, he began by degrees to waste away, and became so changed that one would have said he had covered his handsome face with the mask of death, to which from hour to hour he was hastening. Still he could not refrain from going as often as he could to see her whom he loved so well ; but at last, his strength being worn out, he was compelled to keep his bed, but would never let his mistress know of it for fear of distressing her. So entirely did he give himself up to despair, that he neither ate, drank, slept, nor rested; and became so lean and wan that he was no longer to be recognised. Some one made his state known to the mother of the demoiselle, who was very kind-hearted, and had besides so much esteem for the gentleman, that if the relations had been of the same mind as herself and her daughter, the personal merit of the invalid would have been preferred to the alleged wealth of the other suitor: but the paternal relations would not hear of it. However, she went with her daughter to see the poor gentleman, whom she found more dead than alive. As he knew that his end was near, he had confessed and communicated, and never expected to see any more visitors; but on beholding again her who was his life and his resurrection, his strength returned so that he at once sat up in the bed, and said, "What brings you hither, madam? How come you to visit a man who has already one foot in the grave, and of whose death you are the cause?"

"What!" exclaimed the lady. "Is it possible we should cause the death of one we love so much? Tell me, I entreat, why you speak in this manner?"

"Madam, I concealed my love for your daughter as long as I could; my relations, however, who have asked her of you in marriage, have gone further than I wished, since I have thereby had the misfortune to lose hope. I say misfortune, not with reference to my individual satisfaction, but because I know that no one will ever treat her so well or love her so much as I would have done. Her loss of the best and most faithful friend and servant she has in the world touches me more sensibly than the loss of my life, which I wish to preserve for her alone. Nevertheless, since henceforth it can be of no use to her, I gain much in losing it."

The mother and daughter tried to comfort him. "Cheer up, my friend," said the mother, "I promise you that, if God restores you to health, my daughter shall never have any other husband than you. She is present, and I command her to make you the same promise."

The daughter, weeping sorely, assured him of what her mother said; but he, knowing that although God were to restore him to health, he should not have his mistress, and that it was only to cheer him that these hopes were held out, replied, "Had you spoken in this manner three months ago, I should have been the healthiest and happiest gentleman in France; but this succour comes so late that I can neither believe it nor rest any hope upon it." Then, as they strove to overcome his incredulity, he continued, "Since you promise me a blessing which can never be mine, even if you would grant it, I will ask you to confer on me one much less, which I have never ventured to demand of you." They both vowed that they would grant his request, and that he might declare it boldly. "I implore you," said he, "to put into my arms her whom you promise me for a wife, and to bid her embrace and kiss me."

The daughter, who was not accustomed to such caresses, was on the point of making objections; but her mother expressly commanded her to comply, seeing that there was no longer in him either the feeling or the power of a living man. After such a command, the daughter no longer hesitated, but going up to the bedside, "Cheer up, my friend," she said, "cheer up, I conjure you." The poor dying creature, notwithstanding his extreme weakness, stretched out his emaciated arms, embraced with all his might her who was the cause of his death, and laying his cold pale lips to hers, clung there as long as he could.

"I have loved you," he said at last, "with a love so intense and so pure that, marriage excepted, I have never desired any other favor of you than that which I now receive. But as God has not been pleased to unite us in marriage, I gladly surrender up my soul to Him who is love and perfect charity, and who knows how much I have loved you, and how pure my desires have been, beseeching Him that, since I hold the dear object of my desires within my arms, He will receive my soul in his." So saying, he clasped her again in his embrace with such vehemence that his enfeebled heart, being unable to sustain the effort, was abandoned by all his spirits ; for joy so dilated them that the seat of the soul gave way and fled to its Creator.

Though it was already some time since the poor gentleman had expired, and could not retain his hold, the love she had felt for him, and which she had always concealed, broke forth at this moment in such wise that the mother and the servants had much difficulty in detaching the almost dead survivor from the corpse. The poor gentleman was honourably interred ; but the greatest triumph in his obsequies was the tears and cries of that poor demoiselle, who as openly displayed her feelings after his death as she had concealed them during his life, as if she would make amends for the wrong she had done him. And I have been told that for all they gave her a husband to console her, she never afterwards knew real joy.*

* It is possible that this may be, as Margaret asserts, a true story of her own day, but it very closely resembles the history of the troubadour Geoffroi Rudel of Blaye, who lived in the latter part of the twelfth century. Merely upon hearsay of the moral and Does it not strike you, gentlemen, who refuse to believe me, that this example must force you to confess that love, too much concealed and too little known, brings people to the grave? There is not one of you but knows the relations on both sides; therefore you cannot question the fact. But this is one of those things which no one believes until he has experienced it.

"Well," said Hircan, who saw that the ladies were weeping, "a greater fool I never heard of. Now, in good faith, is it reasonable that we should die for women who are made only for us, and that we should be afraid of asking of them what God commands them to give? I do not speak for myself, or for others who are married, for I have as much as I want in that way, or more; but I say it for those who stand in need. They are, to my thinking, great blockheads to fear those who ought to fear them. Don't you see that this girl repented of her imprudence? Since she embraced the dead man—a thing repugnant to nature—rely upon it, she would still better have embraced the living man, if he had been as bold as he was pitiable on his deathbed."

"By the very conduct for which you upbraid him," said Oisille, "he showed that he loved honestly, and for that he deserves eternal praise; for chastity in an enamoured heart is a thing more divine than human."

"Madam," replied Saffredent, "to confirm what personal perfections of the Countess of Tripoli, he fell so desperately in love with her that he pined away, and embarked, in an advanced stage of illness, to go and see her. When the vessel reached the port of Tripoli he was too weak to quit it. Moved by so extraordinary a display of love, the countess visited him on board, took his hand, and spoke graciously and cheerily to him. Geoffroi could hardly falter out his thanks, and, overcome by emotion, instantly expired.

Hircan has just said, I beg you to believe that fortune favours those who are bold, and that no man who is loved by a lady fails to obtain from her at last what he demands, either in whole or in part, provided he knows how to set about it sagely and amorously ; but ignorance and timidity make men lose many a good fortune. What is singular is, that they attribute the loss of them to the virtue of their mistress, which they have never put to the least proof. Be assured, madam, that no fortress was ever well attacked but it was taken at last."

"I am shocked at you two," said Parlamente, "that you dare to hold such language. Those whom you have loved have little reason to be obliged to you ; or else you have employed your address upon such easy conquests that you have concluded all others are like them."

"For my part, madam," said Saffredent, "I have the misfortune to have nothing to boast of ; but this I attribute much less to the virtue of the ladies than to the fault I have committed in not having conducted my enterprises with sufficient sagacity and prudence. In support of my opinion, I shall cite no other authority than that of the old woman in the 'Romance of the Rose,' who says, 'Without question, fair sir, we are all made for each other ; every she for every he, and every he for every she.' In short, I am persuaded that if a woman is once in love, her lover will compass his end unless he be a booby."

"Now if I should name a lady," returned Parlamente, "who loved well, was strongly solicited, pressed, and importuned, and yet remained a virtuous woman, victorious over her love and her lover, would you own that this fact, which is truth itself, was possible?"

"Why, yes," replied Saffredent.

"Then you are very incredulous if you do not believe the example adduced by Dagoucin."

"As I have given you," said Dagoucin, "an authentic instance of virtuous love on the part of a gentleman, which continued to his last gasp, if you, madam, know any story that is to the honour of some lady, I beg you will be good enough to finish the day by relating it. Never mind the length; for there is time enough still to say many good things."

"Since I am to finish the day," said Parlamente, "I will not make you a long preamble, my story being so good, so beautiful, and so true, that I long to put you in possession of it. I have not been an eye-witness to the facts; but I have them from an intimate friend of the hero, who related them to me on condition that if I repeated them I should conceal the names of the persons. Everything, then, which I am about to tell you is true, except the names, places, and the country."

NOVEL X.

The loves of Amadour and Florida, wherein are seen several stratagems and dissimulations, and the exemplary chastity of Florida.

THERE was in the county of Aranda, in Aragon, a lady who, while still quite young, was left a widow by Count Aranda, with one son and one daughter, the latter of whom was named Florida. She spared no pains to bring up her children according to their qualities in virtue and good breeding, so that her house was considered to be one of the most honourable in all the

Spains. She often went to Toledo, where the King of Spain then resided ; and when she came to Saragossa, which was not far from her own house, she used to remain a long time at the queen's court, where she was as much esteemed as any lady could be. Going one day, according to her custom, to pay her court to the king, who was then in Saragossa, she passed through a village belonging to the Viceroy of Catalonia, who did not quit the frontiers of Perpignan, on account of the wars between the Kings of France and Spain. But as peace was then made, the viceroy, accompanied by several officers, had come to pay his devoirs to the king. The viceroy, having been apprised that the countess was to pass through his domains, went to meet her, as well by reason of the old friendship he bore her, as to do her honour as the king's kinswoman. He was accompanied by several gentlemen of merit, who had acquired so much glory and reputation during the wars that everyone thought it a good fortune to enjoy their society. There was one among them named Amadour, who, notwithstanding his youth (he was not more than eighteen or nineteen), had such an air of self-possession, and a judgment so ripe, that one would have chosen him among a thousand as a fit man to govern a state. It is true that besides good sense he had so engaging a mien, and graces so vivid and natural, that one never tired of gazing upon him. His conversation so well corresponded with all this, that it was hard to say whether nature had been more bountiful in regard to corporeal or to mental endowments. But what gained him most esteem was his great daring, far exceeding what was common with persons of his age. He had on so many occasions shown what he was capable of, that not only Spain, but France and Italy also, highly esteemed his virtues, for he had never spared himself in any of the wars in which he had been engaged. When his country was at peace he went in search of war among foreigners, and won the respect and love of friends and enemies.

This gentleman was among those who accompanied his captain to the domain at which the countess had arrived. He could not behold with indifference the beauty and the charms of her daughter, who was then but twelve years old. He had never, he thought, seen a being so beautiful and of such high breeding, and he believed that if he could have her good grace he should be happier than if he possessed all the wealth and all the pleasures he could receive from another. After having long regarded her, he finally resolved to love her, in spite of all the insurmountable obstacles to success which reason presented to his view, whether on account of disparity of birth, or as regarded the extreme youth of the beautiful girl, who was not yet of an age to listen to tender speeches. Against all these obstacles he set a resolute hope, and promised himself that time and patience would bring all his toils to a happy end. To remedy the greatest difficulty, which consisted in the remoteness of his residence and the few opportunities he had of seeing Florida, he resolved to marry contrary to what he had resolved in Barcelona and Perpignan, where he was in such favour with the ladies that they hardly refused him anything. He had lived so long on those frontiers during the war that he had the air of a Catalan rather than of a Castilian, though he was born at Toledo, of a rich and distinguished family. Being a younger son, he had not much patrimony; but love and fortune, seeing him ill provided by his parents, resolved to make him a chef-d'œuvre, and gave him by means of his valour what the laws of the country refused him. He was thoroughly versed in the art of war, and princes and lords esteemed him so highly that he oftener refused their good offices than took the trouble to solicit them.

The Countess of Aranda arrived then in Saragossa, and was extremely well received by the king and the whole court. The Governor of Catalonia paid her frequent visits, in which Amadour failed not to accompany him, for the sole pleasure of seeing Florida, for he, in order to make himself known in such good company, attached himself to the daughter of an old knight, his neighbour. Her name was Aventurada. She had been brought up from childhood with Florida, and knew all the secrets of her heart. Whether it was that Amadour found her to his taste, or that her dowry of three thousand ducats a year tempted him, he made her an offer of marriage. She listened to him with pleasure ; but as he was poor, and the old knight was rich, she was afraid he would never consent to the marriage, except at the solicitation of the Countess of Aranda. She addressed herself, therefore, to Florida, and said, " I believe, madam, that this Castilian gentleman, who, as you are aware, often speaks to me here, intends to seek me in marriage. You know what sort of man my father is, and you must be sure he will never give his consent unless the countess and you have the goodness to press him strongly." Florida, who loved the damsel like herself, assured her she would make the business her own ; whereupon Aventurada presented Amadour to her, who on kissing her hand had like to faint for joy. Though he was considered one of the men who spoke best in all the Spains, he could not find a tongue in presence of Florida. She was greatly surprised at this, for though she was but twelve years old, she nevertheless well remembered to have heard that there was not in Spain a man who could deliver what he had to say more fluently, or with a better grace. Seeing, then, that he uttered not a word, she broke silence.

"You are so well known by reputation all over the Spains," she said, "that it would be surprising, Señor Amadour, if you were unknown here; and all who know you desire to have an opportunity to serve you. So if I can be of use to you in any way, I beg you will employ me." Amadour, who was gazing on Florida's charms, was so rapt and transported that he could hardly say grammercy. Though Florida was much surprised at his silence, she attributed it to some caprice rather than to its true cause, and retired without saying more. "Do not be surprised," said Amadour to her he wished to marry, "if I was tongue-tied in presence of the Lady Florida. She speaks so discreetly, and so many virtues are latent under her great youth, that admiration made me dumb. As you know her secrets, I beg you will tell me, Aventurada, how is it possible that she does not possess the hearts of all the gentlemen of this court, for those who shall know her and love her not must be stones or brutes." Aventurada, who already loved Amadour above all men, and could conceal nothing from him, told him that Florida was loved by everybody; but that, in accordance with the custom of the country, she spoke to few; and that as yet she was aware of only two persons who made much show of love for Florida, and those were two young Spanish princes, who desired to marry her. One was the son of the Fortunate Infante, and the other was the young Duke of Cardona.

"Tell me, pray," said Amadour, "which of the two do you think she loves best?"

"She is so good and virtuous that all she can be prevailed on to say is, that she has no choice but as her mother pleases. As far, however, as we can judge, she likes the son of the Fortunate Infante better than the young Duke of Cardona. I believe you to be a man of such good sense that you may, if you like, come to a right surmise upon the matter at once. The son of the Fortunate Infante was brought up at this court, and is the handsomest and most accomplished young prince in Europe. If the question were to be decided by the votes of us maidens, this match would take place, in order that the most charming couple in all Spain might be united. You must know that, although they are both very young, she being but twelve and he fifteen, they have loved each other these three years. If you wish to have her good grace, I advise you to become his friend and servant."

Amadour was very glad to hear that Florida loved something, for he hoped, with the help of time, to become, not her husband, but her lover; for her virtue caused him no uneasiness, his only fear being lest she should not love at all. He had little difficulty in introducing himself to the son of the Fortunate Infante, and still less in gaining his goodwill, for he was expert in all the exercises which the young prince was fond of. He was, above all, a good horseman, skilled in feats of arms, and in all sorts of exercises befitting a young man. As war was then beginning again in Languedoc, Amadour was obliged to return with the governor; but it was not without keen regret, for there was no prospect of his returning to the place where he could see Florida. Before his departure he spoke to his brother, who was major-domo to the Queen of Spain, told him the good match he had in the Countess of Aranda's house in the Lady Aventurada, and begged him to do his best during his absence to further his marriage, and to procure on his behalf the influence of the king, the queen, and all his friends. The brother, who loved Amadour not only as a brother, but for his great worth, promised to do all he could, and bestirred himself so well that Aventurada's miserly old father forgot his avarice, and suffered himself to be moved by Amadour's virtues, as they were represented to him by the Countess of Aranda, the beautiful Florida, and the young Count of Aranda, who was beginning, as he grew up, to love people of merit. After the marriage had been agreed on between the relations, the major-domo made his brother return to Spain under favour of a truce then pending between the two kings. During this truce the King of Spain withdrew to Madrid, to avoid the bad air which was in several places, and at the request of the Countess of Aranda gave his sanction to the marriage of the heiress-Duchess of Medinaceli with the little Count of Aranda. The wedding was celebrated at the palace of Madrid. Amadour was present, and turned the occasion to such account that he married her whom he had inspired with more love than he felt for her, and whom he made his wife only that he might have a plausible pretext for frequenting the place where his mind incessantly dwelt.

After his marriage he became so bold and so familiar in the family of the Countess of Aranda that no more distrust was entertained of him than if he had been a woman. Though he was then but twenty-two years old, he was so prudent that the countess communicated all her affairs to him, and commanded her daughter and her son to converse with him and follow all his advice. Having gained this capital point, he conducted himself so discreetly and with such address that even she whom he loved never suspected it. As she was very fond of Amadour's wife, she had such confidence in the husband that she concealed nothing from him, and even declared to him all the love she felt for the son of the Fortunate Infante ; and Amadour, whose views were all directed to gaining her entirely, talked to her incessantly of the young prince ; for he cared not what was the subject on which he spoke to her, provided he could hold her long in conversation.

He had hardly been a month married when he was obliged to go to the wars again, and it was more than two years before he could return to his wife, who all the while continued to reside where she had been brought up. He wrote frequently to her in the interval ; but the chief part of his letters consisted of compliments to Florida, who on her part failed not to return them, and often even wrote with her own hand some pretty phrase in Aventurada's letters. This was quite enough to induce the husband to write frequently to his wife ; yet in all this Florida knew nothing but that she loved him like a brother. Amadour went and came several times, and during five years he saw Florida not more than two months altogether. Yet, in spite of distance and long absence, his love not only remained in full force, but even grew stronger.

At last Amadour, coming to see his wife, found the countess far away from the court. The king had gone into Andalusia, and had taken with him the young Count of Aranda, who was already beginning to bear arms, and the countess had retired to a country-house of hers on the frontier of Aragon and Navarre. She was very glad of the arrival of Amadour, whom she had not seen for nearly three years. He was welcomed by everybody, and the countess commanded that he should be treated as her own son. When he was with her, she consulted him on all the affairs of her house, and did just as he advised. In fact, his influence in the family was unbounded ; and so strong was the belief in his discernment that he was trusted on all occasions as though he had been a saint or an angel. As for Florida, who loved Aventurada, and had no suspicion of her husband's intentions, she testified her affection for him without reserve. Her heart being free from passion, she felt much pleasure in his society, but she felt nothing more. He, on the other hand, found it a very hard task to evade the penetration of those who knew by experience the difference between the looks of a man who loves and of one who does not love ; for when Florida talked familiarly with him in her frank simplicity, the hidden fire in his heart blazed up so violently that he could not help feeling it in his face, and letting some sparks from it escape from his eyes.

To baffle observation, therefore, he entered into an intrigue with a lady named Paulina, who was considered in her time so beautiful that few men saw her and escaped her fascinations. Paulina being aware how Amadour had made love in Barcelona and Perpignan, and won the hearts of the handsomest ladies in the country, especially that of a certain Countess of Palamos, who was reputed the finest woman in all Spain, told him one day that she pitied him for having, after so many good fortunes, married a wife so ugly as his own. Amadour, who well knew that she had a mind to supply his wants, talked to her in the most engaging terms he could use, hoping to conceal a truth from her by making her believe a falsehood. As she had experience in love, she did not content herself with words, and plainly perceiving that Amadour's heart was not her own, she made no doubt that he wanted to use her as a stalking-horse. With this suspicion in her mind, she observed him so narrowly that not a single glance of his eyes escaped her ; but he managed, though with the utmost difficulty, to regulate them so well that she could never get beyond conjectures. Florida, who had no notion of the nature of Amadour's feelings towards her, used to speak to him so familiarly before Paulina that he could hardly prevent his eyes from following the movements of his heart. To prevent bad consequences, one day, as Florida and he were talking together at a window, he said to her, " My dear, I beseech you to advise me which of the two is better, to speak or to die ? "

" I shall always advise my friends to speak," she replied, without hesitation ; " for there are few words which cannot be remedied : but from death there is no return."

" You promise me, then, that not only you will not be angry at what I want to tell you, but even that you will not give way to surprise until I have laid my whole mind open to you ? "

" Say what you please," replied Florida, " for if you surprise me there is no one who can reassure me."

" Two reasons, madam, have hindered me hitherto from declaring the strong passion I feel for you : one is, that I wished to make it known to you by long services, and the other, that I was afraid you would regard it as a great vanity that a simple gentleman like myself should raise his desires so high. Even though my birth were as illustrious as your own, a heart so true as yours would take it ill that any other than he on whom you have bestowed it, the son of the Fortunate Infante, should talk to you of love. But, madam, as in war necessity often compels the belligerent to destroy his own property, and ruin his standing crops that the enemy may not profit by them, so I venture to forestall the fruit which I hoped to gather in time, lest your enemies and mine profit by our loss. Know, madam, that from the first moment I had the honour of seeing you, I so wholly consecrated myself to your service, though you were very young, that I have forgotten nothing whereby I could hope to acquire your good grace. It was to that end alone that I married her whom I thought you loved best ; and knowing the love you bore to the son of the Fortunate Infante, I took pains to serve him and be about him ; in short, whatever I thought could please you, I have tried with all my might to do. You see that I have had the good fortune to win the esteem of the countess your mother, of the count your brother, and of all those whom you love, and that I am regarded here not as a servant, but as a son of the family. All the pains I have taken for five years have had no other object than to procure me the happiness of passing my whole life with you. I crave no favour or pleasure of you which is not consistent with virtue. I know that I cannot wed you, and if I could I would not do so to the prejudice of the love you bear to him whom I would gladly see as your husband. To love you with a criminal love, like those who presume to think that a lady's dishonour should be the recompense of their long services, is a thought I am so far from entertaining, that I would rather see you dead than know that you were less worthy of love, and that your virtue should suffer the least blemish for the sake of any pleasure whatever to myself. I ask but one thing of you in recompense for my long services, and that is, that you will deign to become a mistress so loyal as never to remove me from your good grace, but let me continue on my present footing, and trust in me more than in anyone besides. Furthermore, madam, do me the honour to be well assured that, be the matter what it may, should you have need of the life of a gentleman, you may count on mine, which I would sacrifice for you right gladly. I beseech you to believe, likewise, madam, that whatever I shall do that is honourable and virtuous shall be done for love of you. If, for sake of ladies inferior to you, I have done things which have been thought well of, what shall I not do for a mistress like you? Things which I found difficult or impossible will seem easy to me. But if you will not permit me to be wholly devoted to you, my resolution is to forsake the career of arms, and renounce the virtue which shall not have helped me at need. I entreat you, then, madam, to grant me the just grace which I ask, and you cannot refuse in conscience and with honour."

Florida changed colour at a speech so novel to her. Surprise made her cast down her eyes; nevertheless, her good sense prompted her to reply, "Does it need so long an harangue, Amadour, to ask of me what you have already? I fear so much that, under your seemingly courteous and modest language, there is some lurking mischief to deceive my unpractised youth, that I know not how to reply to you. Were I to reject the virtuous friendship you offer me, I should do contrary to what I have done hitherto; for you are the person in whom I have reposed most confidence. My conscience and my honour do not revolt either against your request or against the love I bear to the son of the Fortunate Infante, since it rests on marriage, to which you do not aspire. There is nothing, then, to hinder me from replying in accordance with your desires, except a fear I have in my heart, proceeding from the little occasion you have for speaking to me as you do; for if you already have what you ask, how comes it that you ask for it again with so much eagerness?"

"You speak very prudently madam," replied Amadour, who had his answer ready, "and you do me so much honour and so much justice in putting the confidence in me you say, that if I were not content with such a blessing, I were unworthy of all others. But consider, madam, that he who wants to build a durable edifice must begin by laying a good and solid foundation. As I desire to remain for ever in your service, I think not only of the means of being near you, but also of hindering my attachment to you from being perceived. Though this attachment, madam, is quite pure, yet those who do not know the hearts of lovers often judge ill of them, and this gives occasion for scandal as much as if their conjectures were well founded. What makes me speak of this is, that Paulina, who knows well that I cannot love her, suspects me so much that wherever I am she has her eyes continually upon me. When you speak to me before her with so much kindness, I am so much afraid of making some gesture on which she may rest a surmise that I fall into the very thing I wish to avoid. I am therefore constrained, madam, to request you will not for the future address me so suddenly before her, or before those whom you know to be as malicious as she is, for I would rather die than that any creature living should perceive it. If your honour was less dear to me, I should not have been in haste to say this to you, since I am so happy in the love and the confidence you manifest towards me, that I desire nothing more than their continuance."

Florida was so gratified that she could hardly contain herself, and thenceforth she felt in her heart emotions that were new to her. "Virtue and good breeding reply for me," she said, "and grant you what you request."

That Amadour was transported with joy will not be doubted by any who love. Florida followed his advice better than he could have wished ; for as she was timid not only in presence of Paulina, but everywhere else too, she no longer sought his society as she had been used to do. She even disapproved of his intercourse with Paulina, who seemed to her so handsome that she could not believe he did not love her. Florida vented her grief with Aventurada, who was beginning to be very jealous of her husband and Paulina. She poured out her lamentations to Florida, who, being sick of the same distemper, consoled her as well as she could.

Amadour, soon perceiving the change in Florida's conduct, believed not only that she was reserved, as he had advised her to be, but even that she had conceived unfavourable sentiments with regard to him. One day, as he was escorting her home from a convent where she had heard vespers, "What sort of countenance do you show me, madam?" he said.

"Such as I believe you wish me to show," she replied.

Suspecting the truth then, he continued, "I have taken such means, madam, that Paulina no longer suspects you."

"You could not do better for yourself and for me," she replied ; "for while doing yourself pleasure, you do me honour."

Amadour, inferring from this that she believed he took pleasure in talking with Paulina, was so incensed that he could not help saying in anger, "You begin betimes, madam, to make me suffer. I am more to be pitied than blamed, and the most cruel mortification I have ever endured in my life is the painful necessity I am under of speaking to a woman I do not love. Since you put a bad interpretation on what I have done for your service, I will never speak more to Paulina, happen what may. To hide my sorrow as I have hidden my joy, I will retire to some place in the neighbourhood, and wait there till your caprice has passed away. But I hope I shall receive news from my captain, and be obliged to return to the army, where I will remain so long as will prove to you, I hope, that nothing keeps me here but you."

So saying, he went away without awaiting her reply, which caused Florida an anxiety it is impossible to express. Thus love began to make its strength felt through its opposite. Finding on reflection that she had been wrong, Florida wrote to Amadour, begging him to return, which he did after his anger had somewhat subsided. I cannot tell you in detail what they said to each other to destroy these prejudices of jealousy; but the result was that he justified himself so well that she promised not only that she would never believe he loved Paulina, but that she would remain convinced that it was a most cruel martyrdom for him to speak to her, or any other woman, except only with a view to render her service.

After love had dissipated this cloud, and when the lovers were beginning to take more pleasure than ever in each other's society, news came that the King of Spain was sending his whole army to Salces. Amadour, whose custom it was to be among the first to join the royal standards, would not miss this new opportunity of acquiring glory; but it must be owned that he set out with unwonted regret, as well on account of the pleasure he lost, as because he was afraid of finding a change on his return. He reflected that Florida was now fifteen, that many princes and great lords were seeking her hand, and that if she married during his absence he would have no more opportunity of seeing her, unless the Countess of Aranda should give her Aventurada for her companion. Accordingly, he managed so adroitly that the countess and Florida both promised him that, wherever the latter resided after her marriage, his wife should never leave her ; and as there was a talk then of her being married in Portugal, it was resolved that Aventurada should accompany her to that country. Upon this assurance Amadour took his departure, not without extreme regret, and left his wife with the countess.

Florida, left lonely by her lover's departure, lived in such a manner as she hoped would gain for her the reputation of the most perfect virtue, and make the whole world confess that she merited such a servant as Amadour. As for him, on arriving at Barcelona, he was cordially welcomed by the ladies ; but they found him so changed that they never could have believed that marriage could have such an effect upon a man. In fact, he was no longer the same ; he was even vexed at the sight of what he formerly desired ; and the Countess of Palamos, of whom he had been so enamoured, could never find means to make him even visit her. Being impatient to reach the spot where honour was to be gained, he made as short a stay as possible in Barcelona. He was no sooner arrived at Salces than war broke out with great fury between the two kings. I will not enter into details of the campaign, nor enumerate the heroic actions performed in it by Amadour, for then, instead of telling a tale, I should have to compose a great book. It is enough to say that his renown overtopped that of all his comrades in arms. The Duke of Nagyeres, who commanded two thousand men, arrived at Perpignan, and took Amadour for his lieutenant. He did his duty so well with his little corps that in every skirmish no other cry was heard than that of Nagyeres !

Now the King of Tunis, who had long been at war with the Spaniards, learning that Spain and France were waging mutual hostilities about Perpignan and Narbonne, thought it a good opportunity to harass the King of Spain, and sent a great number of ships to pillage and destroy every ill-guarded point they found on the coasts of Spain. The people of Barcelona, seeing so many strange sail pass by, sent word to the viceroy, who was then at Salces, and who immediately despatched the Duke of Nagyeres to Palamos. The Barbarians, finding the place so well defended, made a feint of sheering off ; but they returned in the night, and landed so many men that the Duke of Nagyeres, who had let himself be surprised, was taken prisoner. Amadour, who was very vigilant, hearing the noise, assembled instantly as many of his men as he could, and made so stout a resistance that the enemy, however superior in numbers, were for a long time held at bay. But at last, learning that the Duke of Nagyeres was a prisoner, and that the Turks were resolved to burn Palamos and the house in which he withstood them, he thought it better to surrender than to cause the loss of those who had followed him. Besides, by paying for his ransom, he expected to see Florida again. He surrendered then to a Turk named Dorlin, Viceroy of Tunis, who presented him to his master, in whose service he remained nearly two years, honoured and well treated, but still better guarded ; for, having him in their hands, the Turks thought they had the Achilles of all the Spains.

The news of this event having reached Spain, the relations of the Duke of Nagyeres were greatly affected at his disaster ; but those who had the glory of the country at heart thought the loss of Amadour still more grievous. It became known to the Countess of Aranda, in whose house poor Aventurada lay dangerously ill. The countess, who had great misgivings as to the tender feelings which Amadour entertained for her daughter, but concealed or tried to suppress them, in consideration of the virtues which she recognized in him, called her daughter aside to communicate this painful intelligence to her. Florida, who could dissemble well, said it was a great loss for their whole house, and that, above all, she pitied his poor wife, who, to make the matter worse, was on her sick bed ; but seeing that her mother wept much, she let fall a few tears to keep her company, for fear that the feint should be discovered by being overdone. The countess often talked with her again on the subject, but could never draw from her any indication on which she could form a definite conclusion. I will say nothing of the pilgrimages, prayers, orisons, and fasts which Florida regularly performed for Amadour's safety. Immediately on his reaching Tunis, he sent an express to Florida to acquaint her that he was in good health, and full of hope that he should see her again, which was a great consolation to her. In return, she corresponded with him so diligently that Amadour had not leisure to grow impatient.

At this period the countess received orders to repair to Saragossa, where the king was. The young Duke of Cardona was there, and bestirred himself so effectually with the king and the queen that they begged the countess to conclude the marriage between him and Florida. The countess, who neither could nor would refuse their majesties anything, consented to it the more willingly as she believed that her daughter would at those years have no other will than hers. All being settled, she told her daughter she had chosen for her the match she thought would be most advantageous ; and Florida submitted, seeing no room was left her for deliberation, the business being already settled. To make matters worse, she heard that the Fortunate Infante was at the point of death. She never suffered the least evidence of her mortification to escape in presence of her mother or anyone else ; and so strongly did she conceal her feelings, that instead of shedding tears she was seized with a bleeding at the nose so copious as to endanger her life. By way of re-establishing her health, she married the man she would willingly have exchanged for death. After her marriage she went with her husband to the duchy of Cardona, and took with her Aventurada, whom she acquainted, in confidence, with her mother's harshness towards her, and her regret for the loss of the Fortunate Infante ; but with regard to Amadour, she spoke of him only to console his wife. Resolutely setting God and honour before her eyes, she so well concealed her sorrow that none of those who were most intimate with her ever perceived that she disliked her husband.

For a long time did she continue this life, which was hardly better than death. She failed not to make all known to Amadour, who, knowing the greatness of her heart, and how she had loved the Fortunate Infante, thought it impossible she could live long, and mourned for her as one whom he looked upon as worse than dead. This affliction augmented that under which he already laboured. Gladly would he have been a slave all his life, so Florida had found a husband after her own heart ; for the thought of his mistress's sorrows made him forget his own. Meanwhile, he learned from a friend he had made at the court of Tunis, that the king was resolved to give him his choice, either to renounce his faith or be impaled, for he wished to keep him in his service, if he could make a good Turk of him. To prevent this, Amadour prevailed upon his master to let him go upon his parole without speaking to the king ; and his ransom was set so high that the Turk calculated that a man who had so little wealth could never raise the amount.

On his return to the court of Spain he made but a short stay there, and went away to seek his ransom in the purses of his friends. He went straight to Barcelona, whither the young Duke of Cardona, his mother, and Florida, were gone on some business. Aventurada was no sooner apprised of her husband's return than she imparted the news to Florida, who rejoiced at it as if for her sake. But for fear lest the joy of again beholding Amadour should produce a change in her countenance, which might be noticed by those who did not know her, and therefore would misjudge her, she placed herself at a window, in order to catch sight of him at a distance, and the moment she perceived him, running down a staircase so dark that it was impossible to discern if she changed colour, she embraced him, took him up to her chamber, and then presented him to her mother-in-law, who had never seen him. He had not been there two days before he was as great a favourite as he had been in the house of the Countess of Aranda. I will say nothing of the conversation between Florida and Amadour, nor all she told him of the afflictions she had incurred during his absence. After many tears wrung from her eyes by her grief at having married contrary to her inclination, and at having lost him whom she loved so passionately, and whom she never hoped to see again, she resolved to console herself with the love and confidence she had in Amadour. However, she durst not avow her intentions ; but Amadour, who suspected them, lost neither time nor opportunity to make known to her how much he loved her.

Just when Florida could hardly refrain from advancing Amadour from the condition of an expectant to that of a favoured lover, a distressing and very inopportune accident occurred. The king summoned Amadour to the court upon an affair of importance. His wife was so shocked by this news that she fainted, and falling down a flight of stairs, hurt herself so much that she never recovered. Florida, whom her death bereaved of all her consolation, was as much afflicted as one who had lost all her good friends and relations. Amadour was inconsolable, for, on the one hand he lost one of the best of wives, and, on the other hand, the means of being again with Florida; and so overwhelming was his grief that he was near dying suddenly. The old Duchess of Cardona was constantly at his bedside, repeating the arguments of the philosophers to console him; but it was of no avail, for if his grief for the dead was great, his love for the living made him a martyr.

Amadour's wife being interred, and the king's orders being pressing, he could find no pretext to prolong his stay; which so augmented his anguish that he had like to lose his senses. Florida, who, thinking to console him, was his very desolation, passed a whole afternoon in conversing with him in the most gracious manner, thinking to comfort him by the assurance that she would always find means to see him, oftener than he supposed. As he was to depart on the following day, and was so weak that he could not quit his bed, he entreated her to come again in the evening to see him, after everyone else had left him. She promised to do so, not knowing that excessive love knows no restraint of reason; whilst he, despairing for the future of seeing her whom he had so long loved, and of whom he had never had but what you have seen, was so racked by his love and his despair that he resolved to play, as it were, at double or quits—that is to say, to win or lose all, and to pay himself in one hour for what he thought he had merited. He had his bed hung with such good curtains that he could not be seen by persons in the room, and he complained more than usual, so that everybody in the house thought he had not four-and-twenty hours to live.

After everyone else had visited him in the evening, Florida came, at the request of her husband himself, to see him, her mind made up to console him by a declaration of her affection, and to tell him, without disguise or reserve, that she was resolved to love him as much as honour could allow her. Seated beside the head of his bed, she began her consolations by weeping with him; seeing which, Amadour fancied that in this great agitation of her mind he could the more easily accomplish his purpose, and he sat up in his bed. Florida, thinking he was too weak to do this, offered to prevent him. “Must I lose you forever?” he exclaimed, on his knees; and saying this he let himself fall into her arms like a man whose strength suddenly failed him. Poor Florida embraced and supported him a long while, doing her best to comfort him; but the remedy she applied to assuage his pain increased it greatly. Still counterfeiting the appearance of one half dead, and saying not a word, he set himself in quest of what the honour of ladies prohibits. Florida, seeing his bad intention, but unable to believe it after the laudable language he had always addressed to her, asked him what he meant. Amadour, fearing to provoke a reply which he knew could not be other than chaste and virtuous, went straight to his mark without saying a word. Florida’s surprise was extreme, and choosing rather to believe that his brain was turned than that he had a deliberate design upon her virtue, she called aloud to a gentleman who she knew was in the room; whereupon Amadour, in an agony of despair, threw himself back on his bed so suddenly that the gentleman thought he was dead. Florida, who had risen from her chair, sent the gentleman to fetch some vinegar, and then said to Amadour, "Are you mad, Amadour? What is this you have thought of doing?"

"Do such long services as mine merit such cruelty?" replied Amadour, who had lost all reason in the violence of his love.

"And where is that honour you have so often preached to me?" she retorted.

"Ah, madam," said he, "it is impossible to love your honour more than I have done. As long as you were unmarried I so well mastered my passion that you never were aware of it; but now that you are married and your honour is shielded, what wrong do I do you in asking of you what belongs to me? For have I not won you by the force of my love? The first who had your heart has so little coveted your body that he deserved to lose both. He who possesses your body is unworthy to have your heart, and consequently your body even does not belong to him. But I have taken such pains for your sake during the last five or six years that you cannot but be aware, madam, that to me alone belong your body and your heart, for which I have forgotten my own. If you think to excuse yourself on the ground of conscience, doubt not that when love forces the body and the heart, sin is never imputed. Those even who are so infuriated as to kill themselves cannot sin; for passion leaves no room for reason. And if the passion of love is the most intolerable of all others, and that which most blinds all the senses, what sin would you attribute to him who lets himself be led by an invincible power? I am constrained to go away without the hope of ever seeing you again. But if I had from you before my departure that assurance which my love deserves, I should be strong enough patiently to endure the pains of that long absence. If, however, you will not grant me what I ask, you will soon learn that your rigour has caused me to perish miserably."

Florida, equally astonished and grieved at hearing such language from a man whom till then she had never distrusted, replied, in tears, "Is this, Amadour, the end of all the virtuous speeches you have made me during my youth? Is this the honour and the conscience you have often counselled me to prize more than my own life? Have you forgotten the good examples you have given me of virtuous ladies who have withstood criminal love, and the scorn you have always expressed for the wanton? I cannot believe, Amadour, that you are so different from yourself that God, your conscience, and my honour are dead in you. But if what you say is true, I thank God for having prevented the misfortune into which I had nearly fallen, by causing your tongue to make known to me the bottom of your heart, which I have never fathomed till now. After losing the son of the Fortunate Infante, not only by my marriage, but also because I know he loves another, and seeing myself wedded to a man I cannot love in spite of all my efforts, I had resolved to love you with my whole heart, basing my affection on that virtue which I thought I discerned in you, and which I think I have attained through your means, which is to love my honour and my conscience more than my very life. With these laudable views I had come, Amadour, to lay a good foundation for the future; but you have convinced me that I should have built on a drifting sand, or rather on loathsome mud ; and though a great part of the house was already built, in which I hoped perpetually to abide, you have knocked it all down at a blow. So never more expect anything of me ; and never think of speaking to me, wherever I may be, either with your tongue or your eyes ; and be assured that my sentiments will never change. I say this to you with extreme regret. If I had plighted you a perfect friendship, I am sure my heart could not have borne this rupture and lived ; though, indeed, the amazement into which I am cast at having been deceived is so intense and poignant, that, if it does not cut short my life, it will at least render it very unhappy. I have no more to say but to bid you an eternal farewell."

I will not attempt to describe the anguish of Amadour at hearing these words. It would be impossible not only to depict it but even to imagine it, except for those who have been in a similar position. As Florida turned to depart, he caught her by the arm, well knowing that he should lose her forever unless he removed the bad opinion his conduct had caused her to entertain of him. "It has been the longing of my whole life, madam," he said, with the most sanctimonious countenance he could assume, "to love a woman of virtue ; and as I have found few such, I wished to know if you were as estimable in that respect as you are for beauty ; whereof I am now, thanks be to God, fully convinced. I congratulate myself on having given my heart to such an assemblage of perfections ; and I entreat you, madam, to pardon my caprice and my audacity, since the dénouement is so glorious for you, and yields me such pleasure."

Florida was beginning to have her eyes opened to the wiles of men ; and as she had been slow to believe evil where it existed, she was still slower to believe good where it was not. "Would to God," she said, "that your words were true; but I am not so ignorant but that my married experience shows me clearly that the force and infatuation of passion have made you do what you have done. Had God suffered me to slacken the reins, I am quite sure you would not have tightened them. No one would think of looking for virtue in that sort of way. But enough of this. If I too lightly gave you credit for some goodness, it is time I should know the truth, which now delivers me out of your hands." So saying, she left the room, and passed the whole night in tears. The anguish she felt from the change was so great that she could hardly bear it. Reason told her she should cease to love, but her heart told her quite another thing, and who can master the heart? Unable, then, to overcome her love, she resolved to cherish it as warmly as ever, but to suppress all tokens of it for the satisfaction of her honour.

Amadour went away the next day in a state of mind easily imagined. His great heart, however, instead of letting him yield to despair, suggested to him a new device whereby he might again see Florida and regain her goodwill. Taking the road then to Toledo, where the King of Spain was residing, he passed through the county of Aranda, arrived late one evening at the countess's mansion, and found the countess sick with grief at the absence of Florida. She kissed and embraced Amadour as though he were her own son, both because she loved him, and because she suspected that he loved Florida. She asked news of her, and he gave her as much as he could, but not all true. He avowed the friendship which subsisted between them, which Florida had always concealed, begged her mother often to send him news of her, and to bring her soon to Aranda. He passed the night at the countess's, and continued his journey next day.

Having despatched his business with the king, he joined the army, but looked so melancholy and so changed that the ladies and the captains with whom he was intimate could hardly believe he was the same man. He wore only black clothes, and those of a much coarser kind than was requisite for the mourning he wore ostensibly for his wife, whose death served as a convenient pretext for his sadness. Amadour lived in this way for three or four years without returning to court. The Countess of Aranda, hearing that her daughter was piteously changed, wanted her to come back to her, but Florida would not; for when she learned that Amadour had acquainted her mother with their mutual friendship, and that her mother, though so discreet and virtuous, had so much confidence in Amadour that she approved of it, she was in marvellous perplexity. On the one hand, she considered that if she told her mother the truth it might occasion mischief to Amadour, which she would not have done for her life, believing that she was quite able to punish his insolence without any help from her relations. On the other hand, she foresaw that, if she concealed his misconduct, her mother and her friends would oblige her to speak with him and show him a fair countenance, and thereby, as she feared, encourage his evil intentions. However, as he was far away, she said nothing of what was past, and wrote to him when the countess desired her to do so; but it was plain, from the tone of her letters, that they were written not from her spontaneous impulses, but in obedience to her mother, so that Amadour felt pain in reading them instead of the transports of joy with which he had formerly received them.

Having during two or three years performed so many fine exploits that all the paper in Spain could not contain them, he devised a grand scheme, not to regain Florida's heart, for he believed he had lost it wholly, but to vanquish his enemy, since such she declared herself. Setting aside reason, and even the fear of death to which he exposed himself, he adopted the following course. He made such interest with the governor-in-chief that he was deputed to go and report to the king respecting certain enterprises that were in hand against Leucate ; and, without caring for the consequences, he communicated the purport of his journey to the Countess of Aranda, before he had mentioned it to the king. As he knew that Florida was with her mother, he posted to the countess's, under pretence of wishing to take her advice, and sent one of his friends before him to apprise her of his coming, begging she would not mention it, and would do him the favour to speak with him at night unknown to everyone. The countess, very glad of this news, imparted it to Florida, and sent her to undress in her husband's room, that she might be ready when she should send for her after everyone was in bed. Florida, who had not recovered from her first fear, said nothing of it, however, to her mother, and went to her oratory to commend herself to God, and pray that He would guard her heart from all weakness. Remembering that Amador had often praised her for her beauty, which had lost nothing by her long illness, she chose rather to impair it with her own hand than to suffer it to kindle so criminal a fire in the heart of so worthy a man. To this end she took a stone, which she found opportunely, and gave herself such a great blow with it on the face that her mouth, eyes, and nose were quite disfigured. That it might not appear she had done it designedly, when the countess sent for her she let herself fall on coming out of her oratory. The countess hearing her cries hurried to her, and found her in that sad condition. Florida raised herself up and told her mother she had struck her face against a great stone. Her wounds were immediately dressed and her face bandaged, after which her mother sent her to her own chamber, and begged her to entertain Amadour, who was in her cabinet, until she had got rid of her company. Florida obeyed, supposing that Amadour had some one with him : but when she found herself alone with him, and the door closed, she was as much vexed as Amadour was delighted, fancying that he should achieve, by fair means or by force, what he had so long coveted.

After a brief conversation, finding her sentiments unchanged, and hearing from her lips a protestation that, though it were to cost her her life, she would never swerve from the principles she had professed at their last meeting, he exclaimed, desperately, "By God, Florida, your scruples shall not deprive me of the fruit of my toils. Since love, patience, and entreaties are of no avail, I will employ force to have that without which I should perish."

Amadour's visage and his eyes were so changed that the handsomest complexion in the world was become red as fire, and the mildest and most agreeable aspect so horrible and furious that it seemed as though the fire in his heart blazed out through his eyes. In his rage he had seized both Florida's delicate hands in his strong gripe, and finding herself deprived of all means of defence or flight, she thought the only chance left her was to try if his former love was so extinct that it could not disarm his cruelty. "If I must now look upon you as an enemy, Amadour," she said, "I conjure you, by the virtuous love with which I formerly believed your heart was animated, at least to hear me before you do me violence. What can possess you, Amadour," she said, seeing that he listened to her, "to desire a thing that can give you no pleasure, and would overwhelm me with grief? You have so well known my sentiments during my youth and my prime, which might have served as an excuse for your passion, that I wonder how, at my present age, and ugly as you see I am, you seek for that which you know you cannot find. I am sure you do not doubt that my sentiments are still the same, and, consequently, that nothing but violence can enable you to obtain your wishes. Look at the state of my face, forget the beauty you have seen in it, and you will lose all desire to approach me. If there is any remnant of love in your heart, it is impossible but that pity shall prevail over your rage. It is to your pity, and to the virtue of which you have given me so many proofs, that I appeal for mercy. Do not destroy my peace of mind, and make no attempt upon my honour, which, in accordance with your counsel, I am resolved to preserve. If the love you had for me has degenerated into hate, and you design from vindictiveness rather than affection to make me the most miserable woman on earth, I declare to you that it shall not be so, and that you will force me to complain openly of your vicious conduct to her who is so prejudiced in your favour. If you reduce me to this extremity, consider that your life is not safe."

"If I must die," replied Amadour, "a moment will put an end to all my troubles; but the disfigurement of your face, which I believe is your own work, shall not hinder me from doing what I am resolved; for though I could have nothing of you but your bones, I would have them close to me."

Finding that entreaties, arguments, and tears were useless, Florida had recourse to what she feared as much as the loss of life, and screamed out as loudly as she could to her mother. The countess, on hearing her cries, at once suspected the truth, and hastened to her with the utmost promptitude. Amadour, who was not so near dying as he said, let go his hold so quickly that the countess, on opening the cabinet, found him at the door, and Florida far enough away from him. "What is the matter, Amadour?" said the countess. "Tell me the truth." Amadour, who was prepared beforehand, and was never at a loss for an expedient at need, answered, with a pale and woebegone countenance, "Alas! madam, I no longer recognize Florida. Never was man more surprised than I am. I thought, as I told you, that I had some share in her goodwill, but now I see plainly I have no longer any. Methinks, madam, that whilst she lived with you she was neither less discreet nor less virtuous than she is now; but she had no squeams of conscience to hinder her from talking to people and looking them in the face. I wanted to look at her, but she would not allow it. Seeing this, I thought I must be in a dream or a trance, and I asked leave to kiss her hand, according to the custom of the country, but she absolutely refused it. It is true, madam, I have done wrong, and I crave your pardon for it, in taking her hand and kissing it in a manner by force. I asked nothing more of her, but I see plainly that she is resolved upon my death, and that, I believe, is why she called you. Perhaps she was afraid I had some other design upon her. Be that as it may, madam, I acknowledge I was wrong; for though she ought to love all your good servants, such is my ill-luck, that I have no part in her goodwill. My heart will not change for all that, with regard either to her or to you ; and I entreat you, madam, to let me retain your goodwill, since I have lost hers without deserving it."

The countess, who partly believed and partly doubted, asked her why she had called out so loudly. Florida replied that she did so because she was frightened. The countess asked her many other questions, and never got any but the same reply ; for having escaped from her enemy, Florida thought him sufficiently punished by the disappointment. After the countess had conversed a long time with Amadour, she let him talk again with Florida in her presence, in order to see how he would look ; but he said little to her, and contented himself with thanking her for not having told her mother, and begging her that at least, since he was banished from her heart, another might not profit by his disgrace. "If I could have defended myself in any other way," said Florida, "all would have passed between our two selves. You shall be let off with this, unless you force me to do worse. Do not be afraid that I shall ever love ; for since I have been deceived in my judgment of a heart which I thought was full of virtue, I shall never believe that a man exists who is worthy to be trusted. This misfortune will make me banish for ever from my breast all passions which love can occasion." So saying, she took leave of him.

Her mother, who had been watching them, could come to no conclusion, except that she saw clearly that her daughter had no longer any friendship for Amadour. She thought this unreasonable, and that it was enough for herself to like anyone to make Florida conceive an aversion for that person. From that moment she was so displeased with her that for seven years she never spoke to her but with asperity, and all this at the solicitation of Amadour. Florida, who had formerly shunned nothing so much as her husband's presence, resolved to pass all her life by his side, to avoid her mother's harshness; but seeing that nothing succeeded with her, she made up her mind to deceive Amadour. To this end she pretended to be more tractable, and advised him to attach himself to a lady to whom she said she had spoken of their mutual love. This lady, who was in the queen's household, and whose name was Loretta, delighted at having made such a conquest, was so little mistress of her transports that the affair became noised abroad. The Countess of Aranda herself, being at court, became aware of it, and afterwards treated Florida with more gentleness. Loretta's husband, who was a captain, and one of the King of Spain's great governors, was so incensed that he was resolved to kill Amadour at all hazards; but Florida, who heard of this, and, in spite of herself, still loved Amadour, instantly gave him warning. Eager as he was to return to her, he replied that if she would grant him every day three hours conversation, he would never speak another word to Loretta; but she would do nothing of the sort. "Since, then, you do not wish me to live," said Amadour, "why would you hinder me from dying, unless you hope to make me suffer more in living than the pain of a thousand deaths? Let death fly me as it will, I will seek it, so that at last I shall find it, and then only I shall be at rest."

Meanwhile, news arrived that the King of Grenada had begun hostilities against the King of Spain, which obliged the king to send his son thither with the Constable of Castile and the Duke of Alva, two old and sage lords. The Duke of Cardona and the Count of Aranda desired to take part in the campaign, and begged the king to give them some command. The king gave them appointments suitable to their quality, and desired they should act under the advice of Amadour, who performed during the war such astonishing acts as testified as much desperation as valour. His desperate rashness at last cost him his life. The Moors, having offered battle, gave way before the charge of the Spaniards, and made a feint of flying, in order to draw on the Christian army to pursue them. Their stratagem succeeded. The old Constable and the Duke of Alva, suspecting it, detained the Prince of Spain against his will, and hindered him from passing the river ; but the Count of Aranda and the Duke of Cardona crossed it in defiance of orders to the contrary. The Moors, finding themselves pursued only by a small body, wheeled round. The Duke of Cardona was killed with a scimitar, and the Count of Aranda was so dangerously wounded that he was left for dead on the field. Amadour coming up, cleft his way through the melée with such fury that one would have said he was a maniac, and had the bodies of the duke and the count carried to the camp of the prince, who regretted them as if they had been his own brothers. On examining their wounds, it was found that the Count of Aranda was not dead. He was laid on a litter and carried home, where he lay ill for a long time. The body of the young duke was transported to Cardona. After rescuing the two bodies, Amadour took so little care of his own person that he let himself be surrounded by a great number of Moors. Knowing, then, that if he fell into the hands of the King of Grenada he should die a cruel death, unless he renounced the Christian religion, he resolved not to give his enemies the glory of his death or his capture, but to surrender up his body and his soul to God ; and kissing the cross of his sword, he plunged it into his body with such force that no second blow was needed.

Thus died poor Amadour, as much regretted as his virtues deserved. The news instantly spread from mouth to mouth all over Spain. Florida, who was then at Barcelona, where her husband had formerly directed that he should be buried, after having caused his obsequies to be performed with pomp, retired into the convent of Jesus, without saying a word to her mother or her mother-in-law, taking for her spouse and lover Him who had delivered her from a love so violent as that of Amadour, and from the distress caused her by the society of such a husband. Her sole subsequent occupation and care was to love God so perfectly that, after having been a long time a nun, she surrendered up her soul to him with the joy with which a bride meets her husband.*

* “We have every reason to believe that this novel was suggested to the Queen of Navarre by some actual occurrence at the court of Charles VIII. and Louis XII. Whilst disguising the names of the principal actors, the princess has yet intermingled real events with her narrative. The beginning of the novel might even lead us to surmise that Margaret alludes in it to something in which she was personally concerned. The Countess of Aranda, left a very young widow, with a son and daughter, is very like Louise of Savoy and her two children. This, however, is a mere conjecture of ours, on which we by no means insist.

“For those who would like to attempt the solution of this little historical problem, we subjoin a list of some facts which occurred at the period in which the Queen of Navarre places her story.

“Taking of Salces by the French in 1496. Don Henry of Aragon, Count of Ribagorce, was then Viceroy of Catalonia, and Don Henry Henriquez Governor of Rousillon.—Truce between France and Spain in 1497.—Revolt at Grenada in 1499.—In 1500, revolt of the Moors in the Alpujarras; King Ferdinand marches against them in person.—In 1501, defeat of the Spaniards, in which were killed Don Alfonso de Aguilar, Pedro de Sandoval, &c., &c.

I am afraid, ladies, you have found this long story tedious; but it would have been still longer if I had given it as it was told to me. Imitate Florida's virtues, ladies, but be not so cruel; and never esteem men so highly, lest, when you are undeceived, you bring upon them a miserable death, and a life of sorrow upon your selves.

"Do you not think," said Parlamente, turning to Hircan, "that this lady was tried to the utmost, and that she resisted virtuously?"

"No," he replied; "for the least resistance a woman can decently make is to cry out. But what would she have done if she had been in a place where she could not be heard? Besides, if Amadour had not been more swayed by fear than by love, he would not so easily have given up. So I still maintain that no man ever loved heartily, and was loved in return, who did not obtain what he sought if he went the right way about it. I must,

The Duke of Najera is sent against him.—In 1503 a Moorish fleet, consisting of ten flustes, ravages the coasts of Catalonia. That same year King Ferdinand burns Leucate.—In 1513, the King of Spain, to appease the feud existing between the Count of Ribagorce and the Count of Aranda, commissions Father Juan de Estuniga, Provincial of the Order of St. Francis, to effect an agreement between them by means of a marriage between the eldest daughter of Count Aranda and the eldest son of the Count of Ribagorce. The latter refuses, and is banished the realm. As for the son of the Fortunate Infante, this must be Don Alfonso of Aragon, Count of Ribagorce, Duke of Segovia, sole male heir of the house of Castile, proposed in 1506 as husband for Jane the Crazy. His father, Henry of Aragon, Duke of Segovia, was surnamed the Infante of Fortune, because he was born in 1445, after the death of his father.

"Such are the events which the Queen of Navarre has mixed up with a narrative in which she declares that she has changed names, places, and countries."—Bibliophiles Français.

however, applaud Amadour for having in part done his duty."

"Duty?" said Oisille. "Do you think that a servant does his duty in offering violence to his mistress, to whom he owes all respect and obedience?"

"When our mistresses, madam," replied Saffrendent, "hold their rank in chamber or hall, seated at their ease as our judges, we are on our knees before them; we timidly lead them out to dance, and serve them with so much diligence that we anticipate their commands; we have so much fear of offending them, and so much desire to serve them well, that no one can look upon us without compassion. We are often thought more witless than brutes, and people praise the proud spirit of our ladies, who look so imperious, and speak with so much good breeding, that they make themselves feared, loved, and esteemed by those who see only the outside. But in private, where there is no other judge than love, we know very well that they are women and we are men. The name of mistress is then changed to that of friend, and he who was a servant in public becomes a friend in a tête-à-tête. Thence comes the old proverb:—

Well to serve and loyal to be,
Raiseth a servant to mastery.

Of honour they have as much as men, who can give it them and take it away; and as they see we suffer with patience, it is just that they should indemnify us when they can do so without damage to their honour."

"You do not speak," said Longarine, "of that true honour which is the most perfect contentment that can be had in this world. Though all the world believed me a virtuous woman, and I alone knew the contrary, the praises of others would but increase my shame and my secret confusion. On the other hand, were all mankind to condemn me, whilst my conscience was free from all reproach, I should derive a sort of pleasure from calumny, so true it is that virtue is never wholly unhappy."

"Though you have left nothing to say," observed Geburon, "you will permit me to remark that I regard Amadour as the most worthy and most virtuous of cavaliers. Though he has been given a feigned name, I think, nevertheless, that I recognize him; but since others have not named him, neither will I. I will only say that if he is the same as I suppose, never was his heart susceptible of fear, or exempt from love."

"It strikes me," said Oisille, "that this day has passed so agreeably that, if this continues, our time will seem very short. The sun is already low, and vespers have been rung at the Abbey this long time. I did not tell you so before, because I was less desirous to hear vespers than to know the end of the story."

Hereupon everybody rose, and proceeding to the abbey they found that the monks had been waiting for them for more than an hour. After vespers they supped. The evening was not passed without discussing the tales that had been told in the day, and reviewing in memory the means of making the next day pass as agreeably as the first. After no end of sports in the meadow, everyone went to bed highly gratified by the way in which their first day had been spent.

SECOND DAY.

NEXT day, the party rose betimes, eager to return to the spot where they had had so much pleasure. Everyone had his tale ready, and was impatient to bring it forth. After having heard Madame Oisille's reading and attended mass, dinner was the next affair, during which they also recalled to mind many a story.

After dinner they went to rest in their chambers, and at the appointed hour everyone repaired to the meadow, where it seemed that the weather and the day expressly favoured their design. After they were all seated on verdant couches prepared by nature's own hands, Parlamente said, "Since I was the last speaker yesterday, it is for me to select the lady who shall begin this day's proceedings. Those of yesterday having been opened by Madame Oisille, the sagest and eldest lady present, I give my vote to day to the youngest—I do not say to the most light-witted, for I am sure that if we all follow her example, the monks will not have to wait so long to say vespers as they did yesterday. I call upon you, Nomerfide, but I beg you will not make us begin the day with tears."

"There was no need to give me that caution," said Nomerfide; "for one of our companions has made me choose a tale, which I have set so fast in my head that I could not tell any other; and if it engenders sadness in you, why then your nature must be very melancholy."

NOVEL XI.

An odorous adventure which befell Madame de Roncex at the Franciscan Monastery of Thouars.

IN the household of Madame de La Tremouille there was a lady named Roncex, who one day, when her mistress had gone to the Cordeliers, had a pressing need to go to the place to which she could not send her waiting-woman. She took with her a girl named La Mothe to keep her company, but from bashfulness and desire of secrecy left her in the chamber, and entered alone into a very dark privy, which was common to all the Cordeliers ; and they had rendered such good account there of all their victuals that the whole place, the seat and the floor, was covered with must of Bacchus and Ceres, passed through the bellies of the Cordeliers. The poor woman, who was so hard pressed that she had scarcely time to tuck up her skirts to sit down, unluckily seated herself on the filthiest spot in the whole place, and there she stuck as if she had been glued to it, and her poor buttocks, garments, and feet were so bewrayed that she durst not step or turn any way for fear of making herself still worse. Thereupon she began to cry out, as loud as she could, " La Mothe, my dear, I am undone and dishonoured ! " The poor girl, who had heard sundry tales of the wickedness of the Cordeliers, suspecting that some of them were hid there, and wanted to violate the lady, ran as fast as she could, saying to everyone she met, " Come and help Madame de Roncex ; the Cordeliers want to ravish her in that privy. " They ran to the place with all speed, and found the poor dame De Roncex crying for help, desiring to have some woman who could clean her, and with her hinder parts all uncovered, for she was afraid to touch them with her garments lest she should befoul them. Rushing in at her cries, the gentlemen beheld that fine spectacle, and found no Cordelier molesting her, but only the ordure with which all her posteriors were glued. This did not pass without laughter on their part or great shame on hers ; for, instead of having women to clean her, she was waited on by men, who saw her naked in the worst condition in which a woman could show herself. Thereupon she dropped her clothes, and so dirtied what was still clean, forgetting the filth she was in for the shame she felt at seeing men. When she was out of that nasty place, it was necessary to strip her stark naked, and change all her clothes before she left the monastery. She was very much disposed to resent the help which La Mothe had brought her, but understanding that the poor girl believed her case was still worse, she forgot her anger and laughed like the rest.

Methinks, ladies, this story has been neither long nor melancholy, and that you have had from me what you expected.

The company laughed heartily at her story, and Oisille said to her, " Though the tale is nasty and dirty, we cannot object to it, knowing the persons to whom it happened. Well, I should have been very glad to see the faces worn by La Mothe and by her to whom she brought such good aid. But since you have ended so soon, give your voice to some one who does not think with such levity."

" If you would have my fault repaired," replied Nomerfide, " I give my voice to Dagoucin, who is so discreet that for his life he would not utter a folly."

Dagoucin thanked her for the favourable opinion she entertained of his good sense, and said, "The story I propose to relate will serve to show how love infatuates the greatest and worthiest hearts, and how difficult it is to overcome wickedness by dint of kindness."

[The preceding novel and epilogue, which are found in all the manuscripts consulted by the Bibliophiles Français, are the nineteenth of the edition of 1558. They are suppressed in that of 1559, and in all the subsequent editions, except that of 1853, and the following substituted for them.]

FACETIOUS SAYINGS OF A CORDELIER IN HIS SERMONS.

NEAR the town of Bleré, in Touraine, there is a village named Martin le Beau, where a Cordelier of Tours was called on to preach the Advent and Lent sermons. This Cordelier, who had more gabble than learning, finding himself sometimes short of matter, would contrive to eke out his hour by telling tales, which were not altogether disagreeable to the good villagers. Preaching on Holy Thursday, on the Pascal Lamb, when he had to state that it was eaten by night, seeing among the congregation some handsome young ladies newly arrived from Amboise with the intention of spending Easter at the village, he wished to surpass himself, and asked all the women if they knew what it was to eat raw meat at night. "If you don't, I will tell you, ladies," said he. The young men of Amboise, who had come, some with their wives, others with their sisters and nieces, and who were not acquainted with the pilgrim's humour, began to be scandalised; but after having heard him further, instead of being shocked, they laughed, especially when he told them that to eat the Pascal Lamb it was necessary to have one's loins girt, one's feet in one's shoes, and a hand on one's staff. The Cordelier, seeing them laugh, and guessing why, immediately corrected himself.

"Well, then, shoes on one's feet, and one's staff in his hand," said he. "Buttered bread, and bread buttered—is it not all one?" How this was received I leave you to guess. The Cordelier, perceiving that his hour was nearly out, made new efforts to divert the ladies, and gave them reason to be pleased with him. "By-and-by, ladies," he said to them, "when you are chatting with your gossips, you will ask them, 'Who is this master friar who speaks so boldly? He is a jovial companion, I warrant.' I tell you, ladies, be not astonished—no, be not astonished if I speak boldly, for I am of Anjou, at your service." So saying he ended his sermon, leaving his audience more disposed to laugh at his absurdities than to weep over the Passion of our Lord, the commemoration of which they were then celebrating.

His other sermons during the holidays were pretty much of the like efficacy. You know the brethren of that order do not forget to go about making their collections to get them their Easter eggs, as they say. Not only have they no lack of these, but people give them besides many other things, such as linen, yarn, chitterlings, hams, chines, and so forth. On Easter Tuesday, when he was making his exhortations to charity, of which people of his sort are no niggards, he said, "I am bound, ladies, to thank you for the charities you have bestowed on our poor convent, but I cannot help remarking to you that you have not duly considered our wants. You have given us, for the most part, nothing but chitterlings, of which, thanks be to God, we have no scarcity, the convent being choke-full of them. What shall we do, then, with such lots of chitterlings? Do you know what we shall do with them? It is my advice, ladies, that you mix your hams with our chitterlings, and you will make a fine alms."

Facetious sayings of a Cordelier.

Then, continuing his sermon, he contrived to introduce the subject of scandal. After having expatiated upon it and adduced some examples, he cried out, with warmth, "I am surprised, ladies and gentlemen of St. Martin, that you are scandalised at a thing that is less than nothing, and that you make a talk of me everywhere without reason, saying, 'Who would have thought it of the father, that he should have got his landlady's daughter with child?' That is a thing to be astonished about, truly. A monk has got a girl with child. What a wonder! But hark you, fair ladies, would you not have reason to be much more surprised if the girl had got the monk with child?"

Such, ladies, were the precious viands with which this good shepherd fed the Lord's flock. So shameless was he, that after the commission of his sin, he had the impudence to speak of it in the pulpit, where nothing should be uttered but what is edifying to one's neighbour, and tends, in the first place, to the glory of God.

"That was what you may call a master-monk," said Saffredent. "I should be at a loss to choose between him and Friar Angebaut, at whose door were laid all the facetious things that were said in good company."

"I see no matter for laughter in all this," said Oisille, "nor is the circumstance of the time to the monk's advantage."

"You omit to say, madam," observed Nomerfide, "that at that time, although the thing happened not very long ago, your honest villagers, nay, most of the people even of the good towns, who think themselves cleverer than the others, had more regard for such preachers than for those who preached to them the holy Gospel purely and simply."

"Be that as it may," said Hircan, "he was not far wrong in asking for hams in exchange for chitterlings, for there is a great deal more eating in them. If any devout dame had understood the thing amphibologically, as I believe the monk intended, neither he nor his brethren would have been badly off, any more than the young wench who had her bag full."

"What effrontery!" exclaimed Oisille, "to pervert the sense of the text according to his caprice, thinking he had to do with people as brutalised as himself, and impudently endeavouring to corrupt silly women, in order to teach them to eat raw meat at night."

"Ay," said Simontault, "but then he had before him those young tripesellers of Amboise, in whose tub he would fain have washed his —. Shall I say what? No, you understand me. He would gladly have given them a taste of it, not roasted, but all stirring and frisking to give them the more pleasure."

"Gently, gently, Seigneur Simontault," said Parlemente; "you forget yourself. Where is your usual modesty, of which you can make such good use at need."

"True, madam, but the foul-mouthed monk made me equivocate. To return to our first proceedings. I beg that Nomerfide, who is the cause of my error, will give her voice to some one who will make us forget our common fault."

"Since you will have it that I am a sharer in the fault," said Nomerfide, "I will choose one who will set all right again; and that is Dagoucin, who is so well behaved that he would rather die than say anything improper."

Dagoucin thanked her for her good opinion. "The story I am going to relate," he said, "is calculated to show you how love infatuates the greatest and the best, and how difficult it is to overcome wickedness by dint of kindness."

NOVEL XII.

Incontinence and tyranny of a duke of Florence—Just punishment of his wickedness.

AT Florence there lived, about ten years ago, a duke of the house of Medicis, who had married Madame Margaret, natural daughter of the Emperor Charles the Fifth. As the princess was still very young, and the duke would not sleep with her until she was of more mature age, he treated her very tenderly ; and to spare her he amused himself with some other ladies of the city, whom he used to visit by night whilst his wife slept. Among others, he took a fancy to a lady as beautiful as she was good and virtuous, the sister of a gentleman whom the duke loved as himself, and to whom he conceded such authority that he was obeyed like the duke himself. The latter had no secrets which he did not communicate to him, so that, in a manner, he might be called his second self. The duke, knowing that the gentleman's sister was a lady of the highest virtue, durst not at first speak to her of his passion ; but after having tried every other expedient, he at last addressed his favourite on the subject.

"If there was anything in the world, my friend," he said, "which I would not do for you, I should be afraid to tell you what is in my thoughts, and still more to ask your aid. But I have so much friendship for you, that if I had a wife, a mother, or a daughter who could save your life, you may be assured you should not die. I am persuaded that you love me as much as I love you. If I, who am your master, have such an affection for you, that which you should have for me should be no less. I have a secret, then, to tell you. Through trying to conceal it, I have fallen into the state in which you now see me, from which I have no hope of escaping but by death, or by the service you may render me, if you will."

Touched by these representations on the part of his master, and seeing his face bathed in tears, the gentleman felt so much pity that he said, "I am your creature, my lord; it is from you I hold all my wealth and honours, and you may speak to me as to your own soul, being sure that whatever I can do is at your command."

The duke then declared the passion with which he was possessed for his favourite's sister, and told him it was impossible he should live long unless the brother enabled him to enjoy her; for he was quite sure that prayers or presents would be of no avail with her. "If, then," said the duke, in conclusion, "you love my life as much as I love yours, finds means to secure me a bliss I can never obtain but through your aid." The gentleman, who loved his sister and the honour of his house more than his master's pleasure, remonstrated with him, and implored him not to reduce him to the horrible necessity of soliciting the dishonour of his family, protesting there was nothing he would not do for his master, but that his honour would not suffer him to perform such a service as that. The duke, inflamed with intolerable anger, bit his nails, and replied, furiously, “Since I find no friendship in you, I know what I have to do.” The gentleman, who knew his master’s cruelty, was alarmed, and said, “Since you absolutely insist on it, my lord, I will speak to her.” “If you set store by my life, I will set store by yours,” were the duke’s last words as he went away.

The gentleman knew well what this meant, and remained a day or two without seeing the duke, pondering over the means of extricating himself from so bad a dilemma. On the one hand, he considered the obligations he was under to his master, the wealth and honours he had received from him; on the other hand, he thought of the honour of his house, and the virtue and chastity of his sister. He knew very well that she never would consent to such infamy, unless she were overcome by fraud or violence, which he could not think of employing, considering the shame it would bring upon him and her. In fine, he made up his mind that he would rather die than behave so vilely to his sister, who was one of the best women in Italy; and he resolved to deliver his country from a tyrant who was bent on disgracing his house; for he saw clearly that the only means of securing the lives of himself and his kindred was to get rid of the duke. Resolved, then, without speaking to his sister, to save his life and prevent his shame by one and the same deed, he went after two days to the duke, and told him that he had laboured so hard with his sister that at last, with infinite difficulty, he had brought her to consent to the duke’s wishes, but on condition that the affair should be kept secret, and that no one should know of it but they three. As people readily believe what they desire, the duke put implicit faith in the brother’s words. He embraced him, promised him everything he could ask, urged him to hasten the fulfilment of his good tidings, and appointed a time with him for that purpose.

When the exulting duke saw the approach of the night he so longed for, in which he expected to conquer her whom he had thought invincible, he retired early with his favourite, and did not forget to dress and perfume himself with his best care. When all was still, the gentleman conducted him to his sister's abode, and showed him into a magnificent chamber, where he undressed him, put him to bed, and left him, saying, "I am going, my lord, to bring you one who will not enter this room without blushing; but I hope that before day dawns she will be assured of you."

He then went away to his own room, where he found one trusty servant awaiting him by his orders. "Is thy heart bold enough," he said to him, "to follow me to a place where I have to revenge myself on the greatest of my enemies?" "Yes, my lord," replied the man, who knew nothing of the matter in hand, "though it were upon the duke himself." Thereupon, without giving the man time for reflection, the gentleman hurried him away so abruptly that he had not time to take any other weapon than a poniard with which he was already armed.

The duke, hearing his favourite's footsteps at the door, believed that he was bringing him the object of his passion, and threw open the curtains to behold and welcome her; but instead of her he saw her brother advance upon him with a drawn sword. Unarmed, but undaunted, the duke started up, seized the gentleman round the middle, saying, "Is this the way you keep your word?" and for want of other weapons used his nails and his teeth, bit his antagonist in the thumb, and defended himself so well that they fell together beside the bed. The gentleman, not feeling confident in his own strength, called his man, who, seeing his master and the duke grappling each other so desperately that he could not well distinguish which was which in that dark spot, dragged them both out by the heels into the middle of the room, and then set about cutting the duke's throat with his poniard. The duke defended himself to the last, until he was exhausted by loss of blood. Then the gentleman and his man laid him on the bed, finished him with their poniards, drew the curtains upon the body, and left the room, locking the door behind them.

Having slain his enemy and liberated the republic, the gentleman thought that his exploit would not be complete unless he did the same by five or six near relations of the duke. To this end he ordered his man to go and fetch them one by one ; but the servant, who had neither vigour nor boldness enough, replied, " It strikes me, my lord, that you have done enough for the present, and that you had much better think of saving your own life than of taking that of others. If every one of them should take as long to despatch as the duke, it would be daylight before we had finished, even should they be unarmed." As the guilty are easily susceptible of the contagion of fear, the gentleman took his servant's advice, and went with him alone to a bishop, whose place it was to have the gates opened and to give orders to the postmasters. The gentleman told the prelate he had just received intelligence that one of his brothers was at the point of death ; that the duke had given him leave to go to him, and therefore he begged his lordship would give him an order to the postmasters for two good horses, and to the gate-keepers to let him pass. The bishop, to whom his request seemed almost equivalent to a command from the duke his master, gave him a note, by means of which he at once obtained what he required : but instead of going to see his brother, he made straight for Venice, where he had himself cured of the bites inflicted by the duke, and then passed over into Turkey.

Next morning the duke's servants, not seeing or hearing anything of him, concluded that he had gone to see some lady ; but at last becoming uneasy at his long absence, they began to look for him in all directions. The poor duchess, who was beginning to love him greatly, was extremely distressed at hearing that he could not be found. The favourite also not making his appearance, some of the servants went for him to his house. They saw blood at his chamber door, but no one could give any account of him. The trace of blood led the duke's servants to the chamber where he lay, and finding the door locked, they broke it open at once, saw the floor covered with blood, drew the curtains, and beheld the duke stark dead on the bed. Picture to yourselves the affliction of these servants, as they carried the body to the palace. The bishop arrived there at the same time, and told them how the gentleman had fled in the night under pretence of going to see his brother. This was enough to lead every one to the conclusion that it was he who had done the deed. It clearly appeared that his sister had known nothing about it. Though she was surprised at so unexpected an event, she loved her brother for it, since, without regard to his own life, he had delivered her from a tyrant who was bent on the ruin of her honour. She continued always to lead the same virtuous life ; and though she was reduced to poverty by the confiscation of all the family property, her sister and she found husbands as honourable and wealthy as any in Italy. Both of them have always lived subsequently in the best repute.*

Here is a fact, ladies, which should make you beware of that little god, who delights in tormenting princes and private persons, the strong and the weak, and who so infatuates them that they forget God and their conscience, and even the care of their own lives. Princes and those who are in authority ought to fear to outrage their inferiors. There is no man so insignificant but he can do mischief when it is God's will to inflict vengeance on the sinner, nor any so great that he can do hurt to one whom God chooses to protect.

This story was listened to by the whole company, but with very different sentiments. Some maintained that the gentleman had done well in securing his own life and his sister's honour, and delivering his country from such a tyrant. Others, on the contrary, said that it was enormously ungrateful to take the life of a man who had loaded him with wealth and honours. The ladies said he was a good brother and a virtuous citizen; the gentlemen, on the contrary, maintained that he was a traitor and a bad servant. It was amusing to hear the opinions and arguments delivered on the one side and on the other: but the ladies, as usual, spoke more from passion than from judgment, saying that the duke deserved death, and that blessed was the brother who had

* The historical fact related in this novel is one of the most celebrated in the annals of Florence. The duke was Alessandro, natural son of Lorenzo de Medicis, and the murderer was his cousin, Lorenzo de Medici. Historians state that the latter decoyed the duke to his house under pretence of affording him an interview with a Florentine lady, but they do not mention that she was Lorenzo's sister.

slain him. "Ladies," said Dagoucin, who saw what a lively controversy he had excited, "pray do not put yourselves in a passion about a thing that is past and gone; only take care that your beauties do not occasion murders more cruel than that which I have related."

"'The Fair Lady without Compassion,'"* said Parlamente, "has taught us to say that people hardly ever die of so agreeable a malady."

"Would to God, madam," rejoined Dagoucin, "that every lady here knew how false is this notion. They would not then, I imagine, desire the reputation of being pitiless, or like to resemble that incredulous fair one who let a good servant die for want of responding favourably to his passion."

"So, then," said Parlamente, "to save the life of a man who says he loves us, you would have us violate our honour and our conscience?"

"I do not say that," replied Dagoucin, "for he who loves thoroughly would be more afraid of hurting the honour of his mistress than she herself. Hence it seems to me that a gracious response, such as is called for by a seemly and genuine love, would only give more lustre to the honour and conscience of a lady. I say a seemly love, for I maintain that those who love otherwise do not love perfectly."

"That is always the upshot of your orisons," said Ennasuite. "You begin with honour, and end with its opposite. If all the gentlemen present will tell us the truth of the matter, I will believe them on their oaths."

Hircan swore that he had never loved anyone but his wife, and that it was far from his wish to make her offend

* La Belle Dame sans Merci is the title of a poem by Alain Chartier, in the form of a long metaphysical dialogue between a lady and her lover,

God. Simontault spoke to the same effect, and added that he had often wished that all women were ill-natured except his own wife. "You deserve that yours should be so," retorted Geburon; "but for my part, I can safely swear that I loved a woman so much that I would rather have died than have made her do anything capable of diminishing the esteem in which I held her. My love was so founded upon her virtues, that I would not have seen a stain upon them for the most precious favours I could have obtained from her."

"I thought, Geburon," said Saffredent, laughing, "that the love you have for your wife, and the good sense with which nature has endowed you, would have saved you from playing the lover elsewhere; but I see I was mistaken, for you use the very phrases which we are accustomed to employ to dupe the most subtle of dames, and under favour of which we obtain a hearing from the most discreet. Where is the lady, indeed, who will not lend us an ear when we begin our discourse with honour and virtue? But if we were all to lay open our hearts before them just as they are, there is many a man well received by the ladies whom then they would not condescend so much as to look upon. We hide our devil under the form of the handsomest angel we can find, and so receive many a favour before we are found out. Perhaps, even, we lead the ladies so far, that thinking to go straight to virtue, they have neither time nor opportunity to retreat when they find themselves face to face with vice."

"I thought you quite a different sort of man," said Geburon, "and imagined virtue was more agreeable to you than pleasure."

"Why," said Saffredent, "is there any greater virtue than to love in the way God has ordained? To me it seems much better to love a woman as a woman, than to make her one's idol, as many do. For my part, I am convinced that it is better to use than to abuse."

All the ladies coincided in opinion with Geburon, and bade Saffredent hold his tongue. "Very well," said he, "I am content to say no more on the subject, for I have fared so badly with regard to it that I don't want to have any more to do with it."

"You may thank your own bad thoughts for having fared badly," said Longarine, "for where is the woman with a proper sense of decorum who would have you for a lover after what you have just said?"

"There are those," he retorted, "who did not think me intolerable, and who would not have exchanged their own sense of decorum for yours. But let us say no more about it, in order that my anger may shock no one, and may not shock myself. Let us think to whom Dagoucin will give his voice."

"I give it to Parlamente," he replied at once, "persuaded as I am that she must know better than anyone what is honourable and perfect friendship."

"Since you elect me to tell a story," said Parlamente, "I will relate to you one which occurred to a lady who had always been one of my good friends, and who has never concealed anything from me."

NOVEL XIII.

The captain of a galley, under pretence of devotion, fell in love with a demoiselle. What happened in consequence.

THERE WAS in the household of the regent, mother of King Francis, a very devout lady, married to a gentleman of the same character. Though her husband was old, and she young and fair, nevertheless she served him and loved him as though he had been the handsomest young man in the world. To leave him no cause of uneasiness, she made it her care to live with him like a woman of his own age, shunning all company, all magnificence in dress, all dances and diversions such as women are usually fond of, and making the service of God her sole pleasure and recreation. One day her husband told her that from his youth upwards he had longed to make the journey to Jerusalem, and he asked her what she thought of the matter. She, whose only thought was how to please him, replied : " Since God has deprived us of children, my dear, and has given us wealth enough, I should be strongly inclined to spend a part of it in performing that sacred journey ; for, whether you go to Jerusalem or elsewhere, I am resolved to accompany, and never forsake you." The good man was so pleased with this reply that he fancied himself already standing on Mount Calvary.

Just at this time there arrived at court a gentleman who had served long against the Turks, and who was come to obtain the king's approval for a projected enterprise against a fortress belonging to the Ottomans, the success of which was likely to be very advantageous to Christendom. The old devotee talked with him about his expedition, and learning from him that he was resolved upon it, asked him if he would be disposed, after it was accomplished, to make another journey to Jerusalem, which himself and his wife had a great desire to see. The captain, highly approving of so good a design, promised to accompany him, and to keep the thing secret. The old gentleman was impatient to see his wife, to tell her what he had done. As she had scarcely less longing than her husband to perform the journey, she talked of it often to the captain, who, paying more attention to her person than to her words, became so much in love with her that, in talking to her of the voyages he had made by sea, he often confounded the port of Marseilles with the Archipelago, and said horse when he meant to say ship, so much was he beside himself. He found her, however, of so singular a character that he durst not let her see that he loved her, much less tell her so in words. The fire of his passion became so violent by dint of his concealing it that it often made him ill.

The demoiselle, who regarded him as her guide, took as much care of him as of the cross, and sent to inquire after him so often that the interest she evinced for him cured the patient without the aid of physic. Several persons, who knew that the captain had always had a better reputation for valour than for devotion, were surprised at the great intercourse between him and this lady; and seeing that he had changed from white to black, that he frequented the churches, attended sermons, and performed all the devoirs of a devotee, they doubted not that he did so to ingratiate himself with the lady, and could not even help hinting as much to him. The captain, fearing lest this should come to the ears of the lady, withdrew from society, and told her husband and her, that, being on the point of receiving his orders and quitting the court, he had many things to say to them, but that, for the greater secrecy, he would only confer with them in private, to which end he begged they would send for him when they had both retired for the night.

This proposal being quite to the old gentleman's liking, he failed not to go to bed early every night and make his wife undress. After everybody had gone to rest, he used to send for the captain to talk about the journey to Jerusalem, in the course of which the good man often fell asleep devoutly. On these occasions, the captain, seeing the old gentleman sleeping like the blessed, and himself seated in a chair at the bedside, close to her whom he thought the most charming woman in the world, felt his heart so hard pressed, between his fear and his desire to declare himself, that he often lost the use of his tongue. But that she might not perceive his perplexity, he launched out upon the holy places of Jerusalem, where are to be seen the memorials of the great love which Jesus Christ had for us. What he said of that love was only uttered to conceal his own; and while he expatiated upon it, he kept his eyes fixed on the lady, wept and sighed so à propos, that her heart was quite penetrated with piety. Believing from this outward appearance of devotion that he was quite a saint, she begged him to tell her how he had lived, and how he had come to love God with such fervour? He told her he was a poor gentleman, who to acquire wealth and honours had forgotten his conscience, and married a lady who was too nearly related to him, one who was rich, but old and ugly, and whom he did not love at all; that after having drawn all his wife's money from her, he had gone to seek his fortune at sea, and had sped so well that he had become the captain of a galley; but that since he had had the honour of her acquaintance, her holy converse and her good example had so changed him that he was resolved, if by God's grace he came back alive from his expedition, to take her and her husband to Jerusalem, there to do penance for his great sins which he had forsaken, after which it would only remain for him to make reparation to his wife, to whom he hoped soon to be reconciled. This account which he gave of himself was very pleasing to the pious lady, who congratulated herself much on having converted a sinner of such magnitude.

These nocturnal confabulations continued every night until the departure of the captain, who never ventured to declare himself. Only he made the fair devotee a present of a crucifix from our Lady of Pity, beseeching her, whenever she looked upon it, to think of him. The time of his departure being come, and having taken leave of the husband, who was falling asleep, he had last of all to take leave of the fair one, in whose eyes he saw tears, drawn forth by the kind feeling she entertained for him. His impassioned heart so thrilled at the sight that he almost fainted as he bade her farewell, and burst into such an extraordinary perspiration that he wept, so to speak, not only with his eyes, but with every part of his body. Thus he departed without any explanation, and the lady, who never before had seen such tokens of regret, was quite astonished at his emotion. She had not the less good opinion of him for all that, and her prayers accompanied him on his way. A month afterwards, as she was returning to her own house one day, she was met by a gentleman, who delivered a letter to her from the captain, begging her to read it in private, and assuring her that he had seen him embark, fully resolved to perform an expedition which should be pleasing to the king and advantageous to the faith. At the same time, the gentleman mentioned that he was going back to Marseilles to look after the captain's affairs. The lady went to the window and opened the letter, which consisted of two sheets of paper written all over. It was an elaborate declaration of the feelings which the writer had so carefully concealed, and in it was enclosed a large handsome diamond, mounted in a black enamelled ring, which the lady was supplicated to put on her fair finger.

Having read the enormously long letter from beginning to end, the lady was the more astonished as she had never suspected the captain's love for her. The diamond caused her much perplexity, for she knew not what to do with it. After thinking over the matter all that day, and dreaming of it at night, she rejoiced that she could abstain from replying for want of a messenger, saying to herself that as the bearer of the letter had taken such pains on the writer's behalf, she ought to spare him the mortification of such a reply as she had resolved to give him, but which she now thought fit to reserve till the captain's return. The diamond was still a cause of much embarrassment to her, as it was not her custom to adorn herself at anyone's expense but her husband's. At last her good sense suggested to her that she could not employ it better than for the relief of the captain's conscience, and she instantly despatched it, by the hands of one of her servants, to the captain's forlorn wife, to whom she wrote as follows, in the assumed character of a nun of Tarrascon:—

“MADAM,—Your husband passed this way a little before he embarked. He confessed, and received his Creator like a good Christian, and declared to me a fact which lay heavy on his conscience, namely, his regret for not having loved you as he ought. He begged me at his departure to send you this letter with this diamond, which he begs you to keep for his sake, assuring you that if God brings him back safe and sound, he will make amends for the past by all the love that you can desire. This diamond will be for you a pledge of his word. I ask of you on his behalf the aid of your good prayers ; for all my life he shall have part in mine."

When the captain's wife received this letter and the diamond, it may well be imagined how she wept with joy and sorrow : joy at being loved by her husband, and sorrow at being deprived of his presence. She kissed the ring a thousand times, washing it with her tears, and praised God for having restored her husband's affection to her at the close of her days, and when she least expected it. The nun who, under God, had wrought such a blessing for her was not forgotten in her grateful acknowledgments. She replied to her by the same man, who made his mistress laugh heartily when he told her how the captain's wife had received her communication. The fair devotee congratulated herself on having got rid of the diamond in so pious a manner, and was as much rejoiced at having re-established the good understanding between the husband and wife as though she had gained a kingdom.

Some time afterwards news arrived of the defeat and death of the poor captain. He had been abandoned by those who ought to have supported him, and the Rhodians, who had most interest in concealing his design, were the first to make it known. Nearly eighty men who had made a descent on the land were cut off almost to a man. Among them there was a gentleman named Jean, and a converted Turk, for whom the fair devotee had been godmother, and whom she had given to the captain to accompany him on his expedition. Jean fell along with the captain ; the Turk, wounded in fifteen places with arrows, escaped by swimming to the French vessels, and it was from his report that it was known exactly how the thing had happened. A certain gentleman whom the captain believed to be his friend, and whose interests he had advanced with the king and the greatest personages in France, after the captain had landed stood off shore with his vessels. The captain, seeing that his scheme was discovered, and that he was opposed by four thousand Turks, set about retreating. But the gentleman in whom he put such confidence, considering that after his death he himself would have the command and the profit of that great fleet, represented to the officers that it was not right to risk the king's vessels and the lives of so many brave men on board them in order to save eighty or a hundred persons. The officers, as spiritless as himself, coincided with him in opinion. The captain, seeing that the more he called to them the more they drew off from the shore, faced round against his foes, and though he was up to his knees in sand, he defended himself so valiantly that it almost seemed as if his single arm would defeat the assailants. But at last he received so many wounds from the arrows of those who durst not approach him within less than bowshot distance, that he began to grow weak from loss of blood. The Turks, seeing that the Christians were nearly spent, fell upon them with the scimitars ; but notwithstanding the overwhelming numbers of the foe, the Christians defended themselves as long as they had breath. The captain called to him the gentleman named Jean, and the Turk whom the devotee had given him, and planting his sword in the ground, kissed and embraced the cross on his knees, saying, “Lord, receive the soul of him who has not spared his life for the exaltation of thy name.” Jean, seeing him droop as he uttered these words, took him and his sword in his arms, wishing to succour him ; but a Turk cut both his thighs to the bone from behind. “Come, captain,” he cried, as he received the stroke, “let us go to Paradise to see him for whose sake we die.” As he had been united with the captain in life, so was he also in death. The Turk, seeing that he could be of no use to either of them, and that he was pierced with arrows, made his way to the vessels by swimming ; and though he was the only one who escaped out of eighty, the perfidious commander would not receive him. But being a good swimmer, he went from vessel to vessel, till at last he was taken on board a small one, where in the course of a little time he was cured of his wounds.

It was through this foreigner that the truth became known respecting this event, glorious to the captain, and shameful to his companion in arms. The king, and all good people who heard of it, deemed the act of the latter so black towards God and man that there was no punishment too bad for him. But on his return he told so many lies, and made so many presents, that not only did his crime remain unpunished, but he succeeded to the post of him whose lacquey he was not worthy to be. When the sad news reached the court, the regent-mother, who highly esteemed the captain, greatly mourned his loss. So did the king, and all who had known him. When she, whom he had so passionately loved, heard of his strange, piteous, and Christian end, the obduracy she had felt towards him melted into tears, and her lamentations were shared by her husband, whose pilgrim hopes were frustrated by the catastrophe.

I must not forget to mention that a demoiselle belonging to this lady, who loved the gentleman Jean better than herself, told her mistress, the very day the captain and he were killed, that she had seen in a dream him whom she loved so much, that he had come to her in white raiment to bid her farewell, and told her that he was going to Paradise with his captain. But when she learned that her dream was true, she made such piteous moans that her mistress had enough to do to console her. Some time after, the court went into Normandy, of which province the captain was a native, and his wife failed not to come and pay her respects to the regent-mother, intending to be introduced by the lady with whom her husband had been so much in love. Whilst waiting for the hour when she could have audience, the two ladies entered a church, where the widow began to laud her husband, and make lamentations over his death. "I am, madam, the most unhappy of women," she said. "God has taken my husband from me at the time when he loved me more than ever he had done." So saying, she showed the diamond she wore on her finger as a pledge of his perfect affection. This was not said without a world of tears; and the other lady, who saw that her good-natured fraud had produced so excellent an effect, was so strongly tempted to laugh, in spite of her grief, that, not being able to present the widow to the regent, she handed her over to another, and retired into a chapel, where she had her laugh out.*

* The incidents related in this novel appear to be real, but it is impossible to discover the names of the actors. M. Paul Lacroix supposes the hero of the novel to be a Baron de Malleville, Knight of Malta, who was killed at Beyrout in an expedition against the Turks, and whose death has been celebrated by Clement Marot. But the Bibliophiles Français remark that the conjecture is unten-

Methinks, ladies, that those of our sex to whom presents are made ought to be glad to employ them as usefully as did this good lady; for they would find there is pleasure and joy in doing good. We must by no means accuse her of fraud, but praise her good sense, which enabled her to extract good out of a bad thing.

"You mean to say, then," said Nomerfide, "that a fine diamond, worth two hundred crowns, is a bad thing? I assure you, if it had fallen into my hands, neither his wife nor his relations would ever have set eyes on it. Nothing is more one's own than a thing that is given. The captain was dead, no one knew anything of the matter, and she might well have abstained from making the poor old woman cry."

"Good faith, you are right," said Hircan, "for there is many a woman who, to show that she is better than others, does acts contrary to her nature. In fact, do we not all know that nothing is more covetous than a woman? Yet vanity often prevails with them over avarice, and makes them do things in which their hearts have no share. In my opinion, the lady who set so little store by the diamond did not deserve it."

"Gently, gently," said Oisille; "I think I know her, and I pray you not to condemn her unheard."

"I do not condemn her, madam," replied Hircan; "but if the gentleman was so gallant a man as he has been represented to have been, it was a glorious thing for her to have a lover of such merit, and to wear his ring. But perhaps some one less worthy to be loved held her so fast by the finger that the ring could not be placed on it."

able, De Malleville being styled Parisien by the poet, whereas the captain was a Norman. He was a married man, too, which a Knight of Malta could not be.

"Truly," said Ennasuite, "she might fairly keep it, since no one knew anything about it."

"What!" exclaimed Geburon, "is everything allowable for those who love, provided nobody knows of it?"

"I have never," said Saffredent, "seen anything punished as a crime except imprudence; in fact, no murderer, robber, or adulterer, is ever punished by justice, or blamed amongst men, provided they are as cunning as they are wicked. But wickedness often blinds them so that they become witless. Thus it may be truly said that it is only fools who are punished, and not the vicious."

"You may say what you will," said Oisille, "but it is for God to judge the heart of the lady. For my part, I see nothing in her conduct but what is comely and virtuous; and to put an end to this dispute, I beg you, Parlamente, to call on some one to follow you."

"I have great pleasure in calling on Simontault," replied Parlamente, "and I am mistaken if, after these two sad novels, he will not give us one which will not make us weep."

"That is almost as good as saying that I am a buffoon," said Simontault. "By way of revenge, I will let you see that there are women who make a show of being chaste with regard to certain people, or for a certain time; but the end unmasks them, as you will see by this true story."

NOVEL XIV.

Subtlety of a lover who, counterfeiting the real favourite, found means to recompense himself for his past troubles.

AT the time when the grand-master of Chaumont was governor of the duchy of Milan, there was a gentleman named Bonnivet, whose merits afterwards raised him to the rank of admiral of France. As his rare endowments made him liked by everybody, he was often a welcome guest at banquets and entertainments where ladies were present, and he was better received by them than ever was Frenchman before or since, both because he was a handsome, agreeable man, and spoke well, and because he had the reputation of being one of the ablest and most resolute soldiers of his time. One day during the carnival, when he was among the masters, he danced with a lady, one of the handsomest and finest women in Milan. At every pause in the music, he failed not to entertain her with the language of love, in which no one was such an adept as he; but the fair one, not thinking herself bound to respond to his most humble supplications, cut him short, told him flatly that she neither loved nor ever would love any one but her husband, and that he had better address his tender speeches elsewhere. Nothing daunted by this reply, which he would by no means take for a refusal, Bonnivet stuck to the lady, and continued to press his suit with great vivacity until Mid-Lent. In spite of all his endeavours, he found her steadfast in the resolution she had expressed, yet could not persuade himself that all this was real earnest, seeing the hard favour of the husband and the beauty of the wife.

Convinced, then, that she practised dissimulation, he resolved to have recourse to the same art, and thenceforth desisted from his solicitations. He narrowly inquired into her conduct, and found that she loved an Italian gentleman of good parts and accomplishments. Bonnivet gradually insinuated himself into the Italian's acquaintance, and did so with such adroitness that the latter never suspected his motive, but conceived such an esteem for him that next to his fair one he was the person he loved best in the world. In order to extract the Italian gentleman's secret from his breast, Bonnivet pretended to unlock his own, and told him that he loved a lady, naming one whom he scarcely ever thought of, at the same time begging him to keep the secret, that they might both have but one heart and one thought. The Italian, in return for the confidence which Bonnivet reposed in him, informed him, without reserve, of his passion for the lady before mentioned, on whom Bonnivet wanted to be revenged. The two friends met every day, and mutually recounted the good fortunes of the last four-and-twenty hours, with this difference, however, that one lied and the other told the truth. The Italian confessed that he had loved the lady in question for three years, without ever having obtained from her more than fair words and assurances that he was loved. Bonnivet gave him his very best advice; the Italian acted upon it, and prospered by it so well that in a few days the lady consented to fulfil all his desires. Nothing remained now but to contrive means for their meeting; but as Bonnivet was fertile in expedients, this was soon done.

“ I am more obliged to you than to any man living,”

said the Italian to him one evening before supper, "for, thanks to your excellent advice, I expect this night to enjoy what I have been longing for so many years."

"Pray let me know the nature of your enterprise," said Bonnivet, "so that if there is any risk in it, or it requires any artifice, I may aid and serve as your friend."

He then learned that the lady had an opportunity for leaving the great door of the house open, under the pretext of enabling one of her brothers, who was ill, to send out at any hour of the night for what he might require. The Italian was to enter the court-yard through that door, but was not to ascend the main staircase. He was to turn to the right to a small staircase, go up it to the first gallery, on which the chambers of her father-in-law and her brother-in-law opened. He was to take the third door from the stairs, push it gently, and if he found it locked, he was to go away at once, for he might conclude for certain that her husband had returned, though he was not expected back for two days; but if he found the door open, he was to come in softly, and lock the door behind him, being assured that there was no one in the room but herself. Above all, he was to wear felt shoes, that he might make no noise, and not leave home till two hours after midnight, for her brothers-in-law, who were much addicted to play, never went to bed till past one o'clock. Bonnivet congratulated his friend, wished him good speed, and bade him not hesitate to command his services if he could be of any use to him. The Italian thanked him, said that in affairs such as this one could not be too much alone, and went off to make his preparations.

Bonnivet, on his side, did not sleep; and seeing that the time was come to be revenged on the cruel fair one, he went to bed early, had his beard trimmed after the fashion of the Italian's, and his hair cut so that she might not recognize the difference if she touched him. The felt shoes were not forgotten, nor any of the other things which the Italian was accustomed to wear. As he was held in high consideration by the lady's father-in-law, he did not hesitate to go early to the house, being prepared, in case anyone perceived him, to go straight to the chamber of the old gentleman, with whom he had some business.

He reached the house at midnight; met several people in it passing to and fro, but no one noticed him, and he made his way into the gallery. He touched the first two doors, and found them shut; the third being open, he entered it, and locked it behind him. The chamber was all hung with white, and there was a bed with a drapery of the same colour, of such fine stuff, and so excellently wrought with the needle, that nothing could be handsomer. The lady was alone in bed, dressed in the most exquisite night-gear, as he could perceive (himself unseen) through a corner of the curtain, for there was a large wax candle burning in the room. For fear of being recognized, he first put out the light; then he undressed and went to bed to her. The fair one, believing him to be the man she had loved so long, received him with all possible caresses; but he, well knowing that he owed all this to her mistake, took good heed not to say one word to her, his only care being to revenge himself at the cost of her honour, and without being under any obligation to her; but she liked that sweet revenge so well, that she thought she had recompensed him for all his sufferings. This lasted till the clock struck one, when it was time to leave her. Then he asked her, in a very low whisper, if she was as well satisfied with him as he was with her. She, thinking still that he was her lover, replied that she was not only satisfied, but even surprised at the excess of his love, which had kept him an hour without speaking. Upon this he could restrain himself no longer. "Now, madam," he said, laughing outright, "will you refuse me another time, as you have hitherto done?"

The lady, recognizing him too late by his voice and his laughter, was overwhelmed with shame and vexation, and called him a thousand times impostor, cheat, traitor, villain. She would have sprung out of bed to look for a knife with which to kill herself for having been so unhappy as to lose her honour for a man whom she did not love, and who, to be revenged upon her, might make known this affair to the whole world. But he held her fast, and vowed so hard that he would love her better than the other, and would faithfully keep her secret, that at last she believed him, and was pacified. He then told her how he had contrived to find himself where he then was, and related to her all the pains he had taken to win her; whereupon she praised his ingenuity, and vowed that she would love him better than the other, who had not been able to keep her secret. She was now convinced, she said, how false were the prejudices that prevailed against the French, who were better men, more persevering, and more discreet than the Italians; and from that moment she would cast off the erroneous opinions of her countrypeople, and attach herself heartily to him. Only she entreated him that for some time he would forbear from showing himself at any entertainment or in any place where she might be, unless he were masked; for she knew well she should be so much ashamed, that her countenance would tell tales of her to everybody. Having promised this, he begged her in his turn to receive his friend well when he should come about two o'clock, and afterwards get rid of him by degrees. She made great difficulties about this, and only yielded at last under the strong coercion of her love for Bonnivet, who on taking leave of her behaved so much to her satisfaction that she would gladly have had him stay a little longer.

Having risen and put on his clothes, he went out of the room, and left the door ajar, as he had found it. As it was near two o'clock, he withdrew into a corner near the head of the stairs, lest he should meet the Italian, and soon afterwards saw him pass along the gallery and enter the fair one's chamber. Bonnivet then went home to rest after the fatigues of the night, and remained in bed till nine next morning. The Italian failed not to come to him when he was getting up, and gave him an account of his adventure, which had not turned out quite so agreeably as he had expected; for, said he, "I found the lady out of bed in her dressing-gown, and in a high fever, her pulse beating violently, her face all on fire, and such a great perspiration breaking out upon her, that she begged me to go away for fear she should be obliged to call her women to her. She was so ill, in short, that she had more need to think of death than of love, and to be put in mind of Heaven rather than of Cupid. She was very sorry, she told me, that I had run such a hazard for her sake, since she could not make me any requital in this world, being about, as she hoped, to find herself soon in a better one. I was so shocked at a mischance I so little anticipated, that my fire and my joy were changed to ice and sadness, and I instantly withdrew. At daylight this morning I sent to inquire for her, and have received word that she is extremely ill."

As he delivered this sad report he wept so piteously that one would have thought his soul would have been washed out with his tears. Bonnivet, who was as much disposed to laugh as the other was to weep, consoled him as well as he could, and bade him recollect that things of long duration always seem to have an untoward beginning, and that love had caused this delay only to enhance his future enjoyment. Thereupon the two friends parted. The lady kept her bed for some days, and was no sooner out of it once more than she dismissed her first lover, alleging as her reason the fear of death in which she had been, and the terror of her conscience. She devoted herself wholly to Bonnivet, whose love lasted, as usual, about as long as the bloom and beauty of the flowers.

It strikes me, ladies, that Bonnivet's sly manœuvres were a fair set-off against the hypocrisy of the Milanese lady, who, after playing the prude so long, at last let her lasciviousness be seen.

"You may say what you please of women," said Ennasuite ; "but Bonnivet's conduct was anything but that of a man of honour. If a woman loves a man, is that any reason why another should have her by trickery?"

"Set it down for certain," said Geburon, "that when that sort of goods is for sale, they are always carried off by the highest and last bidder. Do not imagine that those who serve ladies take such a world of trouble for their sakes. No, it is for themselves, and for their own pleasure."

"Of that I entertain no manner of doubt," said Longarine ; "for, to be frank with you, all the lovers I have had have invariably begun by talking of my interests, and telling me that they loved my life, my welfare, and my honour, and the upshot of it all has no less invariably been their own interest, their own pleasure, and their own vanity. So it is best to dismiss them before they have finished the first part of their sermon ; for when you come to the second, you cannot refuse them with so much credit to yourself, since declared vice is a thing to be rejected as a matter of course."

"According to your doctrine, then," said Ennasuite, "one ought to rebuff a man as soon as he opens his mouth, without knowing what he has to say."

"Not so," replied Parlamente. "Every one knows that, at the outset, a woman ought not to let it appear that she understands, still less that she believes, the declaration made to her by a lover ; but when he comes to strong oaths, it strikes me that it is more becoming in the lady to leave him in the middle of that fine road than to go with him all the way to the bottom."

"Nay, but are we always to assume that they love us with a criminal passion?" said Nomerfide. "Is it not sinful to think ill of one's neighbour?"

"You may believe this or not, as you please," said Oisille ; "but there is so much reason for fearing that such is the case, that the moment you discover the least inkling of it, you cannot be too prompt in getting away from a fire which is too apt to burn up a heart before even it is once perceived."

"That is a very hard law you lay down," replied Hircan. "If women, whom gentleness becomes so well, were all as rigorous as you would have them to be, we men would lay aside meekness and supplication, and have recourse to stratagem and violence."

"The best thing," said Simontault, "is, that every one should follow the bent of his nature, and love or not, as he pleases, but always without dissimulation."

"Would to God," exclaimed Saffredent, "that the observance of this law were as productive of honour as it would be of pleasure!"

But Dagoucín could not refrain from observing, "Those who would rather die than make known their sentiments, could not endure your law."

"Die!" cried Hircan. "The good knight is yet unborn who would die for any such cause. But let us say no more of what is impossible, and see to whom Simon-tault will give his voice."

"To Longarine," replied the gentleman thus appealed to; "for I observed her just now talking to herself. I suspect she was conning over some good thing, and she is not wont to disguise the truth either against man or woman."

"Since you think me such a friend to the truth," said Longarine, "I will tell you a story, which, though not quite so much to the credit of our sex as I could wish, will, nevertheless, show you that there are women who have as much spirit and as sound wits as men, and are not inferior to them in cunning. If my story is somewhat long, I will endeavour to make you amends by a little gayety."

NOVEL XV.

How a lady of the court, being neglected by her husband, whose love was bestowed elsewhere, retaliated upon him.

THERE was at the court of King Francis the First a gentleman whom I could name if I would. He was poor, not having five hundred livres a year; but the king prized him so highly for his great endowments, that he bestowed upon him a wife so wealthy that a great lord might have been satisfied with such a match. As his wife was still very young, the king requested one of the greatest ladies of the court to take her into her household, which she did with great willingness. The gentleman was so well-bred and so good-looking, that he was greatly esteemed by all the court ladies, especially by one of them, whom the king loved, and who was neither so young nor so handsome as his wife. The gentleman loved this lady so passionately, and made so little account of his wife, that he hardly shared her bed one night in the year; and to add to the poor creature's mortification, he never spoke to her, or showed her any token of kindness; a sort of treatment which she found it very hard to bear. Meanwhile he spent her income for his own gratification, and allowed her so small a share of it, that she had not wherewithal to dress as became her quality. The lady with whom she resided often complained of this to the husband. "Your wife," she said, "is handsome, rich, and of a good family, yet you neglect her. Her extreme youth has enabled her hitherto to endure this neglect; but it is to be feared, that when she comes to maturer years, her mirror, and some one who is no friend to you, will so set before her eyes her beauty which you disdain, that resentment will prompt her to do what she would not have dared to think of if you had treated her better." But the gentleman, whose heart was set elsewhere, made light of these judicious remonstrances, and went on in his old ways.

After two or three years, the young wife began to be one of the finest women in France. Her reputation was so great that it was commonly reported at court that she had not her equal. The more sensible she became that she was worthy to be loved, the more poignantly she felt her husband's contemptuous treatment, and but for the efforts of her mistress to console her, she would almost have sunk into hopeless melancholy. After having tried in vain every means to please her husband, she came to the conclusion that it was impossible he should so ill respond to the love she bore him unless he were captivated elsewhere. With this idea in her mind, she set to work so carefully and so shrewdly that she found out where it was he was so occupied every night as to forget his conscience and his wife. When she had thus got certain evidence of the life he led, she fell into such deep despondency that she would wear nothing but black, and shunned all places of amusement. Her mistress perceived this, and omitted nothing by which she could hope to raise her out of that gloomy mood; but all her kind efforts were unavailing. Her husband was made acquainted with her condition, but instead of caring to relieve it, he only laughed at it.

A great lord who was nearly related to the young wife's protectress, and who paid her frequent visits, having one day been informed of the husband's hard-hearted behaviour, was so shocked at it, that he would fain try to console the wife; but he was so charmed with her conversation and manners, and thought her so beautiful, that he had far more desire to make her love him than to talk to her of her husband, except it was to let her know how little cause she had to love such a man. As for the young lady herself, forsaken by him who ought to have loved and cherished her, and wooed by a lord who had everything to recommend him, she thought herself fortunate in having made such a conquest. Though she desired always to preserve her honour, nevertheless she took great pleasure in talking to him, and in seeing that she was loved, a thing whereof she had, so to speak, a famishing need. This tender friendship lasted some time, but at last the king became aware of it, and as he had a great regard for the husband, and would not have any one affront or annoy him, he begged the prince to discontinue his attentions, on pain of incurring the royal displeasure. The prince, who prized the king's good graces above all the ladies in the world, promised to forego his designs, since such was the king's wish, and to go that very evening and bid farewell to the lady.

That evening the husband, being at his window, saw the prince come in and enter his wife's chamber, which was beneath his own. The prince saw him too, but did not turn back for all that. On saying farewell to her whom he was but beginning to love, the only reason he alleged for this change in him was the king's command. After many tears and lamentations, which lasted nearly until one o'clock in the morning, the lady said to him at parting, "I thank God, my lord, for the grace he confers upon me in depriving me of your friendship, since it is so little and so weak that you take it up and lay it down at the commands of men. As for me, I did not consult either mistress, or husband, or myself, whether I should love you or not. Your engaging manners and your good looks won my heart ; but since yours is less amorous than timid, you cannot love perfectly, and the friend who is not true and staunch to the uttermost is not the friend for me to love thoroughly, as I had resolved to love you ; farewell, then, my lord, you whose timidity does not deserve a love so frank and so sincere as mine."

The prince went away with tears in his eyes, and looking back, he again saw the husband, who had watched him in and out. Next day the prince told him why he had gone to see his wife, and acquainted him with the commands laid upon him by the king, whereat the gentleman was greatly pleased, and gave much thanks to his sovereign. But seeing that his wife was becoming more beautiful every day, and he himself older and less good-looking, he began to change his part, and to assume that which he had long made his wife play ; for he sought her more than he had been wont, and took much more notice of her. But the more he sought her the more she shunned him, being very glad to pay him back a part of the distress he had caused her by his indifference. At the same time, not to miss the pleasure which love was beginning to afford her, she cast her eyes on a young gentleman whose person and manners were so engaging, that he was a favourite with all the ladies of the court. By complaining to him of the unkind treatment she had experienced, she inspired him with such pity for her, that he left nothing untried to console her. On her part, to indemnify her for the prince she had lost, she loved this new friend so heartily, that she forgot her past griefs, and thought only of the means of adroitly carrying on her intrigue ; and in this she succeeded so well, that her mistress never perceived it, for she took good care never to speak in her presence to her lover. When she had anything to say to him, she went to see certain ladies of the court. Among these was one with whom her husband seemed to be in love.

One dark night after supper she stole away alone, and entered the ladies' room, where she found him whom she loved more than herself. She sat down beside him, and leaning over a table they conversed together, whilst they pretended to be reading a book. Some one whom the husband had set on the watch came and told him whither his wife was gone ; and he, like a sensible man as he was, said nothing, but followed her quickly, entered the room, and saw her reading a book. Pretending not to see her, he went straight up to the ladies, who were at the other side of the room; whilst so disconcerted was she at being found by him with a man to whom she had never spoken in his presence, that she scrambled over a table, and ran away as if her husband was pursuing her sword in hand, and went to her mistress, who was just about to retire for the night.

After her mistress was undressed and she had left the room, she met one of her own women coming to tell her that her husband wanted her. She said flatly she would not go to him, for he was so strange and harsh that she was afraid he would do her some mischief. Nevertheless she went at last, for fear of worse. Her husband said not a word to her about what had occurred until they were in bed; but then as she could not help crying, he asked her the cause of her tears? She cried, she said, because she was afraid he was angry at having found her reading with a gentleman. The husband replied that he had never forbidden her to speak to anybody; but that he had been surprised at seeing her run away, as if she had done something wrong; and that this had made him believe she loved the gentleman. The end of the matter was that he forbade her thenceforward to speak to any man, either in public or in private, assuring her that otherwise he would kill her without mercy. But to forbid things we like is the surest way to make us desire them more ardently, and it was not long before this poor woman had forgotten her husband's threats and her own promises.

The very same evening, having gone back to sleep with other demoiselles and her attendants, she sent to invite the gentleman to visit her at night. Her husband, whose jealousy kept him awake, and who had heard that the gentleman used to visit his wife at night, wrapped himself up in a cloak, took a valet-de-chambre with him, and went and knocked at his wife's door. Up she got, and seeing her women all asleep, she went alone in her mantle and slippers to the door, never in the least suspecting who was there. Her inquiry, who was there? was answered in her lover's name; but for her better assurance, she half opened the wicket and said, "If you are the person you say, give me your hand, and I shall know if you speak truly." The moment she felt her husband's hand, she recognized him, and slamming the wicket, cried out, "Ha, monsieur! it is your hand."

"Yes," cried her husband, in a great passion, "it is the hand that will keep word with you. So fail not to come, when I send for you."

With that he went away, and she returned to her chamber more dead than alive. "Get up, my friends," she cried to her women; "get up. You have slept too long for me. I thought to trick you, and I have been tricked myself," and, saying this, she fainted away. Her women, thus suddenly roused from their sleep, were astonished at her words, and still more when they saw her lying like a corpse, and they ran hurriedly to and fro in search of means to revive her. When she had recovered her speech, she said to them, "You see before you, my friends, the most wretched creature in the world." Then she related to them her adventure, entreating them to stand by her, for she looked upon herself already as a dead woman. While her women were endeavouring to comfort her, a valet-de-chambre arrived with a message from her husband, ordering her to come to him instantly. Thereupon she embraced two of her women, and began to cry and shriek, beseeching them not to let her go, for she was sure she should never return. The valet-de-chambre, however, bade her not be afraid, for he would answer for it with his life that no harm should happen to her. Seeing, then, that resistance was useless, she threw herself in the valet's arms, saying, "Since it must be so, my friend, carry this wretched body to death;" and in fact he carried, rather than led her away, for she was almost in a swoon. The moment she entered her husband's room, she fell on her knees, and said, "Have pity on me, monsieur, I beseech you; and I swear to you before God that I will tell you the whole truth."

"That I am determined you shall," replied the husband in a furious tone, and ordered every one to quit the room. As his wife had always seemed to him very devout, he thought she would not perjure herself if he made her swear on the cross. He therefore sent for a very handsome one he had, and when they were alone he made her swear on that cross that she would speak the truth as to such questions as he should put to her. By this time she had been able to rally her spirits, and having partly recovered from her first terror, she resolved to conceal nothing, but at the same time not to say anything which could compromise her lover. Her husband then put the questions he deemed necessary, and this was how she replied to them :

"I will not attempt to justify myself, monsieur, or to make little of the love I have entertained for the gentleman who is the cause of your jealousy. Whatever I might say to that effect, you could not and ought not to believe it after what has occurred; but I must tell you what has occasioned this love. Never wife so loved her husband as I loved you; and but for your unkindness I should never have loved any one but you. You know that while I was yet a child, my parents wished to marry me to a man of higher birth than you ; but they could never make me consent to it from the moment I had spoken to you. I declared for you in spite of all they could say, and without caring for your poverty. You know in what manner you have treated me hitherto. This has caused me such grief and vexation, that but for the support of the lady with whom you have placed me, I should have sunk under my despair. But at last, seeing myself full-grown, and esteemed fair by every one but you, I began to feel so acutely the wrong you did me, that the love I had for you turned into hatred, and the desire of pleasing you into that of revenging myself. While in this desperate mood, I had opportunity to see a prince, who, more obedient to the king than to love, forsook me at a time when I was beginning to derive consolation from an honourable love. After I had lost the prince, I found one who had no need to be at any pains to woo me, for his good looks, his deportment, and his excellent endowments, are enough to make him an object of interest to all women of sense. At my solicitation, and not at his own, he has loved me with such propriety that he has never asked of me anything inconsistent with my honour. Though the little cause I have to love you might induce me to make light of my wedded faith, yet my love for God and my own honour have hitherto prevented me from doing anything I have need to confess, or which can make me apprehensive of infamy. I do not deny that, under pretence of going to say my prayers, I have retired as often as I could into a garderobe to converse with him ; for I have never confided the conduct of this affair to any one. Nor yet do I deny, that being in such a private place, and safe from all suspicion, I have kissed him with more hearty goodwill than I kiss you ; but may God never show me mercy if anything else ever happened in our tête-à-têtes, or if he ever asked me for more, or my own heart ever harboured a thought of granting anything besides ; for I was so happy, that it seemed to me there could not be in the world a greater pleasure than that which I enjoyed.

“ But you, sir, who are the sole cause of my misfortunes, would you desire to be revenged for conduct of which you have so long been setting me an example, with this difference, that what you have done you have done without honour and without conscience ? You know, and I know too, that she whom you love does not content herself with what God and reason command. Though the laws of men condemn to infamy women who love any others than their husbands, the law of God, which is infinitely more venerable, and more august, condemns men who love any other women than their own wives. If the faults we have both committed be weighed in the balance, you will be found more guilty than I. You are a wise man ; you have age and experience enough to know evil, and shun it ; but I am young, and have no experience of the force and might of love. You have a wife who loves you, and to whom you are dearer than her own life ; and I have a husband who shuns me, hates me, and treats me with such harshness as he would not show to a servant woman. You love a woman in years, lean and lanky, and not so handsome as I am ; and I love a gentleman, younger than you, handsomer, and more agreeable. You love the wife of your best friend and the mistress of your sovereign, thus violating friendship and the respect you owe to both ; and I love a gentleman who has no other ties than his love for me. Judge now, sir, without partiality, which of us two is the more to be condemned or excused. I do not believe there exists a man of sense and knowledge of the world who would not give his verdict against you, seeing that I am young and ignorant, despised by you and loved by the handsomest and best-bred gentleman in France, and that notwithstanding all that, I love him only because I despair of being loved by you."

Hearing such home truths as these delivered by the lips of a beautiful woman, with such grace and assurance that it was easy to see she did not think herself deserving of any punishment, the husband was so confounded that he knew not what to reply, except that a man's honour and a woman's were different things. Nevertheless, as she swore that nothing criminal had taken place between her and her lover, it was not his intention to love her less ; but he begged that she would offend no more, and that they should both forgive and forget the past. She gave a promise to that effect, and, the reconciliation being effected, they went to bed together.

Next morning an old demoiselle, who was greatly alarmed for her mistress's life, came to her bedside and said, " Well, madam, how do you find yourself ? " " There is not a better husband in the world than mine," she replied, laughing, " for he believed me on my oath." In this way five or six days passed in apparent harmony between the married pair ; meanwhile, however, the husband, whose jealousy was not at all allayed had, his wife narrowly watched night and day ; but in spite of all this vigilance his spies could not hinder the lady from again entertaining her lover in a dark and very suspicious place. Nevertheless, she managed the matter so secretly, that no one could ever know the truth for certain ; only some valet set a story afloat that he had found a gentleman and a lady in a stable which was under the chamber occupied by the mistress of the lady in question. Upon this doubtful evidence the husband's jealousy became so increased that he resolved to have the gallant assassinated; and he assembled for that purpose a great number of relations and friends, who were to despatch him in case they met him. But it happened that one of the principal persons among the confederates was an intimate friend of the man whose death they plotted; and instead of surprising him, he put him fully on his guard; and the gentleman was such a general favourite, and always had such a good escort of friends, that he did not fear his enemy; nor was he ever assailed.

He thought it right, however, to have a conference with the lady under whose protection his fair one resided, and who had never heard a word of the whole affair, for he had never spoken with the young lady in her presence. Going to a church where he knew that she was, he acquainted her with the husband's jealousy, and the design he had formed against his life, and told her that although he was innocent, he was resolved to go and travel in foreign countries, in order to extinguish the false report that was beginning to gather strength. The princess was greatly astonished at hearing such news, and vowed that the husband did very wrong to suspect so virtuous a woman as his wife, and one in whom she had never seen anything but virtue and propriety. However, considering the husband's influence, and in order to put an end to this scandalous report, she advised him to withdraw for some time, assuring him she would never believe any such idle fancies and suspicions. Furthermore, she advised him to speak to the husband before his departure.

He took her advice, and meeting the husband in a gallery near the king's chamber, he said to him with an assured countenance, and with the respect due to a man of his rank, "I have all my life desired, monsieur, to render you service, and I learn that in return you laid wait, yesterday evening, for my life. I beg you to consider, monsieur, that although you have more power and authority than I, nevertheless I am a gentleman as well as you, and I should be very loth to part with my life for nothing. I entreat you also to consider that you have a virtuous wife, and if any one chooses to say the contrary, I will tell him that he foully lies. For my part, I am not conscious of having done anything that should give you cause for wishing me ill ; therefore, if it so please you, I will remain your obedient servant ; or if not, I am the king's, and that is enough for me."

The husband replied, that true it was he had suspected him ; but he thought him so gallant a man that he would rather be his friend than his enemy ; and, taking leave of him, hat in hand, he embraced him as a friend. You may imagine what was said by those who had been commissioned on the preceding evening to kill the gentleman, when they witnessed these demonstrations of esteem and friendship. The lover then set out on his travels ; but as he had less money than good looks, his mistress gave him a ring her husband had given her, worth three thousand crowns, which he pawned for fifteen hundred.

Some time after his departure the husband waited on the princess, and begged leave for his wife to pass some months with one of his sisters. The princess was much surprised at this unexpected request, and pressed him so much to tell her the reason of it, that he partially explained it to her. The young lady then having taken her leave of her mistress and the whole court, without shedding tears, or showing the least sign of grief, set out for the place to which her husband chose to send her, under the care of a gentleman who had express orders to watch her carefully, and above all, not to suffer her to speak on the road with the suspected person. Being aware of the nature of the orders given to her escort, she every day gave them alarms, and made game of their vigilance. On the day she began her journey, she fell in with a Cordelier on horseback, and chatted with him from dinner almost till bedtime. When they were within a good league of the inn, she said to him, "Here, father, are two crowns, for the consolations you have afforded me : I have wrapped them in paper as you see, for otherwise I know you would not venture to touch them. Do me the favor to set off at a gallop across the country the moment you quit my side, and take care that you are not seen by the people about me. I say this for your good and for the obligation I am under to you."

Off went the Cordelier accordingly ; and no sooner had he gone, than she said to her attendants, "Good servants you are, forsooth, and very vigilant guards. Properly you fulfil the orders of your master who confided in you. The very person with whom you have been commanded not to suffer me to speak, has been conversing with me the whole day, and you have let him alone. You deserve the stick, and not wages." The gentleman to whose care the fair lady had been entrusted was so vexed at hearing this, that he could not answer her a single word. Taking two men with him, he set spurs to his horse and galloped after the Cordelier, who did his best to escape, seeing himself pursued ; but as they were better mounted they overtook him. The good father, who had no idea why they treated him in that manner, roared for mercy, and in suppliant humility took off his hood and remained bareheaded. They then perceived that he was not the person they had taken him for, and that their mistress had made fools of them ; which she did more cruelly still when they came back from their chase. " You are proper men," she said, " to be entrusted with the care of women. You let them talk without knowing to whom, and then believing anything they choose to tell you, you go and insult God's servants."

After several other pranks as humorous as this, she reached the place of her destination, where her two sisters-in-law and the husband of one of them kept her in great subjection. By this time the husband learned that her ring was pledged for fifteen hundred crowns. To save the honour of his wife and recover the ring, he sent her word to redeem it, and that he would pay the money. Caring nothing for the ring since her lover had the money for it, she wrote to him that her husband constrained her to reclaim it, and lest he should suppose that she loved him less than before, she sent him a diamond which her mistress had given her, and which she prized more than all her other jewels. Her lover cheerfully sent her the merchant's obligation, thinking himself well off to have fifteen hundred crowns and a diamond ; but glad above all things at being assured that his mistress loved him still. As long as the husband lived, they remained apart, and could only correspond in writing. Upon the husband's death, the lover, supposing that his mistress still retained the same feelings towards him which she had always professed, lost no time in demanding her hand in marriage ; but found that long absence had given him a rival who was preferred to himself. He was so mortified at this, that, shunning all intercourse with ladies, he wooed danger, and died at last, after having distinguished himself as much as ever young man did.

This tale, ladies, in which our sex is not spared, conveys this lesson to husbands : that wives of high spirit suffer themselves to be led astray by resentment and vindictiveness, rather than by the charms of love. The heroine of this novel long resisted that sweet passion, but at last gave way to her despair. A good woman should not do like her, for there is no excuse for a bad action. The more one is exposed to do wrong, the more virtue there is in overcoming one's self and doing well, instead of rendering evil for evil ; especially as the ill one thinks to do to another often recoils upon the doer. Happy those women in whom God manifests the virtues of chastity, meekness, and patience.

"It strikes me, Longarine," said Hircan, "that the lady you have been telling us of was inspired by resentment more than by love ; for had she loved the gentleman as much as she pretended, she would never have quitted him for another ; and therefore she may be called spiteful, vindictive, obstinate, and fickle."

"You talk at your ease on such matters," said Ennasuite, "but you know not what a heart-break it is to love without being loved."

"It is true I have little experience in that way," said Hircan ; "for only let a lady show the least coldness towards me, and at once I bid adieu to love and her."

"That is all very well," said Parlamente, "for a man like you, who loves only his own pleasure ; but an upright wife ought not to forsake her husband."

"And yet," observed Simontault, "the fair one in question forgot for awhile that she was a woman ; for a man could not have revenged himself more signally."

"It is not fair," said Oisille, "to conclude from one instance of a naughty woman, that all others are like her."

"You are all women, however," replied Saffredent ; "and however bravely adorned you may be, any one who looked carefully under your petticoats would find that you are so."

"We should do nothing but wrangle all day, if we were to listen to you," said Nomerfide. "But I so long to hear another story, that I beg Longarine to call on some one."

Longarine cast her eyes on Geburon, and said, "If you have a story to tell of some good lady, pray do so now."

"Since you call upon me," replied Geburon, "I will relate to you a thing that happened at Milan."

NOVEL XVI.

Of a Milanese lady who tested her lover's courage, and afterwards loved him heartily.

WHEN the Grand-Master of Chaumont was governor of Milan, there was a lady there who passed for one of the most respectable in the city. She was the widow of an Italian count, and resided with her brothers-in-law, not choosing to hear a word about marrying again. Her conduct was so correct and guarded that she was highly esteemed by all the French and Italians in the duchy. One day, when her brothers and sisters-in-law entertained the Grand-Master of Chaumont, the widow could not help being present, contrary to her custom of never appearing at any festive meeting. The French could not see her without praising her beauty and her grace : one among them especially, whom I will not name. It is enough to inform you that there was not a Frenchman in Italy more worthy to be loved, for he was fully endowed with all the beauties and graces which a gentleman could have. Though he saw the widow dressed in black crape, apart from the young people, and withdrawn into a corner with several old ladies, yet, being one who had never known what it was to fear man or woman, he accosted her, took off his mask, and quitted the dance to converse with her. He passed the whole evening with her and the old ladies her companions, and enjoyed himself more than he could have done with the youngest and sprightliest ladies of the court. So charmed was he with this conversation, that when it was time to retire he hardly believed he had had time to sit down. Though he talked with the widow only upon common topics, suited to the company around her, she failed not to perceive that he was anxious to make her acquaintance, which she was so resolute to prevent, that he could never afterwards meet with her in any company, great or small.

At last, having made inquiries as to her habits of life, and learned that she went often to the churches and religious houses, he set so many people on the watch that she could not go to any of those places so secretly but that he was there before her, and stayed as long as he could see her. He made such good use of his time, and gazed at her with such hearty good will, that she could not be ignorant of his passion ; and to prevent these encounters she resolved to feign illness for some time, and hear mass at home. This was a bitter mortification to the gentleman, for he was thus deprived of his only means of seeing her. At last, when she thought she had baffled his plans, she returned to the churches as before, and Love took care forthwith to make this known to the gentleman, who then resumed his habits of devotion. Fearing lest she should throw some other obstacle in his way, and that he should not have time to make known to her what he felt, one morning, when she was hearing mass in a little chapel, where she thought herself snugly concealed, he placed himself at the end of the altar, and turning to her at the moment when the priest was elevating the host, said, in a voice of deep feeling, "I swear to you, madam, by Him whom the priest holds in his hands, that you are the sole cause of my death. Though you deprive me of all opportunity to address you, yet you cannot be ignorant of the passion I entertain for you. My haggard eyes and death-like countenance must have sufficiently made known to you my condition." The lady pretended not to understand him, and replied, "God's name ought not to be taken in vain ; but the poets say that the gods laugh at the oaths and falsehoods of lovers, wherefore women who prize their honour ought neither to be credulous nor pitiful." So saying, she rose and went home.

Those who have been in the like predicament will readily believe that the gentleman was sorely cast down at receiving such a reply. However, as he did not lack courage, he thought it better to have met with a rebuff than to have missed an opportunity of declaring his love. He persevered for three years, and lost not a moment in which he could solicit her by letters and by other means ; but during all that time she never made him any other reply, but shunned him as the wolf shuns the mastiff ; and that not by reason of any aversion she felt for him, but because she was afraid of exposing her

He managed so adroitly that he was in the lady's room at the moment appointed.

Photographed from Life.
Copyright, 1902, by D. Trenor.

honour and reputation. The gentleman was so well aware that there lay the knot of the difficulty, that he pushed matters more briskly than ever ; till, after a world of trouble, refusals, and sufferings, the lady was touched by his constancy, took pity on him, and granted him what he had so long desired and waited for.

The assignation having been made, and the requisite measures concerted, the gentleman failed not to present himself at the rendezvous, at whatever risk of his life, for the fair widow resided with her relations. But as he was not less cunning than handsome, he managed so adroitly that he was in the lady's chamber at the moment appointed. He found her alone in a handsome bed ; but as he was undressing in eager haste, he heard whisperings outside the chamber-door, and the noise of swords clashing against the walls. "We are undone," cried the widow, more dead than alive. "Your life and my honour are in mortal peril. My brothers are coming to kill you. Hide yourself under the bed, I beseech you ; for then they will not find you, and I shall have a right to complain of their alarming me without cause."

The gentleman, who was not easily frightened, coolly replied, "What are your brothers that they should make a man of honour afraid ? If their whole race was assembled at the door, I am confident they would not stand the fourth lunge of my sword. Remain quietly in bed, therefore, and leave me to guard the door."

Then wrapping his cloak round his left arm, and with his sword in his hand, he opened the door, and saw that the threatening weapons were brandished by two servant maids. "Forgive us, monsieur," they said. "It is by our mistress's orders we do this ; but you shall have no more annoyance from us." The gentleman, seeing that his supposed antagonists were women, contented himself with bidding them go to the devil, and slamming the door in their faces. He then jumped into bed to his mistress without delay. Fear had not cooled his ardour, and without wasting time in asking the meaning of the sham alarm, he thought only of satisfying his passion.

Towards daylight, he asked his bedfellow why she had so long delayed his happiness, and what was her reason for making her servants behave so oddly. "I had resolved," she said, laughing, "never to love; and I have adhered to that resolution ever since I became a widow. But the first time you spoke to me, I saw so much to admire in you that I changed my mind, and began from that hour to love you as much as you loved me. It is true that honour, which has always been the ruling principle of my conduct, would not suffer love to make me do anything which might blemish my reputation. But as the stricken deer thinks to change its pain by change of place, so did I go from church to church, hoping to fly from him whom I carried in my heart, the proof of whose perfect love has reconciled honour with love. But to be thoroughly assured that I gave my heart to a man who was perfectly worthy of it, I ordered my women to do as they have done. I can assure you, if you had been frightened enough to hide under the bed, my intention was to have got up and gone into another room, and never have had anything more to do with you. But as I have found you not only comely and pleasing but also full of valour and intrepidity to a degree even beyond what fame had reported you; as I have seen that fear could not appal you, nor in the least degree cool the ardour of your passion for me, I have resolved to attach myself to you for the rest of my days; being well assured that I cannot place my life and my honour in better hands than in those of him whom of all men in the world I believe to be the bravest and the best.”*

As if human will could be immutable, they mutually promised and vowed a thing which was not in their power—I mean, perpetual affection, which can neither grow up nor abide in the hearts of men, as those ladies know who have learned by experience what is the duration of such engagements. Therefore, ladies, if you are wise, you will be on your guard against us, as the stag would be against the hunter if the animal had reason, for our felicity, our glory, and delight is to see you captured, and to despoil you of what ought to be dearer to you than life.

“Since when have you turned preacher, Geburon?” said Hircan. “You did not always talk in that fashion.”

“It is true,” replied Geburon, “that I have all my life long held a quite different language; but as my teeth are bad, and I can no longer chew venison, I warn the poor deer against the hunters, that I may make amends in my old age for the mischiefs I have desired in my youth.”

“Thank you, Geburon, for your warning,” retorted Nomerfide, “but after all, we doubt that we have much reason to be obliged to you; for you did not speak in that way to the lady you loved so much, therefore it is a proof that you do not love us, or yet wish that we should love. Yet we believe ourselves to be as prudent and virtuous as those you so long chased in your young days. But it is a common vanity of the old to believe that they have always been more discreet than those who come after them.”

* The hero of this novel is again Admiral de Bonnivet, as we learn from Brantôme.

"When the cajolery of one of your wooers," retorted Geburon, "shall have made you acquainted with the nature of men, you will then believe, Nomerfide, that I have told you the truth."

"To me it seems probable," observed Oisille, "that the gentleman whose intrepidity you extol so highly must rather have been possessed by the fury of love, a passion so violent that it makes the greatest poltroons undertake things which the bravest would think twice of before attempting."

"If he had not believed, madam," said Saffredent, "that the Italians are readier with their tongues than with their hands, methinks he must have been frightened."

"Yes," said Oisille, "if he had not had a fire in his heart which burns up fear."

"Since you did not think the courage of this gentleman sufficiently laudable," said Hircan, "I presume you know of some other instance which seems to you more worthy of praise."

"It is true that this gentleman's courage deserves some praise," said Oisille, "but I know an instance of intrepidity that is worthy of higher admiration."

"Pray tell us it then, madam," said Geburon.

"If you so much extol," said Oisille, "the bravery of a man who displayed it for the defence of his own life and of his mistress's honour, what praise is too great for another, who, without necessity, and from pure valour, behaved in the manner I am about to relate?"

NOVEL XVII.

How King Francis gave proof of his courage in the case of Count Guillaume, who designed his death.

A GERMAN count named Guillaume, of the House of Saxe, to which that of Savoy is so closely allied that anciently the two made but one, came to Dijon, in Burgundy, and entered the service of King Francis. This count, who was considered one of the finest men in Germany, and also one of the bravest, was so well received by the king, that he not only took him into his service, but placed him near his person, as one of the gentlemen of his chamber. The Seigneur de la Tremouille, Governor of Burgundy, an old knight and faithful servant of the king, being naturally suspicious and attentive to his master's interests, had always a good number of spies among his enemies to discover their intrigues; and he conducted himself with such wariness that little escaped his notice. One day he received a letter, informing him among other things, that Count Guillaume had already received certain sums of money with promises of more, provided he would have the king put to death in any way in which it could be done. The Seigneur de la Tremouille instantly communicated the intelligence to the king, and made no secret of it to Madame Louise of Savoy, his mother, who, putting out of consideration that she was related to the German, begged the king to dismiss him forthwith. Instead of doing so, the king begged Madame Louise to say no more about it, declaring it impossible that so gallant a man could be guilty of so villainous an act.

Some time after, a second despatch was received, confirmatory of the former one. The governor, burning with zeal for the preservation of his master's life, begged permission of him either to expel the count from the realm, or to take precautionary measures against him; but the king expressly commanded him to make no stir in the matter, doubting not that he should come at the truth by some other means.

One day, the king went to the chase, armed with no other weapon other than a very choice sword, and took Count Guillaume with him, desiring him to keep close up with him. After having hunted the stag for some time, the king, finding himself alone with Count Guillaume, and far from his suite, turned aside, and rode into the thick of the forest. When they had advanced some way he drew his sword, and said to the count, "What think you? Is not this an excellent sword?" The count, taking it by the point, replied that he did not think he had ever seen a better. "You are right," rejoined the king; "and it strikes me that if a gentleman had conceived the design of killing me, and knew the strength of my arm, the boldness of my heart, and the temper of this good sword, he would think twice of it before he attacked me; nevertheless, I should regard him as a great villain, if, being alone with me, man to man, he durst not attempt to execute what he had dared to undertake."

"The villainy of the design would be very great, sire," replied the astounded count; "but not less would be the folly of attempting to put it in execution."

The king sheathed his sword with laugh, and, hearing the sound of the chase, set spurs to the horse, and galloped in the direction from which the sound came.

When he rejoined his suite he said not a word of what had passed, satisfied in his own mind that Count Guillaume, for all his vigour and bravery, was not the man to strike so daring a blow. The count, however, making no doubt that he was suspected, and greatly fearing a discovery, went the next day to Robertet, the secretary of finance, and told him that, on considering the profits and appointments the king had proposed to make him for remaining in his service, he found they would not be sufficient to maintain him for half the year ; and that, unless his majesty would be pleased to double them, he should be under the necessity of retiring. He concluded by begging that Robertet would ascertain the king's pleasure in the matter, and make him acquainted with it as soon as possible. Robertet said he would lose no time, for he would go that instant to the king : a commission which he undertook the more readily, as he had seen the information obtained by La Tremouille. As soon as the king was awake, Robertet laid his business before him, in presence of Monsieur de la Tremouille and Admiral de Bonnivet, who were not aware of what the king had done the day before.

"You want to dismiss Count Guillaume," said the king, laughing, "and you see he dismisses himself. You may tell him, then, that if he is not satisfied with the terms he accepted when he entered my service, and which many a man of good family would think himself fortunate in having, he may see if he can do better elsewhere. Far from wishing to hinder him, I shall be very glad to have him find as good a position as he deserves."

Robertet was as prompt in carrying this reply to the count as he had been in laying the latter's proposals before the king. "That being the case, I must retire from his majesty's service," said the count. Fear made him so eager to be gone, that twenty-four hours sufficed for the rest. He took leave of his majesty as he was sitting down to table, and affected extreme regret at the necessity which compelled him to quit that gracious presence. He also took leave of the king's mother, who let him go with no less gladness than she had welcomed him as a kinsman and friend. The king, seeing his mother and his courtiers surprised at the count's sudden departure, made known to them the alarm he had given the count, adding that even if he were innocent of what was laid to his charge, he had a fright sufficient to make him quit a master whose temper he did not yet know.*

I see no reason, ladies, which could have obliged the king thus to expose his person against a man who was reckoned so formidable an adversary, had he not chosen, from mere greatness of soul, to quit the company in which kings find no inferiors to offer them simple combat, in order to put himself upon an equal footing with a man whom he regarded as his enemy, and to prove in person his daring and high courage.

"He was certainly right," said Parlamente; "for the praises of all mankind are not so satisfying to a great heart as its own experience of the virtues with which God has endowed it."

"The ancients long ago represented," said Geburon, "that one cannot arrive at the temple of Fame without passing through that of Virtue. As I know the two persons of whom you have related this tale, I know perfectly well that the king is one of the most intrepid men in his dominions."

* The fact related in this novel must have occurred in the forest of Argilly, in July, 1521, when Francis I. was at Dijon. The German count in question was Wilhelm von Furstemberg. He is the subject of the thirtieth chapter of Brantôme's Capitaines Etrangers.

"When Count Guillaume came to France," said Hircan, "I should have been more afraid of his sword than of those of the best four among the Italians who were then at court."

"We all know," said Ennasuite, "that all the praises we could bestow on the king would fall far short of his merits, and that the day would be gone before everyone should have said all he thinks of him. Therefore, madam, give your voice to some one who may again tell us something to the advantage of men, if any such thing there be."

"I imagine," said Oisille to Hircan, "that as you are so much in the habit of speaking ill of women, you will not find it difficult to tell us something good of your own sex."

"That I can the more easily do," replied Hircan, "as it is not long since I was told a tale of a gentleman whose love, fortitude, and patience were so praiseworthy that I must not suffer their memory to be lost."

NOVEL XVIII.

A lady tests the fidelity of a young student, her lover, before granting him her favours.

IN a certain town in France there lived a young seigneur of good family, who was attending the schools, desiring to acquire the knowledge which endows those of quality with honour and virtue. Though he had already made such progress in his studies that at the age of seventeen or eighteen he was a pattern for other students, Love failed not, nevertheless, to teach him other lessons. To make them more impressive and acceptable, that sly instructor concealed himself under the face and in the eyes of the handsomest lady in the country, who had come to town on business connected with a lawsuit. Before Love employed the charms of this lady to subjugate the young seigneur, he had gained her heart by letting her see the perfections of the gentleman, who for good looks, pleasing manners, good sense, and a winning tongue, was not surpassed by anyone. You who know what way this fire makes in a little time, when once it has begun to burn the outworks of a heart, will easily imagine that love was not long in rendering himself master of two such accomplished subjects, and so filling them with his light that their thoughts, wishes, and words were but the flame of that love. The natural timidity of youth made the gallant press his suit with all possible gentleness. But it was not necessary to do violence to the fair one, since love had already vanquished her. Modesty, nevertheless, that inseparable companion of the ladies, obliged her to conceal the sentiments of her heart as long as she could. But at last the citadel of the heart, wherein honour has its dwelling, was so breached that the poor lady gave her consent to what she had never been loth to. Still, in order to put the patience, fortitude, and passion of her lover to the proof, she surrendered only on one very difficult condition ; on his fulfilling which, she assured him that she would always love him most truly ; but if he failed in it, she would do quite the reverse. The condition she proposed was this : she would condescend to talk with him, both being in bed together en chemise, but he was to ask nothing of her beyond kisses and sweet words ; and he, thinking there was no joy comparable to that which she offered him, accepted the condition without hesitation.

That night the compact was fulfilled. It was in vain she caressed him ; he would never break his word, however sharply he felt the promptings of nature. Though he was fully assured that the pains of purgatory were not a whit worse than those he endured, yet his love was so great, and his hopes so strong, that, counting on the perpetual affection it cost him so much to secure, he triumphed by his patience, and got up from beside her just as he laid down. The fair one, more astonished, I rather think, than pleased at such extraordinary forbearance, took it into her head either that his love was not so great as he said, or that he had not found in her all the attractions he had expected ; for she made no account at all of the propriety, patience, and religious fidelity of her lover. She resolved, therefore, before she surrendered, to put the love he professed for her once more to the proof. To this end she requested him to gallant a girl she had in her service, one who was very good-looking, and much younger than herself, in order that persons who saw him come so often to her house might suppose that he came for the sake of the girl, and not of herself. The young seigneur, who flattered himself that he had inspired as much love as he harboured in his own bosom, did all that was required of him, and made love to the girl in obedience to her mistress's desire ; and the girl, pleased with the addresses of so handsome a youth, who had such a seductive tongue, believed all he said to her, and was in love with him in earnest.

The mistress, seeing that things had come to this pass, and that her lover desisted none the more from pressing her to fulfil her promise, admitted to him that, after having put his love to such severe proofs, it was but just that she should recompense his constancy and submissiveness ; accordingly, she promised to meet him an hour after midnight. I need not tell you whether or not the impassioned lover was transported with joy, and was punctual to the assignation. But the fair one, in order to put the force of his passion to a new trial, said to her demoiselle, "I know the love of Seigneur Such-a-one for you, and I know that you are no less in love with him. I take such an interest in your happiness that I have resolved to contrive means for you both to enjoy a long conversation together in private and at your ease." The demoiselle was in such ecstasy that she could not dissemble her passion, and, in obedience to her mistress's directions, lay down alone on a handsome bed. The mistress then, leaving large candles lighted, the better to display the girl's beauty, and the door open, pretended to go away, but contrived to hide herself near the bed so cunningly that she could not be discovered. The lover, expecting to find her as she had promised, stole softly into the room at the appointed hour, shut the door, undressed, and got into bed. No sooner had he stretched out his arms to embrace his mistress, as he supposed, than the poor girl, who believed him to be all her own, threw her arms round his neck, and spoke to him with such affection, and with such a charming countenance, that there is not a holy hermit in the world but would have forgotten his paternosters for her sake. But when he recognized her form and her face, the love that had made him get so quickly into bed made him jump out of it still more hastily, on finding that his bedfellow was not she who had made him sigh so long. Vexed then alike with the mistress and the maid, "Your folly," he said, "and the malice of her who put you there, cannot make me other than I am. Try to be an honest woman; for you shall not lose your good name through me." So saying, he flung himself out of the room in huge dudgeon,

The poor girl, believing him to be all her own, threw her arms around his neck.

Photographed from Life.

and it was a long time before he again visited his mistress.

Love, however, who is never without hope, suggested to him that the greater his constancy, and the more it was made known by such decisive experiments, the longer and more blissful would be his enjoyment. The lady, who had witnessed all, was so delighted and so surprised at the excess and firmness of his love, that she was impatient to see him again, in order to make amends for the sufferings she had inflicted upon him in testing his affection. The moment she saw him she spoke to him so graciously, and with such tenderness, that he not only forgot all he had undergone, but even rejoiced at it, seeing that his mistress honoured his constancy, and was convinced of the sincerity of his love. He had no more disappointments to complain of; his services and his love were crowned, and he obtained from the fair one thenceforth all his heart could wish for.

Show me, ladies, if you can, a woman who has evinced the same firmness, patience, and fidelity in love as this gentleman. Those who have been exposed to the like temptations think those which painters assign to St. Anthony very trivial in comparison. For he who can be chaste and patient in spite of the temptations of beauty, love, opportunity, and the absence of all hindrance, may rely on having virtue enough to overcome all the devils in hell.

"It is a pity," said Oisille, "that the gentleman did not address his love to a lady as virtuous as himself; it would then have been the most decorous and perfect I ever heard of."

"Tell me," said Geburon, "which of this gentleman's two trials do you think was the more difficult?"

"The last, I think," said Parlamente; "for resentment and anger are the most terrible of all temptations."

Longarine said she thought that the first was the most arduous of the two; for in order to keep his promise, he had to be victorious over love and over himself.

"You talk at random," said Simontault; "but we, who know something about the matter, may be allowed to say what we think of it. For my part, I say that he was a fool the first time, and a blockhead the second. It is my belief that, in keeping his word to his mistress, he made her suffer as much as himself, or more. She only exacted that promise from him to make herself appear a better conducted woman than she really was; for she could not but know that there is no command, or oath, or anything else in the world, which is capable of stopping the headlong impulses of a violent love. She was very glad to cover her vice under an appearance of virtue, and make believe that she was accessible for nothing beneath a heroic virtue. He was a blockhead the second time to leave her who loved him, and was worth more than the other, especially when he had so good an excuse as the provocation he had received."

"I say quite the contrary," interrupted Dagoucín. "The first time he showed himself firm, patient, and a man of his word; and the second time, faithful, and loving to perfection."

"And who knows," said Saffredent, "but he was one of those whom a chapter names de frigidis et maleficiatis?* But that nothing might be wanting to the glory of this hero, Hircan ought to have acquainted us if he did his duty when he got what he wanted. We should then have been able to judge whether he was so chaste through virtue or through impotence."

* This is an allusion to the penalties pronounced by several councils, and repeated in the Capitularies and the Decretals of Pope Boniface VIII., against those who were supposed guilty of having by magical practices deprived a bridegroom of the power of consummating his nuptials.

"You may be sure," said Hircan, "that if I had been told this, I should not have concealed it any more than the rest. But knowing as I do the man and his temperament, I attribute his conduct to the force of his love, and not at all to impotence or coldness."

"If that is the case," said Saffredent, "he ought to have laughed at his promise. Had the fair one been offended at his doing so, it would not have been very hard to appease her."

"But, perhaps," said Ennasuite, "she would not then have consented."

"That's a fine idea!" cried Saffredent. "Was he not strong enough to force her, since she had given him the opportunity?"

"Holy Mary!" exclaimed Nomerfide, "how you talk! Is that the way to win the good graces of a lady who is believed to be chaste and modest?"

"It seems to me," replied Saffredent, "that one cannot do more honour to a woman of whom one desires to have that sort of thing than to take it by force, for there is not the pettiest demoiselle of them all but dearly loves to be long wooed and entreated. There are some who can only be won by dint of presents; others are so stupid that they are hardly pregnable on any side. With these latter, one must think of nothing but how to hit upon the means of having them. But when one has to do with a dame so wary that one cannot deceive her, and so good that she is not to be come at either by presents or by fair words, is it not allowable to try all possible means of success? Whenever you hear that a man has forced a woman, you may be sure that she had left him no other means to accomplish his ends ; and you ought not to think the worse of a man who has risked his life to satisfy his love."

"I have seen in my time," said Geburon, laughing, "places besieged and taken by storm, because there was no means of bringing the governors to terms either by money or threats ; for they say that a fortress which treats is half taken."

"One would think," said Ennasuite, "that love is built only upon these follies. There have been many who have loved constantly with other intentions."

"If you know one such instance," said Hircan, "tell it us."

"I know one," said Ennasuite, "which I will willingly relate."

NOVEL XIX.

Two lovers, in despair at being hindered from marrying, turn monk and nun.

IN the time of the Marquis of Mantua, who had married the sister of the Duke of Ferrara, there was in the service of the duchess a demoiselle named Pauline, so much loved by a gentleman who was in the service of the marquis that everyone was surprised at the excess of his passion ; for being poor, but a handsome man, and, moreover, in great favour with the marquis, it was thought that he ought to attach himself to a lady who had wealth enough for them both : but he regarded Pauline as the greatest of all treasures, which he hoped to make his own by marriage. The marchioness, who loved Pauline, and wished that she should make a wealthier match, dissuaded her from this one as much as she could, and often hindered the lovers from seeing each other, telling them that if they married they would be the poorest and most miserable couple in Italy. But the gentleman could not admit the validity of this argument. Pauline, on her part, dissembled her love as much as she could; but she only thought of it the more for all that. Their courtship was long, and they hoped their fortune would mend in time.

While they were awaiting this happy change, war broke out, and the gentleman was made prisoner, along with a Frenchman who was as much in love in his own country as the other was in Italy. Being fellows in misfortune, they began reciprocally to communicate their secrets. The Frenchman told his companion that his heart was captive, without saying to whom; but as they were both in the service of the Marquis of Mantua, the Frenchman knew that his comrade loved Pauline, and, having his interest at heart, advised him to abandon that connection. This the Italian vowed it was impossible for him to do, and added that, unless the Marquis of Mantua, in recompense for his imprisonment and his good services, bestowed his mistress upon him at his return, he would turn Cordelier, and never serve any other master than God. The Frenchman, who saw in him no signs of religion, with the exception of his devotion to Pauline, could not believe that he spoke in earnest. At the end of nine months the Frenchman was set at liberty, and exerted himself to such effect that he procured that of his comrade also, who immediately on his liberation renewed his importunities to the marquis and the marchioness for their sanction to his marriage with Pauline. It was in vain they represented to him the poverty to which they would both be reduced ; the relations on both sides, who would not consent to the match, forbade him to speak any more to Pauline, in hopes that absence and impossibility would cure him of his headstrong passion : but all this was unavailing to change his feelings. Seeing himself forced to submit, he asked leave of the marquis and marchioness to bid farewell to Pauline, after which he would see her no more, and his request was forthwith granted.

“ Since heaven and earth are against us,” said he to Pauline when they met, “ and we are not only forbidden to marry, but even to see each other, the marquis and marchioness, our master and mistress, who exact such a cruel kind of obedience of us, may boast of having with one word smitten two hearts, whose bodies can henceforth only languish to death. By so unfeeling a mandate they plainly show that they have never known love or pity. I know well that their purpose is to see us both prosperously established in wealthy marriages ; but they know not that people are truly rich only when they are content. However, they have so wronged and incensed me that it is impossible I should remain in their service. I have no doubt that if I had never talked of marrying you, they would not have carried their scruples so far as to forbid our speaking to each other ; but as for me, I can assure you that, having long loved you so honestly and truly, I shall continue to love you all my life. And forasmuch as seeing you I could not endure the monstrous hardship of not being allowed to speak to you, and not seeing you, my heart, which could not remain void, would be filled with a despair which might end fatally for me, I have for a long time resolved to retreat into the cloister. Not but that I well know one may work out his salvation in any condition of life ; but I believe that in these retreats one has more leisure to meditate on the greatness of the Divine goodness, which will have pity, I trust, on the faults of my youth, and dispose my heart to love the things of heaven as much as I have loved those of earth. If God gives me the grace to be able to obtain his, my continual occupation will be to pray for you. I entreat you, by the faithful and constant love we have borne to one another, to remember me in your prayers, and to beseech the Lord to give me as much constancy, when I cease to see you, as He gave me gladness in beholding you. As I have hoped all my life to have from you through marriage what honour and conscience allow, and have contented myself with that hope, now that I lose it, and can never be treated by you as a husband, I entreat that, in bidding me farewell, you will treat me as a brother, and let me kiss you."

Poor Pauline, who had manifested rigour enough towards him, seeing the extremity of his grief and the reasonableness of his request, which was so moderate under such circumstances, could only reply by throwing herself in tears on his neck. So overcome was she that speech, sense, and motion failed her, and she fainted in his arms, whilst love, sorrow, and pity produced the same effect on him. One of Pauline's companions, who saw them fall, called for help, and they were recovered by force of remedies. Pauline, who wished to hide her affection, was ashamed when she was aware how vehemently she had suffered it to display itself ; however, she found a good excuse in the commiseration she had felt for the gentleman. That heart-broken lover, unable to utter the words, "Farewell for ever !" hurried away to his chamber, fell like a corpse on his bed, and passed the night in such bitter lamentations that his servant supposed he had lost all his relations and friends, and all he was worth in the world. Next morning he commended himself to our Lord, and after dividing the little he possessed among his domestics, only retaining a very small sum of money for his immediate use, he forbade his servants to follow him, and wended his way alone to the convent of the Observance, to ask for the monastic habit, with the determination of wearing none other as long as he lived. The warden, who had known him formerly, thought at first that he was joking, or that he himself was dreaming; indeed, there was not a man in all the country who had less the look of a Cordelier, or was better gifted with the graces and endowments which one could desire to see in a gentleman. But after having heard him, and seen him shed floods of tears, the source of which was unknown to him, the warden kindly received him as a guest, and soon afterwards, seeing his perseverance, he gave him the robe of the order, which the poor gentleman received with great devotion.

The marquis and marchioness were made acquainted with this event, and were so much surprised at it that they could hardly believe it. Pauline, to show that she was without passion, did her best to dissemble her regret for her lover, and succeeded so well that everybody said she had forgotten him, whilst all the time she would fain have fled to some hermitage, to shun all commerce with the world. But one day, when she went to hear mass at the Observance with her mistress, when the priest, the deacon, and the sub-deacon issued from the vestry to go to the high altar, her lover, who had not yet completed the year of his noviciate, served as acolyte, and led the procession, carrying in both hands the two canettes covered with silk-cloth, and walking with downcast eyes. Pauline, seeing him in that garb, which augmented rather than diminished his good looks, was so surprised and confused that, to conceal the real cause of her heightened colour, she began to cough. At that sound, which he recognized better than the bells of his monastery, the poor lover durst not turn his head ; but as he passed before her, he could not hinder his eyes from taking the direction to which they had been so long used. Whilst gazing sadly on his mistress, the fire he had thought almost extinct blazed up so fiercely within him that, making an effort beyond his strength to conceal it, he fell full length on the floor. His fear lest the cause of this accident should be known prompted him to say that the floor of the church, which was broken at that spot, had thrown him down. Pauline perceived from this circumstance that he had not changed his heart along with his habit ; and believing that, as it was now so long since he had retired from the world, everyone imagined she had forgotten him, she resolved to put into execution her long-meditated design of following her lover's example.

Having now been more than fourteen months privily making all necessary arrangements previous to her taking the veil, she one morning asked leave of the marchioness to go to hear mass at the convent of St. Claire. Her mistress granted this request without knowing why it was preferred. Calling at the Franciscan monastery on her way, Pauline begged the warden to let her see her lover, whom she called her relation. She saw him in private, in a chapel, and said to him, " If I could with honour have retired to the cloister as soon as you, I should have been there long ago. But now that by my patience I have prevented the remarks of those who put a bad construction upon everything rather than a good one, I am resolved to renounce the world, and adopt the order, habit, and life which you have chosen. If you fare well,

I shall have my part ; and if you fare ill, I do not wish to be exempt. I desire to go to Paradise by the same road as you, being assured that the Being who is supremely perfect, and alone worthy to be called Love, has drawn us to his service by means of an innocent and reasonable affection, which He will convert entirely to himself through His Holy Spirit. Let us both forget this perishing body, which is of the old Adam, to receive and put on that of Jesus Christ, who is our spirit."

The cowed lover wept with joy to hear her express such a holy desire, and did his utmost to confirm it. "Since I can never hope for more than the satisfaction of seeing you," he said, "I esteem it a great blessing that I am in a place where I may always have opportunity to see you. Our conversations will be such that we shall both be the better for them, loving as we shall do with one love, one heart, one mind, led by the goodness of God, whom I pray to hold us in His good hands, in which no one perishes." So saying, and weeping with love and joy, he kissed her hands ; but she stooped her face as low as her hand, and they exchanged the kiss of love in true charity.

From the Franciscan monastery, Pauline went straight to the convent of St. Claire, where she was received and veiled. Once there, she sent word to her mistress, who, hardly crediting such strange news, went to see her next day, and did all she could to dissuade her from her purpose. The only reply she received from Pauline was that she ought to be satisfied with having deprived her of a husband of flesh, the only man in the world she had ever loved, without seeking likewise to separate her from Him who is immortal and invisible, which neither she nor all the creatures on earth could do. The marchioness, seeing her so strong in her pious resolution, kissed her, and left her in her convent with extreme regret.

These two persons lived afterwards such holy and devout lives that it cannot be doubted that He whose law is charity said to them at the end of their course, as to Mary Magdalen, "Your sins are forgiven, since you have loved so much," and removed them in peace to the blessed abode where the recompense infinitely surpassed all human merits.

You cannot but own, ladies, that the man's love was the greater of the two ; but it was so well repaid that I would all those who love were so richly recompensed.

"In that case, there would be more fools than ever," said Hircan.

"Do you call it folly," said Oisille, "to love virtuously in youth, and then to centre all our love in God?"

"If despite and despair are laudable," replied Hircan, laughing, "then I must say that Pauline and her lover are worthy of high praise."

"Yet God has many ways of attracting us to Him," said Geburon ; "and though their beginnings seem bad, their end is, nevertheless, very good."

"I believe," said Parlamente, "that no one ever perfectly loved God who did not perfectly love some of his creatures in this world."

"What do you call loving perfectly?" said Saffredent. "Do you believe that those enamoured cataleptics who worship ladies at a hundred paces' distance, without daring to speak out, love perfectly?"

"I call perfect lovers," replied Parlamente, "those who seek in what they love some perfection, be it goodness, beauty, or charming demeanour ; who aim always at virtue, and whose hearts are so noble and so spotless that they would rather lose their lives than devote them to low things forbidden by honour and conscience ; for the soul which is created only to return to its sovereign good, so long as it is imprisoned in the body, does but long to arrive at that high destination. But because the senses, which can give its views thereof, are obscured and carnal since the sin of our first parents, they can only present to it those visible objects which approach nearest to perfection. In that direction the soul rushes forth, and thinks to find in outward beauty, in visible graces, and in moral virtues, the supreme beauty, grace, and virtue. But after having sought and proved them, and not found what it loves, the soul lets them go, and passes on its way, like the child who loves apples, pears, dolls, and other trivial things, the handsomest it can see, and thinks that to amass little pebbles is to be wealthy ; but as it grows up it loves living dolls, and amasses things necessary to human life. After a longer experience has shown it that there is neither perfection nor felicity in the things of this earth, it seeks the true felicity, and Him who is its source and principle. Still, if God did not open the eyes of its faith, it would be in danger of passing from ignorance to infidel philosophy ; for it is faith alone that demonstrates and makes the soul receive that good which the carnal and animal man cannot know."

"Do you not see," said Longarine, "that even the uncultivated ground, which produces only trees and useless herbs, is, nevertheless, an object of desire, in the hope that when it is well cultivated and sown it will produce good grain ? In like manner, the heart of man, which is conscious only of visible things, will never arrive at the condition of loving God but through the seed of the Word ; for that heart is a sterile, cold, and corrupted soil."

"Thence it comes," said Saffredent, "that most doctors are not spiritual, because they never love anything but good wine and ugly sluts of chambermaids, without making trial of what it is to love honourable ladies."

"If I could speak Latin well," said Simontault, "I would quote St. John to you, who says, 'He who loves not his brother whom he sees, how shall he love God whom he doth not see?' In loving visible things, one comes to love things invisible."

"Tell us where is the man so perfect as you describe, et laudabimus eum," said Ennasuite.

"There are such men," replied Dagoucin; "men who love so strongly and so perfectly that they would rather die than entertain desires contrary to the honour and conscience of their mistresses, and who yet would not have either them or others be aware of their sentiments."

"These men are like the chameleon, who lives on air," observed Saffredent. "There is no man in the world but is very glad to have it known that he loves, and delighted to know that he is loved. Also, I am convinced, that there is no fever of affection so strong but passes off as soon as one knows the contrary. For my part, I have seen palpable miracles in that way."

"I beg, then," said Ennasuite, "that you will take my place, and tell us a story of some one who has been restored from death to life by having discovered in his mistress the reverse of what he desired."

"I am so much afraid," said Saffredent, "of displeasing the ladies, whose most humble servant I have always been, and always shall be, that without an express command I should not have dared to speak of their imperfections. But, in token of obedience, I will speak the truth."

NOVEL XX.

A gentleman finds his mistress in the arms of her groom, and is cured at once of his love.

AT one time there lived in Dauphiné a gentleman named the Seigneur De Riant, of the household of King Francis I., and one of the best-looking and best-bred men of his day. He paid his court for a long time to a widow, whom he loved and respected so much that, for fear of losing her good graces, he durst not ask of her that which he longed for with the utmost passion. As he was conscious of being a handsome man and well worthy of being loved, he firmly believed what she often swore to him—namely, that she loved him above all men in the world; and that if she were constrained to do anything for any one, it would be for him alone, who was the most accomplished gentleman she had ever known. She begged he would content himself with this, and not attempt to exceed the limits of decorous friendship, assuring him that, upon the least symptom of his craving anything more, she should be lost to him for ever.

The poor gentleman not only contented himself with these fine words, but even deemed himself happy in having won the heart of a person he believed to be so virtuous. It would be an endless affair to give you a circumstantial detail of his love, of the long intercourse he had with her, and of the journeys he made to see her. Enough to say that this poor martyr to a fire so pleasing that the more one is burned by it the more one likes to be burned, daily sought the means of aggravating his martyrdom. One day he was seized with a desire to travel post to see her whom he loved better than himself, and whom he prized above all the women in the world. On arriving at her house he asked where she was. They told him she had just come back from vespers, and was gone to take a turn in the warren to finish her devotions. He dismounts, goes straight to the warren, and meets her woman, who tells him that she is gone to walk alone in the great alley. Upon this he began to hope more than ever for some good fortune, and continued to search for her as softly as possible, desiring above all things to steal upon her when she was alone. But on coming to a charming pleached arbour, in his impatience to behold his adored, he darted into it abruptly, and what did he see then but the lady stretched on the grass, in the arms of a groom, as ugly, nasty, and disreputable as De Riant was all the reverse. I will not pretend to describe his indignation at so unexpected a spectacle ; I will only say it was so great that in an instant it extinguished his long-cherished flame. "Much good may it do you, madam," said he, as full of resentment as he had been of love. "I am now cured and delivered of the continual anguish which your fancied virtue had caused me ;" and without another word, he turned on his heel and went back faster than he had come. The poor woman had not a word to say for herself, and could only put her hands over her face, that as she could not cover her shame she might at least cover her eyes, and not see him who saw her but too plainly, notwithstanding her long dissimulation.

So, ladies, unless you choose to love perfectly, never think of dissembling with a proper man, and giving him displeasure for sake of your own glory ; for hypocrisy is paid as it deserves, and God favours those who love frankly.*

“It must be confessed,” said Oisille, “that you have kept something good in reserve for us to the end of the day. If we were not pledged to tell the truth, I could not believe that a woman of such a station could have forgotten herself so much as to quit so handsome a gentleman for a nasty groom.”

“If you knew, madam,” replied Hircan, “the difference there is between a gentleman who has all his life worn harness and followed the army, and a servant who has led a sedentary life and been well fed, you would excuse this poor widow.”

“Say what you will,” rejoined Oisille, “I doubt that you would admit any excuse for her.”

“I have heard,” said Simontault, “that there are women who are very glad to have apostles to preach up their virtue and their chastity ; they treat them with the most gracious kindness and familiarity, and assure them they would grant them what they sue for, did conscience and honour permit it. When the poor dupes are in company they talk of these excellent ladies, and swear they would put their hands in the fire if they are not women of virtue, relying on the proof they think they have personally obtained for their assertion. But the ladies thus praised by these simple gentlemen show themselves in their real colours to those who are like themselves, and choose for the objects on whom they bestow their favours

* This is a very old story, though told by the Queen of Navarre with name and date, as one of her own time. It occurs in the introduction to the Arabian Nights, in the eighteenth canto of the Orlando Furioso, and in the novels of Morlini, the first edition of which was printed at Naples in 1520. La Fontaine has put it at the beginning of his tale of Joconde.

men who have not the boldness to tell tales, and of so abject a condition that, even were they to blab, they would not be believed."

"I have heard the same thing said before by extravagantly jealous folk," said Longarine. "But surely this is what may be called painting a chimera; for though such a thing may have happened to one wretched woman, is it thence to be inferred that all women do the same thing?"

"The more we talk on this subject," said Parlamente, "the more we shall be maligned. We had better go hear vespers, that we may not keep the monks waiting for us as we did yesterday."

This proposal was unanimously agreed to.

"If anyone," said Oisille, as they were walking back to the monastery, "gives thanks to God for having told the truth to-day, Saffredent ought to implore his pardon for having told such a villanous tale against the ladies."

"I give you my oath," said Saffredent, "that although I have only spoken upon hearsay, what I have told you is, nevertheless, the strict truth. But if I choose to tell you what I could relate of women from my own knowledge, you would make more signs of the cross than they do in consecrating a church."

"Since you have so bad an opinion of women," said Parlamente, "they ought to banish you from their society."

"There are some who have so well practised what you advise," he replied, "that if I could say worse of them, and do worse to them all, to excite them to avenge me on her who does me so much injustice, I should not be slow to do so."

While he was speaking, Parlamente put on her half-mask and went with the rest into the church, where they found that although the bell had been rung for vespers there were no monks to say them. The fathers had been apprised of the agreeable manner in which the company spent their time in the meadow, and being fonder of pleasure than of their prayers, they had gone and crouched down there in a ditch behind a very thick hedge, and had listened to the tales with so much attention that they had not heard the vesper-bell. The consequence was that they came running in with such haste that they were quite out of breath when they should have begun vespers. After service, some of the company inquiring of them why they had come in so late and chanted so badly, they confessed the cause ; and for the future they were allowed to listen behind the hedge, and to sit at their ease. The supper was a merry one ; and during it were uttered such things as any of the company had forgotten to deliver in the meadow. This filled up the rest of the evening, until Oisille begged them to retire, that they might prepare for the morrow, saying that an hour before midnight was better than three after it. There upon they sought their respective chambers, and so ended the second day.

THIRD DAY.

EARLY as it was next morning when the company assembled in the refectory, they found Madame Oisille already there. She had been meditating for half an hour on what she was to read to them; and so intent were they upon listening to her that they did not hear the bell, and a monk had to come and tell them that high mass was about to begin. After hearing mass and dining soberly, in order to have their memories more clear, they all retired to their chambers to review their several repertoires of tales previously to the next meeting in the meadow. Those who had some droll story to tell were already so merry that one could not look in their faces without being prepared beforehand for a hearty laugh. When all were seated, they asked Saffredent to whom he addressed his call. "The fault I committed yesterday," he said, "being as you say so great, and knowing not how to repair it, I call on Parlamente. Her excellent sense will enable her to praise the ladies in such a manner as will make you forget the truth I have told you."

"I do not undertake to repair your faults," replied Parlamente; "but I will take good care not to imitate them. To this end, without departing from the truth we have pledged ourselves to speak, I will show you that there are ladies who in their love have had no other end in view than virtue and honour. As the lady of whom I have to speak is of a good family, I will change nothing in her story but the names. You will see, ladies, from what I am going to narrate, that love can make no change in a chaste and virtuous heart."

NOVEL XXI.

Virtuous love of a young lady of quality and a bastard of an illustrious house—Hindrance of their marriage by a queen—Sage reply of the demoiselle to the queen—Her subsequent marriage.

THERE was a queen in France who had in her household several young ladies of good birth, and among the rest one named Rolandine, who was her near relation. But the queen, being displeased with this young lady's father, punished the innocent for the guilty, and behaved not very well to Rolandine. Though this young lady was neither a great beauty nor the reverse, such was the propriety of her demeanour and the sweetness of her disposition, that many great lords sought her in marriage, but obtained no reply, for Rolandine's father was so fond of his money that he neglected the establishment of his daughter. On the other hand, she was so little in favour of her mistress that she was not wooed by those who wished to ingratiate themselves with the queen. Thus, through the negligence of her father and the disdain of her mistress, this poor young lady remained long unmarried. At last she took this sorely to heart, not so much from eagerness to be married, as from shame at not being so. Her grief reached such a pitch that she forsook the pomp and mundane pursuits of the court to occupy herself only with prayer and some little handiworks. In this tranquil manner she passed her youth, leading the most blameless and devout of lives.

When she was approaching her thirtieth year, she became acquainted with a gentleman, a bastard of an illustrious house, and one of the best-bred men of his day, but ill endowed by fortune, and of so little comeliness that no one but herself would have readily chosen him for a lover. As this poor gentleman had remained solitary like herself, and as the unfortunate naturally seek each other's society, he one day accosted Rolandine. There being a strong similitude between them in point of temperament and fortune, they poured their griefs into each other's ears, and that was the beginning of a very intimate friendship between them. Seeing that they both laboured under the same misfortune, they everywhere sought each other out for mutual consolation, and thus they became more and more attached to each other to an extraordinary degree. Those who had known Rolandine so coy that she would hardly speak to anyone were shocked to see her every moment with the bastard, and told her gouvernante that she ought not to permit such long conversations. The gouvernante spoke to Rolandine on the subject, telling her that it was taken amiss that she should be on such familiar terms with a man who was neither rich enough to marry her, nor good-looking enough to be loved. Rolandine, who had hitherto been reproved for her austerity rather than for her mundane ways, replied, "You see, mother, that I cannot have a husband of my own quality. I have hitherto always attached myself to the young and good-looking; but as I am afraid of falling into the pit into which I have seen so many fall, I now attach myself to this gentleman, who, as you know, is so correct and so virtuous that he never talks to me but of seemly things. What harm, then, do I do to you, and to those who make a talk about it, consoling my sorrows by means of an innocent converse?"

The poor woman, who loved her mistress more than herself, made answer, "I see plainly, mademoiselle, that you are right, and that your father and your mistress do not treat you as you deserve. But since this acquaintance gives rise to remarks which are not to the advantage of your honour, you ought to break it off, though the man were your own brother."

"I will do so, since such is your advice," replied Rolandine, weeping, "but it is very hard to have no consolation in the world."

The bastard came to see her as usual, but, with tears in her eyes, she related to him in detail all that her gouvernante had said to her, and begged him not to visit her any more until this tattle should have subsided; and he complied with her entreaty. Both of them having lost their consolation through this separation, they began to feel an uneasiness such as neither had ever before experienced. Her whole time was spent in prayer, fasting, and journeying; for the sentiment of love, so totally new to her, caused her such agitation that she did not know a moment's rest. The bastard was not in a much better plight; but as he had made up his mind to love her and try to obtain her for a wife, and saw that it would be a very glorious thing for him to succeed in the attempt, his only thought was how he should press his suit, and how he should secure the gouvernante in his interest. To this end he represented to her the deplorable condition of her mistress, who was wilfully deprived of all consolation. The good woman thanked him with tears for the interest he took in her mistress's welfare, and cast about with him for means to enable him to have an interview with her. It was arranged between them that Rolandine should pretend to be troubled with a headache, which made all noise insupportable to her; and that when her companions left her in her chamber, the bastard and she might remain alone, and converse together without restraint. The bastard, delighted with the expedient, gave himself up entirely to the guidance of the gouvernante, and in this way he was enabled to talk with his mistress whenever he pleased.

But this pleasure was not of long duration ; for the queen, who disliked Rolandine, asked what she was doing in her chamber. Some one replied that she had a headache ; but somebody else, either disliking her absence or wishing to cause her annoyance, said that the pleasure she took in conversing with the bastard would be sure to cure her headache. The queen, who regarded as mortal sins in Rolandine what would have been venial sins in others, sent for her, and forbade her ever to speak to the bastard, except in her own chamber or hall. Rolandine professed obedience, and replied, that had she known that the bastard, or anyone else, was displeasing to her majesty, she would never have spoken to him. At the same time, she was inwardly resolved to find out some other expedient, of which the queen should know nothing. As she fasted on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, and did not quit her chamber, she took care to be visited on those days by the bastard, whom she was beginning to love greatly, and had time to talk with him in presence of her gouvernante whilst the others were at supper. The less time they had at their disposal, the more fervid and impassioned was their language ; for they stole the time for mutual conversation, as the thief steals something precious. But there is no secret which is not found out at last. A varlet, having seen the bastard come in one day, mentioned it in a place where it failed not to be repeated, till it reached the ears of the queen, who put herself into such a towering passion that the bastard never afterwards durst enter the chamber of the demoiselles. He often pretended to go a journey, in order to have opportunity to see the object of his affections, and every evening he used to return to the chapel of the château, dressed sometimes as a Cordelier, sometimes as a Jacobin, and always so well disguised that no one knew him except Rolandine and her gouvernante, who failed not at once to accost the good father.

The bastard, feeling assured that Rolandine loved him, did not scruple to say to her one day, "You see, mademoiselle, to what I expose myself for your service, and how the queen has forbidden you to speak to me. You see, too, that nothing is farther from your father's thoughts than disposing of you in marriage. He has refused so many good offers that I know no one far or near who can have you. I know that I am poor, and that you could not marry a gentleman who was not richer than myself; but if to have a great deal of love were to be rich, I should think myself the most opulent man in the world. God has given you great wealth, and the expectation of still greater. If I were so happy as to be chosen by you for your husband, I would be all my life your spouse, your friend, and your servant. If you marry one who is your own equal—and such a one, I think, will not easily be found—he will insist on being the master, and will have more regard to your wealth than to your person, to beauty than to virtue; he will enjoy your wealth, and will not treat you as you deserve. My longing to enjoy this contentment, and my fear that you will have none with another, oblige me to entreat that you will make me happy, and yourself the best-satisfied and best-treated wife in the world."

Rolandine, hearing from her lover's lips the declaration she had made up her mind to address to him, replied, with a glad face, "I rejoice that you have anticipated me, and have said to me what I have long resolved to say to you. Ever since I have known you, now two years, not a moment has passed in which I have not thought over all the arguments that could be adduced in your favour and against you; but at last, having resolved to engage in matrimony, it is time that I should make a beginning, and choose the man with whom I think I can pass my life with most quiet and satisfaction. I have had as suitors men of good figure, wealthy, and of high birth; but you are the only one with whom it seems to me that my heart and mind can best agree. I know that in marrying you I do not offend God, but that, on the contrary, I do what he commands. As for my father, he has so much neglected the duty of establishing me, and has rejected so many opportunities, that the law empowers me to marry without his having a right to disinherit me; but even should I have nothing but what belongs to myself, I shall esteem myself the happiest woman in the world in having such a husband as you. As for the queen, my mistress, I need make no scruple of disobeying her to obey God, since she has not scrupled to frustrate all the advantages that offered themselves to me during my youth. But to prove to you that my love for you is founded on honour and virtue, I require your promise that, in case I consent to the marriage you propose, you will not ask to consummate it until after the death of my father, or until I shall have found means to obtain his consent."

The bastard having promised this with alacrity, they gave each other a ring in pledge of marriage, and exchanged kisses in the church before God, whom they called to witness their mutual promise; and never afterwards was there anything between them of a more intimate nature than kisses. This slight satisfaction quite contented these two perfect lovers, who were a long time without seeing each other, or ever giving way to mutual suspicion. There was hardly a place where honour was to be acquired to which the bastard did not repair, being assured that he could never be poor, since God had bestowed on him a rich wife ; and she, during his absence, so faithfully preserved that perfect affection for him, that she made no account of any other man. There were some who sought her in marriage, and had for answer that, having been so long unmarried, she was resolved to remain so forever. This reply obtained such publicity that it reached the ears of the queen, who asked her the reason of such language. Rolandine replied that it was dictated by obedience ; that she well knew her majesty had never chosen to marry her when very advantageous matches had offered ; and that age and patience had taught her to be content with her present condition. Whenever marriage was mentioned to her, she always replied to the same effect.

The war being ended, and the bastard having returned to court, she did not speak to him before others, but always in the church under pretext of confession, for the queen had forbidden both of them, on pain of their lives, ever to converse except in public. But virtuous love, which fears no prohibitions, was more ingenious in suggesting to them means and opportunity to meet and converse than their enemies in hindering them. There was no monastic habit which the bastard did not successively assume ; and by that means their intercourse was always agreeably maintained, until the king went to one of his country seats near Tours, which was so situated that the ladies could not go on foot to any other church than that of the château, which had such an exposed confessional that the confessor would have easily been recognized. But as often as one opportunity failed them, love furnished them with another. At that very time there came to the court a lady nearly related to the bastard. She and her son were lodged in the king's residence ; and the young prince had a projecting chamber, detached as it were from the king's apartments, and so placed that from his window one could see and speak to Rolandine, their windows being exactly at the angle of the main building and the wing. The chamber which was over the king's hall was that of Rolandine and the other ladies of honour. Rolandine, having frequently seen the young prince at the window, sent word of the fact by her gouvernante to the bastard. The latter, having reconnoitred the ground, pretended to take great pleasure in reading the book of the Knights of the Round Table, which was one of those belonging to the prince ; and towards dinner-hour he used to beg a valet-de-chambre to let him in, and leave him shut up in the chamber to finish reading his book. The valet, knowing him to be his master's relation, and a gentleman to be trusted, let him read as much as he pleased. Rolandine, on her part, used to come to her window, and in order to be free to remain there the longer, she pretended to have a sore leg ; and she took her meals so early that she had no need to go to the table of the ladies of honour. She also bethought her of working at a crimson silk coverlet, which she hung at the window, where she was very glad to be left alone to converse with her husband, who spoke in such a manner that no one could overhear them. When he saw anyone coming she coughed, and made signs to the bastard to retire. Those who had orders to watch them were persuaded that there was no love between them, for she never quitted a chamber in which he certainly could not see her, the entrée being forbidden him.

The mother of the young prince, being one day in her son's chamber, placed herself at the window where lay the big book. Presently one of Rolandine's companions in office, who was at the window of their chamber, saluted the lady. The latter asked her how Rolandine was. The other replied that she should see her if she pleased, and made her come to the window in her nightcap. After some conversation about Rolandine's illness, both parties retired. The lady casting her eyes on the big book of the Round Table, said to the valet-de-chambre who had charge of it, "I am astonished that young people give up their time to reading such follies." The valet-de-chambre replied that he was still more surprised that persons of ripe years, and who passed for sensible people, were more attached to them than the young; and thereupon he told her, as a curious fact, how the bastard, her relation, spent four or five hours every day in reading that book. The lady at once guessed the reason, and ordered the valet-de-chambre to conceal himself, and watch narrowly what the bastard did. The valet-de-chambre executed his commission, and found that, instead of reading, the bastard planted himself at the window, and that Rolandine came and talked with him. He even overheard many expressions of their love, which they thought they had so well concealed. Next day, the valet having told his mistress what he had seen and heard, she sent for her cousin, the bastard, and after some sharp remonstrances, forbade him evermore to place himself at that window. In the evening she spoke to Rolandine, and threatened she would inform the queen if she persisted in that foolish attachment. Rolandine, without losing her presence of mind, replied that, whatever the lady might have been told, she had not spoken to the bastard since she had been prohibited from doing so by her mistress, as her companions and her servants could witness. As for the window of which the lady spoke, she had never talked there with the bastard.

The lover, now fearing lest his intrigue should be exposed, withdrew from the danger, and absented himself for a long time from court, but not without writing to Rolandine, which he managed to do with such address that, in spite of all the queen could do, Rolandine heard from him twice a week. In the first instance he employed a monk to convey his letters ; but this means failing, he sent a little page, dressed sometimes in one colour, sometimes in another. The page used to post himself at the places through which the ladies passed, and, mingling with the other servants, found means always to deliver his letters to Rolandine. The queen going into the country, one of those persons whom she had charged to be on the watch regarding this affair recognized the page, and ran after him ; but the page, who was a cunning lad, darted into the house of a poor woman, who was boiling her pot, and instantly thrust his letters into the fire. The gentleman who pursued him, having caught and stripped him naked, searched him all over, but, finding nothing, let him go. When the page was gone, the good woman asked the gentleman why he had searched the poor boy in that manner. He replied that it was because he believed the boy had letters about him. " You were not likely to find them," she said : " he had hidden them too well." " Where, pray ?" inquired the gentleman, who now made sure of having them. He was quite confounded when he heard that they were burnt, and saw that the page had been too clever for him. However, he went at once and told the queen what he had ascertained.

The bastard, not being able to employ the page any more, sent in his stead an old domestic, who, without caring for the threats of death which he well knew the queen had proclaimed against all who should meddle in this affair, undertook to convey the letters to Rolandine. Having entered the château, he stationed himself at a door which was at the foot of a great staircase used by all the ladies, but a valet, who had formerly known him, recognized him at once, and denounced him to the queen's maître d' hôtel, who gave orders for his instant arrest. The wary servant, seeing that he was watched, turned to the wall, under a certain pretence, tore his letters into the smallest possible pieces, and threw them behind the door. Immediately afterwards he was arrested and searched, but nothing being found on him, he was interrogated upon oath as to whether he had not carried letters. Nothing was left untried in the way of promises or threats to make him confess the truth, but, in spite of all they could do, they could never get anything out of him. The unsatisfactory result was reported to the queen ; but some one having thought of looking behind the door found there the fragments of the letters. The king's confessor was sent for ; and having arranged all the pieces on a table, he read the whole of the letter, in which the secret marriage was plainly revealed, for the bastard called Rolandine his wife. The queen, who was not of a humour to conceal her neighbour's fault, made a great noise about the matter ; and insisted on every means being employed to make the man confess the truth respecting the letter, the identity of which he could not deny ; but say to him or show him what they would, there was no possibility of making him avow anything. Those who had been commissioned in this matter took him to the edge of the river, and put him into a sack, telling him that he lied to God and the queen, contrary to the proved truth. Choosing rather to die than to betray his master, he asked for a confessor, and after having set his conscience right, he said to them, "I pray you, sir, to tell the bastard, my master, that I commend to him my wife and my children, and that I die with a good heart for his service. Do with me what you please, and be assured that you will never extract anything from me to my master's disadvantage." Then, to frighten him more, they threw him into the water shut up as he was in the sack, and shouted to him that his life should be saved if he would speak the truth; but seeing that he made no reply, they took him out of the water, and reported his firm behaviour to the queen. "Neither the king nor myself," said her majesty, "is so fortunate in servants as the bastard, who has not wherewithal to reward them." She did all she could to engage the worthy fellow in her service, but he would never quit his master, until the latter permitted him to enter the service of the queen, in which he lived happy and contented.

Having discovered the secret marriage by means of the intercepted letter, the queen sent for Rolandine, and with great violence of manner called her several times wretch instead of cousin, upbraiding her with the dishonour she had done to her house, and to her who was her mistress, in having thus married without her consent. Rolandine, who was long aware of the little kindness the queen entertained for her, fully returned that feeling. As there was no love between them, fear no longer availed; and as Rolandine saw plainly that a reprimand so publicly given was prompted less by regard for her than by the wish to put her to shame, and that the queen was more pleased in mortifying her than grieved to find her in fault, she replied, with an air as calm and composed as that of the queen was agitated and passionate, "If you did not know your own heart, madam, I would set before you the bad feeling you have long entertained towards my father and me; but you know it so well, that you will not be surprised to hear that it is not a secret for anybody. For my part, madam, I have seen and felt it to my cost. If you had been as kind to me as to those who are not so nearly related to you, I should now be married in a manner that would do honour both to you and to me; but you have forsaken me, and not shown me the least mark of favour, so that I have missed all the good offers I have had through my father's negligence and the little account you have made of me. This unkind treatment threw me into such despair that, if my health had been strong enough to endure the austerities of a convent, I would gladly have entered one to escape from the continual vexations which your harshness caused me. In the midst of this despondency I became acquainted with one who would be of as good a house as myself, if the love of two persons was as much esteemed as the matrimonial ring; for you know that his father would take precedence of mine. He has long loved and cheered me; but you, madam, who have never forgiven me the least fault, or praised any good act I may have done, though you knew by experience it was not my wont to talk of love and mundane vanities, and that I lived a more religious life than any other of your servants, you have not hesitated from the first to take offence at my speaking to a gentleman as unfortunate as myself, and in whose friendship I sought nothing else than consolation of mind. When I saw that I was entirely deprived of this, my despair was so great that I resolved to seek my repose with as much solicitude as you took to deprive me of it. From that very hour we interchanged promises of marriage which were sealed with a ring. It seems to me, then, madam, that you wrong me in calling me wicked. The great and perfect friendship which subsists between the bastard and myself would have given me occasion to do wrong if I had been so disposed, yet we have never gone further than kissing, it being my conviction that God would do me the grace to obtain my father's consent before the consummation of our marriage. I have done nothing against God or against my conscience. I have waited till the age of thirty to see what you and my father would do for me ; and my youth has been passed in such chastity and virtue that no one in the world can justly cast the least reproach upon me in that respect. Finding myself on the decline, and without the hope of obtaining a husband of my own rank, reason determined me to take one according to my taste, not for the lust of the eyes, for, as you know, he whom I have chosen is not comely ; nor yet for that of the flesh, since there has been no consummation ; nor for the pride and ambition of this life, for he is poor, and of little preferment ; but I have had regard purely and simply to the virtue and good qualities he possesses, as to which all the world is constrained to do him justice, and to the great love he has for me, which affords me the hope of enjoying quiet and contentment with him. After having maturely considered the good and the evil which might result to me, I took the course which appeared to me the best, and finally resolved, after two years' examination, to end my life with him ; and this I so fully resolved that no torments which could be inflicted upon me, nor death itself, could make me change my purpose. So, madam, I beseech you to excuse in me what is highly excusable, as you very well know, and leave me to enjoy the peace and quiet I expect to find with him."

The queen, unable to make any reasonable reply to language so resolute and so true, could only renew her passionate chiding and abuse, and bursting into tears, "Wretch," she said, "instead of humbling yourself, and testifying repentance for the fault you have committed, you speak with audacity, and, instead of blushing, you do not so much as shed one tear ; thereby giving plain proof of your obstinacy and hardness of heart. But if the king and your father do as I would have them, they will put you in a place where you will be constrained to hold other language."

"Since you accuse me, madam, of speaking with audacity," replied Rolandine, "I am resolved to say no more, unless you are pleased to permit me to speak." The queen having given her permission, she continued : "It is not for me, madam, to speak to you with audacity. As you are my mistress, and the greatest princess in Christendom, I must always entertain for you the respect which is your due ; and it has never been my intention to depart from it. But as I have no advocate but the truth, and as it is known to myself alone, I am obliged to speak it boldly, in the hope that if I have the good fortune to make you thoroughly cognizant of it, you will not believe me to be such as you have been pleased to call me. I am not afraid that any mortal creature should know in what manner I have conducted myself in the affair which is laid to my charge, for I know that I have not done anything contrary either to God or to my honour. This, madam, is what makes me speak without fear, being well assured that He who sees my heart is with me ; and with such a judge on my side, I should be wrong to fear those who are subject to his judgment. Wherefore should I weep, madam, since honour and conscience do not upbraid me ? As to repentance, madam, I am so far from repenting of what I have done that were it to be done again, I would do it. It is you, madam, who have great reason to weep, both for the wrong you have done me in the past, and for that which you now do me in censuring me publicly for a fault of which you are more guilty than I. If I had offended God, the king, you, my kindred, and my conscience, I ought to testify my repentance by my tears ; but I ought not to weep for having done an act that is good, just, and holy, which would never have been spoken of but with honour, if you, madam, had not prematurely divulged it, and given it an air of culpability : thereby plainly showing that you are more bent on dishonouring me than on preserving the honour of your house and your kindred. But since it is your pleasure, madam, to act thus, it is not for me to gainsay you. Innocent as I am, I shall feel no less pleasure in submitting to the punishment you may choose to inflict upon me than you in imposing it. You and my father, madam, have but to say what you desire that I should suffer, and you shall be promptly obeyed. I reckon upon it, madam, that he will not be backward in this ; and I shall be very glad if he will share your sentiments, and if, after having agreed with you in the negligence he has shown in providing for my welfare, he imitates your activity now that the question is how to do me harm. But I have another Father in Heaven, who, I hope, will give me patience to endure the evils I see you are preparing for me ; and it is in Him alone I put my whole trust."

The queen, bursting with rage, gave orders that Rolandine should be taken out of her sight, and shut up alone in a chamber where she should not be allowed to speak to anyone. Nevertheless, her gouvernante was left with her, and through her it was that Rolandine made known her present condition to the bastard, asking his advice at the same time as to what she should do. The bastard, believing that the services he had rendered to the king would be counted for something, repaired at once to the court. He found the king at the chase, told him the truth of the matter, reminded him of his poverty, and besought his majesty to appease the queen and permit the consummation of the marriage. The king made no other reply than to say "Do you assure me that you have married her?"

"Yes, sire," replied the bastard, "by words and by presents only; but if your majesty pleases, the ceremony shall be completed."

The king looked down, and without saying another word returned to the château. On arriving there, he called for the captain of his guards, and ordered him to arrest the bastard. However, one of the friends of the latter, who guessed the king's intention, sent him warning to get out of the way, and retire to one of his houses which was not far off, promising that if the king should send in search of him, as he expected would be the case, he should have prompt notice, so that he might quit the kingdom; and that, should matters be more favourable, he would send him word to return. The bastard took his friend's advice, and made such good speed that the captain of the guards did not find him.

Meanwhile, the king and queen having conferred together as to what should be done with the poor lady who had the honour to be their relation, it was decided, at the queen's suggestion, that she should be sent back to her father, who should be made acquainted with the truth of the matter. Before she went away, several ecclesiastics and people of sage counsel went to see her, and represented to her that, being engaged only by word of mouth, the marriage could easily be dissolved, provided both parties were willing, and that it was the king's pleasure she should do so, for the honour of the house to which she belonged; but she replied that she was ready to obey the king in all things, provided conscience was not implicated; but what God had joined, men could not put asunder. She besought them not to ask of her a thing so unreasonable. "If the love and the good-will which are founded only on the fear of God," she added, "are a true and solid bond of marriage, then am I so closely bound that neither steel, nor fire, nor water can loose me. Death alone can do so, and to it alone will I surrender my ring and my oath; so, gentlemen, I beg you will say no more to me on the subject." She had so much steadfastness, that she would rather die, and keep her word, than live after having broken it.

This resolute reply was reported to the king, who, seeing that it was impossible to detach her from her husband, gave orders that she should be taken away to her father's; and thither she was carried, with such little ceremony or regard to her quality, that none who saw how she was treated could restrain their tears. She had transgressed, indeed; but her punishment was so great, and her fortitude so singular, that they made her fault seem a virtue. Her father, on hearing this disagreeable news, would not see his daughter, but sent her away to a castle situated in a forest, and which he had formerly built for a reason well worthy to be narrated. There she was for a long time a prisoner, and every day she was told, by her father's orders, that if she would renounce her husband he would treat her as his daughter, and set her at liberty. But nothing could shake her constancy. One would have thought she made pleasant pastime of her sufferings, to see how cheerfully she bore them for the sake of him she loved.

What shall I say here of men ? The bastard, who was under such obligations to her, fled to Germany, where he had many friends, and showed by his inconstancy that he had attached himself to Rolandine through avarice and ambition rather than through real love ; for he became so enamoured of a German lady that he forgot to write to her who was suffering so much for his sake. However cruel fortune was towards them, she yet left it always in their power to write to each other ; but this sole comfort was lost through the bastard's inconstancy and negligence, whereat Rolandine was distressed beyond measure. The few letters he did write were so cold and so different from those she had formerly received from him, that she felt assured some new amour had deprived her of her husband's heart, and done what vexations and persecutions had been incapable of effecting. But her love for him was too great to allow of her taking any decisive step on mere conjectures. In order, therefore, to know the truth, she found means to send a trusty person, not to carry any letters or messages to him, but to observe him, and make careful inquiries. This envoy, on his return, informed her that the bastard was deeply in love with a German lady, and that it was said she was very rich, and that he wished to marry her. So extreme was poor Rolandine's affliction on learning this news, that she fell into a dangerous illness. Those who were aware of its cause told her, on the part of her father, that since the bastard's inconstant and dastardly behaviour were known, she had a perfect right to abandon him ; and they tried hard to persuade her to do so. But it was in vain they tormented her ; she remained unchanged to the end, displaying alike the greatness of her love and of her virtue. In proportion as the bastard's love diminished, Rolandine's augmented, the latter gaining as it were all that the former lost. Feeling that in her bosom alone was lodged all the love that had formerly dwelt in two, she resolved to cherish it until the death of the one or the other.

The divine goodness, which is perfect charity and true love, took pity on her sorrows, and had so much regard for her patience that the bastard died soon after, in the midst of his wooing of another woman. The news being brought her by persons who had been present at his burial, she sent to her father, begging he would be so good as to allow her to say a few words to him. Her father, who had never spoken to her during the whole time of her captivity, went to her forthwith. After having heard her plead her justification at very great length, instead of condemning and thinking of killing her, as he had often threatened, he embraced her, and said, with swimming eyes, " You are more just than I, my daughter, for if you have committed a fault, I am the principal cause of it. But since it has pleased God that things should happen thus, I will try to make amends for the past." Accordingly, he took her home, and treated her as his eldest daughter.

A gentleman who bore the name and the arms of the family at last sought her in marriage. This gentleman, who was very prudent and virtuous, often saw Rolandine, and conceived so much esteem for her that he praised her for what others blamed, persuaded as he was that she acted only upon virtuous principles. The chevalier being liked both by the father and the daughter, the marriage was forthwith concluded. It is true that a brother she had, and who was the father's sole heir, would never give her a portion of the family wealth, under pretext that she had been wanting in obedience to her father; after whose death he treated her so cruelly that she and her husband, who was a younger son, found it a hard matter to subsist. But God provided a remedy, for the brother, who wished to retain all, died, leaving behind him both his own wealth and that of his sister, which he unjustly retained. By this means Rolandine and her husband were raised to great affluence. They lived honourably, according to their quality, were grateful for the favours bestowed on them by Providence, had much love for one another, and, after they had brought up two sons, with whom it pleased God to bless their marriage, Rolandine joyfully yielded up her soul to Him in whom she had always put her whole trust.*

Ladies, let the men who regard us as inconstancy's very self show us a husband like the wife of whom I have been telling you, one who had the same goodness, fidelity, and constancy. I am sure they will find the task so very hard that I will acquit them of it altogether, rather than put them to such infinite pain. As for you, ladies, I beg that, for the maintenance of your dignity,

* The Bibliophiles Français have clearly enough identified the persons in this story. The Queen of France is the celebrated Anne of Bretagne, wife of Charles VIII. and of Louis XII. Rolandine is Anna de Rohan, third child and eldest daughter of Jean II., Viscount of Rohan, Count of Porhoet, Leon, and La Garnache. She married, in 1517, Pierre de Rohan, Baron of Frontenay, by whom she had two sons. The bastard appears to have been Jean, Bastard of Angoulême, legitimized in 1458 by Charles VII.; and the lady, the mother of the young prince, who forbade the bastard to continue his interviews with Rolandine at the window, and who must, therefore, have had a certain right to command him, was probably Louise of Savoy.

you will either not love at all, or love as perfectly as this demoiselle. Do not say that she exposed her honour, since by her firmness she has been the means of so augmenting ours.

"It is true, Oisille," said Parlamente, "that your heroine was a woman of a very lofty spirit, and the more commendable for her steadfastness as she had to do with an unfaithful husband, who wished to quit her for another."

"That, I think," said Longarine, "must have been the hardest thing for her to bear; for there is no burden so heavy which the love of two persons who are truly united may not bear with ease and comfort; but when one of the two deserts his duty, and leaves the whole burden to the other, the weight becomes insupportable."

"You ought then to have pity on us," said Geburon, "since we have to bear the whole weight of love, and you will not so much as help with a finger-end to ease the burden."

'The burdens of the man and of the woman are often different,' observed Parlamente. "The wife's love, founded on piety and virtue, is so just and reasonable, that he who is untrue to the duties of such a friendship ought to be regarded as a dastard, and wicked in the sight of God and man. But as men love only with a view to pleasure, women, who in their ignorance are always the dupes of wicked men, often engage themselves too deeply in a commerce of tenderness; but when God makes known to them the criminal intentions of those whom they supposed to entertain none but good ones, they may break off with honour, and without damage to their reputation, for the shortest follies are always the best."

"That is a mere whim of your own," said Hircan, "to assert that virtuous women may honourably cease to love men, whilst the latter may not in like manner cease to love women; as if the heart of the one sex was different from that of the other. For my part, I am persuaded that, in spite of diversity in faces and dresses, the inclinations of both are the same; the only difference is that the more hidden guilt is the worse."

"I am very well aware," said Parlamente, with some anger, "that in your opinion the least guilty women are those whose guilt is known."

"Let us change the subject," interrupted Simon-tault, "and dismiss that of the heart of man and of woman by saying that the best of them is good for nothing. Let us see to whom Parlamente will give her voice."

"To Geburon," she said.

"Since I have begun with mentioning the Cordeliers," said he, "I must not forget the monks of St. Benedict, and cannot forbear relating what happened in my time to two of these good fathers; at the same time, let not what I am going to tell you of a wicked monk hinder you from having a good opinion of those that deserve it. But as the Psalmist says that all men are liars, and that there is none that worketh righteousness, no not one, it seems to me that one cannot fail to esteem a man such as he is. In fact, if there is good in him, it is to be attributed, not to the creature but to Him who is the principle and the source of all good. Most people deceive themselves in giving too much to the creature, or in too much esteeming themselves. And that you may not suppose it impossible to find extreme concupiscence under an extreme austerity, I will relate to you a fact which happened in the time of King Francis I."

NOVEL XXII.

A prior tries every means to seduce a nun, but at last his villainy is discovered.

THERE was at St. Martin-des-Champs, at Paris, a prior, whose name I will not mention, because of the friendship I once bore him. He led so austere a life until the age of fifty, and the fame of his sanctity was so strong throughout the kingdom, that there was no prince or princess who did not receive him with veneration when he paid them a visit. No monastic reform was effected in which he had not part ; and he received the name of the “Father of true monasticism.” He was elected visitor of the celebrated society of the Ladies of Fontevault, who were in so much awe of him that when he came to any of their convents the nuns trembled with fear, and treated him just as they might have treated the king, hoping thereby to soften his rigour towards them. At first, he did not wish that such deference should be paid him ; but as he approached his fifty-fifth year, he at last came to like the honours he had refused in the beginning ; and coming by degrees to regard himself as the public property of the religious societies, he was more careful to preserve his health than he had been. Though he was bound by the rules of his order never to eat meat, he granted himself a dispensation in that respect, a thing he would never do for anyone else, alleging as his reason that the whole burden of the brethren’s spiritual interests rested upon him. Accordingly, he pampered himself, and to such good purpose that from being a very lean monk he became a very fat one.

With the change in his manner of living a change took place in his heart also, and he began to look at faces on which he had before made it matter of conscience to cast his eyes casually. By dint of looking at beauties, rendered more desirable by their veils, he began to lust after them. In order to satisfy his unholy passion he changed from a shepherd into a wolf ; and if he found an Agnes in any of the convents under his jurisdiction, he failed not to corrupt her. After he had long led this wicked life, Divine goodness, taking pity on the poor misused sheep, was pleased to unmask the villain, as you shall hear.

He had gone one day to visit a convent near Paris named Gif, and while he was confessing the nuns, there came before him one named Sister Marie Herouet, whose sweet and pleasing voice indicated that her face and heart were not less so. The mere sound inspired the good father with a passion exceeding all he had ever felt for other nuns. In speaking to her he stooped down to look at her, and seeing her mouth so rosy and charming, he could not help lifting up her veil to satisfy himself if her eyes corresponded to the beauty of her lips. He found what he sought, and noted it so well that his heart became filled with a most vehement ardour ; he lost his appetite for food and drink, and even all countenance, in spite of his efforts to dissemble. On his return to his priory there was no rest for him. He passed his days and nights in extreme disquietude, his mind continually occupied in devising means to gratify his passion, and make of this nun what he had made of so many others. As he had observed that she possessed steadiness of character and quickness of perception, the thing appeared to him hard to accomplish. Conscious, moreover, that he was ugly and old-looking, he resolved not to attempt to win her by soft words, but extort from her by fear what he could not hope to obtain for love.

With this intention, he returned a few days after to the convent of Gif, and displayed more austerity there than ever he had done before, angrily rating all the nuns. One did not wear her veil low enough; another carried her head too high; another did not make obeisance properly like a nun. So severe was he with regard to all these trifles, that he seemed as terrible as the picture of God on the day of judgment. Being gouty, he was much fatigued in visiting all parts of the convent, and it was about the hour of vespers (an hour assigned by himself) that he reached the dormitory. The abbess told him it was time to say vespers. "Have them said, mother," replied the prior, "for I am so tired that I will remain here, not to repose, but to speak to Sister Marie about a scandalous thing I hear of her; for I am told that she babbles like a worldling." The prioress, who was aunt to Sister Marie's mother, begged that he would chapter her soundly, and left her in the hands of the prior, quite alone, except that a young monk was with him.

Left alone with Sister Marie, he began by lifting up her veil, and bidding her look in his face. Sister Marie replied that her rule forbade her to look at men. "That is well said, my daughter," said the prior, "but you are not to believe that monks are men."

For fear, then, of being guilty of disobedience, Sister Marie looked at him, and thought him so ugly that it seemed to her more a penance than a sin to look at him. The reverend father, after talking of the love he bore her, wanted to put his hands on her breasts. She repulsed him as she ought ; and the reverend father, vexed at so unwonted a beginning, exclaimed in great anger, "What business has a nun to know that she has breasts?"

"I know that I have," replied Sister Marie ; "and I am very certain that neither you nor anyone else shall ever touch them. I am neither young enough nor ignorant enough not to know what is a sin and what is not so."

Seeing, then, that he could not compass his designs in that way, he had recourse to another expedient, and said, "I must declare my infirmity to you, my daughter ; I have a malady which all the physicians deem incurable, unless I delight myself with a woman whom I passionately love. I would not for my life commit a mortal sin ; but even should it come to that, I know that simple fornication is not to be compared to the sin of homicide. So if you love my life, you will hinder me from dying, and save your own conscience."

She asked him what sort of diversion it was that he contemplated ; to which he replied that she might rest her conscience on his, and he assured her that he would do nothing which would leave any weight on either. To let her judge by the preliminaries what sort of pastime it was he asked of her, he embraced her and tried to throw her on a bed. Making no doubt then of his wicked intention, she cried out, and defended herself so well that he could only touch her clothes. Seeing, then, that all his devices and efforts were fruitless, like—I will not say a madman, but like a man without conscience or reason, he put his hand under her robe, and scratched all that came under his nails with such fury that the poor girl, shrieking with all her might, fell in a faint. The abbess, hearing her cries, ran to the dormitory, reproaching herself for having left her relation alone with the reverend father. She stood for a moment at the door to listen, but, hearing her niece's voice, she pushed open the door, which was held by the young monk. When she entered the dormitory, the prior, pointing to her niece, said, " You did wrong, mother, not to acquaint me with Sister Marie's constitution : for, not knowing her weakness, I made her stand before me, and while I was reprimanding her, she fainted away, as you see."

Vinegar and other remedies being applied, Sister Marie recovered from her faint ; and the prior, fearing lest she should tell her aunt the cause of it, found means to whisper in her ear, " I command you, my daughter, on pain of disobedience and eternal damnation, never to speak of what I have done to you. It was my great love for you that made me do it ; but since I see that you will not respond to my passion, I will never mention it to you while I live. I may, however, assure you, for the last time, that if you will love me I will have you chosen abbess of one of the best abbeys in this kingdom."

She replied that she would rather die in perpetual imprisonment than ever have any other friend than Him who had died for her on the cross ; deeming herself happier in suffering all ills with Him than in enjoying without Him all the pleasures the world can afford. She warned him once for all not to speak to her any more in that manner, if he did not wish her to complain of it to the abbess ; but if he desisted, she would say nothing of what was past. Before this bad shepherd withdrew, in order to appear quite different from what he was in reality, and to have the pleasure of again gazing on her he loved, he turned to the abbess and said, " I beg, mother, that you will make all your daughters sing a Salve Regina in honour of the Virgin, in whom I rest my hope." The Salve Regina was sung ; and all the while the fox did nothing but weep, not with devotion, but with regret at having so ill succeeded. The nuns, who attributed his emotion to the love he felt for the Virgin Mary, regarded him as a saint; but Sister Marie, who knew his hypocrisy, prayed to God in her heart to confound a villain who had such contempt for virginity.

The hypocrite returned to St. Martin's, carrying with him the criminal fire which consumed him day and night, and occupied his mind only in trying to find means for accomplishing his unrighteous end. Being afraid of the abbess, whose virtue he was aware of, he thought he could not do better than remove her from that convent. With that view, he went to Madame de Vendôme, who was then residing at La Fère, where she had built and endowed a convent of the order of St. Benedict, named Mont d'Olivet. In his professed character of a sovereign reformer, he represented to her that the abbess of Mont d'Olivet was not capable of governing such a community. The good lady begged him to name one who should be worthy to fill that office. This was just what he wanted, and he at once recommended her to take the abbess of Gif, whom he depicted to her as the abbess of the greatest capacity in France. Madame de Vendôme sent for her forthwith, and gave her the government of her convent of Mont d'Olivet; whilst the prior, who commanded the suffrages of all the communities, had one who was devoted to him elected abbess of Gif.

This being done, he went to the convent to try once more if by prayers or promises he could prevail over Sister Marie. He succeeded no better than the first time, and returning in despair to St. Martin's, he there contrived more villany. As much with a view to accomplish his original purpose as to be revenged on the uncomplying nun, and for fear the affair should obtain publicity, he had the relics stolen from the convent of Gif by night, accused the confessor of the convent, an aged and worthy monk, of having committed the theft, and imprisoned him at St. Martin's. Whilst he kept him there he suborned two witnesses, who deposed that they had seen the confessor and Sister Marie committing an infamous and indecent act in a garden; and this he wanted to make the old monk confess. The good man, who knew all the prior's tricks, begged him to assemble the chapter, and said he would state truly all he knew in presence of the monks. This demand he took care not to grant, fearing lest the confessor's justification should condemn himself; but finding the latter so invincibly steadfast, he treated him so ill that some say he died in prison; others say that the prior forced him to unfrock and quit the realm. Be it as it may, he was never seen afterwards.

The prior, having, as he thought, such a great hold on Sister Marie, went to Gif, where the abbess his creature never disputed a word that fell from his lips. He began by exercising his authority as visitor, and summoned all the nuns one by one, that he might hear them in chamber in form of confession and visitation. Sister Marie, who had lost her good aunt, having at last appeared in her turn, he began by saying to her, "You know, Sister Marie, of what a crime you are accused; and consequently you know that the great chastity you affect has availed you nothing, for it is very well known that you are anything but chaste."

"Produce my accuser," replied Sister Marie, undauntedly, "and you will see how he will maintain such a statement in my presence."

"The confessor himself has been convicted of the fact, and that must be proof enough for you," returned the prior.

"I believe him to be such a good man," said Sister Marie, "that he is incapable of confessing such a falsehood. But even should he have done so, set him before me and I will prove the contrary."

The prior, seeing she was not daunted, said, "I am your father, and as such I wish to be tender with your honour; I leave the matter between you and your conscience, and will believe what you shall tell me. I conjure you then, on pain of mortal sin, to tell me the truth. Were you a virgin when you entered this house?"

"My age at that time, father, is warrant for my virginity. I was then but five years old."

"And since then, my daughter, have you not lost that fair flower?"

She swore she had not, and that she had never undergone any temptation except from him.

"I cannot believe it," the hypocrite replied; "it remains to be proved."

"What proof do you require?"

"That which I exact from other nuns. As I am the visitor of souls, so am I also of bodies. Your abbesses and prioresses have all passed through my hands, and you must not scruple to let me examine your virginity. Lay yourself on that bed, and turn the front of your robe over your face."

"You have told me so much of your criminal love for me," replied Sister Marie, indignantly, "that I have reason to believe your intention is not so much to examine my virginity as to despoil me of it. So be assured I will never consent."

"You are excommunicated," returned the prior, "to refuse obedience; and unless you do as I bid you, I will dishonour you in full chapter, and will state all I know of you and the confessor."

Sister Marie, without suffering herself to be dismayed, replied that He who knew the hearts of his servants would be her stay. "And since you carry your malevolence so far," she said, "I would rather be the victim of your cruelty than the accomplice of your criminal desires; because I know that God is a just judge."

In a rage that may be more easily imagined than described, the prior hurried off to assemble the chapter. Summoning Sister Marie before him, he made her kneel, and thus addressed her: "It is with extreme grief, Sister Marie, that I see how the wholesome remonstrances which I have addressed to you on so capital a fault have been of no avail, and I am compelled with regret to impose a penance upon you contrary to my custom. I have examined your confessor touching certain crimes of which he was accused, and he has confessed to me that he has abused you, and that in a place where two witnesses depose to having seen you. Instead, then, of the honourable post of mistress of the novices in which I had placed you, I ordain that you be the lowest of all, and also that you eat your diet of bread and water on the ground in the presence of all the sisters, until you shall have merited pardon by your repentance."

Sister Marie, having been warned beforehand, by one of her companions who knew her whole affair, that if she made any reply which was displeasing to the prior he would put her in pace, that is, immure her for ever in a cell, heard her sentence without saying a word, raising her eyes to heaven, and praying that He who had given her the grace to resist sin, would give her the patience necessary to endure her sufferings. This was not all. The venerable prior further prohibited her speaking for three years to her mother or her relations, or writing any letter excepting in community.

After this the wretch went away and returned no more. The poor girl remained a long time in the condition prescribed by her sentence ; but her mother, who had a more tender affection for her than for her other children, was surprised at not hearing from her, and said to one of her sons that she believed her daughter was dead, and that the nuns concealed her death in order the longer to enjoy the annual payment made for her maintenance. She begged him to inquire into the matter, and see his sister, if it were possible. The brother went at once to the convent, was answered with the usual excuses, and was told that for three years his sister had not quitted her bed. The young man would not be put off with that reply, and swore that unless she were shown to him he would scale the walls and break into the convent. This threat so alarmed the nuns that they brought his sister to the grating ; but the abbess followed her so closely, that she could not speak to her brother without being heard by the good mother. But Sister Marie, having her wits about her, had taken the precaution beforehand to write down all the facts I have related, together with the details of a thousand other stratagems which the prior had employed to seduce her, and which, for the sake of brevity, I omit.

I must not, however, forget to mention that, whilst her aunt was abbess, the prior, fancying it was on account of his ugliness he was repulsed, caused Sister Marie to be tempted by a young and handsome monk, hoping that, if she yielded to the latter for love, he himself might afterwards have his will of her through fear. But the young monk having accosted her in a garden, with words and gestures so infamous that I should be ashamed to repeat them, the poor girl ran to the abbess, who was talking with the prior, and cried to her, “Mother, they are demons, and not monks, who come to visit us.” Upon this the prior, afraid of being discovered, said to the abbess, with a laugh, “Certainly, mother, Sister Marie is right.” He then took her hand, and said, in presence of the abbess, “I had heard that Sister Marie spoke very well, and with such facility as led people to believe she was mundane. For this reason I have done violence to my nature, and have spoken to her as worldlings speak to women, so far as I know that language from books ; for in point of personal experience I am as ignorant as I was the day I was born. And as I attributed her virtue to my age and ugliness, I ordered my young monk to speak to her in the same tone. She has made, as you see, a sage and virtuous resistance. I am pleased with her for it, and esteem her so highly that henceforth I desire that she be the first after you, and the mistress of the novices, in order that her virtue may be fortified more and more.” The venerable prior did many feats of the same sort during the three years he was in love with the nun, who, as I have said, gave her brother a written narrative of her sad adventures through the grating.

The brother carried the paper to his mother, who hurried distractedly to Paris, where she found the Queen of Navarre, only sister to the king, and laid this piteous tale before her, saying, “Put no more trust, madam, in these hypocrites. I thought I had placed my daughter on the outskirts of heaven, or at least on the way to it ; but I find I have placed her in hell, and in the hands of people worse than all the devils there ; for the devils tempt us only so far as we are ourselves consenting parties, but these wretches try to prevail over us by violence when they cannot do so by love.” The Queen of Navarre was greatly perplexed. She had implicit confidence in the prior of St. Martin's, and had committed to his charge the abbesses of Montivilliers and of Caen, her sisters-in-law. On the other hand, the crime appeared to her so black and horrible, that she longed to avenge the poor innocent girl, and communicated the matter to the king's chancellor, who was then legate in France.* The legate made the prior appear before him, and all that the latter could allege in excuse for himself was that he was seventy years of age. He appealed to the Queen of Navarre, beseeching, by all the pleasures she would ever wish to do him, and as the sole recompense of his past services, that she would have the goodness to put a stop to these proceedings, assuring her he would avow that sister Marie Herouet was a pearl of honour and chastity. The queen was so astounded at this speech, that, not knowing how to reply to it, she turned her back upon him, and left him there. The poor monk, overwhelmed with confusion, retired to his monastery, where he never would let himself be seen by anybody, and died a year afterwards. Sister Marie Herouet, esteemed as the virtues God had given her deserved, was taken from the abbey of Gif, where she had suffered so much, and was made by the king abbess of the abbey of Giy, near Montargis. She reformed the abbey which his majesty had given her, and lived like a saint, animated by the spirit of God, whom she praised all her life long for the repose He had procured her, and the dignity with which He had invested her.†

* Antoine Duprat, cardinal-legate, chancellor of France, was appointed legate in 1530, and died 1535. The events related in this novel must have occurred between those years.

† The prior who figures in this novel was Etienne Gentil, who became prior in 1508, and died in 1536. The abbey of St. Martin-des-Champs stood on the site now occupied by the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers. The church and the refectory are still standing.

There, ladies, is a story which well confirms what St Paul says to the Corinthians, that God makes use of weak things to confound the strong, and of those who seem useless in men's eyes to overthrow the glory and splendour of those who, thinking themselves something, are yet in reality nothing. There is no good in any man but what God puts into him by His grace ; and there is no temptation out of which one does not come victorious, when God grants aid. You see this by the confession of a monk, who was believed to be a good man, and by the elevation of a girl whom he wished to exhibit as criminal and wicked. In this we see the truth of our Lord's saying, that "He that exalteth himself shall be humbled, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

"How many worthy people this monk deceived !" said Oisille ; "for I have seen how they trusted in him more than in God."

"I should not have been one of those he deceived !" said Nomerfide, "for I have such a horror of the very sight of a monk that I could not even confess to them, believing them to be worse than all other men, and never to frequent any house without leaving in it some shame or dissension."

"There are some good men amongst them," said Oisille ; "and the wickedness of an individual ought not to be imputed to the whole body ; but the best are those who least frequent secular houses and women."

"That is very well said," observed Ennasuite, "for the less one sees and knows them the better one esteems them ; for upon more experience one comes to know their real nature."

"Let us leave the monastery where it is," said Nomerfide, "and see to whom Geburon will give his voice."

"To Madame Oisille," replied Geburon, "in order that she may tell us something in honour of the regular clergy."

"We have pledged ourselves so strongly to speak the truth," replied Oisille, "that I could not undertake that task. Besides, your tale reminded me of a piteous one, which I must relate to you, as I come from the neighbourhood of the country where the thing occurred in my own time. I choose this story of recent date, ladies, in order that the hypocrisy of those who believe themselves more religious than others may not so beguile you as to make your faith quit the right path, and induce you to hope for salvation in any other than Him who will have no companion in the work of our creation and redemption. He alone is almighty to save us in eternity and to comfort us in this life, and deliver us out of all our afflictions. You know that Satan often assumes the appearance of an angel of light, in order that the eye, deceived by the semblance of sanctity and devotion, may attach itself to the things it ought to shun."

NOVEL XXIII.

A cordelier who was the cause of three murders, those of husband, wife, and child.

IN Perigord, there dwelt a gentleman whose devotion to St. Francis was such that he imagined all those who wore that saint's habit were, as a matter of course, as holy as the sainted founder of their order. In honour of that good saint he fitted up a suite of apartments in his house to lodge the Franciscan monks, by whose advice he regulated all his affairs, even to the smallest household matters, thinking that he could not but walk safely when he followed such good guides. It happened that the wife of this gentleman, a handsome lady, and as virtuous as she was handsome, was delivered of a fine boy ; for which her husband, who already loved her much, now regarded her with redoubled affection. The better to entertain his wife, the gentleman sent for one of his brothers-in-law ; and a Cordelier, whose name I shall conceal for the honour of the order, arrived also. The gentleman was very glad to see his spiritual father, from whom he had no secrets ; and after a long conversation between the lady, her brother, and the monk, they all sat down to supper. During the repast, the gentleman, looking wistfully at his lovely wife, said aloud to the good father, " Is it true, father, that it is a mortal sin to be with one's wife during the month of her confinement ? "

The Cordelier, who was anything but what he seemed, replied, " Certainly, sir ; I think it is one of the greatest sins that can be committed in marriage. I need only refer you to the example of the blessed Virgin, who would not enter the Temple till the day of her purification, though she had no need of that ceremony. This alone should teach you the indispensable necessity of abstaining from this little pleasure, since the good Virgin Mary, in order to obey the law, abstained from going to the Temple, in which was her whole consolation. Besides, the physicians say there is reason to fear for the children that might be begotten under such circumstances."

The gentleman, who had expected that the monk would give him permission to lie with his wife, was much annoyed at a reply so contrary to his hope ; however, he let the matter drop. The reverend father having drunk a little more than was reasonable during the conversation, cast his eyes on the lady, and concluded within himself that if he was her husband, he would lie with her without asking anyone's advice. As the fire kindles little by little, and at last waxes so strong and fierce that it burns down the house, so the poor monk felt himself possessed with such vehement concupiscence, that he resolved all at once to satisfy the desire he had cherished in secret for three years. After the supper-things had been taken away, he took the gentleman by the hand, led him to the side of the bed, and said to him, in the presence of his wife, "Knowing, sir, as I do, the affection that subsists between you and mademoiselle, I compassionate the feelings with which your great youth inspires you both. Therefore I will impart to you a secret of our holy theology. You must know, then, that the law which is so rigorous on account of the abuses committed by indiscreet husbands, is not so strict with regard to husbands so prudent and moderate as you. Hence, sir, after having stated before others what is the severity of the law, I must tell you in private what is its mildness. Know, then, that there are women and women, as there are men and men. Before all things, then, it is necessary that mademoiselle, who has been delivered these three weeks, should tell you if her flux of blood has quite ceased."

The demoiselle replied very positively that it had.

"That being the case, my son," resumed the Cordelier, "I permit you to lie with her without scruple, on these two conditions: first, that you mention it to no one, and that you come to her secretly; secondly, that you do not come to her until two hours after midnight, in order not to disturb your wife's digestion."

The gentleman promised to observe both these conditions, and confirmed his promise by so strong an oath that the monk, who knew him to be more of a fool than a liar, did not doubt that he would keep his word. After a pretty long conversation, he bade them good night, gave them plenty of benedictions, and retired to his chamber. As he was leaving the room, he took the gentleman by the hand, and said, "Certes, sir, it is time for you to retire also, and leave mademoiselle to repose." The gentleman obeyed and withdrew, telling his wife, in the good father's presence, to leave the door open.

On reaching his chamber the good monk thought of anything but sleeping. As soon as he found that the house was all still, that is to say, about the hour when he was wont to go to matins, he went straight to the chamber where the gentleman was expected. He found the door open, and having entered, he began by putting out the candle, and then got into bed to the lady as fast as he could. "My dear, this is not what you promised the good father," said the demoiselle, who mistook him for her husband; "you said you would not come here until two o'clock." The Cordelier, who was more intent upon action than on contemplation, and was afraid, too, of being recognized if he spoke, made no reply, but proceeded at once to gratify the criminal passion which had long poisoned his heart; whereat the demoiselle was much astonished. The hour when the husband was to come being at hand, the Cordelier got out of bed, and returned to his chamber; but as love had before hindered him from sleeping, so now the fear that always follows crime allowed him no repose. He got up, went to the porter, and said, "My friend, monsieur has commanded me to go back at once to our convent, where I am to put up prayers for him. So pray let me have my beast, and open the door for me without letting anyone know, for this business requires secrecy." The porter, knowing that to obey the Cordelier was to serve his master, opened the gate and let him out.

At that moment the gentleman awoke, and seeing that it was near the time when he was to go to his wife, he wrapped his dressing-gown about him, and went to his wife's bed, whither he might have gone in accordance with God's law without asking leave of anyone. His wife being ignorant of what had occurred, and finding her husband beside her, and hearing his voice, said to him, in surprise, "What, sir! is this the promise you made the good Cordelier, that you would be cautious of your health and mine? Not content with having come hither before the time, you now come again. Do think better of it, I entreat you."

Confounded at being addressed in this manner, and unable to conceal his vexation, the husband replied, "What is this you say? It is three weeks since I have been in bed with you, and you accuse me of coming to you too often. If you continue to talk to me in that strain, you will make me believe that my company is distasteful to you, and constrain me to do what I have never yet done, that is, to seek elsewhere the lawful pleasure you refuse me."

The lady, who thought he was joking, replied, "Do not deceive yourself, sir, in thinking to deceive me. Though you did not speak to me the first time you came, I knew very well that you were there."

The gentleman then perceived that they had both been duped, and solemnly vowed that he had not been there before; and the wife, in an agony of grief, begged he would find out at once who it could be that had deceived her, since the only persons who had slept in the house were her brother and the Cordelier. The husband's suspicions falling immediately on the latter, he ran to his chamber, and found it empty. To make sure whether or not he had fled, he called the porter, and asked if he knew what had become of the Cordelier. The porter told him what had passed, and the poor gentleman, convinced of the monk's villainy, went back to his wife, and said, "Be assured, my dear, that person who lay with you and performed such feats was no other than our father confessor."

The lady, to whom honour had always been most precious, was so horror-stricken, that, forgetting all humanity and the natural gentleness of her sex, she entreated her husband on her knees to revenge her for such a cruel outrage; whereupon he mounted his horse, and rode off in pursuit of the Cordelier. The wife, left alone in her bed, without anyone to counsel her, and without any consolation except her new-born babe, pondered over the hideous adventure which had befallen her, and making no account of her ignorance, regarded herself as guilty, and as the most miserable woman in the world. And then, having never learned anything from the Cordelier but confidence in good works, satisfaction for sins by austerity of life, fasting, and discipline, and being wholly ignorant of the grace given by our good God through the merits of his Son, the remission of sins through his blood, the reconciliation of the Father with us through his death, and the life given to sinners by his sole goodness and mercy, she was so bewildered between her horror at the enormity of the deed and her love for her husband and the honour of her line, that she thought death far happier than such a life as hers. Thus, rendered desperate by her grief, she lost not only the hope which every Christian ought to have in God, but common sense too, and the recollection of her own nature.

Not knowing, then, either God or herself, but, on the contrary, full of rage and madness, she undid one of the cords of her bed, and strangled herself with her own hands. In the agony of that painful death, amidst the last violent efforts of nature, the unfortunate woman pressed her foot upon her infant's face, and its innocence could not secure it from a death as piteous as its mother's.

Roused by a great cry uttered by the expiring lady, a woman who slept in her room got up, and lighted a candle. Seeing her mistress hanging dead by the bed-cord, and her infant smothered at her feet, the horrified servant went to the bedroom of the deceased's brother, and took him to see that sad spectacle. The brother, as deeply afflicted as a man would naturally be who tenderly loved his sister, asked the servant who had perpetrated such a crime. She could not tell at all ; the only thing she could say was, that no one had entered the room but her master, who had quitted it but a moment ago. The brother, hurrying instantly to his brother-in-law's chamber, and not finding him there, was firmly persuaded that he had done the deed. Mounting his horse without more delay, or waiting for fuller information, he rode after his brother-in-law, and met him as he was returning from his ineffectual pursuit of the Cordelier. "Defend yourself, base villain !" cried the brother-in-law ; "I trust that God will revenge me with this sword on the greatest miscreant on earth." The husband would have expostulated ; but the brother-in-law pressed him so hard, that all he could do was to defend himself, without knowing what was the cause of the quarrel. They dealt each other so many wounds that they were compelled, by loss of blood and weakness, to dismount and rest a little. While they were taking breath, the husband said, "Let me at least know, brother, why the friendship we have always had for one another has been changed into such rancorous hatred?"

"Let me know why you have put my sister to death, one of the best women that ever lived," replied the brother; "and why, under pretext of going to sleep with her, you have hung her with the bed-cord?"

More dead than alive on hearing these words, the poor husband faltered out, "Is it possible, brother, that you found your sister in the state you say?" Being assured that this was the exact truth, "Pray, brother, listen to me," he continued, "and you shall know why I left the house." And then he related the adventure of the Cordelier. The astonished brother now bitterly repented the precipitation with which he had acted, and earnestly implored forgiveness. "If I have wronged you," said the husband, "you are avenged; for I am wounded beyond hope of recovery." The brother-in-law set him on his horse as well as he could, and led him back to his own house, where he died the next day, and the survivor confessed before all his relations and friends that he was the cause of his death.

For the satisfaction of justice, the brother-in-law was advised to go and solicit his pardon of King Francis I. To this end, after having honourably interred the father, mother, and child, he set out on one Good Friday, to solicit his pardon at court; and he obtained it through the favour of François Olivier, Chancellor of Alençon, afterwards, in consideration of his great endowments, chosen by the king to be chancellor of France.

I am persuaded, ladies, that after this story, which is the very truth, there is not one of you but will think twice before giving reception to such guests. Let it at least teach you that the more hidden the venom, the more dangerous it is.

"Surely," said Hircan, "this husband was a great fool to bring such a gallant to sup by the side of such a handsome and virtuous woman."

"I have seen the time," said Geburon, "when there was not a house in our country in which there was not a chamber for the good fathers ; but at present people know them so well that they are more feared than adventurers."

"It seems to me," said Parlamente, "that a woman in bed ought never to let monk or priest into her room except to administer to her the sacraments of the church ; and for my part, when I summon any of them to my bedside, it may be taken for a sure sign that I am very far gone."

"If everybody was as austere as you," said Ennasuite, "the poor clergy would no longer be free to see women when and where they pleased, and that would be worse to them than excommunication."

"Have no fear on their account," said Saffredent ; "these worthies will never want for women."

"Is this not too bad ?" exclaimed Simontault. "It is they who unite us with our wives in the bonds of wedlock, and they have the wickedness to try to disunite us, and make us break the oath they have imposed upon us."

"It is a pity," said Oisille, "that they who have the administration of the sacraments make light of them in this manner. They ought to be burned alive."

"You would do better to honour them than to blame them," replied Saffredent, "and to flatter instead of abusing them ; for it is they who have the power to burn and dishonour others, therefore, let them alone ; and let us see, whom does Oisille call on ?"

"On Dagoucin," she replied ; "for I see he is so pensive that it strikes me he must have something good at the tip of his tongue."

"Since I cannot and dare not say what I think," said Dagoucin, "at least I will speak of a man to whom cruelty was prejudicial and afterwards advantageous. Although love has such a good opinion of its own strength and potency that it likes to show itself quite naked, and finds it extremely irksome, nay, insupportable to go cloaked, yet those who, in obedience to its dictates, make too great haste to disclose themselves often suffer for it, as happened to a gentleman of Castile, whose story I shall relate to you."

NOVEL XXIV.

Device of a Castilian to make a declaration of love to a queen, and what came of it.

THERE was at the court of a king and queen of Castile, whose names history does not mention, a gentleman of such good birth and comely person that his equal there was not in all Spain. Everyone held his endowments in admiration, but still more his eccentricity ; for it had never been perceived that he loved or courted any lady, though there were many at the court who might have fired ice itself ; but there was not one who could kindle the heart of Elisor, for so this gentleman was named. The queen, who was a woman of great virtue, but a woman, nevertheless, and not more exempt than the rest of her sex from that flame which is the more violent the more it is compressed—the queen, I say, surprised that this gentleman did not attach himself to any of her ladies, asked him one day if it was true that he was as indifferent as he appeared. He replied, that if she saw his heart as she saw his face, she would not have asked him that question. Eager to know what he meant, she pressed him so hard that he confessed he loved a lady whom he believed to be the most virtuous in all Christendom. She did all she could by entreaties and commands to make him say who the lady was, but all to no purpose ; till at last she pretended to be most deeply incensed against him, and swore that she would never speak to him again if he did not name the lady he loved so passionately. To escape from her importunities, he was forced to say that he would rather die than do what she required of him ; but at last, finding that he was about to be deprived of the honour of seeing her, and to be cast out of her favour for not declaring a truth in itself so seemly that no one could take it in bad part, he said to her, trembling with emotion, "I cannot and dare not, madam, name the person ; but I will show her to you the first time we go to the chase ; and I am sure that you will say, as well as I, that she is the most beautiful and most accomplished lady in the world."

After this reply, the queen went to the chase sooner than she would otherwise have done. Elisor had notice of this, and prepared to wait on her majesty as usual. He had got made for himself a great steel mirror in the shape of a corslet, and this he placed on his chest, concealed beneath a mantle of black frieze, all bordered with purl and gold. He rode a black horse, very richly caparisoned. His harness was all gilded and enamelled black in the Moorish fashion, and his black silk hat had a buckle adorned with precious stones, and having in the centre, for a device, a Love concealed by Force. His sword, poniard, and the devices upon them, corresponded to the rest; in short, he was admirably accoutred; and he was such a good horseman that all who saw him neglected the pleasures of the chase to see the paces and the leaps which Elisor made his horse perform. After escorting the queen to the place where the toils were spread, he alighted and went to aid her majesty to dismount. At the moment she held out her arms he opened his cloak, which covered his new cuirass, and said, "Be pleased, madam, to look here;" and without awaiting her reply, he set her gently on the ground.

"And what did you see in the mirror?" "Nothing but myself," said the Queen.

When the chase was ended, the queen returned to the palace without speaking to Elisor. After supper she called him to her, and told him he was the greatest liar she had ever seen, for he had promised to show her at the chase the lady of his love, and yet he had done no such thing; but for her part, she was resolved for the future to make no account of him. Elisor, fearing that the queen had not understood what he had said to her, replied that he had kept his word, and that he had shown her not only the woman, but also that thing in all the world which he loved best. Affecting ignorance of his meaning, she declared she was not aware that he had shown her any of the ladies. "That is true," replied Elisor; "but what did I show you when you dismounted from your horse?"

"Nothing," said the queen, "but a mirror you had on your chest."

"And what did you see in the mirror?"

"Nothing but myself."

"Consequently, madam, I have kept my word and obeyed you. Never did anything enter my heart but that which you saw when you looked at my chest. She who was there pictured is the only one whom I love, revere, and adore, not as a woman merely, but as an earthly divinity, on whom my life and death depend. The only favour I ask of you, madam, is that the perfect passion, which has been life to me whilst concealed, may not be my death now that I have declared it. If I am worthy that you should regard me and receive me as your most impassioned servant, suffer me at least to live, as I have hitherto done, upon the blissful consciousness that I have dared to give my heart to a being so perfect, and so worthy of all honour, that I must be content to love her, though I can never hope to be loved in return. If the knowledge you now possess of my intense love does not render me more agreeable to your eyes than heretofore, at least do not deprive me of life, which for me consists in the bliss of seeing you as usual. I now receive from you no other favour than that which is absolutely necessary for my existence. If I have less, you will have a servant the less, and will lose the best and most affectionate one you have ever had or ever will have."

The queen, whether it was that she might appear other than she really was, or that she might put his love for her to a longer proof, or that she loved another whom she would not forsake for him, or, lastly, that she was glad to have this lover in reserve in case her heart should become vacant through any fault which might possibly be committed by him whom she loved already, said to him, in a tone which expressed neither anger nor satisfaction, "I will not ask you, Elisor, although I know not the power of love, how you can have been so presumptuous and so extravagant as to love me; for I know that the heart of man is so little at his own command that one cannot love or hate as one chooses. But since you have so well concealed your feelings, I desire to know how long you have entertained them ? ”

Elisor, looking in her beautiful face, and hearing her inquire about his malady, was not without hopes that she would afford him some relief ; but, on the other hand, seeing the self-command and the gravity with which she questioned him, he feared he had to do with a judge who was about to pronounce sentence against him. Notwithstanding this fluctuation between hope and fear, he protested that he had loved her since her early youth ; but that it was only within the last seven years he had been conscious of his pain, or rather of a malady so agreeable that he would rather die than be cured.

“ Since you have been constant for seven years,” said the queen, “ I must be no more precipitate in believing you than you have been in declaring your love to me. Therefore, if you speak the truth, I wish to convince myself of it in a manner that shall leave no room for doubt ; and if I am satisfied with the result of the trial, I will believe you to be such towards me as you swear that you are ; and then, when I find you to be indeed what you say, you shall find me to be what you wish.”

Elisor besought her to put him to any proof she pleased, there being nothing so hard that would not appear to him very easy, in the hope that he might be happy enough to convince her of the perfect love he bore her. He only waited, he said, to be honoured with her commands.

“ If you love me, Elisor, as much as you say,” replied the queen, “ I am sure that nothing will seem hard to you to obtain my good graces ; so I command you, by the desire you have of possessing them, and the fear of losing them, that to-morrow, without seeing me more, you quit the court and go to a place where for seven years you shall hear nothing of me, nor I of you. You know well that you love me, since you have had seven years' experience of the fact. When I shall have a similar seven years' experience, I shall believe what all your protestations would fail to assure me of."

This cruel command made Elisor believe at first that her intention was to get rid of him; but, upon second thoughts, he accepted the condition, hoping that the proof would do more for him than all the words he could utter. "If I have lived seven years without any hope," he said, "under the painful necessity of dissembling my love, now that it is known to you, and that I have some gleam of hope, I shall pass the other seven years with patience and calmness. But, madam, since in obeying the command you impose upon me I am deprived of all the joy I have ever had in the world, what hope do you give me that, at the end of seven years, you will own me for your faithful servant?"

Drawing a ring off her finger, "Let us cut this ring in two," said the queen; "I will keep one half and you the other, in order that I may recognize you by that token, in case length of time makes me forget your face."

Elisor took the ring, divided it in two, gave the queen one half, and kept the other. Then taking leave of her, more dead than those who have already given up the ghost, he went home to give orders for his departure. Sending his whole retinue to the country, he went away with only one attendant to a place so lonely and sequestered that none of his relations and friends had any tidings of him for seven years. How he lived during that time, and what sorrow absence made him endure, are things beyond my telling; but those who love can be at no loss to conceive them.

Precisely at the end of seven years, and at the moment when the queen was going to mass, a hermit with a long beard came to her, kissed her hand, and presented to her a petition, which she did not peruse at once, though her custom was to receive all the petitions that were presented to her, however poor were the people who preferred them. When mass was half said, she opened the petition, and found enclosed in it the half of the ring she had given to Elisor. This was an agreeable surprise for her, and before she read the paper, she ordered her almoner to bring her straightway the hermit who had presented the petition. The almoner sought for him in all directions, but all he could learn was that he had been seen to mount and ride away, but no one could tell which way he had gone. While awaiting the return of her almoner, the queen read the petition, which turned out to be a letter, composed in the best possible manner, and, but for the desire I feel to make it intelligible to you, I should never have ventured to translate it; for I must beg you to understand, ladies, that the Castilian is better adapted than the French tongue to express the emotions of love. The letter was as follows :

“ Time, a mighty teacher, gave me perfectly to know the nature of love. Time was afterwards assigned me, that the incredulous one might see by my protracted woe what love could not convince her of. Time hath shown me on what foundation my heart built its great love. That foundation was your beauty, which concealed great cruelty. Time teaches me that beauty is nothing, and that cruelty is the cause of my weal. Exiled by the beauty whose regards I so yearned for, I have come to be more conscious of your extreme unkindness. I obey your cruel order, however, and am perfectly content to do so ; for time has had such pity on me that I have wished to return to this place to bid you, not a good day, but a last farewell. Time has shown me love just as it is, poor and naked ; and I have no sense of it except regret. But time has likewise shown me the true love, which I have known only in that solitude where for seven years I have been doomed to mourn in silence. Through time I have come to know the love that dwells on high, at sight of which the other love vanishes, and I have given myself wholly to the one, and weaned my affections from the other. To that better love I devote my heart and my body, to do suit and service to it, and not to you. When I served you, you esteemed me nothing. I now give you back entirely the love you put into my heart, having no need either of it or you. I take my leave of cruelty, pain, torment, scorn, hatred, and the burning fire with which you are filled, no less than you are adorned with beauty. I cannot better bid farewell to all woes and pains and intolerable distresses, and to the hell of the amorous woman, than in bidding farewell to you, madam, without the least prospect that wherever you or I may be, we shall ever look upon each other more."

This letter was not read without tears and incredible surprise and regret. Indeed, the queen could not but feel so keenly the loss of a servant who loved her so perfectly, that not all her treasures, nor even her crown, could hinder her from being the poorest and most miserable princess in the world, since she had lost that which no wealth could replace. After hearing mass, she returned to her chamber, where she gave utterance to the lamentations her cruelty had merited. There was no mountain, rock, or forest to which she did not send in quest of the hermit ; but he who had taken him out of her hands, hindered him from falling into them again, and removed him to Paradise before she could discover his retreat in this world.

This example shows that no one can tell what can do him harm only and no good. Still less, ladies, should you carry distrust and incredulity so far as to lose your lovers through desiring to put them to too severe a proof.

"All my life long, Dagoucín," said Geburon, "I have heard the lady in question spoken of as the most virtuous woman in the world; but now I regard her as the most cruel that ever lived."

"It seems to me, however," said Parlamente, "that she did him no such great wrong, if he loved her as much as he said, in exacting from him seven years of trial. Men are so accustomed to lie on these occasions, that one cannot take too many precautions before trusting them—if they are ever to be trusted."

"The ladies of our day," said Hircan, "are wiser than those of times past; for in seven days' trial they are as sure with regard to a lover as others were in seven years."

"Yet are there those in company," said Longarine, "who have been wooed for seven years without ever being won."

"That is true," said Simontault; "but with your leave they ought to be classed with the ladies of bygone times, for in the modern class they would not be received."

"After all," said Oisille, "Elisor was greatly indebted to the queen, since she was the cause of giving his heart entirely to God."

"It was great luck for him," said Saffredent, "to find God in his way ; for, crossed as he was, I wonder he did not give himself to the devil."

"When your lady ill-used you," inquired Ennasuite, "did you give yourself to such a master?"

"Thousands of times ; but the devil would never take me, seeing that the tortures of hell were less than those she made me suffer, and that there is no devil more insupportable than a woman who is passionately loved and will not love in return."

"If I was in your place, and entertained such sentiments," said Parlamente, "I would never love a woman."

"Such has always been my unfortunate propensity," replied Saffredent, "that when I cannot command I think myself very happy in being able to serve. But tell me, pray, in conscience, now, do you applaud this princess for such excessive rigour?"

"Yes," said Oisille, "for I believe she did not choose either to love or be loved."

"That being the case," said Simontault, "why give him hopes after seven years should have passed?"

"You are right," said Longarine ; "and I think that ladies who do not choose to love should cut the matter short at once, and hold out no hopes to their suitors."

"Perhaps," said Nomerfide, "she loved another who was not so worthy as Elisor, and preferred the worse man to the better."

"It is my belief," said Saffredent, "that she was glad to keep him in play, that she might have him ready to her hand whenever she cast off the lover she then preferred to him."

"I see plainly," said Oisille, "that as long as the conversation runs upon this topic, those who do not like to be treated harshly will say everything bad they can of us ; so be pleased, Dagoucin, to give your voice to some one."

"I give it to Longarine," said he, "being assured that she will tell us something novel and speak the very truth without sparing either men or women."

"Since you have such a good opinion of my sincerity," said Longarine, "I will relate an anecdote of a great prince who surpassed in endowments all the princes of his time. Permit me also to remark, that falsehood and dissimulation are things which should be least of all used, unless in a case of extreme necessity. They are very ugly and disgraceful vices, especially in princes and great lords, whom truth becomes still more than other men. But there is no prince in the world, however glorious or rich he may be, who does not acknowledge the empire of love, and submit to its tyranny. Indeed, that arrogant god disdains all that is common, and delights only in working miracles every day, such as weakening the strong, strengthening the weak, making fools of the wise, and knowing persons of the ignorant, favouring the passions, destroying reason, and, in a word, turning everything topsy-turvy. As princes are not exempt from it, no more so are they from the necessity in which they are put by the desire of amorous servitude. Thence it comes that they are forced to use falsehood, hypocrisy, and feigning, which, according to Maître Jean de Meun, are means for vanquishing enemies. Though conduct of this nature is laudable in a prince, though it be censurable in all other men, I will recount to you the device employed by a young prince who tricked those who are used to trick all the world."

NOVEL XXV.

Cunning contrivance of a young prince to enjoy the wife of an advocate of Paris.

AMONG the advocates in Paris, there was one who was more esteemed than any nine others in his profession ; and as his knowledge and ability made him sought by all clients, he became the richest of all the men of the gown. Now, seeing that he had no children by his first wife, he thought he should have some by a second ; for though he was old, he had, nevertheless, the heart and the hope of a young man. He made choice of a Parisian of eighteen or nineteen, very handsome in face and complexion, and handsomer still in figure and plumpness. He loved her and treated her as well as possible ; but he had no children by her any more than by his first wife ; which the fair one at last took sorely to heart. As youth cannot carry the burden of care very far, the advocate's young wife resolved to seek elsewhere the pleasure she did not find at home, and used to go to balls and feasts ; but this she did, nevertheless, with such outward propriety, and so much caution, that her husband could not take offence, for she was always with those ladies in whom he had most confidence.

One day, when she was at a wedding entertainment, there happened to be present a young prince, who told me the story, and forbade me to name him. All I can tell you is that there never was, and never will be, I think, a prince in France of finer person and demeanour. The eyes and the countenance of the advocate's lady inspired the prince with love. He spoke to her so well, and with such grace, that she took pleasure in his discourse, and ingenuously owned to him that she had long had in her heart the love for which he craved, and begged he would spare himself the pains of trying to persuade her to a thing to which love had already made her consent at mere sight. The frankness of love having bestowed on the prince what was well worth the pains of being won by time, he failed not to thank the god who favoured him; and he plied his opportunity so well, that they agreed there and then upon the means of seeing each other in less crowded company. The time and the place being assigned, the prince appeared punctually, but in disguise, that he might not compromise the honour of the fair one. As he did not wish to be known by the rogues and thieves who roam by night, he had himself escorted by some trusty gentlemen, from whom he separated on entering the street where the lady resided, saying to them, "If you hear no noise within a quarter of an hour, go away, and return about three or four o'clock." The quarter of an hour having expired, and no noise having been heard, the gentlemen withdrew.

The prince went straight to the advocate's house, and found the door open as he had been promised, but on going up the staircase he met the advocate with a candle in his hand, who saw him first. Love, however, which gives wit and boldness in proportion to the crossings and thwartings it occasions, prompted the prince to go up at once to the advocate and say to him, "You know, master advocate, the confidence which I and all my house repose in you, and that I regard you as one of my best and most faithful servants. I am come to see you privately, as well to recommend my affairs to you as to beg you will give me something to drink, for I am very thirsty, and not let anybody know that I have been here. When I quit you, I shall have to go to another place, where I should not like to be known."

The poor man, delighted with the honour the prince did him by this familiar visit, begged him to enter his room, and told his wife to prepare a collation of the best fruits and the most exquisite confections she could find ; which she did right gladly, with all possible daintiness. Though she was in kerchief and mantle, and appeared to more than usual advantage in that négligé, the prince affected not to look at her, but talked continually about his business to her husband, who had always had the management of it. Whilst the wife knelt before the prince to present him some confections, and the husband was going to the buffet to fetch him something to drink, she found time to tell him not to fail on departing to enter a garderobe on the right, where she would soon join him. When he had drunk, he thanked the advocate, who wished by all means to accompany him : but this the prince would not allow, assuring him he was going to a place where he had no need of company. Then turning to the wife, he said, " I will not deprive you of your good husband, who is one of my old servants. You are so happy in having him that you have reason to thank God. You must serve and obey him well ; and if you did otherwise you would be very ungrateful." So saying, he went out, shut the door after him, that he might not be followed to the staircase, and entered the garderobe, where the fair one joined him as soon as her husband was asleep. She took him into a cabinet as elegant as could be, but in truth there was nothing in it handsomer than he and she ; and I doubt not that she kept word with him as to all she had promised. He left her at the hour he had told his people, and found them at the place where he had desired them to wait for him.

She was in kerchief and mantle, and appeared to more than usual advantage in that negligée

Photographed from Life

As the intrigue was of long duration, the prince chose a shorter way to go to the advocate's; this was to pass through a monastery. He managed matters so well with the prior that every night the porter opened the door for him towards midnight, and did the same when he returned. The advocate's house not being far from the monastery, he took no one with him. Notwithstanding the prince led the life I have described, still he loved and feared God, so true it is that man is a whimsical mixture of good and evil, and a perpetual contradiction. On his way to the advocate's he only passed through the monastery, but on his return he never failed to remain a long time at prayer in the church. The monks, seeing him on his knees as they went to matins, or returned from them, believed he was the most pious of men.

The prince had a sister who was much in the habit of frequenting that convent. As she loved her brother above all men, she used to commend him to the prayers of all the good people she knew. One day, when she was thus speaking for him with great earnestness to the prior of this monastery, the good father replied, "Why, madam, what is that you ask of me? You name the very man above all others to whose prayers I most desire to be myself commended; for if he is not pious and righteous, I never expect to see one that is so." Thereupon he quoted the text which says that "Blessed is he who can do evil, and doeth it not." The sister, who longed to know what proof the prior had of her brother's sanctity, questioned him so earnestly that he said to her, as if he was revealing a secret of the confessional, "Is it not a marvellous and goodly thing to see a young and handsome prince abandoning pleasures and repose to come frequently to our matins? He does not come like a prince who seeks to be honoured of men, but quite alone, like a simple monk, and he goes and hides himself in one of our chapels. This devotion so confounds my brethren and myself, that we do not think ourselves worthy to be called men of religion in comparison with him."

The sister did not know what to think of this ; for though her brother was very mundane, she knew, nevertheless, that he had a good conscience, that he believed in God and loved him much ; but she could never have imagined that he would make a practice of going to church at that hour. As soon as she saw him, she told him what a good opinion the monks had of him. He could not help laughing, and in such a manner that she, who knew him as she did her own heart, readily guessed that there was something concealed under this pretended devotion. She teased him so much that at last he told her the whole truth, as you have heard from me, and as she did me the honour to relate it to me.*

* Francis I. is the young prince who figures in this novel. The same story has been told of him, with additional circumstances, by some historians and others. It is thus related by a physician named Louis Guyon, Sieur de la Nauche, who flourished at the end of the 16th century. "Francis I. was enamoured of a lady of great beauty and great grace, the wife of an advocate of Paris, whom I will not name, for he has left children in high estate, and who are persons of good repute. The lady would never comply with the king's desires, but on the contrary repulsed him with many rude words, which hurt him sore. Knowing this, some courtiers and royal pimps told the king he might take her authoritatively and by the power of his royalty. One of them actually went and said this to the lady, who reported it to her husband. The advocate saw plainly that they must quit the realm, and that, moreover, they should find it very hard to escape, unless they obeyed. Finally, the husband allowed his wife to comply with the king's desire ; and that he might be no hindrance, he pretended to have business in the country for eight or ten days. Meanwhile he remained concealed in Paris, frequenting the brothels, trying to catch the pox to give to

You see by this, ladies, that there are no advocates so crafty, or monks so shrewd, but that they may be tricked in case of need when one loves well. Since, then, love teaches how to trick the tricksters, how much reason have we to fear it, we who are poor simple creatures ?

"Though I guess pretty well," said Geburon, "who is the hero of this tale, I cannot help saying that he is to be praised for having kept the secret ; for there are his wife, that the king might take it from her. He quickly got what he sought, infected his wife, and she the king, who gave it to several other women with whom he conversed ; and he never could be thoroughly cured, for all the rest of his life he was unhealthy, sad, peevish, and inaccessible." (Diverses Leçons de Louis Guyon, sieur de la Nauche. Lyon, 1610, t. II, p. 109.) Brantôme also speaks of the malady contracted by the king through his gallantries, and says that it shortened his life ; but he does not mention any woman in particular, or allude to the story of the advocate's wife. "Many have thought that she was no other than 'La belle Féronnière,' so called because she was married to an advocate of the Le Féron family, many members of which were distinguished in the bar of Paris."

"We must then," say the Bibliophiles Francais, "number among apocryphal anecdotes the last and vilest part of the adventure of the advocate of Paris. What is true, Margaret has made known to us ; modern historians, even those who have shown themselves most unfavourable to Francis I., have not reproduced the fact stated by Louis Guyon. M. Genin, editor of Margaret's letters, has even published the postscript of a letter of Cardinal d'Armagnac, which proves that at least a year before his death the king was in perfect health. (See Lettres de Marguerite d'Angoulême, &c., 1841, 8vo., p. 473.) Thus is annihilated the ignoble accusation of a shameful disease which should have hastened the death of Francis I."

In Grammont's Memoirs it is related that the Duke of York, afterwards James II., was the victim of the same sort of revenge on the part of a jealous husband as that attributed to the advocate of Paris.

few great lords who give themselves any concern either about the honour of women or public scandal, provided they have their pleasure. Frequently, even, they act in such a manner as to make people believe more than the truth."

"It would be well," said Oisille, "if all young lords followed this example, for often the scandal is worse than the sin."

"You may well believe," said Nomerfide, "that the prayers he offered up in church were very sincere and very acceptable to God."

"That is not a question for you to decide," said Parlamente, "for, perhaps, his repentance was such on his return from his assignation that his sin was forgiven."

"It is very difficult," said Hircan, "to repent of a thing that gives such pleasure. For my part, I have often confessed, but hardly repented it."

"If one does not repent, it were better not to confess," observed Oisille.

"Sin displeases me, madam," rejoined Hircan. "I am vexed at offending God; but pleasure pleases me."

"You would be very glad, you and others like you," remarked Parlamente, "that there were neither God nor law but what agreed with your own inclination."

"I confess," said Hircan, "I should be glad if my pleasures were as pleasing to God as they are to me. In that case, I would often give matter for rejoicing."

"You will not make a new God, however," said Geburon; "and so the best thing we can do is to obey the one we have. But let us leave these disputes to theologians, and see to whom Longarine will give her voice."

"To Saffredent," said Longarine, "on condition that he tells us the finest tale he can recollect, and that he is not so intent on speaking ill of women as not to do them justice when he can say anything to their advantage."

"With all my heart," said Saffredent. "I recollect, quite à propos, a story of a loose woman and a staid one; so you may choose whichever example of the two you prefer. You will see from this story that love makes bad acts be done by persons of bad heart; it also makes people of worth do things deserving of praise; for love is good in itself, but the depravity of the individual often makes it take a new title, such as lascivious, light, cruel, or vile. You will see, nevertheless, from the tale I am about to tell, that love does not change the heart, but makes it appear such as it is: wanton in the wanton, sober in the sober."

NOVEL XXVI.

How the Lord of Avannes was weaned from a dissolute amour with a lady of Pampeluna by the advice and sisterly affection of a virtuous lady.

DURING the reign of King Louis XII., there was a young lord named Monsieur D'Avannes, son of Monsieur d'Albret, the brother of John, King of Navarre, with whom D'Avannes usually resided. This young lord was so handsome, and had such an engaging demeanour at the age of fifteen, that he seemed to be made only to be beloved and admired; and so he was by all who saw him, and above all by a lady who lived in Pampeluna, in Navarre, and was married to a very wealthy man, with whom she lived happily. Though she was but three-and-twenty, yet, as her husband was nearly fifty, she dressed so modestly that she had more the appearance of a widow than of a married woman. She was never seen at weddings or festivities but with her husband, whose worth she prized so highly that she preferred it to the good looks of all other men. The husband, on his side, knew her to be so discreet, and had so much confidence in her, that he entrusted all the affairs of the house to her prudence.

This rich man and his wife were one day invited to the wedding of one of their female relations. D'Avannes was present to do honour to the bridal, and also because he was fond of dancing, in which he acquitted himself better than any man of his day. When dinner was over and the ball began, the rich man begged D'Avannes to dance. The latter asked with whom he would have him dance : whereupon the rich man, taking his wife by the hand, presented her to D'Avannes, and said, " If there was a handsomer lady in the room, monsieur, or one so much at my disposal, I would present her to you as I do this one, begging you, monsieur, to do me the honour to dance with her." The prince gladly complied ; and he was still so young that he took more pleasure in dancing and skipping than in gazing on ladies' charms. It was not so with his partner, who paid more attention to the handsome figure and good looks of her cavalier than to the dance ; but she took care not to let this appear.

Supper time being come, M. D'Avannes took leave of the company and retired to the château. The rich man escorted him thither, mounted on his mule, and said to him on the way, " Monsieur, you have to-day done so much honour to my relations and myself that I should be ungrateful if I did not make you every offering in my power. I know, monsieur, that lords like you, who have strict and close-handed fathers, have often more need of money than we, who, with our small retinue and good management, do nothing but amass. God, who has given me everything that could be desired in a wife, has thought fit to leave me still something to wish for in this world, since I am deprived of the joy which fathers derive from children. I know, monsieur, that it does not belong to me to adopt you ; but if you please to regard me as your servant, and confide your little affairs to me, as far as a hundred thousand crowns may go you shall never want for aid in your need."

M. D'Avannes was very glad of this offer, for he had just such a father as the other had mentioned ; and after thanking his generous friend, he called him his father by alliance. Thenceforth the rich man was so fondly attached to M. D'Avannes, that he failed not to ask him every morning and evening if he wanted anything ; and he made no secret of this to his wife, who was much pleased with it. M. D'Avannes never afterwards wanted anything he could desire. He often went to see his father by alliance, and eat with him ; and when he did not find him at home, the wife gave him whatever he asked for, and spoke to him so sagely, exhorting him to virtue, that he feared and loved her above all women in the world. For her part, having the fear of God and honour before her eyes, she contented herself with seeing and speaking to him, which is enough for a virtuous love ; nor did she ever give him any indication from which he could conjecture that she entertained for him any other than a sisterly and Christian regard. About the age of seventeen, M. D'Avannes began to attach himself more to the ladies than he had been used to do ; and though he would more gladly have loved his own good lady than any other, the fear of losing her friendship hindered him from speaking, and made him fix his choice elsewhere.

He addressed himself to a lady near Pampeluna, who had a house in the town, and had married a young man whose ruling passion was horses, dogs, and hawks. For her sake he gave a thousand entertainments, such as tournaments, games, races, wrestling-matches, masquerades, balls, &c. ; but as the husband was of a jealous temper, and the lady's father and mother knew her to be fair and frolicsome, and were afraid of her tripping, they watched her so closely that all M. D'Avannes could do was to whisper a word or two in her ear at a ball, although he well knew, and this made the matter still more provoking, that nothing but time and place was wanting for the consummation of their mutual inclinations. He went to his good father, told him he had a mind to visit Notre Dame de Montferrat, and begged he would receive his whole retinue into his house, for it was his wish to go alone. This request was instantly granted; but as love is a great prophet, and as the wife was under the influence of that power, she guessed the truth at once, and could not help saying to M. D'Avannes, "The Notre Dame you adore, monsieur, is not outside the walls of this town. Take care of your health, I beseech you." M. D'Avannes, who, as I have already said, feared and loved her, blushed so much at these words that he tacitly betrayed the truth, and went away.

After buying two handsome Spanish horses, he dressed himself as a groom, and disguised himself so well, that no one could have known him. The husband of the wanton lady, being fond of horses above all things, saw the two belonging to M. D'Avannes, and immediately offered to buy them. The bargain being concluded, he took particular notice of the groom, and seeing that he managed the horses very well, asked if he would enter his service. M. D'Avannes at once agreed to do so, and said he was a poor groom, who could do nothing but take care of horses, but this he could do so well that his master would be satisfied with him. The gentleman gave him the charge of all his horses, and when he reached home told his wife that he was going to the château, and that he begged her to look after his groom and his horses. As much to please her husband as because she had no other recreation, the lady went to see the horses, and noticed the new groom, who seemed to her a good-looking man ; but she did not recognize him. Seeing this, he made his obeisance to her in the Spanish fashion, took her hand and kissed it, and in so doing pressed it so strongly that she knew him, for he had often done the same thing in dancing with her. From that moment she thought of nothing but how she might contrive to speak with him in private ; and this she did that very evening. She was invited to an entertainment to which her husband was to have taken her ; but she feigned indisposition, and would not go. Her husband, not wishing to disappoint his friends, begged her, since she would not accompany him, to look after his dogs and his horses, and see that they wanted for nothing. This commission was most agreeable to her ; but the better to play her part, she replied that, since he would not employ her in higher things, she would prove to him, by her care for the least, how much she desired to please him.

No sooner was her husband gone than she went to the stable, where she found that something was not as it should be. To set matters right, she gave so many orders to the men that she was left alone with the head groom, and, for fear of anyone coming upon them, she told him to go into the garden and wait for her in a little corner at the end of an alley, which he did with such haste that he had not time even to thank her. Having given her orders in the stables, she went to see the dogs, and busied herself so much about them, that it seemed as though from being mistress she had become servant. All this being done, she went back to her chamber, and complained so much of fatigue that she had to go to bed. All her women withdrew except one, in whom she specially confided ; and this one she sent to the garden, with orders to bring her the man she would find at the end of the alley. The chambermaid found the head groom, brought him straightway to her mistress, and then mounted guard outside, to give warning should the husband return. M. D'Avannes, finding himself alone with his fair one, stripped off his groom's dress, his false nose and false beard, and not as a timorous groom, but in his proper character, boldly stepped into bed to her without asking leave, and was received as the handsomest man of his time by the most wanton woman in the country. There he remained until the return of her husband, when he resumed his mask, and quitted the place he had so cunningly usurped.

The husband, on entering his courtyard, found that his wife had carefully executed his orders, and thanked her for it. "I have only done my duty, my dear," she said. "It is true that if one had not an eye on the varlets, you have not a dog but what would be mangy, or a horse but would be out of condition ; but as I know their laziness and your wishes, you shall be better served than ever you have been." The husband, who thought he had got the best groom in the world, asked her what she thought of him. "I assure you, monsieur," said she,

“that he knows his business as well as any man you could find. Still he requires to be kept to his work, for he is the sleepest varlet I ever saw.” The wedded pair were on better terms with each other than they had ever been, and the husband became quite cured of his jealousy, because his wife was now as attached to her household concerns as she had previously been fond of feasts, dances, and company. Formerly she used always to spend four hours at her toilette ; but now she dressed very simply. Her husband, and those who did not know that a worse devil had driven out a lesser, extolled her for so happy a change. Meanwhile, this virtuous-seeming hypocrite led such a licentious life that reason, conscience, order, or moderation had no longer any place in her. M. D'Avannes, being young and of a delicate constitution, could not long sustain all this ; but became so pale and thin that he had no need of a mask to conceal his identity. His extravagant love for this woman had so infatuated him that he imagined he had strength to accomplish devoirs for which that of Hercules would not have been sufficient. Having fallen ill at last, and being teased by the lady, who was not so fond of him sick as sound, he asked for his discharge, which the husband granted with regret, making him promise to return as soon as he was recovered.

M. D'Avannes had no need of a horse for his departure, for he had only the length of a street to travel. He went at once to his good father's and found there only his wife, whose virtuous love for him had not at all decreased through absence. When she saw him so pale and thin, she could not help saying to him, “I do not know, monsieur, what is the present state of your conscience, but I do not perceive that your pilgrimage has increased your plumpness. I am very much mistaken if your travels by night have not fatigued you more than those by day. If you had made the journey to Jerusalem on foot, you would have come back more sunburnt, but not so lean and weak. Recollect this ride, and pay no more devotions to such images, which, instead of resuscitating the dead, bring the living to death. I should say more to you, but I see that, if you have sinned, you have been so punished that it would be cruel to add to your distress."

M. D'Avannes, more ashamed than penitent, replied, "I have heard, madam, that repentance follows close upon the fault. This I experience, to my cost ; and I pray you, madam, to excuse my youth, which is punished by the experience of the mischief it would not be warned against."

The lady changed the conversation, and made him lie down in a fine bed, where he remained for a fortnight, taking nothing but restoratives ; and the husband and the wife were so assiduous in their attentions that one or other was always with him. Though he had committed the folly you have heard against the feelings and the advice of the excellent lady, she nevertheless continued to love him as before, in the hope that, when this great fire of youth had passed away, he would reform and come to love rightly, and then he would be all her own. During the fortnight he remained in her house, she talked so much and so well to inspire him with a love of virtue, that he began to hate vice, and to be disgusted with his fault.

Gazing one day on the virtuous lady, who appeared to him much handsomer than the wanton, and knowing her excellent qualities better than he had ever done, he banished all fear, and thus addressed her : "I see no better means, madam, of becoming as good as you would have me to be, than to turn my whole heart to the love of virtue. Pray tell me, madam, I beseech you, would you not have the goodness to give me all the aid in your power to that end?"

The lady, delighted to see him come to the point to which she wished to lead him, replied, "I promise you, monsieur, that if you love virtue as much as becomes a lord of your rank, I will spare nothing to render you all the services of which I may be capable."

"Remember your promise, madam," returned M. D'Avannes; "and consider that God, whom the Christian knows only by faith, has deigned to assume flesh like that of the sinner, in order that, attracting our flesh to the love of his humanity, He might also attract our spirits to the love of his divinity, thus employing visible things to make us love the invisible. As this virtue, which I wish to love all my life long, has nothing visible about it except the outward effects it produces, it is necessary that it should assume some body, in order to make itself known to men. It has assumed that body, madam, in putting on yours, the most perfect it could have found. I own, therefore, that you are not only virtuous, but actually virtue itself; and I, who see that virtue shine beneath the veil of the most beautiful body that ever existed, wish to serve and honour it all my life, and to renounce for ever the love that is criminal and vain."

The lady, though no less delighted than surprised to hear him speak thus, was able completely to conceal her feelings, and said, "I will not take upon me, monsieur, to reply to your theology; but as I am much more disposed to fear the evil than to believe the good, I beg you will not address me in a language which gives you so poor an opinion of those who are weak enough to believe it. I know very well that I am a woman like any other, and a woman that has so many defects that virtue would do something greater in transforming me into itself than in transforming itself into me, unless it wished to remain unknown to the world. No one would think of recognizing it under such a garb as mine. Howbeit, with all my faults, my lord, I still love you as much as a woman can and ought who fears God and cherishes honour ; but this love shall not be declared to you until your heart is capable of the patience which a virtuous love requires. When that time comes, monsieur, I know what I shall have to tell you. Meanwhile, be assured that your welfare, your person, and your honour are dearer to me than to yourself."

Trembling, and with tears in his eyes, M. D'Avannes begged to be allowed to take a kiss as a pledge of her word, but she refused, saying that she did not choose to violate the custom of the country for him. Presently the husband arrived. "I am so much indebted, father," said D'Avannes, "to you and your wife, that I entreat you always to regard me as your son." The good man willingly expressed his assent. "Let me kiss you, then, in assurance of that affection," continued D'Avannes. This was done. "If I were not afraid," he said next, "of contravening the law, I would request the same favour of my mother, your wife." The husband desired his wife to kiss him, which she did without testifying either repugnance or alacrity ; whilst the fire which the previous conversation had already kindled in the heart of M. D'Avannes grew hotter at this kiss so ardently longed for, and before so peremptorily denied him.

After this M. D'Avannes went back to the king, his brother, and told all sorts of stories about his journey to Montferrat. To his great vexation, he learned that his brother was going to Oly and Taffares, and fearing that the journey would be a long one, he resolved to try before his departure if the lady were not better disposed towards him than she appeared. To this end he went to lodge in town, and took, in the street in which she lived, a dilapidated old wooden house, to which he set fire about midnight. The whole town was in great alarm ; the rich man was roused by the noise, and calling out from the window to know where the fire was, he was told that it was at the house of M. D'Avannes. Hurrying thither with all his domestics, he found the young lord in the street in his shirt. Such was his pity for him that, taking him in his arms, and covering him with his own robe, he hastened home with him, and said to his wife, " Here is a prisoner, my dear, whom I commit to your custody. Treat him like myself."

He was no sooner gone than M. D'Avannes, who would have been glad to be treated as her husband, jumped into the bed, hoping that the opportunity and the place would inspire the chaste lady with more humane sentiments ; but he was quite disappointed, for as he got in at one side she got out at the other, carrying away her chamarre, which she put on ; and seating herself at the bedside, she said, " What ! monsieur, did you imagine that opportunity could change a virtuous heart ? Know that as gold becomes purer in the fire, so a chaste heart grows stronger amid temptations. Often it grows stronger among them than elsewhere, and becomes more cold the more it is attacked by its opposite. Be assured, then, that if I had entertained any other sentiments than those I have avowed, I should not have lacked means, and that I neglect them only because I do not choose to use them. If you would have me continue to love you, banish not only the desire but the thought that, do what you may, you can ever bring me to be other than what I am."

Her women now coming in, she ordered them to prepare a collation of all sorts of confections ; but D'Avannes could neither eat nor drink, so great was his vexation at having missed his blow, and exposed himself, as he feared, by that demonstration of his desires, to lose the position of familiarity in which he had been with her. The husband, having taken measures for extinguishing the fire, returned, and prevailed on M. D'Avannes to pass the night in his house ; but he passed it in such a manner that his eyes were more occupied in weeping than in sleeping. He went and bade them adieu at the bedside very early in the morning, and plainly perceived, in kissing the lady, that she felt more pity than anger for his fault. This was a fresh brand to the fire of his love. After dinner he set out for Taffares with the king ; but before his departure he went twice more to take a final farewell of his good father and his wife, who, since her husband's first command, no longer made any scruple to kiss M. D'Avannes as her son.

There is no doubt that the more virtue did violence to the poor lady's eyes and countenance, constraining them to hide the fire that was in her heart, the more it augmented and became insupportable. Unable, then, any longer to endure the conflict between love and honour, which yet she had resolved should never be manifested, and having no longer the pleasure and consolation of seeing and conversing with him for whom she lived, she fell into a continuous fever, caused by a melancholy humour which she was forced to conceal, and which rendered the extremities of her body quite cold, though the inside burned continually. The physicians, a class of men on whose hands hangs not the health of men, began to despair on account of an obstruction of the spleen, which rendered her melancholy, and they advised the husband to warn his wife to think of her conscience, saying that she was in the hands of God ; as if people in good health were not there also. The husband, who was excessively fond of his wife, was so overwhelmed at this news that he wrote, for his own consolation, to M. D'Avannes, begging he would take the trouble to come and see them, in the hope that his presence would be a comfort to the patient. M. D'Avannes, on receipt of the letter, instantly started off post-haste, and on entering the house, he found the domestics of both sexes as full of grief for their mistress as she deserved. Shocked at what he saw, he remained at the door as if paralyzed, until his good father came and embraced him with tears, and without being able to utter a word, led him to the sick woman's chamber. Turning her languid eyes full upon him, she held out her hand, and drew him towards her with all the little strength left her.

“The moment is come, my lord,” she said, embracing him, “when all dissimulation must cease, and I must declare to you the truth I have had so much difficulty in concealing ; it is, that if you have had much love for me, I have had no less for you. But my pain is greater than yours, because I have been compelled to hide it. Conscience and honour have never allowed me to declare to you the sentiments of my heart, for fear of augmenting in you a passion which I wished to diminish. But know, my lord, that the no which I have said to you so often, and which it has cost me so much pain to pronounce, is the cause of my death. I die with satisfaction, since, by God's grace, notwithstanding the excess of my love, I have nothing to reproach myself with in regard to piety and honour. I say the excess of my love, for a less fire than mine has destroyed greater and stronger edifices. I die happy, since, before quitting this world, I can declare my affection, which corresponds to yours, save only that the honour of men and that of women are not the same thing. I pray you, my lord, henceforth not to be afraid to address yourself to the greatest and most virtuous ladies you can ; for it is hearts of that character which have the strongest passions, and which control them most wisely ; and your grace, good looks, and good breeding will always enable you to gather the fruits of your love. I will not ask you to pray to God for me, for I know that the gate of Paradise is not shut against true lovers, and that love is a fire which punishes lovers so well in this life that they are exempted from the sharp torment of purgatory. And now, farewell, my lord ; I commend to you your good father, my husband. Tell him truly, I beg you, what you know of me, in order that he may know how much I have loved God and him. And come no more before my eyes, for henceforth I wish to employ my mind only in putting myself in a condition to receive the promises made to me by God before the foundation of the world."

So saying, she embraced him with all the strength of her weak arms. M. D'Avannes, on whom compassion produced the same effect as pain and sickness in the lady, retired without being able to say a word, and threw himself upon a bed which was in the room, where he fainted several times. The lady then called her husband, and after many becoming demonstrations, she recommended M. D'Avannes to him, assuring him that next to himself that was the person she had loved best in the world. Having kissed her husband she bade him farewell, and then the holy sacrament of the altar was brought her after extreme unction, which she received with joy, and an entire assurance of her salvation. Finding at last that her sight was leaving her, and that her strength was failing, she began to repeat aloud her In manus, hearing which, M. D'Avannes sat up in the bed, and saw her render up with a gentle sigh her glorious soul to Him from whom it came. When he saw that she was dead, he threw himself upon the body, which he had never approached without trembling while she lived, and embraced it so that it was with difficulty he was forced away from it. The husband, who had never supposed he loved her so much, was surprised, and said, "It is too much, my lord." And thereupon they withdrew.

After they had long deplored, the one his wife, the other his mistress, M. D'Avannes recounted his love to the husband, and told him that until her death the deceased had never shown him any other signs than those of rigid reserve. This increased the husband's admiration for his departed wife, and still more his grief for her loss, and all his life afterwards he rendered service to M. D'Avannes. The latter, who was then but eighteen, returned to the court, and it was a long time before he would speak to any of the ladies there, or even see them ; and for more than two years he wore mourning.

You see, ladies, what a difference there is between a chaste woman and a wanton. Their love, too, produced very different effects ; for the one died a glorious death, and the other lived but too long after the loss of her reputation and her honour. As much as the death of the saint is precious before God, so is that of the sinner the reverse.

"Truly, Saffredent," said Oisille, "anything finer than the story you have just narrated one could not wish to hear; and if the rest of the company knew the persons as I do, they would think it still finer, for I never saw a handsomer gentleman, or one of better deportment, than M. D'Avannes."

"Must it not be owned," replied Saffredent, "that this was a chaste and good woman, since, in order to appear more virtuous than she was in reality, and to hide the love which reason and nature willed that she should have for so perfect a gentleman, she let herself die for want of giving herself the pleasure she desired without owning it."

"If she had felt that desire," said Parlamente, "she would not have lacked either place or opportunity to reveal it; but she had so much virtue that reason always controlled her desire."

"You may paint her portrait as you please," said Hircan; "but I know that a greater devil always drives out a less, and that the pride of the ladies seeks rather carnal pleasure than the fear and love of God. They are perpetual enigmas, and they are such clever dissemblers that it is impossible to know what is in their hearts. If the world had not annexed infamy to the loss of their honour, it would be universally found that nature has made them with the same inclinations and the same affections as ourselves. Not daring to take the pleasure they long for, they have changed that vice into another which they think more decorous: I mean a cruelty quite as much pretended as real, by which they think to gain immortal renown; and through the petty vanity of resisting the vice of nature's law (if nature is vicious), they resemble not only the brutes in cruelty and inhumanity, but even the devils, whose pride and craft they borrow."

"It is a pity you have a good woman for your wife," said Nomerfide, "since, not content with despising the virtue of other women, you would fain have it believed that they are all vicious."

"I am very glad," replied Hircan, "to have a wife who gives no ground for scandal ; a thing which I would not do either ; but as for chastity of heart, I believe that she and I are children of Adam and Eve ; so, if we examine ourselves well, we have no business to cover our nakedness with leaves, but rather to confess our weakness."

"I know well," said Parlamente, "that we all have need of the grace of God, being as we are by nature disposed to sin ; but it must be owned, nevertheless, that our temptations are not similar to yours : and if we sin through pride, no one suffers for it, and neither our body nor our hands receive any stain. But your pleasure consists in dishonouring women, and your glory in killing men in war ; which are two things absolutely opposed to the law of God."

"I admit what you say," remarked Geburon ; "but when God says that whoever looks upon a woman to lust after her hath already committed adultery in his heart, and that whoever hateth his neighbour is a homicide, do you suppose he does not also mean to speak of women?"

"God, who knoweth the heart, will decide," said Longarine. "Meanwhile, it is always a good thing that men should have no power to accuse us, for God's goodness is so great that He will not judge us without an accuser. Not judge us, did I say? The frailty of our hearts is so well known to Him that He will give us credit for not having proceeded to overt acts."

"Pray let us drop this dispute," said Saffredent. "We are here to tell tales, not to preach sermons. I therefore give my voice to Ennasuite, and beg that she will not forget to make us laugh."

"I shall not fail to do so," replied Ennasuite. "On my way hither I was told a story of two servants of a princess, which seemed to me so droll, and made me laugh so much, that I forgot the dismal tale I had prepared for to-day, and which I will postpone until to-morrow, my countenance being now too merry to make it pass well with you."

NOVEL XXVII.

Of a secretary who had the impudence to solicit the favours of his host's wife, and had only shame for his pains.

THERE was at Amboise a man who served a princess in the capacity of chamberlain, and who, being an obliging, civil person, gladly entertained people who came to him, especially his own comrades. Not long ago one of his mistress's secretaries came to lodge with him, and remained ten or twelve days. This secretary was so ugly that he was more like a king of the cannibals than a Christian. Though his host treated him as a friend and a brother, yet he behaved to him like a man who had—I will not say forgotten all decency, but who had never had a feeling of it in his heart: this was, to solicit in the way of lawless love his companion's wife, who not only had nothing engaging in her, but looked the very antidote of criminal pleasure, and as good and virtuous a woman as any in Amboise. On becoming aware of the man's bad intentions, the woman thought it better to expose his turpitude than to suppress and conceal it by a prompt and decisive refusal ; she therefore pretended to listen to his suit. He, thinking that he had made a conquest, pressed her incessantly, without considering that she was fifty, that she was not handsome, and that she had the reputation of a good woman who loved her husband. One day among others, when the husband was at home, and they were in a lower room, she pretended that the only thing requisite was to find a safe place for a tête-à-tête, where they might entertain each other as he wished. He proposed that they should go up to the garret. She rose at once, and begged him to go first, promising to follow him. He, laughing and grinning like an amorous monkey, went up stairs and posted himself in the garret. Whilst he was waiting for what he had so hotly desired, he listened with all his ears for his fair one's footsteps ; but instead of them, he heard her voice crying out, "Wait a bit, master secretary, till I go and ask my husband if it is his pleasure that I should go to you." Imagine how the man looked in tears who had cut such an ugly figure when laughing. He hurried down stairs with tears in his eyes, and begged her for God's sake to say nothing, and not set her husband against him. "I am certain," she replied, "that you are too much his friend to wish to say anything which might not be repeated to him ; so I am going to speak to him about this matter." And so she did, in spite of all he could do to prevent her. He ran away, and was as much ashamed as the husband was glad to hear of the trick his wife had played him. So satisfied was the good man with his wife's virtue, that he gave himself no concern about his companion's villany, thinking him sufficiently punished in having the shame he had intended for him recoil upon his own head.

This tale teaches us, ladies, that honest folk ought never to attach themselves to those who have neither conscience, heart, not wit enough to know God, honour, and true love.

"Though your tale be short," said Oisille, "it is as amusing as any I have heard, and to the honour of a worthy woman."

"It is no great thing to boast of," said Simontault, "for an honest woman to refuse a man so ugly as you represent this secretary to have been. Had he been handsome and well-bred, her conduct would then have been some evidence of virtue. As I think I know the man, if it was my turn to tell a story, I think I could give you one about him not less droll than this."

"Well, do so," said Ennasuite.

"Courtiers, and inhabitants of great cities," he continued, "have such a good opinion of their own capacity that they regard others as very small folk in comparison with themselves. Though craft and cunning are of all countries and all conditions, yet as those who think themselves the shrewdest do so only through vanity, they are only the more laughed at when they happen to make some mistake, as I shall instance to you in an affair of recent occurrence."

NOVEL XXVIII.

A secretary, thinking to dupe a certain person, was himself duped.

WHEN King Francis I. was at Paris with his sister the Queen of Navarre, that princess had a secretary named Jean, who was not one of those who let anything worth having be lost for want of picking it up. There was neither president nor counsellor with whom he was not acquainted, merchant nor rich man whose house he did not frequent. At the same time there also arrived in Paris a merchant of Bayonne, named Bernard du Ha, who, having business in hand, and being in need of protection, addressed himself to the lieutenant criminel, who was of his country. The Queen of Navarre's secretary used also to go frequently to see the same person, as a good servant of his master and mistress. One holiday, when he went to the house, he found neither the lieutenant nor his lady at home ; but there was Bernard du Ha, playing a viol or some other instrument for the servant-women of the house, and teaching them to dance the branles of Gascony. When the secretary saw this, he wanted to make Bernard believe that he was doing wrong, and that if the lieutenant and his lady knew of it they would be very angry. Having talked to him in so alarming a manner that the other begged him not to tell what he had seen, he said, "What will you give me not to say a word about it?" Bernard du Ha, who was not so frightened as he made believe, perceiving that the secretary wanted to dupe him, promised to give him a pasty of the best Basque ham he had ever eaten. The secretary was highly pleased, and begged that he might have the pasty on the following Sunday after dinner, which the other promised.

Counting on this promise, the secretary went to see a lady of Paris, whom he passionately desired to marry, and said to her, "On Sunday, madam, I will come and sup with you, if you please; but do not trouble yourself about anything but good bread and good wine, for I have so gulled a stupid fellow of Bayonne, that he will be at the cost of the rest: I will bring you the best Basque ham that ever was tasted in Paris." The lady, taking his word for it, invited two or three of her fair neighbours, and assured them she would treat them to something they had never tasted before. Sunday being come, the secretary went in quest of the merchant, and found him at the Pont au Change. Saluting him very politely, he said, "To the devil with you for having given me such trouble to find you."

"Many a one has taken more trouble than you," replied Bernard du Ha, "and has not been so well rewarded in the end." So saying, he produced the pasty, which he had under his cloak, and which was big enough to set before a small army. The secretary was so pleased that, although he had an enormous ugly mouth, he squeezed it up so small that one would have thought he could not bite the ham. Hastily clutching the pasty, he turned his back upon the merchant without inviting him to partake of the treat, and carried it to his mistress, who was very curious to know if the eatables of Guienne were as good as those of Paris. Supper-time being come, the company began to fall to at the soup with much vigour. "Leave those insipid things," said the secretary, "and let us taste this whet for wine." So saying, he opened the pasty, and set about cutting the ham, but it was so hard that he could not stick the knife into it. After trying again and again, he found that he was hoaxed, and that instead of a ham he had been given a wooden shoe, such as is worn in Gascony, with a stick thrust into the end of it, and the whole smeared with suet and powdered with rust of iron and spices, which gave out a very pleasant odour. The secretary was greatly ashamed both of having been duped by the person he thought to dupe, and having deluded his mistress, contrary to his intentions ; to say nothing of his sore disappointment at having to content himself with soup for supper. The ladies, who were as vexed as himself, would have accused him as the author of the trick if they had not seen by his face that he was anything but pleased with its success.

After making a light supper, the secretary retired in great dudgeon, and seeing that Bernard du Ha had not kept his word, he did not think himself bound by his own. Accordingly he went to the lieutenant criminel, intending to say everything bad he could of the merchant ; but the latter had been beforehand with him, and had already related the adventure to the lieutenant, who laughed in the secretary's face, and told him that he had learned to his cost what it was to play tricks on Gascons. And so all he got was the shame of having been the dupe of his own cunning.

The same thing happens to many, who, wishing to deceive, find themselves deceived. Therefore it is best to do to others only as we would be done by.

"I assure you," said Geburon, "that I have often witnessed such occurrences ; and those who pass for village boobies often overreach persons who think themselves very clever ; for there is no greater ninny than a man who thinks himself cunning, nor any one wiser than he who knows that he is not so.'

"He who knows his own incapacity, knows something, after all," said Parlamente.

"For fear time should fail us, I give my voice to Nomerfide," said Simontault. "I am sure she will not delay us long by her rhetoric."

"You shall have from me the satisfaction you desire," said Nomerfide. "I am not surprised, ladies, if love inspires princes and well-educated persons with the art of extricating themselves from danger. In fact, they are brought up in intercourse with so many persons of knowledge, that it would be very surprising if they were ignorant of anything. But address in love appears with much greater lustre when those who display it are persons of less intelligence. I shall, then, relate to you a piece of cleverness exhibited by a priest through the prompting of love alone; for he was so ignorant in all other things, that he could hardly say mass."

NOVEL XXIX.

A villager, whose wife intrigued with the parish priest, suffered himself to be easily deceived.

THERE was at Carrelles, a village in the county of Maine, a rich husbandman, who in his old age married a handsome young wife, by whom he had no children; but she consoled herself for this disappointment with several friends. When gentlemen and persons of mark failed her, she reverted to her last resource, which was the church, and chose for the accomplice of her sin him who could absolve her—that is to say, her priest, who paid frequent visits to his sheep. The dull old husband suspected nothing ; but as he was a rough and sturdy old fellow, she played her game as secretly as she could, being afraid that her husband would kill her if he came to know of it.

One day, when the husband was gone into the fields, and his wife did not expect him back for some time, she sent for master parson to confess her ; but during the time they were making good cheer together the husband arrived so suddenly that the priest had not time to steal off. Intending, then, to hide, he went by the wife's directions up into a loft, and covered the trap-hole in the floor by which he had got in with a winnowing basket. Meanwhile, the wife, who was afraid her husband might suspect something, regaled him well at dinner, and plied him so well with wine, that the good man, having taken a little drop too much, and being fatigued with walking, fell asleep in a chair by the fireside. The priest, who found it dull work waiting in the loft, on ceasing to hear any noise in the room below, leaned over the trap-hole, and stretching out his neck as far as he could, saw that the good man was asleep. But while making his observations he inadvertently leaned with so much weight on the winnowing basket, that down fell basket, priest and all, by the side of the good man, and woke him up with the noise. But the priest was on his legs before the other had opened his eyes, and said, " There's your winnowing basket, gossip, and I'm much obliged to you ;" and so saying, he walked off. The poor husbandman, quite bewildered, asked his wife what was the matter? " It is your winnowing basket, my dear," she replied, " which the priest had borrowed and has now returned."

"It is a very clumsy way of returning what one has borrowed," said the good man, grumbling, "for I thought the house was falling."

In this way the priest saved himself at the expense of the husbandman, who objected to nothing but the abrupt manner in which his reverence had returned his winnowing basket. The master he served, ladies, saved him for that time, in order to possess and torment him longer.

"Do not imagine that simple folk are more exempt from craft than we are," said Geburon; "far from it, they have a great deal more. Look at thieves, murderers, sorcerers, false coiners, and other people of that sort, whose wits are always at work; they are all simple folk."

"I am not surprised that they have more craft than others," said Parlamente, "but I am surprised that, having their wits directed to so many other things, they can think of love. Is it not strange that so fine a passion can enter such vulgar hearts?"

"You know, madam, what Maître Jean de Meun says:—

Aussi bien sont amourettes.

Sous bureau que sous brunettes.

Besides, the love of which the tale speaks is not that which makes one wear harness. The poor, who have not wealth and honours like us, have in compensation more of the commodities of nature. Their viands are not so delicate as ours, but good appetite makes amends for that deficiency, and they fare better on coarse bread than we on dainties. Their beds are not so handsome or so well made as ours, but their sleep is sounder.

Their ladies are neither painted nor decked out like ours whom we idolize, but they receive pleasure from them much oftener than we, without fearing any other tongues than those of the beasts and birds that see them. In a word, they lack what we have, and have abundance of what we have not."

"Pray let us have done with this peasant and his wife," said Nomerfide, "and finish the day before vespers. It is for Hircan to do so."

"I will finish it, then, with a very dismal tale," said Hircan. "Though I do not willingly speak ill of ladies, knowing as I do that men are malicious enough to deduce from the fault of one conclusions disparaging to all the rest, yet the singularity of the adventure overcomes my fear, and the exposure of ignorance will perhaps make others wiser."

NOVEL XXX.

Frailty of a lady who, to conceal one evil, commits another still greater.

WHEN Louis XII. was king, the legate at Avignon being then a lord of the house of Amboise, nephew to the legate of France, whose name was George, there was a lady in Languedoc who had an income of more than four thousand ducats. Her name I will not mention, for sake of her relations. She was still very young when her husband died, leaving her but one son; and whether from regret for her husband, or love of her son, she resolved never to marry again. To avoid all occasion for doing so, she frequented only the society of the devout, thinking that opportunity makes sin, and not knowing that sin forges opportunity. She gave herself up wholly to the divine service, shunning all parties of pleasure, and everything worldly, insomuch that she made it a matter of conscience to be present at a wedding, or to hear the organ played in church. When her son was seven years old, she chose a man of holy life as his preceptor, to bring him up in piety and sanctity. But when he was between fourteen and fifteen, nature, who is a very mysterious schoolmaster, finding him well grown and idle, taught him a very different lesson from any he had learned from his preceptor; for under that new instruction he began to look upon and desire such things as seemed to him fair and among others a demoiselle who slept in his mother's room. No one had the least suspicion of this, for he was regarded as a child, and nothing was ever heard in the house but goodly discourse.

The young gallant having begun secretly to solicit this girl, she went and told her mistress. The mother loved her son so much, that she believed this to be a story told to get him into disgrace; but the girl repeated her complaints so often that her mistress at last said she would find out the truth of the matter: if it was as the girl stated, she would punish her son severely, but if not, the accuser should pay the penalty. In order, then, to come at the truth, she ordered the demoiselle to make an appointment with the young gentleman that he should come to her at midnight, to the bed in which she lay alone near the door in his mother's chamber. The demoiselle obeyed her orders, and that night the mother lay down in the demoiselle's bed, resolving that if her son came thither she would chastise him in such a manner that he should never lie with a woman without remembering it. Such were her angry thoughts when her son actually entered the bed in which she lay ; but unable still to bring herself to believe that he had any unchaste intention, she waited for some plainer evidence of his bad purpose before she would speak to him. But she waited so long, and nature is so frail, that her anger ended in an abominable pleasure, and she forgot that she was a mother. As water retained by force is more impetuous when let loose, so was it with this unfortunate woman, who made her whole pride consist in the violence she did her body. When she began to descend the first step from her chastity she found herself at once at the bottom, and became pregnant that night by him whom she wished to hinder from getting others with child.

No sooner was the sin committed than she was seized with the most poignant remorse, and her repentance lasted as long as her life. So keen was her anguish on rising from beside her son, who never discovered his mistake, that entering a closet, and calling to mind the firm resolution she had formed and which she had so badly executed, she passed the whole night alone in an agony of tears. But instead of humbling herself, and owning that of ourselves alone, and without the aid of God, we can do nothing but sin, she thought by her own efforts and by her tears to repair the past and prevent future mischief, always imputing her sin to the occasion, and not to wickedness, for which there is no remedy but the grace of God. As if there was but one sort of sin which could bring damnation, she applied her whole mind to avoid that one ; but pride, which the sense of extreme sinfulness should destroy, was too strongly rooted in her heart, and grew in such a manner, that, to avoid one evil, she committed many others.

Early next morning she sent for her son's governor, and said to him, " My son is coming to maturity, and it is time that he should be removed from the house. One of my relations, who is beyond the mountains with the Grand Master of Chaumont, will be glad to have him. Take him away, then, forthwith; and to spare me the pain of parting, do not let him come to bid me farewell." Without more ado she gave him money for the journey, and he set out the next day with his pupil, who was very glad of it; and having had what he wanted of his mistress, desired nothing better than to go to the wars. The lady was long plunged in extreme grief, and but for the fear of God she could have wished that the unhappy fruit of her womb should perish. To conceal her fault she pretended to be ill; and having a bastard brother in whom she confided above all men, and to whom she had made large donations, she sent for him, informed him of the misfortune that had happened to her, but not of her son's share in it, and begged him to save her honour by his help, which he did. Some days before she expected to be confined, he advised her to try change of air, and remove to his house, where she would be more likely to recover than at home. She went thither with hardly any attendants, and found there a midwife, who had been sent for as if to attend her brother's wife, and who, without knowing the lying-in woman, delivered her by night of a fine little girl. The gentleman put the infant out to nurse as his own; and the lady, after a month's stay, returned home, where she lived more austere than ever.

Her son being grown up, and Italy being at peace, he sent to beg his mother's permission to return to her. But as she was afraid of relapsing into the same crime, she put him off from time to time as well as she could; but he pressed her so much, that at last she gave him leave to come home, having no plausible reason to allege for persisting longer in her refusal. She sent him word, however, not to appear before her until he was married ; to choose a wife whom he loved passionately ; and not to let his choice be determined by wealth, for if he chose a comely wife that was enough.

During this time the daughter, who had been left with the bastard brother, having grown up into a very handsome girl, her guardian thought of removing her to some place where she should not be known. He consulted the mother on the subject, and it was her wish that she should be given to the Queen of Navarre, named Catherine. The girl was so handsome and well-bred at the age of thirteen, that the Queen of Navarre had a great regard for her, and wished much to marry her well ; but the girl being poor, many lovers presented themselves, but no husband. The unknown father, returning from Italy, visited the court of the Queen of Navarre, and no sooner saw his daughter than he fell in love with her. As he had his mother's permission to marry any woman he liked, he only asked was she of noble lineage, and being told that she was, he demanded her in marriage of the Queen of Navarre, who very gladly bestowed her upon him, knowing well that the cavalier was as wealthy as he was well-bred and handsome.

The marriage having been consummated, the gentleman wrote to his mother, saying she could no longer close her doors against him, since he brought with him a wife as handsome and as perfect as she could wish for. His mother made inquiries as to the wife he had taken, and found that it was their own daughter, which caused her such excessive affliction, that she was near dying suddenly, seeing that the means she employed to put a stop to the course of her misfortune only served to make it greater. Finding no remedy for what had occurred, she went to the Legate of Avignon, confessed the enormity of her crime, and asked his advice. The legate, to satisfy her conscience, summoned several theologians, to whom he submitted the affair without naming the person concerned. The decision of this council of conscience was, that the lady was never to reveal the secret to her children, who had not sinned, inasmuch as they had known nothing; but that, as for herself, she was to do penance all her life. So the poor lady returned home, where soon after arrived her son and her daughter-in-law, who loved each other so much, that never was there a fonder couple, or one more like each other, she being his daughter, sister and wife; and he her father, brother, and husband. Their love continued unabated to the last, whilst their profoundly penitent mother never saw them caress but she withdrew to weep.*

* This novel is founded on a popular tradition, traces of which are found in several places in France. Millin, in his Antiquités Nationales, speaking of the collegial church of Ecouis, says: "There was found in the middle of the nave, in the cross aisle, a white marble slab, on which was inscribed this epitaph:

‘Ci-gît l’enfant, ci-gît le père,
Ci-gît la sœur, ci-gît le frere,
Ci-gît la femme et le mari,
Et ne sont que deux corps ici.’”

[Here lies the child, here lies the father, here lies the sister, here lies the brother, here lie the wife and the husband, and there are but two bodies here.]

“The tradition is, that a son of Madame d’Ecouis had by his mother, without knowing her or being recognized by her, a daughter named Cécile. He afterwards married in Lorraine that same Cécile, she being then with the Duchess of Bar. Thus Cécile was her husband’s daughter and sister. They were interred in the same grave at Ecouis, in 1512.” Millin says that the same story is told

There, ladies, is what happens to those of your sex who think to vanquish, by their own strength, love and nature with all the faculties which God has given them.

(but with modifications) in other churches of France; for instance, in that of Alincourt, a village between Amiens and Abbeville, is seen the following epitaph:

“ Ci-gît le fils, ci-gît la mere,
 Ci-gît la fille avec le pere,
 Ci-gît la sœur, ci-gît le frere,
 Ci-gît la femme et le mari,
 Et ne sont que trois corps ici.”

[Here lies the son, here lies the mother, here lies the daughter with the father, here lies the sister, here lies the brother, here lie the wife and the husband, and there are only three bodies here.]

Gaspard Meturas, who has inserted this epitaph in his Hortus Epitaphiorum Selectorum, 1648, says that it is found in a church of Claremont, in Auvergne, and adds: “The key to it consists in saying that the mother engendered her husband by lying with (en épousant) her own father; for it thence follows that he was her son, her brother and her husband, even legitimately, the marriage having been effected with a righteous ignorance on both sides.

Dunlop, in his History of Fiction, says that the thirty-fifth novel of the second part of Bandello “is the same story with the plot of the Mysterious Mother of Horace Walpole, and the thirtieth tale of the Queen of Navarre. The first part of this story had already been told in the twenty-third novel of Massuccio. The second part, which relates to the marriage only, occurs in Bandello and the Queen of Navarre. It is not likely, however, that the French or Italian novelists borrowed from one another. The tales of Bandello were first published in 1554, and as the Queen of Navarre died in 1549, it is improbable that she had an opportunity of seeing them. On the other hand, the work of the queen was not printed till 1558, nine years after her death, so it is not likely that any part of it was copied by Bandello, whose tales had been edited some years before. It may therefore be presumed that some current traditions furnished both with the horrible incident they report. Indeed, Bandello declares, in the introduction to the tale, that it happened in Navarre, and was told to him by a lady of that country. In Luther’s Colloquia Mensalia, under the article Auricular Confes-

Better were it to own their weakness, avoid exposure to temptation, and say to God, like David, "Lord I suffer force : answer for me."

"It is impossible to imagine a stranger case," said Oisillé. "Methinks there is no man or woman who ought not to humble himself and fear God, seeing how the hope of doing a good thing was so productive of mischief."

"Be assured," said Parlamente, "that the first step man takes in self-confidence, removes him so far from the confidence he ought to have in God."

"Man is wise," said Geburon, "when he recognizes no greater enemy than himself, and distrusts his own will and counsel, however good and holy they may seem in his eyes."

"For no apparent prospect of good to come of it, however great," said Longarine, "should a woman expose herself to share the same bed with a man, however sion, it is said to have occurred at Erfurt, in Germany. It is also related in the eleventh volume of Byshop's Blossoms, and in L'Inceste Innocent, a novel by Desfontaines, published in 1638. Julio de Medrano, an old Spanish writer of the sixteenth century, says that he heard a similar story when he was in the Bourbonnais, where the inhabitants showed him the house in which the parties had lived, and repeated to him this epitaph, which was inscribed on their tomb" (that in four lines quoted above). "Mr. Walpole disclaims having had any knowledge of the tale of the Queen of Navarre or Bandello when he wrote his drama. Its plot, he says, was suggested by a story he had heard when very young, of a lady who, under uncommon agonies of mind, waited on Archbishop Tillotson, revealed her crime, and besought his counsel in what manner she should act, as the fruit of her horrible artifice had lately been married to her son, neither party being aware of the relation that subsisted between them. The prelate charged her never to let her son or daughter know what had passed. For herself, he bade her almost despair."

nearly related to her. Fire and tow are no safe neighbours."

"Assuredly," said Ennasuite, "this woman was a conceited fool, who thought herself such a saint that she could not sin, as some would have simple folks believe of them, which is a gross and pernicious error."

"Is it possible," exclaimed Oisille, "that there are people so foolish as to believe anything of the sort?"

"They do still more," said Longarine; "they say that it is necessary to habituate oneself to chastity; and to try their strength, they talk with the handsomest women and those they love best, and by kissing and touching them make trial of themselves as to whether or not they are in a condition of complete mortification of the flesh. When they find that this pleasure moves them, they fall back on solitude, fasting, and discipline; and when they have so subdued the flesh that neither conversation nor kissing causes them any emotion, the fools try the temptation of lying together and embracing without any voluptuous desire. But, for one who resists, a thousand succumb. Thence have ensued so many mischiefs, that the Archbishop of Milan, where this religious practice was introduced, was compelled to separate the sexes, and put the women into the women's convent, and the men into that of the men."

"Was there ever a more extravagant folly?" said Geburon. "A man wants to make himself sinless, and seeks with avidity provocations to sin."

"Some there are," said Saffredent, "who do quite the reverse; they shun temptation as much as possible, and yet concupiscence clings to them everywhere. The good Saint Jerome, after having soundly flogged and hid himself in the desert, confessed that he had been unable to overcome the fire of lust that burned in his marrow.

The sovereign remedy, then, is to commend oneself to God; for, unless He upholds us by His power, His virtue, and His goodness, we not only fall, but take pleasure in falling."

"You do not see what I do," said Hircan; "which is, that whilst we were telling our stories the monks who were behind that hedge did not hear the vesper-bell; but no sooner did they hear us talk of God than away they went, and now they are ringing the second bell."

"We shall do well to follow them," said Oisille, "and praise God for his grace in enabling us to pass this day so happily."

Upon this the whole company rose and went to the church, where they devoutly heard vespers. At supper they talked over the conversation of the day, and many things which had occurred in the time, each citing what he thought most worthy of recollection. After a cheerful evening, they retired to their beds, in the hope of resuming next day a pastime which was so agreeable to them. Thus ended the third day.

FOURTH DAY.

MADAME OISILLE rose earlier than the rest, according to her good custom, and meditated on Holy Writ whilst awaiting the gradual assemblage of the company. The laziest excused themselves with the words of Scripture, "I have a wife, and I cannot come so soon." Thus it was that when Hircan and his wife made their appearance, Madame Oisille had already begun her reading; but she knew how to pick out the passages in which those are censured who neglect the hearing of the Word. She not only read the text, but she made them such good and holy exhortations that it was impossible for them to take offence at them. When these devotional exercises were ended, Parlamente said to her, "I was vexed when I came in at having been lazy, but I now congratulate myself on my laziness, since it has made you speak so well. I derive a double advantage from it—repose of body and satisfaction of mind."

"For penance, then, let us go to mass," said Oisille, "to pray to our Lord for the will and the strength to do His commands; and then let Him command what He pleases."

As she said these words they entered the church, and after having heard mass with much devotion, they sat down to table, where Hircan did not fail to banter his wife for her laziness. After dinner every one retired to study his part, and at the appointed hour they all repaired punctually to the usual rendezvous. Oisille asked Hircan who should begin the day. "If my wife had not been the first speaker yesterday," he said, "I would give my voice for her; for though I have always believed that she loved me better than any man in the world, she has shown me to-day that she loves me a great deal better than God and his Word, since she has preferred my company to your reading. Since, then, I cannot give my voice to the most discreet of the women, I will give it to the most discreet of the men—I mean Geburon, whom I entreat not to spare the monks.”

“It is not necessary to make the entreaty,” replied Geburon. “I hold them too well in mind to forget them. It is not long since I heard a story told by Monsieur de Saint Vincent, then the emperor’s ambassador, which is too good to be lost.”

NOVEL XXXI.

A monastery of cordeliers was burned and the monks in it, in perpetual memory of the cruelty of one of them who was in love with a lady.

WITHIN the dominions of the Emperor Maximilian of Austria there was a monastery of Cordeliers, held in high esteem, and near it was the house of a gentleman. This gentleman was so infatuated with these Cordeliers that there was nothing he did not give them, in order to have part in the benefit of their fastings and prayers. Among others, there was in this monastery a tall, handsome young Cordelier, whom the gentleman had taken for his confessor, and who was as absolute in the house as the master himself. The Cordelier, struck by the exceeding beauty and propriety of the gentleman’s wife, became so enamoured of her, that he could neither eat nor drink, and lost all natural reason. Resolved to execute his design, he went all alone one day to the gentleman's house. Finding no one at home, the monk asked the lady whither her husband was gone. She replied that he was gone to one of his estates, where he was to remain two or three days; but that if he wanted him, she would send an express to bring him back. The Cordelier told her that was unnecessary, and began to go to and fro about the house, as if he had some affair of consequence in his head.

As soon as the monk had left the lady's room, she said to one of her women (there were but two of them), "Run after the father, and learn what he wants; for I know by his looks that he is not pleased." The girl, finding him in the court-yard, asked him if he wanted anything? He said he did, and drawing her into a corner, he plunged into her bosom a poniard he carried in his sleeve. He had hardly done the deed when one of the gentleman's men, who had gone to receive the rent of a farm, entered the yard on horseback. As soon as he had dismounted, he saluted the Cordelier, who embraced him, and buried the poniard in his back, after which he closed the gates of the château.

The lady, seeing that her servant did not return, and surprised at her remaining so long with the Cordelier, said to the other woman, "Go see why your companion does not come back." The servant went, and no sooner came in sight of the Cordelier than he called her aside, and served her as he had done the other. Knowing that he was then alone in the house, he went to the lady, and told her that he had long loved her, and that it was time she should obey him. She, who could never have suspected him of anything of the kind, replied, "I believe, father, that if I were so unhappily inclined, you would be the first to condemn me and cast a stone at me."

"Come out into the yard," said the monk, "and you will see what I have done."

The poor woman did so, and seeing her two women and her man lying dead on the ground, was so horrified, that she remained motionless and speechless as a statue. The villain, who did not want to have her for an hour only, did not think fit to offer her violence then, and said to her, "Have no fear, mademoiselle; you are in the hands of that man in all the world who loves you most." So saying, he took off his robe, beneath which he had a smaller one, which he presented to the demoiselle, threatening, if she did not put it on, that he would treat her as he had done the others. The demoiselle, more dead than alive, made a show of obeying him, as well to save her life as to gain time, in hopes that her husband would return. She took off her head-dress, by the Cordelier's order, as slowly as she could; and when she had done so, the monk, without regard to the beauty of her hair, cut it off in haste, made her strip to her shift, and put on the small robe, and then, resuming his own, set off with all the speed he could make along with the little Cordelier he had so long coveted.

God, who has pity on the wronged innocent, was touched by the tears of this poor lady, and so ordered things that her husband, having despatched his business sooner than he expected, took that very road to return home by which the Cordelier was carrying off his wife. The monk, descrying the husband from a distance, said to the lady, "Here comes your husband. I know that if you look at him he will try to get you out of my hands; so walk before me, and do not turn your head in his direction, for if you make him the least sign, I shall have plunged my poniard in your breast sooner than he will have delivered you." Presently the gentleman came up, and asked him whence he came? "From your house, monsieur," replied the Cordelier. "I left mademoiselle quite well, and she is expecting you." The gentleman rode on without perceiving his wife; but the valet who accompanied him, and who had always been in the habit of conversing with the Cordelier's companion, named Friar John, called to his mistress, thinking that she was that person. The poor woman, who durst not turn her head towards her husband, made no reply to the valet; and the latter crossed the road, that he might see the face of this pretended Brother John. The poor lady, without saying anything, made a sign to him with her eyes, which were full of tears. The valet then rode up to his master, and said, "In conscience, monsieur, Friar John is very like mademoiselle, your wife. I had a look at him as I crossed the road. It is certainly not the usual Friar John; at least, I can tell you, that if it is, he weeps abundantly, and that he gave me a very sorrowful glance of his eye."

"Come out into the yard," said the monk, "and you will see what I have done."

The gentleman told him he was dreaming, and made light of what he said. The valet, however, still persisting in it that there was something wrong, asked leave to ride back and see to it, and begged his master to wait for him. The gentleman let him go, and waited to see what would be the upshot. But the Cordelier, hearing the valet coming after him with shouts to Friar John, and making no doubt that the lady had been recognized, turned upon the valet with a great iron-bound staff, gave him such a blow on the side that he knocked him off his horse, and springing instantly upon him with the poniard, speedily dispatched him. The gentleman, who from a distance had seen his valet fall, and supposed that this had happened by some accident, spurred towards him at once to help him. As soon as he was within reach, the Cordelier struck him a blow of the same staff with which he had struck the valet, unhorsed and fell upon him ; but the gentleman, being very strong, threw his arms round the Cordelier, and hugged him so roughly, that he not only prevented his doing him any more mischief, but made him drop the poniard. The wife caught it up at once and gave it to her husband. At the same time she seized him by his hood and held him with all her might, whilst her husband stabbed him several times with the poniard. The Cordelier, being unable to do anything else, begged for quarter, and confessed the crime he had committed. The gentleman granted him his life, and begged his wife to go for his people, and a cart to carry the prisoner away, which she did, throwing off her Cordelier's robes, and hurrying home in her shift and cropped hair. The gentleman's retainers all hastened to help him to bring home the wolf he had captured ; and the culprit was afterwards sent by the gentleman to Flanders to be tried by the emperor's officers.

He not only confessed the crime for which he was tried, but also avowed a fact, which was afterwards verified on the spot by special commissioners sent for that purpose, which was, that several other ladies and handsome girls had been taken to that convent in the same manner as this Cordelier had attempted to carry off the lady of whom we are speaking ; and if he did not succeed, this was owing to nothing else than the goodness of God, who always takes upon Him the defence of those who trust in Him. The girls and the other stolen spoil found in the monastery were removed, and the monks were burned with the monastery, in perpetual memorial of a crime so horrible. We see from this that there is nothing more cruel than love when its principle is vice, as there is nothing more humane or more laudable when it dwells in a virtuous heart.*

I am very sorry, ladies, that truth does not furnish us with so many tales to the advantage of the Cordeliers as contrariwise. I like this order, and should be very glad to know some story in which I could praise them. But we are so pledged to speak the truth, that I cannot conceal it after the report of persons so worthy of belief; though, at the same time, I assure you that if the Cordeliers of the present day did anything worthy of memory which was to their honour, I would do justice to it with more alacrity than I have told the truth in the story I have just related to you.

"In good faith, Geburon," said Oisille, "that sort of love might well be called cruelty."

"I am surprised," said Simontault, "that he did not ravish the lady at once when he saw her in her shift, and in a place where he was master."

"He was not picksome but gluttonous," said Saffre-dent. "As he intended to have his fill of her every day, he had no mind to amuse himself with nibbling at her."

"That is not it," said Parlamente. "A ruffian is always timorous. The fear of being surprised and losing his prey made him carry off his lamb, as the wolf carries off a sheep, to devour it at his ease."

* Notwithstanding what is said in the prologue to the fourth day respecting the recent origin of this tale, it is found in several writers of earlier date. It is identical, for instance, with a fabliau by Rutebeuf entitled Frère Denise (See Fabliaux de Legrand d'Aussy), iv. 383, and has some resemblance to No. LX. of the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles. The Queen of Navarre's tale has been copied by Henry Stephens, in his Apology for Herodotus, by L'Etoile, in his journal of the reign of Henry III., anno 1577, and by Malespini, in his Ducento Novelle, No. LXXV.

"I cannot believe he loved her," said Dagoucin, "nor can I conceive that so exalted a passion as love should enter so cowardly and villanous a heart."

"Be it as it may," said Oisille, "he was well punished for it. I pray God that all who do the like deeds may suffer the like penalties. But to whom do you give your voice?"

"To you, madam," said Geburon, "for I know you will not fail to tell us a good tale."

"If new things are good," replied Oisille, "I will tell you one which cannot be bad, since the event happened in my time, and I have it from an eye-witness. You are doubtless not ignorant that death being the end of all our woes, it may, consequently, be called the beginning of our felicity and our repose. Thus man's greatest misery is to wish for death and not be able to obtain it. The greatest ill which can befall a criminal is not to be put to death, but to be made to suffer so much that he longs for death, while his sufferings, though continual, are of such a nature as not to be capable of abridging his life. It was in this way that a gentleman treated his wife, as you shall hear."

NOVEL XXXII.

A husband surprises his wife in flagrante delicto, and subjects her to a punishment more terrible than death itself.

KING CHARLES VIII. sent to Germany a gentleman named Bernage, Lord of Sivray, near Amboise. This gentleman, travelling day and night, arrived very late one evening at the house of a gentleman, where he asked for a night's lodging, and obtained it, but with difficulty. The owner of the house, nevertheless, learning in whose service he was, came to him and begged he would excuse the incivility of his servants, stating that certain of his wife's relations, who meant him mischief, obliged him to keep his doors thus closed. Bernage told him on what business he was travelling, and his host expressing his readiness to render the king his master all possible services, received his ambassador into his house, and lodged and treated him honourably. Supper-time being come, he showed him into a richly-tapestried hall, where, entering from behind the hangings, there appeared the most beautiful woman that ever was seen ; but her hair was cropped close, and she was dressed in black garments of German cut. After the gentleman had washed with Bernage, water was set before this lady, who washed also, and took her seat at the end of the table without speaking to anyone, or anyone to her. Bernage often looked at her, and thought her one of the handsomest women he had ever seen, except that her face was very pale, and her air extremely sad. After she had eaten a little, she asked for drink, which was given to her by a domestic in a very singular vessel. This was a death's head, the holes of which were stopped with silver ; and out of this vessel she drank two or three times. After she had supped and washed, she made a reverence to the master of the house, and retired again behind the tapestry without speaking to anyone.

Bernage was so surprised at this extraordinary spectacle that he became quite sombre and pensive. His host perceived this, and said to him, " You are surprised, I see, at what you have beheld at table. Now, the courteous demeanour I have marked in you does not permit me to make a secret of the matter to you, but to explain it, in order that you may not suppose me capable of acting so cruelly without great reason. That lady whom you have seen is my wife, whom I loved more than man ever loved woman. I risked everything to marry her, and I brought her hither in spite of her relations. She, too, evinced so much love for me that I would have hazarded a thousand lives to obtain her. We lived long in such concord and pleasure that I esteemed myself the happiest gentleman in Christendom; but honour having obliged me to make a journey, she forgot hers, and the love she had for me, and conceived a passion for a young gentleman I had brought up in this house. I was near discovering the fact on my return home, but I loved her so ardently that I could not bring myself to doubt her. At last, however, experience opened my eyes, and I saw what I feared more than death. The love I had felt for her changed into fury and despair. Feigning one day to go into the country, I hid myself in the chamber which she at present occupies. Soon after my pretended departure, she retired to it, and sent for the young gentleman. I saw him enter the room and take liberties with her which should have been reserved for me alone. When I saw him about to enter the bed with her, I issued from my hiding-place, seized him in her arms, and slew him. But as my wife's crime seemed to me so great that it would not have been a sufficient punishment for it had I killed her as I had killed her gallant, I imposed upon her one which I believe is more insupportable than death; which was, to shut her up in the chamber in which she used to enjoy her stolen pleasures. I have hung there in a press all the bones of her gallant, as one hangs up something precious in a cabinet; and that she may not forget them at her meals, I have her served, as she sits opposite to me at table, with the skull of that ingrate instead of a cup, in order that she may see living him whom she has made her mortal enemy by her crime, and dead, for her sake, him whose love she preferred to mine. In this way, when she dines and when she sups, she sees the two things which must afflict her most, namely, the living enemy and the dead friend ; and all this through her guilt. In other respects, I treat her as I do myself, except that her hair is cropped ; for the hair is an ornament no more appropriate to the adulteress than the veil to a harlot ; therefore her cropped head denotes that she has lost honour and chastity. If you please to take the trouble to see her, I will take you into her room."

Bernage willingly accepted the offer, and going down stairs with his host, found the lady seated alone by an excellent fire in a very handsome chamber. The gentleman drew back a curtain which concealed a great press, and there he saw all the bones of a man suspended. Bernage had a great wish to speak to the lady, but durst not for fear of the husband, until the latter, guessing his thoughts, said to him, " If you like to say anything to her, you will see how she expresses herself."

" Your patience, madam," said Bernage, turning to her, " is equal to your torture ; I regard you as the most unhappy woman in the world."

The lady, with eyes filled with tears, and with incomparable grace and humility, replied, " I confess, sir, that my fault is so great, that all the ills which the master of this house, whom I am not worthy to call husband, could inflict upon me, are nothing in comparison to the grief I feel for having offended him." So saying she wept profusely.

The gentleman took Bernage by the arm and led him away. Next morning he continued his journey upon the king's service ; but on taking leave of the gentleman he could not help saying to him, " The esteem I entertain for you, sir, and the courtesies you have shown me in your house, oblige me to tell you that, in my opinion, considering the great repentance of your poor wife, you ought to forgive her ; the more so as you are young and have no children. It would be a pity that a house like yours should fall, and that those who perhaps do not love you should become inheritors of your substance."

The gentleman, who had resolved never to forgive his wife, pondered long over what Bernage had said to him, and at last, owning that he had spoken the truth, promised that if she persevered in her present humility, he would forgive her after some time. Bernage, on his return to the court, related the whole story to the king, who directed inquiries to be made into the matter, and found that it was all just as Bernage had reported. The description he gave of the lady's beauty so pleased the king that he sent his painter, Jean de Paris, to take her portrait exactly as she was, which he did with the husband's consent. After she had undergone a long penance, and always with the same humility, the gentleman, who longed much for children, took pity on his wife, reinstated her, and had by her several fine children.

If all those wives who have done the same sort of thing had to drink out of similar vessels, I am greatly afraid, ladies, that many a gilt cup would be turned into a death's head. God keep us from the like, for if his goodness does not restrain, there is not one of us but may do worse ; but if we trust in Him, He will guard those who own that they cannot guard themselves. Those who rely on their own strength run great risk of being tempted, and of being constrained by experience to acknowledge their infirmity. I can assure you that there are many who have stumbled through pride in this way, whilst others, who were reputed less discreet, have been saved through their humility. The old proverb says truly, "What God keeps is well kept."

"I look upon the punishment inflicted in this case as quite reasonable," said Parlamente; "for as the offence was worse than death, so also ought the penalty to be."

"I am not of your opinion," said Ennasuite. "I would rather see the bones of all my lovers hung up in my cabinet all my life long than die for them. There is no misdeed that cannot be repaired, but from death there is no return."

"How can infamy be repaired?" asked Longarine. "Do what she may, you know that a woman cannot retrieve her honour after a crime of this nature."

"I should like to know," returned Ennasuite, "if the Magdalen is not now in more honour than her sister who was a virgin?"

"I admit," replied Longarine, "that we praise her for her love for Jesus Christ, and for her great penitence; nevertheless, the name of sinner clings to her always."

"Much I care what name men give me," said Ennasuite; "only let me have God's pardon and my husband's too, there is no reason why I should wish to die."

"If this lady loved her husband as she ought," said Dagoucin, "I am surprised she did not die of grief at looking upon the bones of him whom her crime had brought to death."

"Why, Dagoucin," said Simontault, "have you yet to learn that women know neither love nor regret?"

"Yes," he replied, "for I have never ventured to prove their love for fear of finding it less than I should have wished."

"You live, then, on faith and hope," said Normerfide, "as the plover lives on wind. You are easily kept."

"I content myself with the love I feel in my own heart," he replied, "and with the hope that there is the same in the hearts of ladies. But if I was quite sure that that love corresponded to my hope, I should feel a pleasure so extreme that I could not sustain it and live."

"Keep yourself safe from the plague," said Geburon, "for as for the other malady, I warrant you against it. But let us see to whom Madame Oisille will give her voice."

"I give it," she said, "to Simontault, who I know will spare no one."

"That is as much as to say that I am rather given to evil speaking," said he. "I shall, nevertheless, let you see that people who have been regarded in that same light have yet spoken the truth. I believe, ladies, you are not so simple as to put faith in everything a person tells you, however sanctified an air he may assume, unless the proof is clear beyond doubt. Many an abuse is committed under the guise of a miracle. Therefore I intend to relate to you a story not less honourable to a religious prince than shameful to a wicked minister of the church."

NOVEL XXXIII.

Incest of a priest, who got his sister with child under the cloak of sanctity, and how it was punished.

THE Count Charles d'Angoulême,* father of Francis I., and a prince of great piety, being one day at Coignac, some one told him that in a village named Cherves there was a maiden who lived with such austerity that it was a marvel, yet she was with child, and did not even make any secret of it, but assured everybody that she had never known man, and that she knew not how it had happened to her, unless it was the work of the Holy Ghost. The people readily gave credit to this delusion, and looked upon the girl as a second Virgin Mary, the more so as she had been known to be so well-behaved from her childhood, and never to have shown the least sign of a disposition to mundane vanities. She not only fasted at the seasons appointed by the church, but also made several voluntary fasts every week, and never stirred from the church as long as there was any service going on in it. The common people made so much account of this manner of life that everyone flocked to see her, as though she were a living miracle, and fortunate was he who could touch her gown. The priest of the parish was her brother, a man in years, of an austere life, and a reputed saint. So rigorously did he treat his sister, that he had her shut up in a house, whereat the people were greatly displeased, and the affair made so much noise that it came, as I have already said, to the ears of

* This story is told of the father of Queen Margaret, and is doubtless founded on fact.

Count Charles, who, seeing the delusion into which everybody had fallen, resolved to put an end to it.

To this end, he sent a referendary and an almoner, both of them worthy men, to ascertain the truth. They went to the spot, inquired into the fact as carefully as possible, and applied to the priest, who was so vexed at the affair that he begged them to be present at the verification he hoped to make of it. Next morning the priest celebrated mass, his sister, who was very big, being present on her knees. After it was over, he took the Corpus Domini, and said to his sister, in presence of the whole congregation, "Wretch that thou art, here is He who suffered death for thee, in whose presence I ask thee if thou art a virgin as thou hast always assured me." She replied boldly and fearlessly that she was so. "How, then, is it possible that thou art pregnant, yet still a virgin?" "All I can say," she replied, "is, that it is the grace of the Holy Ghost, who does in me whatever he pleases; but also I cannot deny the grace which God has done me in preserving me a virgin. Never have I had even a thought of marrying."

Her brother then said to her, "I give thee here the precious body of Jesus Christ, which thou wilt take to thy damnation if thou dost not speak the truth; whereof will be witnesses these gentlemen, who are here present on the part of my lord the count."

The girl, who was about thirteen years of age, then made oath as follows:—"I take the body of our Lord here present to my condemnation before you, sirs, and you my brother, if ever man has touched me any more than you." So saying, she received the body of our Lord.

The referendary and the almoner went away quite confounded, not being able to believe that anyone would lie after such an oath, and they made their report to the count, whom they tried to bring to entertain the same belief as themselves. But he, being a wise man, after much thought, made them repeat the very words of the oath; and having well weighed them, he said, "She told you that never man touched her any more than her brother. I am persuaded that it was her brother who got her with child, and that she seeks to conceal his incest by prevarication. We, who believe that Jesus Christ is come, must not expect another. Return then to the place and put the priest in prison; I am sure he will confess the truth."

They executed their orders, but unwillingly, and not without remonstrating against the necessity of putting such a scandal upon a good man. The priest was no sooner committed to prison than he confessed his crime, and owned that he had instructed his sister to speak as she had done in order to conceal the intercourse between them, and this not only to baffle inquiry by so slight a device, but also to secure themselves universal esteem and veneration by this false statement. Being asked how he could carry his wickedness to such an excess as to make his sister swear upon our Lord's body, he replied that his audacity had not reached that length, and that he had used an ordinary wafer, which was neither consecrated nor blessed.

All this having been reported to the Count d'Angoulême, he sent the affair before the courts of justice. Execution was delayed until the sister was delivered of a fine boy. After her delivery the brother and sister were burnt, to the great astonishment of all the people, who had beheld a monster so horrible under such a garb of holiness, and so detestable a crime under the appearances of a life so laudable and regenerate.

The good Count d'Angoulême's faith, ladies, was proof against outward signs and miracles. He knew that we had but one Saviour, who, when he said consummatum est, showed thereby that we are not to expect a successor for our salvation.

"Truly," said Oisille, "that was a monstrous piece of effrontery covered with unparalleled hypocrisy. It is the height of impiety to cover so enormous a crime with the mantle of God and religion."

"I have heard," said Hircan, "that those who commit acts of cruelty and tyranny under pretence of having the king's commission, are doubly punished, the reason being that they make the king's name a cover for their injustice. Likewise, it is seen that although hypocrites prosper for some time under the cloak of godliness, God no sooner unmask them than they appear such as they are; and then their nakedness, their filth, and their infamy are the more horrible, the more august and sacred was the wrapper with which they concealed them."

"There is nothing more agreeable," said Nomerfide, "than to speak frankly and as the heart feels."

"It serves to make one fat," replied Longarine, "and I imagine you decide from your own case."

"Let me tell you," returned Nomerfide, "I remark that fools live longer than the wise, unless some one kills them; for which I know but one reason, namely, that fools do not dissemble their passions. If they are angry they strike; if they are merry, they laugh; but those who deem themselves wise hide their defects with so much care that their hearts are all poisoned with them."

"I believe that is true," said Geburon; "hypocrisy, whether as regards God, men, or nature, is the cause of all the evil that befalls us."

"It would be a fine thing," said Parlamente, "if faith so filled our hearts with Him who is all virtue and all joy, that we should show them to everyone without disguise."

"That will be when there is no longer any flesh on our bones," observed Hircan.

"Yet," remarked Oisille, "the spirit of God, which is mightier than death, can change our hearts without changing our bodies."

"You speak, madam," said Saffredent, "of a gift which God hardly makes to men."

"He does make it," rejoined Oisille, "to those who have faith. But as this is a matter above the comprehension of flesh, let us see to whom Simontault gives his voice."

"To Nomerfide," he said. "As she has a merry heart, I do not think her words will be sad."

"Since you have a mind to laugh," said Nomerfide, "I must serve you after your own way, and give you matter for laughter. I wish to show you that fear and ignorance are equally mischievous, and that one often sins only for want of knowing things. With this view, I will relate to you what happened to two poor Cordeliers of Niort, who, for not understanding the language of a butcher, had like to die of fright."

NOVEL XXXIV.

Two over-inquisitive Cordeliers had a great fright, which had like to cost them their lives.

Two Cordeliers arrived late one night at Grip, a village belonging to the Lord of Fors, situated between Niort and Fors, and took up their quarters with a butcher. As their bedroom was separated from their host's only by an ill-jointed boarded partition, they had a mind to listen to what passed between the husband and wife, and they clapped their ears to the partition close to the head of the host's bed. As the butcher had no suspicion of his guests, he talked to his wife about his business, and said, "My dear, I must be up betimes to-morrow, and see about our Cordeliers. One of them is very fat; we will kill him and salt him forthwith, and we shall make a good thing of him."

Though the butcher talked of his pigs, which he called Cordeliers, the two poor friars, hearing this, set it all down to their own account, and awaited daylight with great terror. One of them was very fat, the other very lean; and the fat one set about confessing himself to his companion, alleging that a butcher, having lost the love and fear of God, would make no more of slaughtering them than an ox or any other beast. As they were shut up in their chamber, from which there was no issue but through their host's, they gave themselves up for dead men, and earnestly commended their souls to God. The young man, who was not so overcome by fear as the elder, said to him, that since they could not get out at the door, they must try to escape through the window ; at the worst they could only be killed in the attempt, and death one way or the other was the same thing in the end. The fat friar consented to the expedient. The young one opened the window, and, as it was not very high, dropped lightly to the ground, and ran away as fast and as far as he could, without waiting for his companion, who was not so lucky, for, being very bulky, he fell so heavily that he hurt one leg severely, and was unable to rise from the ground. Deserted by his companion and unable to follow him, he looked about for some place where he might hide, and saw nothing but a pigsty, into which he dragged himself the best way he could. When he opened the door, two big porkers which were inside rushed out, and left the place free to the Cordelier, who shut himself in, hoping that he might hear people passing by, to whom he would call and obtain help.

As soon as daylight appeared, the butcher got ready his big knives, and told his wife to come and help him to kill the two pigs. Going to the sty, he opened the little door, and cried out, "Come, turn out here, my Cordelier. I'll have your chitterlings for my dinner to-day." The Cordelier, who could not stand on his leg, crawled out on his hands and knees, roaring for mercy. If he was in a great fright, the butcher and his wife were no less so. The first idea that came into their heads was that St. Francis was angry with them because they had called pigs Cordeliers, and under that notion they fell on their knees before the poor friar, begging pardon of St. Francis and his order. On the one side was the Cordelier bawling for mercy to the butcher, on the other side the butcher making the same appeal to the Cordelier. At last the Cordelier, finding that the butcher had no intention of hurting him, told him why he had hid himself in that place. Fear then gave place to laughter, except on the part of the poor friar, whose leg pained him so much that he had no inclination to laugh. The butcher, to console him in some degree, took him back to the house and had his hurt carefully attended to. As for his companion, who had forsaken him in distress, he ran all night, and arrived in the morning at the house of the Lord of Fors, where he made loud complaints of the butcher, who, he supposed, had by that time killed his companion, since the latter had not followed him. The Lord of Fors sent immediately to Grip to see how matters stood, and his messengers brought back matter for laughter, which he failed not to communicate to his mistress, the Duchess d'Angoulême, mother of Francis I.

It is not good, ladies, to listen to secrets when one is not invited, and to have a curiosity to hear what others say.

"Did not I tell you," exclaimed Simontault, "that Nomerfide would not make us cry, but laugh? Every one of us, I think, has done so very heartily."

"Whence comes it," said Oisille, "that one is always more disposed to laugh at a piece of nonsense than at a good thing?"

"Because," replied Hircan, "the nonsense is more agreeable to us, being more conformable to our own nature, which of itself is never wise. Thus everyone is fond of his like: fools love folly, and wise men wisdom. I am sure, however, that neither fools nor wise could help laughing at this story."

"There are some," said Geburon, "who are so engrossed with the love of wisdom that nothing you could say to them would make them laugh. Their joy and their satisfaction are so moderate that no accident is capable of altering them."

"Who are these persons?" inquired Hircan.

"The philosophers of past times," replied Geburon, "who hardly felt either mirth or sadness; at least, they showed no manifestation of either, so possessed were they with the belief that there is virtue in vanquishing oneself."

"I am as much convinced as they that it is good to vanquish a vicious passion," said Saffredent, "but to vanquish a natural passion, which has no evil tendency, seems to me a useless victory."

"Nevertheless, that was regarded as a great virtue," remarked Geburon.

"But then," returned Saffredent, "it is not said that all the ancients were sages; and I would not swear that there was not in them more of the appearance of sense and virtue than of the reality."

"You see, however," said Geburon, "that they condemn everything that is bad, and even that Diogenes trampled on Plato's coverlet because he thought it too rich and curious; and to show that he despised and wished to trample under foot Plato's vainglory and avarice, 'I trample,' said he, 'on the pride of Plato.'"

"You do not tell all," replied Saffredent; "you forget that Plato at once retorted upon him, 'Thou tramplest on it, indeed, but with still more pride.' In fact, it was only through a certain arrogance that Diogenes despised elegance."

"In truth," said Parlamente, "it is impossible to overcome ourselves by ourselves; nor can one think to do so without prodigious pride, the vice of all others the most to be feared, since it rears itself upon the ruins of all the rest."

"Did I not read to you this morning," said Oisille, "that those who believed themselves wiser than others, and who came by the light of reason to know a God, the creator of all things, for having been vain thereof, and not having attributed this glory to Him to whom it belonged, and for having imagined that they had acquired this knowledge by their own labours, became more ignorant and less reasonable—I will not say than other men, but than the very brutes? In fact, their minds having run astray, they ascribed to themselves what belongs to God alone, and manifested their errors by the disorders of their lives, forgetting their very sex, and abusing it, as St. Paul says in his Epistle to the Romans."

"There is not one of us," said Parlamente, "but recognizes, on reading that epistle, that outward sins are the fruits of inward unbelief, the more dangerous to eradicate the more it is covered by virtue and miracles."

"We men," said Hircan, "are nearer to salvation than women, for as they do not hide their fruits they easily know their roots. But you women, who dare not produce yours, and who do so many acts that are fair in appearance, hardly know the root of pride, that grows under so goodly a covering."

"I own," said Longarine, "that if God's word does not show us by faith the leprosy of unbelief that is hidden in our hearts, God does us a great grace when He suffers us to commit a visible fault, which manifests our hidden disposition. Blessed are they whom faith has so humbled that they have no need of outward acts to make them conscious of the weakness and corruption of their natures."

"Do let us consider, I beseech you," said Simontault, "what a course our conversation has taken. From an instance of extreme folly we have come to philosophy and theology. Let us leave these matters to those who are more competent to discuss them, and ask Nomerfide to whom she gives her voice."

"To Hircan," she replied, "but on condition that he will be tender of the honour of the ladies."

"The condition fits me very aptly," said Hircan, "for the story I have to tell you is the very one to fulfil it. You shall see from it, nevertheless, that the inclination of men and of women is naturally vicious, unless it be kept right by the goodness of Him to whom we ought to impute all the victories we achieve over ourselves. And to abate the airs you give yourselves when any story is told which does you honour, I will tell you one which is strictly true."

NOVEL XXXV.

How a sensible husband cured his wife of her passion for a Cordelier.

AT Pampelune there was a lady who was reputed fair and virtuous, and at the same time the most devout and chaste in the country. She loved her husband much, and was so obsequious to him that he had entire confidence in her. She was wholly occupied with God's service, and never missed a single sermon, and omitted nothing by which she could hope to persuade her husband and her children to be as devout as herself, who was but thirty years old, an age at which women commonly resign the pretensions of beauties for those of new she-sages.

On the first day of Lent this lady went to church to receive the ashes which are a memorial of death. A Cordelier, whose austerity of life had gained him the reputation of a saint, and who, in spite of his austerity and his macerations, was neither so meagre nor so pale but that he was one of the handsomest men in the world, was to preach the sermon. The lady listened to him with great devotion, and gazed no less intently on the preacher. Her ears and her eyes lost nothing that was presented to them, and both alike found wherewithal to be gratified. The preacher's words penetrated to her heart through her ears; and the charms of his countenance, passing through her eyes, insinuated themselves so deeply into her mind that she felt as it were in an ecstasy. The sermon being ended, the Cordelier celebrated mass, at which the lady was present, and she took the ashes from his hand, which was as white and shapely as that of any lady. The devotee paid much more attention to the monk's hand than to the ashes he gave her, persuading herself that this spiritual love could not hurt her conscience, whatever pleasure she received from it. She failed not to go every day to the sermon, and to take her husband with her; and both so highly admired the preacher, that at table and elsewhere they talked of nothing but him.

This fire, for all its spirituality, at last became so carnal, that the heart of this poor lady, which was first kindled by it, consumed all the rest. Slow as she had been to feel the flame, she was equally prompt to take fire, and she felt the pleasure of her passion before she was aware that passion had possession of her. Love, which had rendered himself master of the lady, no longer encountered any resistance on her part; but the mischief was that the physician who might have relieved her pain was not aware of her malady. Banishing, therefore, all fear, and the shame she ought to have felt in exposing her wild fantasy to so sober-minded a man, and her incontinence to one so saintly and virtuous, she resolved to acquaint him in writing of the love she cherished for him ; which she did as modestly as she could, and gave her letter to a little page, with instructions as to what he was to do, especially enjoining him to take good care that her husband did not see him go to the Cordelier's.

The page, taking the shortest road, passed through a street where his master happened, by the merest chance, to be sitting in a shop. The gentleman, seeing him pass, stepped forward to see which way he was going ; and the page, perceiving this, hid himself with some trepidation. His master saw this, followed him, and seizing him by the arm, asked him whither he was going. His embarrassed and unmeaning replies, and his manifest fright, aroused the suspicions of the gentleman, who threatened to beat him if he did not tell the truth. "Oh, sir," said the little page, "if I tell you, my mistress will kill me." The gentleman, no longer doubting that his wife was making a bargain without him, encouraged the page, and assured him that nothing should befall him if he spoke the truth—on the contrary, he should be well rewarded ; but if he told a lie, he should be imprisoned for life. Thus urged by fear and hope, the page acquainted him with the real fact, and showed him the letter his mistress had written to the preacher, whereat the husband was the more shocked, as he had been all his life assured of the fidelity of his wife, in whom he had never seen a fault.

Being a wise man, however, he dissembled his anger, and further to try his wife, he answered her letter in the preacher's name, thanking her for her gracious inclination, and assuring her that it was fully reciprocated. The page after being sworn by his master to manage the affair discreetly, carried this letter to his mistress, who was so transported with joy that her husband perceived it by the change in her countenance ; for instead of her fastings in Lent having emaciated her, she looked handsomer and fresher than ever. It was now Mid-Lent, but the lady, without concerning herself about the Lord's Passion or the Holy Week, wrote as usual to the preacher, the theme being always her amorous rage. When he turned his eyes in her direction, or spoke of the love of God, she always imagined that he addressed himself covertly to her ; and, so far as her eyes could explain what was passing in her heart, she did not suffer them to be idle.

The husband, who regularly replied to her in the name of the Cordelier, wrote to her after Easter, begging she would contrive to give him a meeting in private ; and she, impatiently longing for an opportunity to do so, advised her husband to go see some land they had near Pampelune. He said he would do so, and went and concealed himself in the house of one of his friends ; whereupon the lady wrote to the Cordelier that her husband was in the country, and that he might come and see her.

The gentleman, wishing to prove his wife's heart thoroughly, went and begged the preacher to lend him his robe. The Cordelier, who was a good man, replied that his rule forbade him to do so, and that for no consideration would he lend his robe to go masking in. The gentleman assured him it was not for any idle diversion he wanted it, but for an important matter, and one necessary to his salvation ; whereupon the Cordelier, who knew him to be a worthy, pious man, lent him the robe. The gentleman then procured a false beard and a false nose, put cork in his shoes to make himself as tall as the monk, put on the robe, which covered the greater part of his face, so that his eyes were barely seen, and in a word, dressed himself up so that he might easily be mistaken for the preacher. Thus disguised, he stole by night into his wife's chamber, where she was expecting him in great devotion. The poor creature did not wait for him to come to her, but ran to embrace him like a woman out of her senses. Keeping his head down to avoid being recognized, he began to make the sign of the cross, pretending to shun her, and crying, "Temptation! temptation!"

"Alas! you are right, father," said she, "for there is no more violent temptation than that which proceeds from love. You have promised to afford me relief, and I pray you to have pity on me now that we have time and opportunity."

So saying, she made great efforts to embrace him, while he kept dodging her in all directions, still making great signs of the cross, and crying, "Temptation! temptation!" But when he found that she was pressing him too closely, he drew a stout stick from under his robe, and thrashed her so soundly that he put an end to the temptation. This done, he left the house without being known, and immediately returned his borrowed robe, assuring the owner that he had used it to great advantage. Next day he returned home as if from a journey, and found his wife in bed. Pretending not to know the nature of her malady, he asked her what ailed her. She replied that she was troubled with a kind of catarrh, and that she could neither move hand nor foot. The husband, who had a great mind to laugh, pretended to be very sorry, and by way of cheering her, said that he had invited the pious preacher to supper. "Oh, my dear!" said she, "don't think of inviting such people, for they bring ill-luck wherever they go."

"Why, my love," replied the husband, "you know how much you have said to me in praise of this good father. For my part, I believe, if there is a holy man on earth, it is he."

"They are all very well at church and in the pulpit," she rejoined, "but in private houses they are antichrists. Don't let me see him, my dear, I entreat you, for, ill as I am, it would be the death of me."

"Well, you shall not see him, since you do not choose to do so; but I cannot help having him to supper."

"Do as you please," said she; "only, for mercy's sake, let me not set eyes on him, for I cannot endure such folk."

After entertaining the Cordelier at supper, the husband said to him, "I look upon you, father, as a man so beloved by God, that I am sure he will grant any prayer of yours. I entreat you, then, to have pity on my poor wife. She has been possessed these eighteen days by an evil spirit, so that she wants to bite and scratch everybody, and neither cross nor holy water does she care for one bit; but I believe, firmly, that if you put your hand on her the devil will go away. From my heart, I beseech you to do so."

"All things are possible to him who believes, my son," replied the good father. "Are you not well assured that God never refuses his grace to those who ask for it with faith?"

"I am assured of this, father."

"Be assured also, my son, that He is able and willing, and that He is not less mighty than munificent. Let us strengthen ourselves in faith to resist this roaring lion, and snatch from him his prey, which God has made his own by the blood of his Son Jesus Christ."

Thereupon the gentleman conducted the excellent man into the room where his wife was resting on a couch. Believing that it was he who had beaten her, she was roused to a prodigious degree of fury at the sight of him, but her husband's presence made her hang down her head and hold her tongue. "As long as I am present," said the husband to the good father, "the devil does not torment; but as soon as I leave her, you will sprinkle her with holy water, and then you will see how violently the evil spirit works her." So saying, the husband left him alone with his wife, and stopped outside the door to see what would ensue.

When she found herself alone with the Cordelier, she began to scream at him like a mad woman, "Villain! cheat! monster! murderer!" The Cordelier, believing in good faith that she was possessed, wanted to take hold of her head, in order to pray over it; but she scratched and bit him so fiercely that he was obliged to stand further off, throwing plenty of holy water over her, and saying many good prayers. The husband, seeing it was time to put an end to the farce, entered the room again, and thanked the Cordelier for the pains he had taken. The moment he appeared there was end to the wife's termagant behaviour, and she meekly kissed the cross for fear of her husband. The pious Cordelier, who had seen her in such a fury, believed firmly that our Lord had expelled the devil at his prayer, and went away praising God for this miracle. The husband, seeing his wife so well cured of her folly, would never tell her what he had done, contenting himself with having brought her back to the right way by his prudence, and having put her into such a frame of mind that she mortally hated what she had so unwisely loved, and was filled with detestation for her own infatuation. Thenceforth she was weaned from all superstition, and devoted herself to her husband and her family in a very different way from what she had done before.

Here you may see, ladies, the good sense of the husband, and the weakness of one who was regarded as a woman of strict propriety. If you attend well to this example, I am persuaded that, instead of relying on your own strength, you will learn to turn to Him on whom your honour depends.

"I am very glad," said Parlamente, "that you are become the ladies' preacher; you would be so with better right if you would address the same sermons to all those you hold discourse with."

"Whenever you please to hear me," he replied, "I assure you I will speak the same language to you."

"That is to say," observed Simontault, "that when you are not by he will talk to a different purpose."

"He will do as he pleases," said Parlamente, "but, for my own satisfaction, I would have him always speak thus. The example he has adduced will at least be of service to those women who think that spiritual love is not dangerous; but to me it seems that it is more so than any other."

"I cannot think, however," remarked Oisille, "that one should scorn to love a man who is virtuous and fears God; for, in my opinion, one cannot but be the better for it."

"I pray you to believe, madam," rejoined Parlamente, "that nothing can be more simple-willed and easy to deceive than a woman who has never loved; for love is a passion which takes possession of the heart before one is aware of it. Besides, this passion is so pleasing that, provided one can wrap oneself up in virtue as in a cloak, it will be scarcely known before some mischief will come of it."

"What mischief can come of loving a good man," said Oisille.

"There are plenty, madam," replied Parlamente, "who pass for good men as far as ladies are concerned ; but there are few who are so truly good before God that one may love them without any risk to honour or conscience. I do not believe that there is one such man living. Those who are of a different opinion, and trust in it, become its dupes. They begin this sort of tender intimacy with God, and often end it with the devil. I have seen many a one who, under colour of talking about divine things, began an intimacy which at last they wished to break off, but could not, so fast were they held by the fine cloak with which it was covered. A vicious love perishes and has no long abode in a good heart ; but decorous love has bonds of silk so fine and delicate that one is caught in them before one perceives them."

"According to your views, then," said Ennasuite, "no woman ought ever to love a man. Your law is too violent ; it will not last."

"I know that," replied Parlamente, "but for all that, it is desirable that every woman should be content with her own husband, as I am with mine."

Ennasuite, taking these words personally, changed colour, and said, "You ought to think everyone the same at heart as yourself, unless you set yourself up for being more perfect than the rest of your sex."

"To avoid dispute," said Parlamente, "let us see to whom Hircan will give his voice."

"I give it to Ennasuite," said he, "in order to make up matters between her and my wife."

"Since it is my turn to speak," said Ennasuite, "I will spare neither man nor woman, so as to make both sides even. You find it hard to overcome yourselves and admit the probity and virtue of men. This obliges me to relate a story of the same nature as the preceding one."

NOVEL XXXVI.

A President of Grenoble, becoming aware of his wife's irregularities, took his measures so wisely that he revenged himself without any public exposure of his dishonour.

THERE was at Grenoble a president whose name I shall not mention. It is enough to say that he was not a Frenchman, that he had a very handsome wife, and that they lived very happily together. The husband, however, being old, the lady thought fit to love a young clerk named Nicolas. When the husband went in the morning to the Palace of Justice, the clerk used to step into the bedchamber and take his place. An old domestic of the president's, who had been in his service for thirty years, discovered this, and as a faithful servant, could not help revealing it to his master. The president, who was a prudent man, would not believe the fact without inquiry, and told the servant that he wanted to create dissension between him and his wife; adding, that if the fact was as he stated, he could easily give him ocular proof of it, and if he failed to do so, then he, the president, would believe that the servant had trumped up his lying tale to make mischief between husband and wife. The valet assured him that he should see what he had told him.

One morning, when the president had gone to the palace, and the clerk had stolen into the bedroom as usual, the valet sent one of his fellow-servants to apprise the president, while he himself remained on the watch before the bedroom door, to see if Nicolas came out. The president, on seeing the messenger beckon to him, immediately quitted the court on pretence of sudden illness, and hurried home, where he found his old servant standing sentry at the bedroom door, and was assured by him that Nicolas was inside, having gone in not long before. "Remain at the door," said the president. "There is no other way to get in or out of the room, as thou knowest, except a little closet, of which I always keep the key."

The president enters the room, and finds his wife and the clerk in bed together. Nicolas, who did not expect such a visit, threw himself in his shirt at his master's feet, and implored pardon, whilst the lady fell a crying. "Though what you have done," said the president to her, "is as bad as it can be, I do not choose to have the credit of my house blasted for you, and the daughters I have had by you made the sufferers. I command you, then, to cease your crying, and see what I am going to do. As for you, Nicolas," said he to the clerk, "hide yourself in my cabinet, and make no noise."

Nicolas having done as he ordered, he opened the door, and calling in the old servant, said to him, "Didst thou not assure me thou wouldst show me my clerk in bed with my wife? I came hither on the strength of thy word, and thought to kill my wife. I have found nothing, though I have searched everywhere. Search thyself, under the beds and in all directions."

The valet, having searched and found nothing, said to his master, "The devil must have flown away with him; for I saw him go in, and he did not come out by the door; however, I see he is not here."

"Thou art a very bad servant," said his master, "to want to put such division between my wife and me. Begone ; I discharge thee, and for the services thou hast rendered me, I will pay thee what I owe thee and more ; but get thee gone quickly, and beware how thou art found in this city after twenty-four hours are past."

The president paid him his wages, and five or six years over ; and as he had reason to be satisfied with his fidelity, he resolved within himself to reward him still more. When the valet had gone away with tears in his eyes, the president called the clerk out of the cabinet, and after having given him and his wife such a lecture as they deserved, he forbade them both to give the least hint of the matter to anyone. His wife he ordered to dress more elegantly than she had been used to do, and to let herself be seen at all parties and entertainments. As to the clerk, he ordered him to make better cheer than before ; but that as soon as he should whisper in his ear the words "Go away," he should take good care not to remain three hours longer in the city.

For a fortnight the president did nothing but feast his friends and neighbours, contrary to his previous custom, and after the repast he gave a ball to the ladies. One day, seeing that his wife did not dance, he ordered the clerk to dance with her. The clerk, thinking he had forgotten the past, danced gayly with the lady ; but when the ball was over, the president, feigning to have some order to give him about household matters, whispered in his ear, "Begone, and never come back." Sore loth was Nicolas to leave the lady-president, but very glad to get off safe and sound. After the president had fully impressed all his relations and friends, and all the inhabitants of Grenoble, with the belief that he was very fond of his wife, he went one fine day in the month of May into his garden to gather a salad. I do not know what herbs it was composed of ; but I know that his wife did not live twenty-four hours after eating of it, whereat he appeared greatly afflicted, and played the disconsolate widower so well that no one ever suspected him of having killed her. In this way he revenged himself and saved the honour of his house.*

I do not pretend, ladies, to laud the president's conscience ; but my design is to exhibit the levity of a woman,

* In a manuscript French dictionary of the Beauties and Curiosities of Dauphiné, there is an article which says that " in the Rue des Clercs, at Grenoble, was formerly to be seen over the hall door of the house of Nicholas Prunier de Saint André, president of the Parliament of Grenoble, a stone escutcheon, supported by an angel, and bearing a lion de gueule on a field or. These arms were those of the Carles family, which became extinct in the seventeenth century. The angel that supported the escutcheon held the forefinger of one hand to his mouth in a mysterious manner, as if to enjoin secrecy. Geoffroy Carles, sole president of the Parliament of Grenoble in 1505, put it up over that house, which belonged to him. He, indeed, had long dissembled before he found an opportunity to be revenged for the infidelity of his wife, by causing her to be drowned by the mule she rode at the passage of a torrent. He had purposely ordered that the mule should be left several days without drink. This occurrence, which appeared in print in several places, was made the subject of one of the novels of that time, in which, however, the names of the persons concerned are not given. Geoffroy was so learned in the Latin tongue, and in the humanities, that Queen Anne of Bretagne, wife of Louis XII., selected him to teach that tongue and the belles lettres to her daughter Renée, who was afterwards Duchess of Ferrara. The same Geoffroy Carles was made knight of arms and of laws by Louis XII. in 1509." This is probably the person meant by the Queen of Navarre, though she gives a different account of the manner in which he put this wife to death. The story, however, appears to be older than the times of Geoffroy Carles, since it is related of a president of Provence in the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles (No. 47), which were composed between the years 1456 and 1461, and first printed in Paris in 1486.

and the great patience and prudence of a man. Do not be offended, ladies, I beseech you, with the truth, which sometimes tells against you as well as against the men; for women, too, have their vices as well as their virtues.

"If all those who have intrigued with their valets were compelled to eat such salads," said Parlamente, "I know those who would not be so fond of their gardens as they are, but would pluck up all the herbs in them, to avoid those which save the honour of children at the expense of a wanton mother's life."

Hircan, who guessed for whom she meant this, replied with great warmth, "A woman of honour should never suspect another of things she would not do herself."

"To know is not to suspect," rejoined Parlamente. "However, this poor woman paid the penalty which many deserve. Moreover, I think that the president, being bent on avenging himself, could not set about it with more prudence and discretion."

"Nor with more malice," Longarine subjoined. "It was a cold-blooded and cruel vengeance, which plainly showed that he respected neither God nor his conscience."

"What would you have him do, then," said Hircan, "to revenge the most intolerable outrage a wife can ever offer to her husband."

"I would have had him kill her," she answered, "in the first transports of his indignation. The doctors say that such a sin is more pardonable, because a man is not master of such emotions; and consequently, the sin he commits in that state may be forgiven."

"Yes," said Geburon, "but his daughters and his descendants would have been disgraced for ever."

"He ought not to have poisoned her," said Longarine, "for since his first great wrath was past, she might have lived with him like an honest woman, and nothing would ever have been said about the matter."

"Do you suppose," said Saffredent, "that he was appeased, though he pretended to be so? For my part, I'm persuaded that the day he mixed his salad his wrath was as hot as on the very first day. There are people whose first emotions never subside until they have accomplished the dictates of their passion."

"It is well to ponder one's words," said Parlamente, "when one has to do with people so dangerous as you. What I said is to be understood of an anger so violent that it suddenly engrosses the senses, and hinders reason from acting."

"I take it in that very sense," replied Saffredent, "and I say that of two men who commit a fault, he who is very amorous is more pardonable than the other who is not so; for when one loves well, reason is not easily mistress. If we would speak truly, we must own there is not one of us but has some time or other experienced that furious madness, and yet hopes for grace. Let us say, then, that true love is a ladder by which to ascend to the perfect love which we owe to God. No one can ascend to it but through the afflictions and calamities of this world, and through the love of his neighbour, to whom he ought to wish as much good as to himself. This is the true bond of perfection; for as St. John says, 'How can you love God whom you do not see, unless you love your neighbour, whom you do see?'"

"There is no fine text in Scripture which you may not warp to your own purposes," said Oisille. "Beware of doing like the spider, which extracts a poison from every good viand; for I warn you that it is dangerous to quote Scripture out of place, and without necessity."

"Do you mean to say, then," returned Saffredent, "that when we talk to your unbelieving sex, and call God to our aid, we take his name in vain? If there is sin in this, it all lies at your door, since your unbelief constrains us to use all the oaths we can think of; and even so we cannot kindle your icy hearts."

"A plain proof," said Longarine, "that you all lie; for if you spoke the truth, it is so potent that it would persuade us. All that is to be feared is lest the daughters of Eve too easily believe in the serpent."

"I see plainly how it is," said Saffredent; "the women are invincible. So I give up the game to see on whom Ennasuite will call."

"On Dagoucin," she said, "who, I think, will not be disposed to speak against the ladies."

"Would to God," said he, "that they were as favourable to me as I am disposed to speak so of them. To show you that I have endeavoured to do honour to the virtuous of their sex by the pains I have taken to learn their good actions, I will relate one of those to you. I will not say, ladies, that the patience of the gentleman of Pampelune and of the president of Grenoble was not great, but I maintain that their vindictiveness was no less so. In praising a virtuous man, we must not so much exalt a single virtue as to make it serve as a cloak and cover for so great a vice. A woman who has done a virtuous action for the love of virtue itself is truly laudable. An instance of this I will give you in the story I am about to tell you of a young married lady, whose good deed had for motive only the honour of God and the salvation of her husband."

NOVEL XXXVII.

Judicious proceedings of a wife to withdraw her husband from a low intrigue with which he was infatuated.

A CERTAIN lady of the house of Loue was so good and virtuous that she was loved and esteemed by all her neighbours. Her husband with good reason confided to her all his affairs, which she managed so discreetly that in a short while their house became under her hands one of the richest and best furnished in Anjou and Touraine. She lived long with her husband, and had several fine children by him ; but as there is no enduring felicity here below, hers began to be crossed. Her husband, not feeling satisfied with a life of such perfect ease, had a mind to try if trouble would increase his enjoyment. His wife was no sooner asleep than he used to get up from beside her, and not return till daylight. The lady took this conduct so much to heart that falling into a profound melancholy, which yet she tried to conceal, she neglected the affairs of her house, her person, and her family, thinking she had lost the fruit of her labours in losing her husband's love, to preserve which there was no pains she would not willingly have sustained. But as she saw he was lost to her, she became so negligent of everything else that the consequences were soon seen in the mischief that ensued. On the one hand, the husband spent without order or measure ; on the other hand, the wife no longer attending to the affairs of the house, they soon became so involved that the timber began to be felled, and the lands to be mortgaged. One of her relations, who knew her secret grief, remonstrated with her on the fault she committed, and told her that if she did not regard the fortunes of the family for her husband's sake, she ought at least to consider her poor children. This argument struck her ; she rallied her spirits, and resolved to try by every means to regain her husband's love.

Next night, perceiving that he rose from beside her, she also got up, put on her night-wrapper, had her bed made, and sat down to read for hours until his return. When he entered the room, she went up and kissed him, and presented a basin and water to him to wash his hands. Her husband, astonished at this extraordinary behaviour, told her that he had only been to the privy, and that he had no need to wash. She replied, that although it was no great matter, still it was decent to wash one's hands when one came from so nasty a place, thereby wishing to make him know and hate his wicked way of life. As this did not produce any amendment in him, she continued the same course of proceeding for a year, but still without success.

This being the case, one night, when she was waiting for her husband, who stayed away longer than usual, she took it into her head to go after him. She did so, and looking for him in chamber after chamber, she at last found him in a back lumber-room in bed with the ugliest and dirtiest servant wench about the house. To teach him to quit so handsome and so cleanly a wife for so ugly and frousy a servant, she took some straw and set it on fire in the middle of the room. But seeing that the smoke would as soon smother her husband as awake him, she pulled him by the arm, crying out " Fire ! fire !" If the husband was ashamed and confounded at being found by so worthy a wife with such a swinish bedfellow, it was not without great reason. " For more than a year, sir," said his wife, " have I been endeavouring by gentleness and patience to withdraw you from such a wicked life, and make you comprehend that, while washing the outside, you ought to make the inside clean also ; but when I saw that all my efforts were useless, I be-thought me of employing the element which is to put an end to all things. If this does not correct you, sir, I know not if I shall be able another time to withdraw you from the danger as I have done now. I pray you to consider that there is no greater despair than that of slighted love, and that if I had not had God before my eyes, I could not have been patient so long."

The husband, glad to be let off so cheaply, promised that for the future he would never give her cause for sorrow. The wife gladly believed him, and with his consent turned away the servant who offended her. They lived so happily afterwards that even past faults were for them a source of increased satisfaction, in consequence of the good that resulted from them.

If God gives you such husbands, ladies, do not despair, I entreat you, before you have tried all means to reclaim them. There are four-and-twenty hours in the day, and there is not a moment in which a man may not change his mind. A wife ought to esteem herself happier in having regained her husband by her patience, than if fortune and her relations had given her one more faultless.*

"There," said Oisille, "is an example for all married women to follow."

"Follow it who will," said Parlamente ; "but for my

* The subject of this novel is the same as that of the story of the Dame de Langalier, related by the Seigneur de Latour-Landry to his daughters, in the book he wrote for their instruction. (See Leroux de Lincy, Femmes Célèbres de l'Ancienne France, i. 350.)

part it would be impossible for me to be so patient. Although in every condition in which one is placed, patience is a fine virtue, it seems to me, nevertheless, that in matrimonial matters it at last produces enmity. The reason is that, suffering from one's mate, one is constrained to keep aloof from the offender as much as possible. From this alienation springs contempt for the faithless one, and this contempt gradually diminishes love; for one loves a thing only in proportion as one esteems it."

"But it is to be feared," said Ennasuite, "that the impatient wife would meet with a furious husband, who, instead of patience, would cause her sorrow."

"And what worse could a husband do than we have just heard?" said Parlamente.

"What could he do?" rejoined Ennasuite. "Beat his wife soundly, make her sleep on the little bed, and put her he loves into the best bed."*

"I believe," said Parlamente, "it would be less painful to a right-minded woman to be beaten in a fit of passion than to be despised by a husband who was not worthy of her. After the rupture of wedded affection, the husband could do nothing which could be more painful to the wife. Accordingly, the tale states that the lady took pains to bring back the truant only for the sake of her children—a fact I can readily believe."

"Do you think it a great proof of patience in a woman," said Nomerfide, "to kindle a fire on the floor of a room in which her husband is sleeping?"

"Yes," said Longarine, "for when she saw the smoke

* In France, formerly, it was customary to have in all well-furnished bedrooms two beds, a principal one and another much smaller for the confidential servant, who always slept in his master's room. See Novel XXXIX.

she woke him up ; and that was perhaps the greatest fault she committed, for the ashes of such husbands would be good to make lye withal."

"You are cruel, Longarine," said Oisille. "Yet that is not the way in which you lived with your husband."

"No," replied Longarine, "for, thank God, he never gave me cause ; on the contrary, I must regret him as long as I live, instead of complaining of him."

"And if he had treated you otherwise," said Nomerfide, "what would you have done?"

"I loved him so much," replied Longarine, "that I believe I should have killed him and myself afterwards. After having thus avenged myself, I should have found more pleasure in dying than in living with a faithless man."

"So far as I can see," observed Hircan, "you love your husbands only for your own sakes. If they commit the least fault on Saturday, they lose their whole week's labour. Do you want to be mistresses, then ? For my part, I am willing to have it so, if other husbands will consent to it."

"It is reasonable that the man should rule us," said Parlamente ; "but it is not reasonable that he should forsake and ill use us."

"God has so wisely ordained, both for the man and for the woman," said Oisille, "that I believe marriage, provided it be not abused, is one of the best and happiest conditions in life. I am persuaded that all present are as much impressed with that opinion as myself, or even more so, however they may affect to think otherwise. As the man esteems himself wiser than the woman, the fault will be more severely punished if it comes from him. But enough of this. Let us know on whom Dagoucin will call."

“On Longarine,” was the reply.

“You give me great pleasure,” said Longarine; “for I have a story which is worthy to follow yours. Since we are upon the praise of virtuous patience in ladies, I will tell you of one whose conduct was still more laudable than hers of whom you have just heard, and was the more commendable as she was a city lady, a class who are usually less trained to virtue than others.”

NOVEL XXXVIII.

Memorable charity of a lady of Tours with regard to her faithless husband.

THERE was at Tours a handsome and discreet bourgeoisie, who, for her virtues, was not only loved but feared by her husband. However, as husbands are frail and often grow tired of always eating good bread, hers fell in love with one of his métayères.* He used frequently to go from Tours to visit his métairie, always remained there two or three days, and always came back so jaded and out of sorts that his poor wife had trouble enough to set him up again. But no sooner was he himself once more, than back he would go to his métairie, where pleasure made him forget all his ailments. His wife, who loved his life and health above all things, seeing him always come back in such a bad plight, went to the métairie, where she found the young woman whom her husband loved, and said to her, not angrily, but in the gentlest manner possible, that she knew her husband often visited her, but was sorry she treated him so badly as invariably to send him home ill. The poor woman, constrained by respect for her mistress and by the force of truth, had not courage to deny the fact, and besought pardon. The Tourangeaude * desired to see the room and the bed in which her husband slept. The room struck her as so cold and dirty that she was struck with pity, and sent straightway for a good bed, fine blankets, sheets, and counterpane after her husband's taste. She had the room made clean and neat, and hung with tapestry, gave the woman a handsome service of plate, a pipe of good wine, sweetmeats, and confections, and begged her for the future not to send her husband back to her in so broken-down a condition.

* Metayere. It was usual in France, before the Revolution, for the owner of a farm to supply the tenant with seed, &c., and to receive a proportion of the crop in lieu of rent. A farm managed on this principle was called a métairie, and the farmer a metayer, feminine, metayere.

It was not long before the husband went to see the métayère as usual ; and great was his surprise to find the sorry room become so neat, but still greater was it when she gave him a silver cup to drink out of. He asked her where it came from, and the poor woman told him with tears that it was his wife, who, pitying his poor entertainment, had thus furnished the house, enjoining her to be careful of his health. Struck by the great goodness of his wife, who thus returned so much good for so much evil, the gentleman reproached himself for ingratitude as great as his wife's generosity. He gave his métayère money, begged her thenceforth to live like an honest woman, and went back to his wife. He confessed the whole truth to her, and told her that her gentleness and goodness had withdrawn him from a bad course, from which it was impossible he should ever have escaped by any other means ; and forgetting the past, they lived thenceforth together in great peace and concord.*

* Woman of Touraine.

There are very few husbands, ladies, whom the wife does not win in the long run by patience and love, unless they are harder than the rocks which yet the weak and soft water pierces in time.

"Why, this woman had neither heart, nor gall, nor liver !" exclaimed Parlamente.

"What would you have ?" said Longarine ; "she did as God commands, rendering good for evil."

"I fancy," said Hircan, "that she was in love with some Cordelier, who ordered her as a penance to have her husband so well treated in the country, in order that while he was there she might have leisure to treat himself well in town."

"In this you plainly show the wickedness of your own heart," said Oisille, "judging so ill of a good deed. I believe, on the contrary, that she was so penetrated by the love of God that she cared for nothing but her husband's welfare."

"It strikes me," said Simontault, "that he had more reason to return to his wife during the time he was in such bad case at the métairie than when he was made so comfortable there."

* This tale is related by the author of the Menagier de Paris, i. 237, ed. 1847, published by the Société de Bibliophiles Français. It is the 72d of Morlini, and is in the manuscript copy of the Varii Succedi of Orologi, mentioned by Borromio. The French and Italian tales agree in the most minute circumstances, even in the name of the place where the lady resided. Erasmus also relates this tale in one of his colloquies, entitled Uxor Μεμψαγαμος sive Conjugium ; and it occurs in Albion's England, a poem by William Warner, who was a celebrated writer in the reign of Queen Elizabeth ; those stanzas which contain the incident have been extracted from that poetical epitome of English history, and published in Percy's Relics under the title of the Patient Countess.

"I see," said Saffredent, "that you are not of the same way of thinking as a rich man of Paris, who, when he lay with his wife, could not lay aside the least of his mufflings without catching cold, but when he went to see the servant girl in the cellar, without cap or shoes, in the depth of winter, he never was a bit the worse for it. Yet his wife was very handsome, and the servant very ugly."

"Have you not heard," said Geburon, "that God always helps madmen, lovers, and drunkards? Perhaps the Tourangeau was all three."

"Do you mean thence to infer," said Parlamente "that God does nothing for the chaste, the wise, and the sober?"

"Those who can help themselves," replied Geburon, "have no need of aid. He who said that he came for the sick and not for the hale came by the law of his mercy to aid our infirmities, and cancelled the decrees of his rigorous justice; and he who thinks himself wise is a fool in the sight of God. But to end the sermon, whom do you call upon, Longarine?"

"On Saffredent," she said.

"Then I will prove to you by an example," said he, "that God does not favour lovers. Though it has been already said, ladies, that vice is common to women and to men, yet a woman will invent a cunning artifice more promptly and more adroitly than a man. Here is an example of the fact."

NOVEL XXXIX.

Secret for driving away the hobgoblin.

A LORD of Grignaux, gentleman of honour to Anne, Duchess of Brittany and Queen of France, returning home after an absence of more than two years, found his wife at another estate he had, not far from that in which he usually resided. He asked the reason of this, and was told that the house was haunted by a spirit, which made such a disturbance that no one could live in it. Monsieur de Grignaux, who was not a man to give credit to these fancies, replied that if it was the devil himself he should not fear him, and took his wife home with him to their usual abode. At night he had plenty of torches lighted, the better to see this spirit; but, after watching a long time without seeing or hearing anything, he at last fell asleep. No sooner had he done so than he was awakened by a sound box on the ears, after which he heard a voice crying, "Brenigne, Brenigne," which was the name of his deceased grandmother. He called to a woman who slept in the chamber to light a candle, for he had had all the torches put out, but she durst not rise. At the same time, Monsieur de Grignaux felt his bed-clothes pulled off, and heard a great noise of tables, trestles, and stools tumbled about the room with a din that lasted until day. But he never believed that it was a spirit; he was not so frightened as vexed at losing his night's rest.

On the following night, being resolved to catch Master Goblin, he had no sooner lain down than he pretended to snore with all his might, keeping his open hand over his face. While thus awaiting the arrival of the spirit, he heard something approach, and began to snore louder than ever. The spirit, which by this time had become familiar, gave him a great thump, whereupon Monsieur de Grignaux seized its hand, crying out, "Wife, I have caught the spirit." His wife rose instantly, lighted a candle, and behold you, it turned out that the spirit was the girl who slept in their chamber. She threw herself at their feet, begging to be forgiven, and promised to tell them the truth, which was, that the love she long entertained for a domestic had made her play this trick in order to drive the master and mistress out of the house, and that they two, who had charge of it, might make good cheer, which they failed not to do when they were alone. Monsieur de Grignaux, who was not a man to be trifled with, had them both beaten in a manner they never forgot, and then turned them both out of doors. In this way he got rid of the spirits who had haunted his house for two years.

Love, ladies, works wonders. It makes women lose all fear, and torment men to arrive at their ends. Condemning the wickedness of the servant, we must equally applaud the good sense of the master, who knew that the departed spirit does not return.

"Decidedly," said Geburon, "the valet and the wench were not then favoured by love. I agree with you, however, that the master had need of much good sense."

"The girl, however," said Ennasuite, "lived for a long while to her heart's content by means of her stratagem."

"That is a very wretched content," said Oisille,

“which begins with sin and ends with shame and punishment.”

“That is true,” rejoined Ennasuite; “but there are many persons who suffer whilst living righteously, and who have not the wit to give themselves in the course of their lives as much pleasure as the pair in question.”

“I firmly believe,” replied Oisille, “that there is no perfect pleasure unless the conscience is at rest.”

“The Italian maintains,” said Simontault, “that the greater the sin the greater the pleasure.”

“One must be a perfect devil to entertain such a thought,” said Oisille; “but let us drop the subject, and see to whom Saffredent will give his voice.”

“No one remains to speak but Parlamente,” said Saffredent; “but though there were a hundred others, she should have my voice, as a person from whom we are sure to learn something.”

“Since I am to finish the day,” said Parlamente, “and promised yesterday to tell you why Rolandine’s father had the castle built in which he kept her so long a prisoner I will now fulfil my word.”

NOVEL XL.

The Count de Jossebelin has his brother-in-law put to death, not knowing the relationship.

THE Count de Jossebelin, father of Rolandine, had several sisters. Some made wealthy marriages, others became nuns, and one, who was incomparably handsomer than the rest, remained in his house unmarried. The brother was so fond of this sister that he preferred neither his wife nor his children to her ; and though she had many eligible offers of marriage, they were all rejected, from his fear of losing her, and being obliged to pay down money. Consequently she remained a great part of her life unmarried, living with strict propriety in her brother's house. There was a young and handsome gentleman who had been reared in the house, and who as he grew in age grew also in personal and mental endowments, to that degree that he completely governed his master. When the latter had any message to send his sister, he always made this young gentleman the bearer of it ; and as this took place morning and evening, it led to such a familiarity as presently ripened into love. The young gentleman durst not for his life offend his master ; the demoiselle was not without scruples of honour ; and so they had no other fruition of their love than in conversing together, until the brother had said again and again to the lover that he wished he was of as good family as his sister, for he had never seen a man he would rather have for a brother-in-law. This was repeated so often that after consulting together, the lovers came to the conclusion that if they married secretly they should easily be forgiven. Love, which makes people readily believe what they desire, persuaded them that no bad consequences would ensue for them ; and with that hope they married, unknown to anyone except a priest and some women.

After having for some years enjoyed the pleasure which two handsome persons who passionately love each other can reciprocally bestow, fortune, jealous of their happiness, roused up an enemy against them, who, observing the demoiselle, became aware of her secret delights, being yet ignorant of her marriage. This person went and told the brother that the gentleman in whom he had such confidence visited his sister too often, and at hours when a man ought never to enter her chamber. At first he could not believe this, such was his trust in his sister and the gentleman. But, as he loved his house's honour, he caused them to be observed so closely, and set so many people on the watch, that the poor innocent couple were at last surprised.

One evening, word being brought the brother that the gentleman was with his sister, he went straightway to her chamber, and found them in bed together. Choking with rage and unable to speak, he drew his sword, and ran after the gentleman to kill him; but the latter, being very nimble, evaded him; and, as he could not escape by the door, he jumped out of a window that looked upon the garden. The poor lady threw herself in her shift on her knees before her brother, crying, "Spare my husband's life, monsieur, for I have married him, and if he has offended you, let me alone suffer the punishment, for he has done nothing but at my solicitation."

"Were he a thousand times your husband," replied the incensed brother, "I will punish him as a domestic who has deceived me." So saying, he went to the window, and called out to his people to kill him, which was forthwith done before his eyes and those of his sister.

At this sad spectacle, which her prayers and supplications had been unable to prevent, the poor wife was like one distracted. "Brother," she said, "I have neither father nor mother, and I am of an age to marry as I choose. I chose a man whom you told me repeatedly that you would have liked me to marry. And because I did so, as by law I had a right to do without your interference, you put to death the man you loved best in the world. Since my prayers have not availed to save him,

I conjure you by all the affection you ever had for me to make me the companion of his death, as I have been of all his fortunes. Thereby you will glut your cruel and unjust wrath, and give repose to the body and soul of a wife who will not and cannot live without her husband."

Though the brother was beside himself with passion, he had so much pity on his sister that, without saying yes or no, he left her and withdrew. After having carefully investigated the matter, and ascertained that the murdered man had been wedded to his sister, he would have been glad if the deed had not been done. Being afraid, however, that his sister, to revenge it, would appeal to justice, he had a castle built in the midst of a forest, and there he confined her, with orders that no one should be admitted to speak to her.

Some time after, to satisfy his conscience, he tried to conciliate her, and caused her to be sounded upon the subject of marriage; but she sent him word that he had given her such a bad dinner she had no mind to be regaled with the same dish for supper; that she hoped to live in such wise that he should never have the pleasure of killing a second husband of hers; and that after dealing so villanously with the man he loved best in the world, she could not imagine that he would pardon another. She added, that notwithstanding her weakness and impotence, she trusted that He who was a just judge and would not suffer wrong to go unpunished, would do her the grace to avenge her, and let her finish her days in her hermitage in meditating on the love and charity of her God. And this she did. She lived in that place with so much patience and austerity that after her death every one visited her remains as those of a saint. From the moment of her death her brother's house began to fall into decay, so that of six sons not one remained to continue it. They all died miserably ; and in the end Rolandine, his daughter, remained sole heiress of all, as you have been told in another tale, and succeeded to her aunt's prison.*

I wish, ladies, that you may profit by this example, and that none of you may think of marrying for your own pleasure, without the consent of those to whom you owe obedience. Marriage is an affair of such long duration that one cannot engage in it with too much deliberation ; and deliberate ever so well and so sagely, yet one is sure to find in it at least as much pain as pleasure.

"Were there no God or law to teach maidens discretion," said Oisille, "the example might suffice to make them have more respect for their relations than to marry without their knowledge."

"Nevertheless, madam," replied Nomerfide, "when one has one good day in the year, one is not wholly unfortunate. She had the pleasure of seeing and conversing for a long time with him whom she loved better than herself. Besides, she enjoyed it through marriage without scruple of conscience. I regard this satisfaction as so great that, to my thinking, it fairly counterbalanced the grief that subsequently befel her."

"You mean to say, then," said Saffredent, "that the pleasure of bedding with a husband is more to a woman than the pain of seeing him killed before her eyes."

* Josselin, a little town of Le Morbihan, was included in the domains of the Viscount of Rohan, whose name the Queen of Navarre disguises by calling him Count of Jossebelin. Jean II., Viscount of Rohan, had one uterine sister, named Catherine, and several half-sisters. Catherine de Rohan, who is said by the authors of Histoire Gènealogique de la Maison de France, iv. 57, to have died unmarried, is the heroine of this novel, and the murder of the Count of Keradieux, for which the Viscount of Rohan was imprisoned, is no doubt the one of which the Queen of Navarre speaks.

"No such thing," said Nomerfide; "were I to say so, I should speak contrary to my own experience of women. What I mean is, that an unaccustomed pleasure like that of marrying the man one loves best must be greater than the pain of losing him by death, which is an ordinary occurrence."

"That may be true of natural death," said Geburon, "but the one in question was too cruel. I think it very strange that this lord, who was neither her father nor her husband, but only her brother, should have dared to commit such a cruel deed, seeing even that his sister was of an age at which the law allows girls to marry as they think fit."

"For my part, I see nothing strange in that," said Hircan. "He did not kill his sister, whom he loved so fondly, and over whom he had no jurisdiction; but he dealt as he deserved with the young gentleman, whom he had brought up as his son, and loved as his brother. He had advanced and enriched him in his service, and then, by way of gratitude, the young gentleman married his sister, which he ought not to have done."

"Again," resumed Nomerfide, "it was no common and ordinary pleasure for a lady of such high family to marry a gentleman domestic. Thus, if the death was a surprise, the pleasure also was novel, and the greater as it was contrary to the opinion of all the wise, and was helped by the satisfaction of a heart filled with love, and by repose of soul, seeing that God was not offended. As to the death you call cruel, it seems to me that death being necessary, the quicker it is the better; for do we not know that death is a passage which must inevitably be crossed? I regard as fortunate those who do not linger long in the outskirts of death, and who by good luck, which alone deserves that name, pass at one bound into everlasting felicity."

"What do you call the outskirts of death?" said Simontault.

"Sorrows, afflictions, long maladies," replied Nomerfide. "Those who have to sustain such extreme pangs of body or of mind that they come to despise death and complain of its too tardy approach are in the outskirts of death, and they will tell you how the inns are named in which they have sighed more than reposed. The lady in question could not help losing her husband by death; but her brother's anger saved her from the pain of seeing him for a long time an invalid or ill-tempered, and she could deem herself happy in converting to the service of God the satisfaction and joy she had with her husband."

"Do you count for nothing the shame she underwent and the tedium of her prison?" said Longarine.

"I am persuaded," replied Nomerfide, "that when one loves well, and with a love founded on God's command, one makes no account of shame, except so far as it lessens love; for the glory of loving well knows no shame. As for her prison, as her heart was wholly devoted to God and her husband, I imagine she hardly felt the loss of her liberty; for where one cannot see what one loves, the greatest blessing one can have is to think of it incessantly. A prison is never narrow when the imagination can range in it as it will."

"Nothing can be truer than what Nomerfide alleges," said Simontault; "but the madman who effected this separation ought to have deemed himself a very wretch, offending as he did God, love, and honour."

"I am astonished," said Geburon, "that there is so much diversity in the nature of women's love ; and I see plainly that those who have the most love have the most virtue, but those who have the least love are the virtuous in false seeming."

"It is true," said Parlamente, "that a heart that is virtuous towards God and man loves with more passion than a vicious heart, because the former is not afraid that the real nature of its sentiments should be apparent."

"I have always understood," said Simontault, "that men are not blameable for paying court to women ; for God has put into the heart of man love and the boldness to sue, and into that of woman fear and the chastity to refuse. If a man has been punished for having used the power implanted in him, he has been treated with injustice."

"But was it not a monstrous inconsistency in this brother," said Longarine, "to have persisted so long in praising this young gentleman to his sister ? It seems to me that it would be a great folly, not to say cruelty, in a man who had charge of a fountain to praise its water to one who gazed on it, parched with thirst, and then to kill him for offering to drink of it."

"The fire of his encomiums on the young man," said Parlamente, "unquestionably kindled the fire of love in the lady's heart, and he was wrong to put out with his sword a fire he himself had lighted by his sweet words."

"I am surprised," said Saffredent, "that it should be taken amiss that a simple gentleman, by dint of courtship alone, and not through any false pretences, should come to marry a lady of so illustrious a house, since the philosophers maintain that the least of men is worthier than the greatest and most virtuous of women."

"The reason is," said Dagoucin, "that in order to preserve the public tranquillity, regard is only had to the degree of the families, the age of the persons, and the laws, men's love and virtue being counted as nothing, in order not to confound the monarchy. Thence it comes that in the marriages which take place between equals, and in accordance with the judgment of men and of the relations, the persons are often so different in heart, temperament, and disposition, that instead of entering into an engagement which leads to salvation, they throw themselves into the confines of hell."

"Instances have also been seen," said Geburon, "of persons who have married for love, with hearts, dispositions and temperaments mutually conformable, without concerning themselves about difference of birth, and who have, nevertheless, repented of what they have done. In fact, a great but indiscreet love often changes into jealousy and fury."

"To me it seems," said Parlamente, "that neither the one course nor the other is commendable, and that those persons who submit to the will of God regard neither glory, nor avarice, nor voluptuousness. They alone are to be commended, who, actuated by virtuous love, sanctioned by the consent of their relations, desire to live in the married state as God and nature ordain. Though there is no condition without its troubles, I have yet seen these latter run their course without repenting that they had entered upon it. The present company is not so unhappy as not to number in it married persons of this class."

Thereupon Hircan, Geburon, Simontault, and Saffredent vowed that they had all married in that very spirit, and that accordingly they had never repented of the act. Whether that was true or not, the ladies whom it concerned were nevertheless so pleased with the declaration, that, being of opinion they could hear nothing better than it, they rose to go and give thanks for it to God, and found that the monks were ready for the vesper service. Their devotions ended, they supped, but not without reverting to the subject of marriage, everyone recounting his own experience whilst wooing his wife. But as they interrupted each other, it was not possible to make a full record of their several stories, which was a pity, for they were not less agreeable than those they had recounted in the meadow.

This conversation was so interesting that bed-time arrived before they were aware of it. Madame Oisille was the first to perceive that it was time to retire, and her example was followed by the rest. All went to bed in the gayest humour, and I do not think the married couples slept more than the others, but spent a part of the night in talking over their affections in times past, and giving each other evidences of its present existence. Thus the night passed agreeably away.

FIFTH DAY.

MADAME OISILLE, as soon as day had dawned, prepared for them a spiritual breakfast of such good savour, that it fortified their minds and bodies alike; and the company were so attentive to it, that it seemed that they never heard a sermon to more advantage. The second bell for mass having rung, they went to meditate on the good things they had heard. After mass they took a little walk while waiting for dinner, anticipating as agreeable a day as the preceding one. Saffredent said that he was so charmed with the good cheer they made and the recreation they enjoyed, that he could wish it might be a month yet before the bridge was finished; but as it was no comfort to the abbot to live along with so many respectable people into whose presence he durst not bring his usual female pilgrims, he urged the workmen to make all possible speed. When the company had rested awhile after dinner, they returned to their usual pastime, and everyone being seated, they asked Parlamente who should begin. "It strikes me," she said, "that Saffredent would do very well, for his face does not seem to me adapted to make us cry."

"Nay, ladies, you will be very cruel," he replied, "if you bestow no pity upon a Cordelier whose story I am going to relate to you. You will say, perhaps as has been already remarked of other incidents of this kind, that they are things which have happened to ladies, and would not have been attempted but for the facility of their execution; but that is not the case: on the contrary, you shall see from the example I am about to adduce, that the Cordeliers are so blind in their lust, that they know neither fear nor prudence.”

NOVEL XLI.

Strange and novel penance imposed by a cordelier confessor on a young lady.

WHEN Margaret of Austria came to Cambrai on the part of the emperor her nephew to negotiate the peace between him and the Most Christian King, who sent on his part Louise of Savoy his mother, there was in the suite of Margaret of Austria the Countess of Aiguemont, who passed in that assembly for the most beautiful of the Flemish ladies. After the conference the Countess of Aiguemont returned home, and the season of Advent being come, she sent to a monastery of Cordeliers, requiring a preacher, a good man, fit to preach to and confess the countess and her household. The warden, who received great benefits from the house of Aiguemont and from that of Fiennes, to which the countess belonged, sent the best preacher in the society, and the one who was regarded as the most upright man. He performed his duty very well in preaching the Advent sermons, and the countess was perfectly satisfied with him.

On Christmas night, when the countess intended to receive her Creator, she sent for her confessor, and after having well and duly confessed in a chapel carefully closed that the confession might be more secret, she gave place to her lady of honour, who, having made her confession, next sent her daughter. After the young penitent had told all she knew, the good confessor knew something of her secrets, which prompted him to impose upon her an extraordinary penance, and he was bold enough to say to her, "Your sins, my daughter, are so great, that I order you, for penance, to wear my cord on your bare flesh."

The demoiselle, who had no wish to disobey him, replied, "Give it me, father, and I will not fail to wear it."

"No, daughter," replied the holy man, "it would not be meet for you to fasten it on. That must be done by these very hands from which you are to receive absolution, and afterwards you will be absolved from all your sins."

The demoiselle began to cry, and said she would do no such thing. "What!" exclaimed the confessor, "are you a heretic, to refuse the penances which God and our holy Mother Church have ordained?"

"I make of confession the use which the Church has commanded," replied the demoiselle. "I am quite willing to receive absolution and to do penance; but I will not have you put your hands to it; for in that case, I refuse to submit to your penance."

"That being the case," said the confessor, "I cannot give you absolution."

The demoiselle withdrew, sorely troubled in conscience, for she was so young that she was afraid she had transgressed by the refusal she had given to the reverend father. After mass was over, and the Countess of Aiguemont had taken the communion, her lady of honour, intending to do the same, asked her daughter if she was ready. The girl replied, with tears, that she had not yet confessed. "Then, what have you been doing so long with the preacher?" inquired her mother.

The good father was handsomely thrashed in the kitchen.

"Nothing," replied the daughter; "for as I would not submit to the penance he ordered me, he would not grant me absolution."

Thereupon the mother questioned her so shrewdly, that she learned the nature of the extraordinary penance which the monk wished to impose upon her daughter. She made her confess to another, and afterwards they both communicated.

As soon as the countess returned from church, the lady of honour complained to her of the preacher, to the countess's great surprise, for she had a very good opinion of him. All her anger, however, did not hinder her from laughing at the oddity of the penance; but neither did her laughter hinder her from having the good father chastised. He was handsomely thrashed in the kitchen, and so compelled, by dint of blows, to confess the truth; after which, he was sent away, bound hand and foot, to his warden, with a request that another time he would commission better men to preach the word of God.

Consider, ladies, if the monks do not scruple to display their wickedness in so illustrious a house, what are they not capable of doing in the poor places to which they commonly go to make their gatherings, and where they have such full opportunities that it is a miracle if they quit them without scandal? This obliges me to entreat, ladies, that you will change your scorn into compassion, and consider that the power which can blind the Cordeliers does not spare the ladies, when he finds them a fair mark for his shafts.

"Assuredly, this was a wicked Cordelier," said Oisille. "A monk, a priest, and a preacher, to be guilty, on Christmas day, of such an infamy, and that in the house of God, and under the sacred veil of confession! This was carrying impiety and villany to the very climax."

"Why," said Hircan, "to hear you talk, one would think the Cordeliers should be angels, or more chaste than other men ; but they are quite the reverse, as you must know from many an example. As for this one, it appears to me that he was very excusable, finding himself, as he did, shut up alone with a handsome girl."

"Nay," said Oisille, "but it was Christmas night."

"The very thing that makes him the more excusable," said Simontault, "for being in Joseph's place, beside a beautiful virgin, he had a mind to try and beget a baby, in order to play the mystery of the Nativity to the life."

"Truly," said Parlamente, "if he had thought of Joseph and the Virgin Mary, he would not have harboured such a wicked purpose. At any rate, he was an audacious villain to make such a criminal attempt upon no encouragement."

"The manner in which the countess had him castigated," said Oisille, "might serve, methinks, as a warning to others like him."

"I do not know if she did well," said Nomerfide, "thus to scandalise her neighbour, and if it would not have been better to remonstrate with him on his fault in private and gently, than thus to divulge it."

"That I think would have been better," said Geburon, "for we are commanded to reprove our neighbour in secret, before we speak of his offence, not only to the Church, but to any person whatever. When a man is deprived of all motives on the side of honour, it is very hard for him to reform ; and the reason is, that shame keeps as many from sin as does conscience."

"I think," said Parlamente, "that every one should practise the precepts of the Gospel, and it is very scandalous that those who preach them should do the reverse ; therefore we need have no fear of scandalising those who scandalise others. On the contrary, it appears to me meritorious to make them known for what they are, so that we may be on our guard against their wiles with regard to the fair sex, who are not always wary and prudent. But to whom does Hircan give his voice ? ”

“ Since you ask me,” he replied, “ I give it to you, to whom no sensible man could refuse it.”

“ Well, then,” rejoined Parlamente, “ I will tell you a story to which I can testify of my own knowledge. I have always heard that the weaker the vessel in which virtue abides, and the more violently it is assaulted by a powerful and formidable antagonist, the more worthy is it of praise, and the more conspicuously is its nature displayed. That the strong defends himself against the strong is no matter for wonder ; but to see the weak beat the strong is a thing to be extolled by all the world. Knowing the persons of whom I mean to speak, methinks it would be wronging the truth I have seen hid under so mean a garb that no one made any account of it, if I did not speak of her by whom were done the honourable actions of which I am about to tell you.”

NOVEL XLII.

Chaste perseverance of a maiden, who resisted the obstinate pursuit of one of the greatest lords in France—Agreeable issue of the affair for the demoiselle.

THERE once lived in one of the best towns of Touraine a lord of great and illustrious family, who had been brought up from his youth in the province. All I need say of the perfections, beauty, grace, and great qualities of this young prince is, that in his time he never had his equal. At the age of fifteen, he took more pleasure in hunting and hawking than in beholding fair ladies. Being one day in a church, he cast his eyes on a young girl who, during her childhood, had been brought up in the château in which he resided. After the death of her mother, her father had withdrawn thence, and gone to reside with his brother in Poitou. This daughter of his, whose name was Francoise, had a bastard sister, whom her father was very fond of, and had married to this young prince's butler, who maintained her on as handsome a footing as any of her family. The father died, and left to Francoise for her portion all he possessed about the good town in question, whither she went to reside after his death ; but as she was unmarried and only sixteen, she would not keep house, but went to board with her sister.

The young prince was much struck with this girl, who was very handsome for a light brunette, and of a grace beyond her rank, for she had the air of a young lady of quality, or of a princess, rather than of a bourgeoisie. He gazed upon her for a long while ; and as he had never loved, he felt in his heart a pleasure that was new to him. On returning to his chamber, he made inquiries about the girl he had seen at church, and recollected that formerly, when she was very young, she used often to play in the château with his sister, whom he put in mind of her. His sister sent for her, gave her a very good reception, and begged her to come often to see her, which she did whenever there was any entertainment or assembly. The young prince was very glad to see her, and so glad that he chose to be deeply in love with her. Knowing that she was of low birth, he thought he should easily obtain of her what he sought ; and, as he had no opportunity to speak with her, he sent a gentleman of his chamber to her with orders to acquaint her with his intentions, and settle matters with her. The girl, who was good and pious, replied that she did not believe that so handsome a prince as his master would care to look upon a plain girl like herself, especially as there were such handsome ones in the château that he had no need to look elsewhere ; and that she doubted not he had said all this to her out of his own head and without orders from his master.

As obstacles make desire more violent, the prince now became more hotly intent on his purpose than ever, and wrote to her, begging her to believe everything the gentleman should say to her on his part. She could read and write very well, and she read the letter from beginning to end ; but for no entreaties the gentleman could make would she ever reply to it, saying that a person of her humble birth should never take the liberty to write to so great a prince ; but that she begged he would not take her for such a fool as to imagine that he esteemed her enough to love her as much as he said. Moreover, he was mistaken if he fancied that because she was of obscure birth, he might do as he pleased with her, and that to convince him of the contrary, she felt obliged to declare to him that, bourgeoisie as she was, there was no princess whose heart was more upright than hers. There were no treasures in the world she esteemed so much as honour and conscience. And the only favour she begged of him was, that he would not hinder her from preserving that treasure all her life long, and that he might take it for certain that she would never change her mind though it were to cost her her life.

The young prince did not find this answer to his liking. Nevertheless, he loved her but the more for it. and failed not to lay siege to her when she went to mass ; and during the whole service he had no eyes but to gaze on that image to which he addressed his devotions. But when she perceived this, she changed her place and went to another chapel, not that she disliked to see him, for she would not have been a reasonable creature if she had not taken pleasure in looking on him ; but she was afraid of being seen by him, not thinking highly enough of herself to deserve being loved with a view to marriage, and being too high-minded to be able to accommodate herself to a dishonourable love. When she saw that in whatever part of the church she placed herself, the prince had mass said quite near it, she went no more to that church, but to the most distant one she could find. Moreover, when the prince's sister often sent for her, she always excused herself on the plea of indisposition.

The prince, seeing he could not have access to her, had recourse to his butler, and promised him a large reward if he served him in this affair. The butler, both to please his master and for the hope of lucre, promised to do so cheerfully. He made it a practice to relate daily to the prince all she said and did, and assured him, among other things, that she avoided as much as possible all opportunities of seeing him. The prince's violent desire for an interview with her, set him upon devising another expedient. As he was already beginning to be a very good horseman, he bethought him of going to ride his great horses in a large open place of the town, exactly opposite to the house of the butler, in which Françoise resided. One day, after many courses and leaps, which she could see from her chamber window, he let himself fall off his horse into a great puddle. Though he was not hurt, he took care to make great moans, and asked if there was no house into which he might go and change his clothes. Every one offered him his own; but some one having remarked that the butler's was the nearest and the best, it was chosen in preference to any of the others. He was shown into a well-furnished chamber, and as his clothes were all muddy, he stripped to his shirt and went to bed. Every one except his gentleman having gone away to fetch other clothes for the prince, he sent for his host and hostess, and asked them where was Françoise? They had a good deal of trouble to find her, for as soon as she had seen the prince come in, she had gone and hid herself in the remotest corner of the house. Her sister found her at last, and begged her not to be afraid to come and see so polite and worthy a prince.

The Prince and the Peasant Girl.

Photo copied from LEE
Copyright, 1900, by D. Thomas.

“What! sister,” said Françoise, “you, whom I regard as my mother, would you persuade me to speak to a young prince of whose intentions I cannot be ignorant, as you well know?”

But her sister used so many arguments, and promised so earnestly not to leave her alone, that Françoise went with her, with a countenance so pale and dejected, that she was an object rather to inspire pity than love. When the young prince saw her at his bedside, he took her cold and trembling hand, and said, "Why, Françoise, do you think me such a dangerous and cruel man that I eat the women I look at? Why do you so much fear a man who desires only your honour and advantage? You know that I have everywhere sought in vain for opportunities to see and speak to you. To grieve me the more, you have shunned the places where I had been used to see you at mass, and thereby you have deprived me of the satisfaction of my eyes and my tongue. But all this has availed you nothing. I have done what you have seen in order to come hither, and have run the risk of breaking my neck in order to have the pleasure of speaking to you without restraint. I entreat you, then, Françoise, since it would be hard for me to have taken all this pains to no purpose, that as I have so much love for you, you will have a little for me."

After waiting a long while for her reply, and seeing she had tears in her eyes, and durst not look up, he drew her towards him and almost succeeded in kissing her. "No, my lord, no," she then said, "what you ask cannot be. Though I am but a worm in comparison with you, honour is so dear to me that I would rather die than wound it in the least degree for any pleasure in the world; and my fear, lest those who have seen you come in conceive a false opinion of me, makes me tremble as you see. Since you are pleased to do me the honour to address me, you will also pardon the liberty I take in replying to you as honour prescribes. I am not, my lord, so foolish or so blind as not to see and know the advantages with which God has endowed you, and to believe that she who shall possess the heart and person of such a prince will be the happiest woman in the world. But what good does that do me? That happiness is not for me or for any woman of my rank; and I should be a downright simpleton if I even entertained the desire. What reason can I believe you have for addressing yourself to me; but that the ladies of your house, whom you love, and who have so much grace and beauty, are so virtuous that you dare not ask of them what the lowness of my condition makes you easily expect of me? I am sure that if you had of such as me what you desire, that weakness would supply you with matter to entertain your mistresses for two good hours; but I beg you to believe, my lord, that I am not disposed to afford you that pleasure. I was brought up in a house in which I learned what it is to love. My father and mother were among your good servants. Since then it has not pleased God that I should be born a princess to marry you, or in a rank sufficiently high to be your friend, I entreat you not to think of reducing me to the rank of the unfortunates of my sex, since there is no one who esteems you more than I, or more earnestly desires that you may be one of the happiest princes in Christendom. If you want women of my station for your diversion, you will find plenty in this town incomparably handsomer than myself, and who will spare you the trouble of soliciting them so much. Attach yourself, then, if you please, to those who will gladly let you buy their honour, and harass no longer a poor girl who loves you better than herself; for if God were this day to require your life or mine, it would be a happiness to me to sacrifice mine in order to save yours. If I shun your person, it is not for want of love, but rather because I too well love your conscience and mine, and because my honour is more precious to me than my life. I ask you, my lord, if you please, to continue to honour me with your good-will, and I will pray to God all my life for your health and prosperity. It is true that the honour you do me will give me a better opinion of myself among persons of my own station ; for after having seen you, where is the man of my own condition whom I would deign to regard ? Thus my heart will be free and under no obligation, except that which I shall ever acknowledge, to pray to God for you, which is all I can do for you while I live."

Contrary as this reply was to the prince's desires, nevertheless he could not help esteeming her as she deserved. He did all he could to make her believe he would never love anyone but herself ; but she had so much sense that he never could bring her to entertain so unreasonable a notion. Though, during the course of this conversation, it was often intimated to the prince that fresh clothes had been brought him, he was so glad to remain where he was that he sent back word he was asleep. But at last, supper-time being come, and not daring to absent himself from respect for his mother, who was one of the most correct ladies in the world, he went away, more impressed than ever with the excellence of Françoise. He often talked of her to the gentleman who slept in his chamber. That person, imagining that money would be more effectual than love, advised him to present a considerable sum to the girl in consideration of the favour he solicited. As the young prince's mother was his treasurer, and his pocket money was not much, he borrowed, and out of his own funds and those of his friends he made up a sum of five hundred crowns, which he sent to Françoise by his gentleman, commissioning him to beg that she would change her mind.

"Tell your master," she said, when the gentleman offered her the present, "that my heart is so noble and generous, that were it my humour to do what he desires, his good looks and his pleasing qualities would have already made a conquest of me; but since these are incapable of making me take the slightest step at variance with honour, all the money in the world could not do it. You will take back his money to him, if you please, for I prefer honest poverty to all the wealth he could bestow upon me."

Baffled by this downright refusal, the gentleman was tempted to think that a little violence might succeed, and he dropped threatening hints of her master's influence and power. "Make a bugbear of the prince," she said, laughing in his face, "to those who do not know him; but I, who know him to be wise and virtuous, can never believe that you say this by his order; and I am persuaded that he will disavow it all if you repeat it to him. But even were it true that you had his authority for what you say, I tell you that neither torments nor death could ever shake my resolution, for, as I have said before, since love has not changed my heart, no earthly good or evil can ever effect what that has failed to accomplish."

It was with indescribable vexation that the gentleman, who had undertaken to humanize her, carried back this answer to his master, whom he urged to carry his point by all possible means, representing to him that it would be shameful for him to have undertaken such a conquest and not achieve it. The young prince, who wished to employ only fair means, and who was afraid, besides, of his mother's anger if the story got abroad and reached her ears, durst not take any further step, until at last the gentleman suggested to him an expedient, which seemed to him so good, that he felt already as if the fair one was his own. To this end he spoke to the butler, who, being ready to serve his master on any terms, consented to everything required of him. It was arranged, then, that the butler should invite his wife and his sister-in-law to go see their vintage at a house he had near the forest; he did so, and they agreed to the proposal. The appointed day being come, he gave notice to the prince, who was to go to the same place, accompanied only by his gentleman. But it pleased God that his mother was that day adorning a most beautiful cabinet, and had all her children to help her; so that the proper time passed by before the prince could get away. This was no fault of the butler's, who had fully performed his part; for he made his wife counterfeit illness, and when he was on horseback with his sister-in-law on the croup, she came and told him that she could not go. But the hour having passed by and no prince appearing, "I believe," said he to his sister-in-law, "we may as well go back to town."

"Who hinders us?" said Françoise.

"I was waiting for the prince, who had promised to come," said the butler.

His sister, clearly discerning his wicked purpose, replied, "Wait no longer for him, brother; for I know that he will not come to-day."

He acquiesced, and took her home again. On arriving there she let him know her dissatisfaction, and told him plainly he was the devil's valet, and did more than he was commanded; for she was very sure that it was his work and the gentleman's, not the prince's; that they both liked better to flatter his weaknesses, and gain money, than to do their duty as good servants; but that since she knew this she would no longer remain in his house. Thereupon she sent for her brother to take her away to his own country, and immediately quitted her sister's house.

The butler having missed his blow, went to the château to know why the prince had not come, and met him on the way, mounted on his mule, with no other attendant than his confidential gentleman.

"Well," said the prince, the moment he saw him, "is she still there?"

The butler told him what had happened, and the prince was greatly vexed at having missed the rendezvous, which he regarded as his last hope. However, he took such pains to meet Francoise, that at last he fell in with her in a company from which she could not escape, and upbraided her strongly for her cruelty to him, and for quitting her brother-in-law's house. Francoise told him she had never known a more dangerous man, and that he, the prince, was under great obligations to him, since he employed in his service not only his body and his substance, but also his soul and his conscience. The prince could not help feeling that there was no hope for him; he therefore resolved to press her no more, and he continued all his life to entertain a great esteem for her. One of his domestics, charmed by her virtue, wished to marry her; but she could never bring herself to consent without the approbation and command of the prince, on whom she had set her whole affection. She had him spoken to on the subject; he consented to the marriage, and it took place. She lived all her life in good repute, and the prince did her much kindness.*

What shall we say, ladies? Are we so low spirited as to make our servants our masters? She whose story I have related to you was not to be overcome either by love or by importunity. Let us imitate her example and be victorious over ourselves. Nothing is more praiseworthy than to subdue one's passions.

* The young lord spoken of in this novel is evidently Francis I.; and the town of Touraine is Amboise, where Louise of Savoy resided with her children.

"I see but one thing to regret in this case," said Oisille, "which is, that actions so virtuous did not take place in the time of the historian. Those who have so lauded Lucretia would have left her story to relate the virtues of this heroine. They seem to me so great that I could hardly believe them, had we not sworn to speak the truth."

"Her virtue does not seem to me so great as you make it out to be," said Hircan. "You must have seen plenty of squeamish invalids, who left good and wholesome food for what was bad and unwholesome. Perhaps this girl loved some one else, for whose sake she despised persons of the first order."

To that Parlamente replied, that the life and end of this girl showed "that she had never loved but him whom she loved above her life, but not above her honour."

"Put that out of your head," said Saffredent, "and learn what was the origin of that phrase honour, which prudes make such a fuss about. Perhaps those who talk so much about it do not know what it means. In the time when men were not over crafty—the golden age, if you will—love was so frank, simple, and strong that no one knew what it was to dissemble, and he who loved most was the most esteemed. But malignity, avarice, and sin, having taken possession of men's hearts, drove out from them God and love, and put there, instead of them, self-love, hypocrisy, and feigning. The ladies seeing that they had not the virtue of true and genuine love, and that hypocrisy was very odious amongst mankind, gave it the name of honour. Those, then, who could not compass that true love said that they were forbidden by honour. This practice they have erected into so cruel a law that even those of their sex who love perfectly dissemble, and think that this virtue is a vice ; but such of them as have good sense and sound judgment never fall into this error. They know the difference between darkness and light ; and know that genuine love consists in manifesting chastity of heart, which lives upon love alone, and does not pride itself on dissimulation, which is a vice."

"Yet it is said," observed Dagoucin, "that the most secret love is the most commendable."

"Secret," replied Simontault, "for those who might misjudge it, but clear and avowed at least for the two persons concerned."

"So I understand it," said Dagoucin. "Nevertheless, it were better it were unknown by one of the two than known to a third. I believe that the subject of the tale loved the more strongly that she did not declare her love."

"Be this as it may," said Longarine, "virtue is to be esteemed ; and the highest virtue is to overcome one's own heart. When I consider the means and opportunities she had, I maintain that she was entitled to be called a heroine."

"Since you make self-mortification the measure of virtue," said Saffredent, "the prince deserved more praise than she did. To be convinced of this, one has only to consider his passion for her, his power, his opportunities, and the means he might have employed, yet would not, that he might not violate the rule of perfect affection, which makes the indigent equal to the prince, but consented himself with employing the means which fair dealing permits."

"There is many a one who would not have done that," said Hircan.

"He is the more to be esteemed," replied Longarine, "because he overcame the evil disposition common to men. Blessed, unquestionably, is he who has it in his power to do evil yet does it not."

"You put me in mind," said Geburon, "of a woman who was more afraid of offending men than God, her honour, and love."

"Pray tell us the story," said Parlamente.

"There are people," he continued, "who own no God, or who, if they believe there is one, think him so remote that he can neither see nor know the bad acts they commit; or if He does, they suppose Him to be so careless and indifferent to what is done here below that he will not punish them. Of this way of thinking was a lady, whose name I shall conceal for the honour of her race, and call her Jambicque. She used often to say that to care only for God was all very well, but the main point with her was to preserve her honour before men. But you will see, ladies, that her prudence and her hypocrisy did not save her. Her secret was revealed, as you shall find from her story, in which I will state nothing but what is true, except the names of the persons and the places, which I shall change."

NOVEL XL.

Hypocrisy of a court lady discovered by the denouement of her amours, which she wished to conceal.

A PRINCESS of great eminence lived in a very handsome château, and had with her a lady named Jambicque, of a haughty and audacious spirit, who was, nevertheless, such a favourite with her mistress that she did nothing but by her advice, believing her to be the most discreet and virtuous lady of her time. This Jambicque used to inveigh loudly against illicit love ; and if ever she saw that any gentleman was enamoured with one of her companions, she used to reprimand the pair with great bitterness, and tell a very bad tale of them to her mistress, so that she was much more feared than loved. As for her, she never spoke to a man except aloud, and with so much haughtiness that she was universally regarded as an inveterate foe to love ; but, in her heart, she was quite otherwise. In fact, there was a gentleman in her mistress's service with whom she was as much in love as a woman could be ; but so dear to her was her good name, and the reputation she had made herself, that she entirely dissembled her passion.

After suffering for a year, without choosing to solace herself, like other women, by means of her eyes and her tongue, her heart became so inflamed that she was driven to seek the ultimate remedy ; and she made up her mind that it was better to satisfy her desire, provided none but God knew her heart, than to confide it to one who might betray her secret. Having come to this resolution, one day when she was in her mistress's chamber, and was looking out on a terrace, she saw the gentleman she loved so much walking there. After gazing on him until darkness concealed him from her sight, she called her little page, and, pointing out the gentleman to him, "Do you see," she said, "that gentleman in a crimson satin doublet, and a robe trimmed with lynx fur ? Go and tell him that a friend of his wishes to see him, and is waiting for him in the gallery in the garden."

Whilst the page was doing his errand, she went out the back way, and went to the gallery, after putting on her mask and pulling down her hood. When the gentleman entered the gallery, she first fastened both the doors, so that no one should come in upon them, and then embracing him with all her might, she said in a low whisper, "This long time, my friend, the love I have for you has made me long for place and time to speak with you ; but my fear for my honour has been so great that I have been constrained, in spite of myself, to conceal my passion. But at last love has prevailed over fear ; and as your honour is known to me, I declare that if you will promise to love me, and never to speak of it to anyone, or inquire whom I am, I will be all my life your faithful and loving friend ; and I assure you I will never love any but you ; but I would rather die than tell you who I am !"

The gentleman promised all she asked, and thereby encouraged her to treat him in the same way—that is to say, refuse him nothing. It was in winter, about five or six o'clock in the evening, when, of course, he could not see much. But if his eyes were of little service to him on the occasion, his hands were not so. Touching her clothes, he found they were of velvet, a costly stuff in those times, and not worn every day, except by ladies of high family. As far as the hand could judge, all beneath was neat, and in the best condition. Accordingly he tried to regale her to the best of his ability ; she too performed her part equally well, and the gentleman easily perceived she was married.

When she was about to return to the place whence she came, the gentleman said to her, "Highly do I prize the favour you have conferred on me without my deserving it ; but that will be still more precious to me which you will grant at my entreaty. Enchanted as I am by your gracious favour, I beg you will tell me if I am to expect a continuance of it, and in what manner I am to act ; for, not knowing you, how am I to address you elsewhere to solicit the renewal of my happiness ?”

“ Give yourself no concern about that,” replied the fair one, “ but rely upon it that every evening after my mistress has supped, I shall be sure to send for you, if you are on the terrace where you were just now. But, above all things, do not forget what you have promised. When I simply send word that you are wanted, you will understand that I await you in the gallery ; but if you hear speak of going to meat, you may either retire or come to our mistress’s apartment. Above all, I beg you never to attempt to know who I am, unless you wish to break our friendship.”

The lady and the gentleman then went their several ways. Their intrigue lasted a long while without his ever being able to know who she was, though he had a marvellous longing to satisfy his curiosity on the point. He wearied his imagination in vain to guess who she might be, and could not conceive that there was a woman in the world who did not choose to be seen and loved. As he had heard some stupid preacher say that no one who had ever seen the face of the devil could ever love him, he imagined that she might possibly be some evil spirit. To clear up his doubts, he resolved to know who she was who received him so graciously. The next time, therefore, that she sent for him, he took some chalk, and in the act of embracing her marked her shoulder without her perceiving it. As soon as she had left him, he hastened to the princess’s chamber, and stationed himself at the door to observe the shoulders of the ladies who entered. It was not long before he saw that same Jambicque advance to the door, with such an air of lofty disdain, that he durst not think of scrutinizing her like the others, feeling assured that she could not be the person he sought. But when her back was turned, he could not help seeing the mark of the chalk, though such was his astonishment he could hardly believe his own eyes. However, after having well considered her figure, which corresponded precisely to that he was in the habit of touching in the dark, he was convinced that it was she herself ; and he was very glad to see that a woman who had never been suspected of having a gallant, and was renowned for having refused so many worthy gentlemen, had at last fixed upon him alone.

Love, who never remains in one mood, could not suffer him long to enjoy that satisfaction. The gentleman conceived such a good opinion of his own powers of pleasing, and flattered himself with such fair hopes, that he resolved to make his love known to her, imagining that when he had done so, he should have reason to love her still more passionately. One day, when the princess was walking in the garden, the Lady Jambicque turned into an alley by herself. The gentleman, seeing her alone, went to converse with her, and feigning not to have seen her elsewhere, said to her, " I have long loved you, mademoiselle, but durst not tell you so, for fear of offending you. This constraint is so irksome to me that I must speak or die ; for I do not believe that any one can love you as I do."

Here the Lady Jambicque cut him short, and looking sternly upon him, " Have you ever heard," she said, " that I had a lover ? I trow not ; and I am amazed at your presumption in daring to address such language to a lady of my character. You have seen enough of me here to be aware that I shall never love anyone but my husband. Beware, then, how you venture again to speak to me in any such way."

Astonished at such profound hypocrisy, the gentleman could not help laughing. "You have not always been so rigid, madam," he said. "What is the use of dissembling with me? Is it not better we should love perfectly than imperfectly?"

"I neither love you perfectly nor imperfectly," replied Jambicque, "but regard you just as I do my mistress's other servants. But if you continue to speak to me in this manner, I am very likely to hate you in such sort that you will repent of having given me provocation."

The gentleman, pushing his point, rejoined, "Where are the caresses, mademoiselle, which you bestow upon me when I cannot see you? Why deprive me of them now that day reveals your exquisite beauty to me?"

"You are out of your senses," exclaimed Jambicque, making a great sign of the cross, "or you are the greatest liar in the world; for I don't believe I ever bestowed on you more or less caresses than I do at this moment: What is it you mean, pray?"

The poor gentleman, thinking to force her from her subterfuges, named the place where he had met her, and told her of the mark he had put upon her with chalk in order to recognize her. Her exasperation was then so excessive that, instead of confessing, she told him he was the most wicked of men to have invented such an infamous lie against her, but that she would try to make him repent it. Knowing what influence she had with her mistress, he tried to appease her, but all in vain. She rushed from him in fury, and went to where her mistress was walking, who quitted the company with her to converse with Jambicque, whom she loved as herself. The princess, seeing her so agitated, asked her what was the matter? Jambicque concealed nothing, but told her all the gentleman had said, putting it in so artful a manner and so much to the poor gentleman's disadvantage, that his mistress that very evening sent him orders to go home instantly, without saying a word to any one, and to remain there until further orders. He obeyed for fear of worse. As long as Jambicque was with the princess he remained in exile, and never heard from Jambicque, who had warned him truly that he should lose her if ever he tried to know her.*

You may see, ladies, how she, who preferred the world's respect to her conscience, lost both the one and the other : for everybody now knows what she wished to conceal from her lover ; and through her desire to avoid being mocked by one alone, she has now become an object of derision to all the world. It cannot be said in her excuse that hers was an ingenuous love, the simplicity of which claims every one's pity ; for what makes her doubly deserving of condemnation is that her design was to cover the wickedness of her heart with the mantle of glory and honour, and pass before God and man for what she was not. But He who will not give His glory to another was pleased to unmask her, and make her appear doubly infamous.

* Brantôme (Dames Galantes, Discours ii.), gives a detailed analysis of this novel in a very lively style, and says of the too-talkative gallant, "Those who knew the temper of this gentleman will hold him excused, for he was neither cold nor discreet enough to play that game, and mask himself with that discretion. According to what I have heard from my mother, who was in the Queen of Navarre's service and knew some secrets of her novels, and was herself one of the confabulators (devisantes), it was my late uncle La Chastaigneraye, who was brusque, hasty, and rather volatile." This Seigneur de La Chastaigneraye is the same who fought the famous duel with the Sire de Jarnac, in which he was killed with a sword-pass known by the name of coup de Jarnac. Brantôme says that the lady was a grande dame, but he does not name her.

"Truly," said Oisille, "this woman was wholly excusable; for who can say a word for her, since God, honour, and love are her accusers?"

"Who?" exclaimed Hircan, "why, pleasure and folly, two great advocates for the ladies."

"If we had no other advocates," said Parlamente, "our cause would be ill defended. Those who let pleasure get the better of them, ought no longer to call themselves women, but men; for the honour of that sex is not sullied but exalted by lust and concupiscence. A man who revenges himself on his enemy, and kills him for giving him the lie, passes for a brave man, and is so, indeed. It is the same thing when a man loves a dozen women besides his own wife. But the honour of women has a different foundation—that is to say, gentleness, patience, and chastity."

"You speak of the wise among them," rejoined Hircan.

"I do not choose to know any others," said Parlamente.

"If there were no foolish ones," said Nomerfide, "those who would fain be believed by everybody would prove to have been often liars."

"Pray, Nomerfide," said Geburon, "let me give you my voice, in order that you may tell us a tale to that purpose."

"Since virtue constrains me, and you make it my turn, I will tell you what I know to that effect. I have not heard any one here present fail to speak to the disadvantage of the Cordeliers, and in pity for them I purpose to say some good of them in the tale you are about to hear,"

NOVEL XLIV.

A cordelier received a double alms for telling the plain truth.

A CORDELIER came to the house of Sedan to ask Madame de Sedan, who was of the house of Coucy, for a pig she used to give them every year as alms. Monseigneur de Sedan, who was a wise and facetious man, made the good father eat at his table, and to put him on his mettle, he said to him among other things, "You do well, good father, to make your gatherings whilst you are not known, for I am greatly afraid that if once your hypocrisy is discovered, you will no longer have the bread of poor children earned by the sweat of their fathers." The Cordelier was not abashed by this remark, but replied, "My lord, our order is so well founded that it will endure as long as the world, for our foundation will never fail so long as there are men and women on earth." Monseigneur de Sedan being curious to know what was this foundation he spoke of, pressed him strongly to tell. After many attempts to excuse himself, the Cordelier said, "Know, my lord, that we are founded on the folly of women; and as long as there is a foolish woman in the world, we shall not die of hunger."

Madame de Sedan, who was very choleric, hearing this speech, flew into such a passion that if her husband had not been there, she would have had the Cordelier roughly handled; and she swore very decidedly he should never have the pig she had promised; but Monseigneur de Sedan, seeing he had not disguised the truth, swore he should have two, and had them sent to his monastery.

Thus it was, ladies, that the Cordelier, being sure that ladies' offerings could not fail him, contrived to have the favour and the alms of men for speaking the plain truth. Had he been a flatterer and dissembler, he would have been more pleasing to the ladies, but not so profitable to himself and his brethren.

The novel was not ended without making the company laugh, especially those of them who knew the lord and lady of Sedan. "The Cordeliers, then," said Hircan, "ought never to preach with a view to make women wise, since their folly serves them so well."

"They do not preach to them to be wise," said Parlamente," but only to believe themselves so ; for those women who are wholly mundane and foolish, give them no great alms ; but those who by reason of frequenting their monasteries, and carrying paternosters marked with a death's head, and wearing their hoods lower than others, think themselves the wisest, are those who may well be called foolish ; for they rest their salvation on the confidence they have in those unrighteous men whom, in consideration of a little seeming, they esteem demi gods."

"But who can help believing them," said Ennasuite, "seeing that they are ordained by our prelates to preach the Gospel, and reprove us for our sins ?"

"Those can," replied Parlamente, "who have known their hypocrisy, and who know the difference between God's doctrine and the devil's."

"Jesus !" exclaimed Ennasuite, "can you suppose that those people would dare preach a bad doctrine ?"

"Suppose ?" returned Parlamente, "nay, I am sure there is nothing they believe less than the Gospel ; I mean the bad ones among them, for I know many good men who preach the Scriptures purely and simply, and live likewise without scandal, without ambition or covet-ousness, and in chastity that is neither feigned nor constrained. But the streets are not so full of such men as of their opposites; and the good tree is known by its fruits."

"In good faith, I thought," said Ennasuite, "that we were bound under pain of mortal sin to believe all they tell us from the pulpit of truth, when they speak only of what is in Holy Writ, or adduce the expositions of holy doctors divinely inspired."

"For my part," said Parlamente, "I cannot ignore the fact that there have been among them men of very bad faith; for I know well that one of them, a doctor in theology and a principal of their order, wanted to persuade several of his brethren that the Gospel was no more worthy of belief than Cæsar's Commentaries, or other histories written by authentic doctors; and, from the hour I heard that, I would never believe a preacher's word, unless I found it conformable to God's, which is the true touchstone for distinguishing true words and false."

"Be assured," said Oisille, "that they who often read it in humility will never be deceived by human fictions or inventions; for whoso has a mind filled with truth cannot receive a lie."

"Yet it seems to me that a simple person is more easily deceived than another," observed Simontault.

"Yes," said Longarine, "if you esteem silliness to be simplicity."

"I say," returned Simontault, "that a good, gentle, simple woman is more easily beguiled than one who is cunning and crafty."

"I suppose you know some one who is too full of such goodness," said Nomerfide; "if so, tell us about her."

“Since you have so well guessed, I will not disappoint you,” replied Simontault; “but you must promise me not to weep. Those who say, ladies, that your craftiness exceeds that of men, would find it hard to produce such an example as that I am about to relate to you, wherein I intend to set forth the great craft of a husband, and the simplicity and good nature of his wife.”

[The preceding novel and epilogue, which are found in all the MSS., are wanting in the edition of 1588. Claude Gouget has substituted the following for them in that of 1559.]

How two lovers cleverly consummated their amours, the issue of which was happy.

THERE were in Paris two citizens, one of them a lawyer, the other a silk-mercier, who had always been great friends, and on the most familiar terms. The lawyer had a son named Jacques, a young man very presentable in good society, who often visited his father's friend, the mercier; but it was for the sake of a handsome daughter the latter had, named Françoise, to whom Jacques paid his court so well that he became assured she loved him no less than he loved her. Whilst matters stood thus, an army was sent into Provence to oppose the descent which Charles of Austria was about to make in that quarter; and Jacques was forced to join that army, being called out in his order. He had hardly arrived in the camp when he received news of his father's death. This was a double grief to him: on the one hand, from the loss of his father; on the other hand, from the obstacles he plainly foresaw he should encounter on his return to seeing his mistress as often as he had hoped. Time allayed the first of these griefs, but made him feel the other more acutely. As death is in the course of nature, and it is usual for parents to die before their children, the grief that is felt for their loss gradually subsides. But it is quite otherwise with love; for instead of bringing us death, it brings us life, by giving us children who render us immortal, so to speak; and this it is, principally, which renders our desires the more ardent.

Jacques, being then returned to Paris, thought of nothing but how to renew his intimacy with the mercer, in order to traffic in the choicest of his wares under pretext of pure friendship. As Françoise had beauty and sprightliness, and had long been marriageable, she had several suitors during the absence of Jacques; but whether it was that her father was stingy, or that, having but that one child, he wished to establish her well, he had not made much account of any of these suitors. As people do not wait nowadays before talking scandal until they have just grounds for it, especially where the honour of our sex is concerned, this set people talking ill of Françoise. Her father, not choosing to do like many others, who, instead of reproving the faults of their wives and children, seem, on the contrary, to incite them thereto, did not shut his ears or his eyes to the popular opinion, but watched his daughter so closely that even those who sought her with no other intention than marriage saw her but rarely, and then only in her mother's presence. It need not be asked whether or not such vigilance was irksome to Jacques, who could not conceive that they should treat her so rigorously without some important reason to him unknown. This conjecture distressed him, and distracted his feelings between love and jealousy.

Resolved at all cost to know what might be this mysterious reason, he proposed to ascertain in the first place if she still retained the same tender sentiments towards him; and he went about so assiduously that at last he found means one morning at mass to place himself near her, when he perceived from her manner that she was as glad to see him as he her. As he knew that the mother was not so strict as the father, he sometimes took the liberty, when he met them on their way to church, to accost them familiarly and with ordinary politeness; and this as if he had met them by mere chance, the whole being with a view to prepare matters for the design he meditated.

By and by, when the year of mourning for his father was nearly expired, he resolved, when changing his garments, to put himself on a good footing, and do honour to his ancestors. He spoke of his intention to his mother, who approved of it, and longed the more ardently to see him well married, as she had but two children, himself and a daughter, who was already settled in life. Like an honourable lady as she was, she encouraged her son to virtue by setting before him the example of a great number of young men of his own age, who were making way by themselves, or at least showed that they were worthy of the parents from whom they derived their being. As the only question now was where they should make their purchases, the good lady said to her son, "It is my opinion, Jacques, that we cannot do better than to go to Daddy Pierre's (this was the father of Françoise). He is one of our friends, and would not cheat us."

This was tickling her son where he itched; however, he stood out, and said, "We will go and deal where we are best served, and cheapest. However, as Daddy Pierre was the intimate friend of my late father, I shall be very glad to give him the first call before we go elsewhere."

One morning, accordingly, the mother and son went to see the Sire Pierre, who received them very well, as you know that merchants can do when they scent profit. They had quantities of silk unfolded for their inspection, and chose what suited them; but they could not agree upon the price, for Jacques haggled on purpose, because his mistress's mother did not make her appearance. At last they left the place without making any purchase, and went to look elsewhere; but Jacques could see nothing he liked in any house but his mistress's, and they returned thither some time afterwards. Françoise's mother was there, and gave them the best possible reception. After the little ceremonies were gone through which are practised in such shops, the mercer's wife putting a higher price on her goods than her husband had done, "You are very hard, madam," said Jacques; "but I see how it is. Father is dead, and our friends don't know us now." So saying he pretended to wipe his eyes, as if the thought of his father had drawn tears from them; but this was only a device to help things forward. His mother, who took the matter up in perfect good faith, said thereupon, in a dolorous tone, "Since the death of my poor good man, we are visited no more than if we had never been known. Little do people care for poor widows."

Hereupon there ensued new demonstrations of friendship, and mutual promises to visit more frequently than ever. Some other merchants now came in, and were taken by the mercer himself into the back shop.

The young man took advantage of this favourable moment to say to his mother, "Madam was formerly in the habit of visiting, on Saints' days, the holy places in our neighbourhood, especially the convents. If she would take the trouble sometimes to look in upon us in passing, and take her wine, she would do us much honour and pleasure."

The mercer's wife, who suspected nothing, replied that for more than a fortnight past she had intended to go into their quarter ; that she would probably do so on Sunday, if the weather was fine, and would not fail to call and see the lady. The conclusion of this affair was followed by that of the bargain for the silks ; for it was no time to stand out for a trifle, and risk losing such a fine opportunity.

Things being in this position, and Jacques considering that he could not bring his project to bear without assistance, he resolved to confide the secret of it to a trusty friend. The two took such good measures together that nothing remained but to put them in execution. Sunday being come, the mercer's wife and her daughter failed not, on their return from their devotions, to call upon the widow, whom they found chatting with one of her female neighbours in a gallery in the garden, whilst her daughter was walking about the alleys with her brother and his friend, whose name was Olivier. On seeing his mistress, Jacques so commanded his face, that not the least change was visible in it, and he went to welcome the mother and daughter with a gay and unembarrassed air. As elderly people usually seek each other's society, the three old ladies seated themselves on a bench with their backs turned to the garden, into which the two lovers gradually moved off, and joined the other two who were walking there. After a little exchange of compliments, all four renewed their promenade, in the course of which Jacques recounted his piteous case to Françoise so movingly that she could neither grant nor refuse what her lover sued for. It needed no more to make him aware that she was smitten.

I must tell you that during this ambulatory conversation, in order to prevent suspicion, they frequently passed to and fro before the bench on which the good women were seated, taking care always to talk of trivial and indifferent matters, and now and then romping in the garden. After the old ladies had been accustomed to the noise for half an hour, Jacques made a sign to Olivier, who played his part with the other girl so well, that she did not notice the two lovers going into an orchard full of cherries, and inclosed with thick hedges of roses and very tall gooseberry-bushes. They pretended to go into a corner of the orchard to pluck almonds, but it was to pluck prunes. There Jacques, instead of giving his mistress a green gown, gave her a red one, for the colour flushed into her cheeks to find herself surprised before she was aware. They had so quickly gathered their prunes, because they were ripe, that Olivier could not have believed it, but that the girl drooped her head, and looked so ashamed. This betokened the truth to him, for before she walked with her head erect, without any fear that the vein in her eye, which ought to be red, should be seen to have the azure hue. Perceiving her confusion, Jacques recalled her to her usual deportment by suitable remonstrances.

The lovers took two or three more turns about the garden, but not without much crying and sobbing on the part of the fair one. "Alas!" she exclaimed, "was it for this you loved me? If I could have thought it—my God! What shall I do? I am undone for ever. What account will you make of me henceforth, at least if you are one of those who love only for pleasure? Oh, that I had died before committing such a fault!" Then followed another violent burst of tears. But Jacques exerted himself so much to console her, and made such promises, confirmed by so many oaths, that before they had taken three more turns about the garden, Jacques made another sign to his friend, and they entered the orchard again by another path. In spite of all she could do, she could not help receiving more pleasure from this second green gown than from the first. In short, she liked it so well that they resolved then and there to seek means for meeting oftener and more commodiously, until such time as her father should be more favourably inclined.

A young woman, a neighbour of the mercer's, distantly related to Jacques, and a good friend to Françoise, was of great help to them in bringing the good man to reason. I am informed that they continued their intrigue without discovery or scandal until the consummation of their marriage. Françoise, who was an only child, proved to be very rich for the daughter of a shopkeeper. It is true that Jacques had to wait for the greater part of his wife's fortune until the death of the father, who was so close-fisted and distrustful that what he held in one hand he imagined the other stole from him.

There, ladies, you have an example of a tender connection well begun, well continued, and better ended; for although it is usual with men to despise a woman or a girl as soon as she has given you what you sue to her for with most eagerness, yet this young man, loving well and in good faith, and having found in his mistress what every husband desires to find in his bride ; knowing, moreover, that the girl was of good family, and correct in all but the fault into which he himself had led her, would not commit adultery elsewhere, or trouble the peace of another household : conduct for which I deem him highly commendable.

“ They were both very blameable, however,” said Oisille ; “ nor was the friend even excusable for having ministered to the crime, or at least acquiesced in such a rape.”

“ Do you call it a rape when both parties are willing ? ” said Saffredent. “ Are there any better marriages than those which are thus brought about by furtive amours ? It has passed into a proverb that marriages are made in heaven ; but this applies neither to forced marriages nor to those which are made for money, and which are regarded as well and duly approved as soon as the father and mother have given their consent.”

“ You may say what you please,” replied Oisille, “ but parental authority must be obeyed, and if there be no father or mother, the will of the other relations must be respected. Otherwise, if everyone was free to marry according to fancy, how many cornuted marriages would there not be ? Can anyone imagine that a young man and a girl from twelve to fifteen years of age know what is good for them ? Anyone who should carefully examine would find that there are as many unhappy marriages among those made for love as those made by constraint. Young people who do not know what they want take the first they meet without inquiry ; and then, when they come gradually to know the mistake they have committed, this knowledge leads them into still greater errors. Those, on the contrary, who have not been married voluntarily, have entered into that engagement by the advice and at the solicitation of persons who have seen more and possess more judgment than themselves: so that, when they come to experience the good they did not know, they enjoy it much better, and embrace it with much more affection."

"Ay, madam," said Hircan, "but you forget that the girl was of ripe years and marriageable, and that she knew the injustice of her father, who let her virginity grow musty for fear of rubbing the rust off his crown pieces. Do you not know that nature is a frisky jade? She loved, she was loved, she found what she wanted ready to her hand, and she might call to mind the old proverb: 'She that will not when she may, when she will she shall have nay.' All these considerations, added to the promptitude of the assailant, left her no time to defend herself. It has been remarked, too, that immediately afterwards a great change was noticed in her countenance. This change was the result of her dissatisfaction at having had so little time to judge whether the thing was good or bad: accordingly, she did not require very long coaxing to prevail on her to make a second trial."

"For my part," said Longarine, "I should not think her excusable but for the good faith of the young man, who, acting like an honest man, did not forsake her, but took her such as he had made her; for which I think him the more deserving of praise, as youth in these days is very corrupt. I do not pretend for all that to excuse his first fault, which virtually amounted to rape with regard to the daughter, and subornation with regard to the mother."

"Not at all, not at all," interrupted Dagoucin; "there was neither rape nor subornation, but all happened voluntarily, both on the part of the mothers, who did not prevent it, though they were duped, and on that of the girl, who liked it well, and never complained."

"All this," said Parlamente, "was only the consequence of the good-nature and simplicity of the mercer's wife, who in good faith led her daughter to the butchery without knowing it."

"Why not say to the wedding?" said Simontault, "since this simplicity was not less advantageous to the girl than it was prejudicial to a wife who was too easily the dupe of her husband."

"Since you know the story," said Nomerfide, "tell it us."

"With all my heart," replied Simontault, "on condition that you promise me not to weep. Those who say, ladies, that you have more craft than men, would find it hard to produce an example like that of which I am going to speak. I purpose to exhibit to you not only the great craft of a husband, but also the extreme simplicity and good-nature of his wife."

NOVEL XLV.

A husband, giving the innocents to his servant girl, plays upon his wife's simplicity.

THERE was at Tours a shrewd, cunning fellow, who was upholsterer to the late Duke of Orleans, son of King Francis I. Though this upholsterer had become deaf in consequence of a severe illness, he nevertheless retained the full use of his wits, and was so well endowed in that respect that there was not a man in his trade more cunning than himself. As for other matters, you shall see from what I am about to relate to you how he contrived to acquit himself. He had married a good and honourable woman, with whom he lived very peaceably. He was greatly afraid of displeasing her, and she also studied to obey him in all things. But for all the great affection the husband had for his wife, he was so charitable that he often gave his female neighbours what belonged to her; but this he always did as secretly as possible. They had a good stout wench as a servant, with whom the upholsterer fell in love. Fearing, however, lest his wife should perceive it, he affected often to scold her, saying she was the laziest creature he had ever seen; but that he did not wonder at it, since her mistress never beat her.

One day, when they were talking of giving the Innocents,* the upholsterer said to his wife, "It would be a great charity to give them to that lazy jade of yours, but it would not do for her to receive them from your hand, for it is too weak, and your heart is too tender. If I were to put my own hand to the job, we should be better served by her than we are." The poor woman, suspecting nothing, begged that he would perform the operation, confessing that she had neither the heart nor the strength to do it. The husband willingly undertook the commission, and as if he intended to flog the wench soundly, he bought the finest rods he could procure; and to show that he had no mind to spare her, he steeped them in pickle, so that the poor woman felt more compassion for her servant than suspicion of her husband.

* The learned Gregory, in his treatise on the Boy Bishop, preserved in his posthumous works, observes that "it hath been a custom, and yet is elsewhere, to whip up the children upon Innocents' Day morning, that the memorie of Herod's murder of the Innocents might stick the closer, and in a moderate proportion to act over the crueltie again in kinde." This custom is mentioned by Haspinian, De Orig. Festor. Christianor. fol. 160. "Hujus lanienæ truculentissimæ ut pueri Christianorum recordentur, et simul discant odium, persecutionem, crucem, exilium, egestatemque statim cum nato Christo incipere, virgis cædi solent in aurora hujus diei adhuc in lectulis jacentes a parentibus suis." That which was at first a serious parody of the martyrdom of Bethlehem, afterwards degenerated into a jocular usage, and persons past the age of childhood, young women especially, were made to play the part of the Innocents. It is related that a Seigneur du Rivau, taking leave of some ladies to join a hunting-party at a considerable distance, heard one of them whisper to another, "We shall sleep at our ease, and pass the Innocents without receiving them." This put Du Rivau on his mettle. He kept his appointment, galloped back twenty leagues by night, arrived at the lady's house at dawn on Innocents'

Innocents' Day being come, the upholsterer rose betimes, went to the upper room, where the servant lay alone, and gave her the Innocents in a very different manner from that he talked of to his wife. The servant fell a-crying, but her tears were of no avail. For fear, however, that his wife should come up, he began to whip

Day, surprised her in bed, and used the privilege of the season. "Vous savez," says the author of the Escraignes (Veillées) Dijonnaises, "que l'on a à Dijon cette peute coutume de fouetter les filles le jour des Innocens, la quelle est entretenue par les braves amoureux, pour avoir occasion de donner quelque chose aux estrennes à leurs amoureuses." Clement Marot has the following epigram on this subject :

"Très chere sœur, si je savois ou couche Votre personne au jour des Innocents,
 De bon matin j'irois en votre couche
 Veoir ce gent corps que j'aime entre cinq cents.
 Adonc ma main (veu l'ardeur que je sens)
 Ne se pourroit bonnement contenter
 De vous toucher, tenir, taster, tenter :
 Et si quelqu'un survenoit d'aventure,
 Semblant ferois de vous innocenter, Seroit-co pas honneste couverture ? "

the bedpost at such a rate that he made the rods fly in pieces, and then he carried them broken as they were to his wife. "I think, my dear," said he, showing them to her, "that your servant will not soon forget the Innocents."

The upholsterer having gone out of doors, the servant went and threw herself at her mistress's feet, and complained that her husband had behaved to her in the most shameful way that ever a servant was treated. The good woman, imagining that she spoke of the flogging she had received, interrupted her, and said, "My husband has done well, and just as I have been begging him to do this month and more. If he has made you smart I am very glad of it. You may lay it all to me. He has not given you half as much as he ought."

When the girl perceived that her mistress approved of such an act, she concluded that it was not such a great sin as she had supposed, seeing that a woman who was considered so virtuous was the cause of it; and so she never ventured to complain of it again. The upholsterer, seeing that his wife was as glad to be deceived as he was to deceive her, resolved frequently to give her the same satisfaction, and gained the servant's consent so well that she cried no more for getting the Innocents. He continued the same course for a long time without his wife's knowing anything of the matter, until winter came, and there was a great fall of snow. As he had given his servant the Innocents in the garden on the green grass, he took a fancy to give them to her also on the snow; and one morning, before anyone was awake, he took her out into the garden in her shift, to make the crucifix on the snow. They romped and pelted each other, and among the sport that of the Innocents was not forgotten. One of the neighbours, meanwhile, had gone to her window to see what sort of weather it was. The window looked right over the upholsterer's garden, and the woman saw the game of the Innocents that was going on there, and was so shocked that she resolved to inform her good gossip, that she might no longer be the dupe of such a wicked husband and vicious servant. After the upholsterer had finished his fine game, he looked round to see if he had been noticed by anyone, and to his great vexation he saw his neighbour at her window. But as he knew how to give all sorts of colours to his tapestry, so he thought he should be able to put such a colour on this fact that his neighbour would be no less deceived than his wife. No sooner had he got to bed again than he made his wife get up in her shift, and took her to the very spot where he had been toying with the servant. He frolicked awhile with her at snow-ball throwing, as he had done with the servant; next he gave her the Innocents as he had done to the other; and then they went back to bed.

The next time the upholsterer's wife went to mass, her neighbour and good friend failed not to meet her there, and entreated her, with very great earnestness, but without saying more, to discharge her servant, who was a good-for-nothing, dangerous creature. The upholsterer's wife said she would do no such thing, unless the other told her why she thought the wench so good-for-nothing and dangerous. The neighbour, thus pressed, stated at last that she had seen her one morning in the garden with her husband.

"It was I, gossip dearie," replied the good woman, laughing.

"What!" cried the neighbour. "Stripped to your shift in the garden at four o'clock in the morning!"

"Yes, gossip," said the upholsterer's wife. "In good sooth, it was myself."

"They pelted each with snow," continued the neighbour, "and he played with her teaties and all that sort of thing as familiarly as you please."

"Yes, gossip, it was myself."

"But, gossip," rejoined the neighbour, "I saw them do upon the snow a thing that seems to me neither decent nor proper."

"That may be, gossip dearie," replied the upholsterer's wife; "but as I told you before and tell you again, it was myself and no one else that did all this; for my good husband and I divert ourselves in that way together. Don't be shocked, pray. You know that we are bound to please our husbands."

The end of the matter was that the neighbour went home much more disposed to wish that she had such a husband than to pity her good friend. When the upholsterer came home, his wife repeated to him the whole conversation she had had with her neighbour. "It is well for you, my dear," he replied, "that you are a good and sensible woman; but for that we should have been separated long ago. But I trust that by God's grace we shall love each other in time to come as much as we have in the past, and that to His glory, and to our own comfort and satisfaction."

"Amen, my dear," said the good woman. "I hope, too, that you will never find me fail to do my part towards maintaining the good understanding between us.*"

* Dunlop thinks that this novel was probably taken from the fabliau of some Trouveur, who had obtained it from the East, as it corresponds with the story of the Shopkeeper's Wife in Nakshebi's Persian tales, known by the name of Tooti Nameh, or Tales of a Parrot. The Queen of Navarre's version of the story has been

One must be very incredulous, ladies, if, after hearing so true a story, one were of opinion that there was as much wickedness in you as in men ; though, to say the truth, without wronging anyone, one cannot help coming to the conclusion with regard to the man and woman in question, that neither the one nor the other was good for anything.

"This man was prodigiously wicked," said Parlamente ; "for on the one hand he deceived his wife, and on the other his servant."

"You cannot have rightly understood the story," said Hircan ; "for it states that he satisfied them both in one morning : a great feat, considering the contrariety of their interests."

"In that respect, he was doubly a knave," replied Parlamente, "to satisfy the simplicity of the one by a lie, and the malice of the other by an act of vice. But I am quite aware that such as these will always be pardoned when they have such judges as you."

"I assure you, however," rejoined Hircan, "that I will never undertake anything so great or so difficult, for provided I satisfy you, my day will not have been ill employed."

"If mutual love does not content the heart," returned Parlamente, "all the rest cannot do so."

"That is true," said Simontault. "I am persuaded imitated by Lafontaine, under the title of La Servante Justifiée. He was particularly struck by an exceedingly comic reiteration of the phrase, "It was I, gossip," in the dialogue between the simple-witted wife and her neighbour, and says in his opening lines :

"Pour cetts fois, la Reine de Navarre D'un C'ETOIT MOI naif autant que rare, Entretiendra dans ces vers le lecteur."

there is no greater pain than to love and not to be loved."

"In order to be loved," said Parlamente, "one should turn to those who love ; but very often those women who will not love are the most loved, and those men love most who are the least loved."

"That reminds me," said Oisille, "of a tale which I had not intended to introduce among good ones."

"Pray tell it us," said Simontault.

"I will do so with pleasure," replied Oisille.

NOVEL XLVI.

A sanctimonious Cordelier attempts to debauch the wife of a judge, and actually ravishes a young lady, whose mother had foolishly authorized him to chastise her for lying too late in bed.

IN Angoulême, where Count Charles, father of King Francis, often resided, there was a Cordelier named De Vale, who was esteemed a learned man and a great preacher. One Advent he preached in the town before the count, and was so admired that those who knew him eagerly invited him to dinner. Among these was the Judge of Exempts of the county, who had married a handsome and virtuous wife, of whom the Cordelier was dying for love, though he had not the boldness to tell her so ; she, however, perceived it, and held him and his passion in disdain. One day he observed her going up to the garret all alone, and thinking to surprise her, he went up after her : but on hearing his steps she turned round, and asked him whither he was going. "I am coming after you," he replied. "I have a secret to tell you."

"Don't come after me, good father," said the judge's wife, "for I do not choose to talk with such as you in secret, and if you come another step higher you shall repent of it."

The friar, seeing her alone, took no heed of her words, and ran up ; but she, being a woman of spirit, as soon as he was at the top gave him a kick in the belly, saying, "Down, down, sir," and sent him rolling from the top to the bottom. The poor friar was so much ashamed of his discomfiture that he forgot his hurt, and ran out of the town as fast as he could, for he was sure she would not conceal the matter from her husband. No more she did, nor from the count and countess, so that the Cordelier durst not appear again in their presence.

To complete his wickedness, he went away to the house of a lady who loved the Cordeliers above all other folk ; and after he had preached a sermon or two before her, he cast eyes upon her daughter, who was very handsome ; and because she did not rise in the morning to go and hear his sermon, he often scolded her before her mother, who used to say, "I wish to God, father, she had tasted a little of the discipline which you and your pious brethren administer to each other." The good father vowed he would give her some of it if she continued to be so lazy, and the mother begged he would do so. A day or two after, the good father entered the lady's room, and not seeing her daughter, asked where she was. "She fears you so little that she is still in bed," replied the lady.

"Assuredly it is a very bad habit in young people to be so lazy," replied the friar. "Few people make much account of the sin of laziness ; but for my part I esteem it one of the most dangerous of all, both for the body and the soul; wherefore you should chastise her well for it, or, if you will leave the business to me, I warrant I will cure her of lying in bed at an hour when she should be at her devotions."

The poor lady, believing that he was a good man, begged he would be pleased to correct her daughter, which he proceeded to do forthwith. Going up a little wooden staircase, he found the girl all alone in bed, fast asleep, and sleeping as she was, he ravished her. The poor girl, waking up, knew not whether it was a man or a devil, and began to scream as loud as she could, and cry for help to her mother, who called out, from the foot of the stairs, "Do not spare her, sir; give it her again, and chastise the naughty hussey." When the Cordelier had accomplished his wicked purpose he went down to the lady, and said to her, with his face all on fire, "I think, madam, your daughter will not forget the discipline I have given her."

After thanking him heartily, the mother went up to her daughter, who was making such lamentation as a virtuous woman well might who had been the victim of such a crime; and when she had learned the truth, she sent everywhere to look for the Cordelier, but he was already far away, and never afterwards was he found in the realm of France.

You see, ladies, what comes of giving such commissions to persons who are not fit to be trusted with them. The correction of men belongs to men, and of women to women; for in correcting men, women would be as pitiful as men would be cruel in correcting women.

"Jesus! madam," said Parlamente, "what a wicked villain of a Cordelier!"

"Say rather," said Hircan, "what a silly fool of a mother, who, cajoled by hypocrisy, allowed so much familiarity to one of a class of men who ought never to be seen but in church."

"Truly," said Parlamente, "I own she was one of the silliest mothers that ever was; and if she had been as wise as the judge's wife, she would rather have made him go down the stairs than up them. But your half-angel devil is the most dangerous of all, and knows so well how to transform himself into an angel of light that one makes it matter of conscience to suspect him for what he is; and it seems to me that the person who is not suspicious deserves praise."

"Nevertheless," said Oisille, "one ought to suspect the evil that is to be avoided; especially so should those who have charge of others; for it is better to suspect mischief where it does not exist, than to fall through foolishly believing in the harmlessness of that which does exist. I have never seen a woman deceived for being slow to believe the word of men, but many a one for having too readily put faith in lies. Therefore I say that the mischief which may happen cannot be too much suspected by those who have charge of men, women, towns, and states; for in spite of the best watch, wickedness and treachery greatly prevail, and the shepherd who is not vigilant will always suffer from the wiles of the wolf."

"Nevertheless," said Dagoucin, "a suspicious person cannot maintain a perfect friendship, and many friends have been parted by a suspicion."

"Supposing that you know a case in point," said Oisille, "I call upon you to relate it."

"I know one so true that you will take pleasure in hearing it," replied Dagoucin. "I will tell you what is most sure to break friendship, ladies, and that is, when the very confidence of the friendship begins to give occasion for suspicion ; for as trusting a friend is the greatest honour one can do him, so doubting him is the greatest dishonour, for it shows that he is thought other than one would have him be, which is the cause of breaking many friendships and turning friends into enemies, as you will see by the tale I am about to relate to you."

[This novel is wanting in the edition of 1558, and the following is substituted for it in that of 1559.]

A Cordelier's sermons on the subject of husbands beating their wives.

IN Angoulême, where Count Charles, father of King Francis I., often made his residence, there was a Cordelier named De Valles, a man of knowledge, and so esteemed as a preacher that he was selected to preach the Advent sermons before the count, a fact which still further enhanced his reputation. It happened during Advent that a young scatterbrain of the town, who had married a young and very pretty woman, continued to run after other women right and left, just as dissolutely as though he were unmarried. The young wife, discovering this, could not conceal her resentment, and was often paid for it sooner and otherwise than she would have liked. All this did not hinder her from continuing her lamentations, and sometimes even from proceeding to abuse and railing, by which conduct she so exasperated her husband that he beat her black and blue, and then she made more noise than ever. The neighbours' wives, who knew the cause of their quarrels, could not keep silence, but cried out publicly in the street, "Fie for shame! To the devil with such husbands!"

By good luck the Cordelier de Valles was passing that way. Having heard the noise, and learned the cause of it, he resolved to touch upon it next day in his sermon; and so he did, bringing in the subject of marriage, and the affections which ought to accompany it. He pronounced a eulogy on the wedded state, strongly censured those who violated its duties, and instituted a comparison between conjugal and parental love. Among other things, he said that a husband was more to be condemned for beating his wife than for beating his father or mother; "For," said he, "if you beat your father or mother, you will be sent for penance to Rome; but if you beat your wife, she and her female neighbours will send you to all the devils, that is to say, to hell. Now just see the difference there is between these two penances. One usually comes back from Rome; but from hell there is no returning. Nulla est redemptio."

Subsequently he was informed that the women took advantage of what he had said, and that their husbands could no longer be masters: and this mischief he desired to remedy, as he had that under which the women had laboured. To this end, in another sermon he compared women to devils, and said that the two were man's greatest enemies and perpetual persecutors, which he could not get rid of, especially women. "In fact," said he, "the devils fly when they are shown the cross, and women do quite the contrary, for it is that which tames them, makes them go and come, and is the cause of their putting their husbands into no end of passions. Would you know, my good people," said he to the husbands, "the way this is to be remedied? Here it is. When you see that your wives torment you incessantly, as is their wont, take the handle of the cross, and thrash them well with it. You will not have done this above three or four times before you will find yourselves the better for it, and will see that as the devil is driven away by the cross, so you will drive your wives away, and make them hold their tongues, by virtue of the handle of the same cross, provided it be not attached."

There, ladies, is a sample of the sermons of the venerable Cordelier de Valles, of whose life I will tell you no more, and for good reason. I will only say that for all he put a good face on the matter, for I knew the man, he was much more for the women than the men.

"He gave a very bad proof of that in this last sermon of his," said Parlamente, "since he instructed the men to maltreat them."

"You do not discern his cunning," said Hircan. "As you have not much experience of war, you cannot be acquainted with the stratagems that are necessary in it, one of the greatest of which is to create division in the enemy's camp; for then he is more easily beaten. Just so Master Monk knew that aversion and anger between husband and wife often occasion a loose rein to be given to female honour. As virtue is the guard of that honour, it finds itself under the fangs of the wolf before it is aware that it is gone astray."

"Be that as it may," said Parlamente, "I could never love a man who had sown discord between my husband and me to the extent of coming to blows; for with beating there is an end to love. Yet they can be so very demure, as I have heard, when they want to cajole some woman or another, and talk in so engaging a manner, that I am sure there would be more danger in listening to them in secret than in publicly receiving blows from a husband who in other respects was a good one."

"In truth," said Dagoucin, "they have made themselves so notorious that one has good cause to fear them, though, in my opinion, it is a laudable thing not to be suspicious."

"One ought, however, to suspect the evil that may be avoided," said Oisille, "and it is better to fear an imaginary ill than to fall into a real one for want of belief. For my part, I have never known a woman to have been beguiled for having been slow to believe men; but I have known many a one who has been beguiled for too easily believing their falsehoods. Consequently I maintain that those who have charge of men, women, towns, and states can never too much fear and suspect the evil that may happen. Wickedness and treachery are so much in vogue that one cannot be too much on one's guard; and the shepherd who is not vigilant will always be plundered by the sly and crafty wolf."

"It is nevertheless true," observed Dagoucin, "that a distrustful and suspicious person can never be a perfect friend; and many friendships have been broken upon a mere suspicion."

"If you know any example in point, tell it us," said Oisille.

"I know one," he replied, "so true, that you will feel pleasure in hearing it. I am going to tell you, ladies, of what most easily breaks friendship, and that is, when the very security of the friendship itself begins to inspire suspicion. As one cannot do a friend a greater honour than to trust in him, so likewise one cannot offer him a keener insult than to distrust him. The reason is, that one thereby shows that one believes him to be quite different from what one would have him to be ; and this causes a breach between many good friends, and makes them enemies, an instance of which you shall see in the tale I am about to tell you."

NOVEL XLVII.

A gentleman of the Pays du Perche, distrusting his friend, obliges him to do him the mischief of which he has falsely suspected him.

NEAR the Pays du Perche there were two gentlemen, who from their childhood had been such perfectly good friends that they had but one heart, one house, one bed, one table, and one purse. Their perfect friendship lasted a long while without there having ever been the least dispute, or even a word that savoured of it ; for they lived, not merely like two brothers, but like one man. One of the two married, but this did not diminish his affection for the other, or prevent his continuing to live with him as happily as before. When they happened to be in any place where beds were scarce, he made him sleep with his wife and him. It is true that he himself lay in the middle. All their goods were in common, so that the marriage, whatever might happen, never altered this perfect friendship.

But as there is nothing solid and permanent in this world, time brought about a change in the felicity of a too happy household. The husband, forgetting the confidence he had in his friend, became jealous without cause of him and his wife, to whom he could not refrain from saying some harsh things, whereat she was the more surprised, as he had ordered her to treat his friend in all respects, save one, exactly like himself. All this, however, did not hinder him from forbidding her to speak to him, unless it was in full company. She made known this prohibition to her husband's friend, who could not believe it, well knowing that he had not done or thought anything with which his friend could be displeased. As he was accustomed to conceal nothing from him, he told him what he had heard, begging him to disguise nothing, for it was his earnest desire not to give him, either in that or in any other matter, the least cause to break a friendship of such long duration.

The husband assured him he had never harboured such a thought, and that those who had spread this report had foully lied. "I know well," said the friend, "that jealousy is a passion as insupportable as love ; and though you were jealous, and even of me, I should not be angry with you, for you could not help it. But I should have reason to complain of a thing which it is in your own power to do or not to do, and that is, to conceal the matter from me, seeing that you have never yet concealed from me any opinion or emotion you have known. On my part, if I were in love with your wife, you ought not to make it a crime in me, for love is a fire which no one can master ; but if I concealed the fact from you, and sought means to make it known to your wife, I should be the worst man that ever lived. Besides, though you have a good wife and a worthy, I can assure you that, even though she were not yours, she is, of all the women I have ever seen, the one I should give myself the least concern about. I pray you, however, if you have the least suspicion, to tell me so, in order to take measures accordingly, so that our long friendship may not be broken for the sake of a woman ; for even if I loved your wife above all the women in the world, I would never speak to her in that case, because I prefer your friendship to any other."

The husband protested to him with great oaths that he never had such a thought, and begged that he would continue with him in all respects upon the old footing. " I will do so, since you desire it," replied the friend ; " but allow me to tell you that I never will live with you if, after this, you have such a thought of me, and keep a secret from me, or take it amiss."

They continued then to live together on the same terms as before, until, after some time, the husband's jealous fit came upon him more strongly than ever, and he ordered his wife no longer to show his friend the same fair countenance. She immediately informed the friend of this, and begged him not to speak to her, as she was forbidden to speak to him. The friend, seeing from this and from certain grimaces of his comrade that he had not kept his word, said to him in great indignation, " If you are jealous, my friend, that is a natural thing ; but after the oaths you have sworn to me, I cannot help telling you that I am aggrieved by your having concealed it so long. I had always believed that between your heart and mine there was no medium or obstacle ; but I see with regret, and without any fault of mine, that I have not succeeded so well as I had hoped, since not only are you jealous of your wife and me, but you furthermore want to make a mystery of it, in order that your malady may endure so long that it may turn into hatred, and the closest friendship which has been seen in our day be succeeded by the most mortal enmity. I have done what I could to prevent this mischief, but since you believe me to be so wicked, and the reverse of all I have ever been, I solemnly vow to you that I will be such as you take me to be, and that I will never rest until I have had from your wife what you imagine I am striving for: and I warn you henceforth to be on your guard against me. Since suspicion has made you renounce my friendship, resentment makes me renounce yours."

The husband tried to make him believe that it was all a mistake, but the other would not listen to him. The furniture and property they had in common were divided, and this division was accompanied by that of their hearts, which had always been so united. The unmarried gentleman kept his word, and never rested until he made his friend a cuckold.

So be it, ladies, to all those who distrust their wives without cause. A woman of honour sooner suffers herself to be overcome by despair than by all the pleasures in the world, and many husbands who are unjustly jealous behave so that at last they have just cause for jealousy, and make their wives do what they suspect them of. Some say that jealousy is love: I deny it; for though it issues from love as ashes from fire, just so it kills it, just as ashes smother the flame.

"I am persuaded," said Hircan, "that there is nothing more irritating to man or woman than to be unjustly suspected. For my own part, there is nothing would sooner make me break with my friends."

"Yet it is not a reasonable excuse," said Oisille, "for a woman to say she revenges herself for her husband's suspicions at the cost of her own shame; it is doing like a man who, not being able to kill his enemy, runs himself through with his own sword, or bites his own fingers when he cannot scratch him. She would have acted more wisely in never speaking to the friend, in order to show her husband that he was wrong in suspecting her, for time would have reconciled them."

"She acted like a woman of spirit," said Ennasuite ; "and if there were many wives like her, their husbands would not be so outrageous."

"After all," said Longarine, "patience finally enables a chaste woman to triumph, and by it she should abide."

"A woman, however, may be sinless, and yet not chaste," observed Ennasuite.

"How do you mean?" asked Oisille.

"When she mistakes another for her husband," replied Ennasuite.

"And where is the fool," exclaimed Parlamente, "who does not know the difference between her husband and another man, disguise himself as he may?"

"There have been, and there will be," rejoined Ennasuite, "those who have made such a mistake in perfect good faith, and who consequently are not culpable."

"If you know an instance of the kind, relate it to us," said Dagoucin ; "to me it seems that innocence and sin are two very incompatible things."

"Well, ladies," said Ennasuite, "if the stories you have already heard have not sufficiently shown you that it is dangerous to lodge those who call us mundane, and look upon themselves as saints, and as persons much more regenerate than we are, here is a tale which will convince you not only that they are men like others, but that they have in them something diabolical exceeding the common wickedness of men."

NOVEL XLVIII.

A Cordelier took the husband's place on his wedding-night, while the latter was dancing with the bridal party.

A GIRL having been married in a village in Perigord, the wedding was celebrated at an inn, where all the relations and friends made merry with the best cheer. Two Cordeliers arrived on the wedding-day, and as it was not in accordance with propriety that they should be present at the marriage-feast, they had their suppers served up to them in their chamber. That one of the pair who had the most authority, and also the most villany, conceived that since he was not allowed to partake with the rest at board he ought to have his share in bed, and resolved to show them a trick of his trade.

When evening came, and the dance was begun, the Cordelier gazed long on the bride from the window, and found her handsome and much to his taste. He inquired of the servant girls which was the bridal-chamber, and learned, to his great satisfaction, that it was close to his own; and then, in order to arrive at his ends, he took care to watch well till he saw the old women steal off with the bride, as usual on such occasions. As it was still early, the husband would not quit the dance, on which he was so intent that he seemed to have forgotten his bride, which the Cordelier had not done; for as soon as his ears informed him that she had been put to bed, he threw off his grey robe, and went and took the bridegroom's place. The fear of being surprised did not allow him to remain there long. He rose, therefore, and went to the end of the alley, where his companion, whom he had left on the watch, signalled to him that the bridegroom was still dancing. The Cordelier, who had not satisfied his wicked lust, then went back to the bride, and stayed with her until his companion made the signal that it was time to go away.

The bridegroom went to bed, and the bride, who had been so briskly plied by the Cordelier, and wanted nothing but rest, could not help saying to her husband, "Have you made up your mind never to go to sleep, but to worry me all night long?" The poor husband, who had but just lain down, asked her in great amazement how he had worried her, seeing that he had been dancing all the evening. "Fine dancing, indeed," said the poor woman; "this is the third time you have come to bed. You had better go to sleep, I think."

Astounded at these words, the husband insisted on knowing the exact truth. After she had related to him the whole thing just as it had occurred, he got up instantly, making no doubt it was the Cordeliers, and went to their chamber, which, as before mentioned, was not far from his own. Not finding them, he shouted for help so loud that all his friends came flocking round him. When he had told them the fact, everyone helped him with candles, lanterns, and all the dogs in the village to hunt for the Cordeliers. Not finding them in the houses, they beat the country round, and caught them in the vineyards, where they treated them as they deserved; for after having well beaten them, they cut off their legs and arms, and left them among the vines to the care of Bacchus and Venus, of whom they were better disciples than of St. Francis.

Do not be astonished, ladies, if these people, who are distinguished by a manner of living so different from ours, do things which adventurers would be ashamed to do. You may rather wonder that they do not do worse, when God withdraws his grace from them. The habit does not always make the monk, as the proverb says. It often unmakes him, and pride is the cause.

"Mon Dieu!" said Oisille, "shall we never have done with tales about these monks?"

"If ladies, princes, and gentlemen are not spared," said Ennasuite, "it strikes me that they have no reason to complain if they are not spared either. They are, for the most part, so useless, that no one would ever mention them if they did not commit some rascality worthy of memory; which makes good the proverb, that it is better to do mischief than to do nothing at all. Besides, the more diversified our bouquet, the handsomer it will be."

"If you promise not to be angry," said Hircan, "I will tell you a story of a great lady so insatiable in love that you will excuse the poor Cordelier for having taken what he wanted where he found it, the more so as the lady of whom I have to speak, having plenty to eat, indulged her craving for tit-bits in a way that was too bad."

"Since we have vowed to speak the truth," said Oisille, "we have also vowed to hear it. You may then speak freely; for the evil we speak of men and women does not injure those who are the heroes of the tale, and only serves to cure people of the esteem they have for the creatures, and the confidence they might repose in them, by showing the faults to which they are subject, to the end that we may rest our hopes on none but Him who is alone perfect, and without whom every man is but imperfection."

"Well, then," said Hircan, "I will proceed boldly with my story."

NOVEL XLIX.

Of a countess who diverted herself adroitly with love sport, and how her game was discovered.

AT the court of one of the kings of France, named Charles (I will not say which of them, for the honour of the lady of whom I am about to speak, and whom I shall also abstain from naming), there was a foreign countess of very good family. As new things please, this lady at once attracted all eyes, both by the novelty of her costume, and by its richness and magnificence. Though she was not a beauty of the first order, she possessed, nevertheless, so much grace, such a lofty deportment, and a manner of speaking which inspired so much respect, that no one ventured to attempt her, except the king, who was very much in love with her. That he might enjoy her society more freely, he gave the count her husband a commission which kept him a long time away from the court, and during that interval the king diverted himself with the countess.

Several of the king's gentlemen, seeing that their master was well treated by the countess, took the liberty to speak to her on the subject; among the rest, one named Astillon, an enterprising and handsome man. At first she answered him with great dignity, and thought to frighten him by threatening to complain to the king his master, but he, who was not a man to be moved by the menaces of an intrepid captain, made light of those which the lady held forth, and pressed her so closely that she consented to grant him a private interview, and even told him what he should do in order to reach her chamber; a lesson which he failed neither to remember nor to practise. To prevent any suspicion on the king's part, he made a pretence of a journey to obtain leave of absence for some days, and actually took his departure from the court, but quitted his retinue at the first stage, and returned at night to receive the favours which the countess had promised him. She fulfilled her promise, and he was so satisfied with his reception that he was content to remain seven or eight days shut up in a garde-robe, living on nothing but aphrodisiacs.

During the time he was thus confined, one of his comrades, named Duracier, came to make love to the countess. She went through the same ceremonies with this second wooer as with the first; spoke to him at first sternly and haughtily, softened to him only by degrees; and on the day she let the first prisoner go, she put the second into his place. Whilst he was there a third came, named Valbenon, and had the same treatment as his two predecessors. After these three came two or three others, who also had part in that sweet captivity; and so it went on for a long while, the intrigue being so nicely conducted that not one of the whole number knew anything of the adventures of the rest. They heard plenty of talk, indeed, of the passion of every one of them for the countess, but there was not one of them but believed himself to be the only favoured lover, and laughed in his sleeve at his disappointed rivals.

One day, all these gentlemen being met together at an entertainment, at which they made very good cheer, they began to talk about their adventures, and the prisons in which they had been during the wars. Valbenon, who was not the man to keep a secret which flattered his vanity, said to the others, "I know in what

He returned at night to meet the Countess.

Photographed from The Copyright 1911 by H. V. Brown prisons you have been ; but as for me, I have been in one for sake of which I will speak well of prisons in general as long as I live, for I don't believe there is a pleasure in the world equal to that of being a prisoner."

Astillon, who had been the first prisoner, at once suspected what prison he meant. "Under what gaoler," he asked, "were you so well treated, that you were so fond of your prison?"

"Be the gaoler who he may," replied Valbenon, "the prison was so agreeable that I was very loth to leave it so soon, for I never was better treated or more comfortable than there."

Duracier, who hitherto had said nothing, shrewdly suspected that the prison in question was that in which he had been confined, as well as the other two. "Tell me," said he to Valbenon, "what sort of food did they give you in that same prison you praise so highly?"

"Food? The king has not better, or more nutritive," was the reply.

"But I should like to know, too," returned Duracier, "did not the person who kept you prisoner make you earn your bread?"

"Hah! ventrebleu!" cried Valbenon, who saw that the mark was hit. "Have I had comrades? I thought myself the only one."

"Well," said Astillon, laughing, "we are all companions and friends from our youth, and all serve the same master. If we all share alike in the same bonne fortune, we may well laugh in company. But in order to know if what I imagine is true, pray let me interrogate you, and all of you tell me the truth. If what I suppose has happened to us, it is the oddest and most amusing adventure that ever could be imagined."

All swore they would speak the truth, at least if matters were so that they could not help doing so. "I will relate my adventure to you," said Astillon, "and you will each answer me yes or no, if yours is like it or not."

Everyone having agreed to this, "In the first place," said Astillon, "I asked leave of absence of the king, under pretence of a journey."

"So did we," said the others.

"When I was two leagues from the court, I left my retinue, and went and surrendered myself a prisoner."

"And so did we."

"I remained for seven or eight days hid in a garde-robe, where I was fed upon nothing but restoratives, and the best viands I ever tasted. At the end of eight days my keepers let me go, much weaker than I had come."

They all swore that they had been served just the same way.

"My imprisonment ended such a day," continued Astillon.

"Mine began the very day yours ended," said Duracier, "and lasted until such a day."

Valbenon now lost patience, and began to swear. "By the Lord," said he, "I find I was the third, though I thought myself the first and the only one, for I entered such a day, and left such another."

The other three who were at table swore that they had entered and departed successively in the same order.

"Since that is the case," said Astillon, "I will describe our gaoler. She is married, and her husband is away."

"The very same," said all the others.

"As I was the first enrolled," continued Astillon, "I will be the first to name her, for our common relief. She is the countess, who was so haughty that in winning her I thought I had done as great a feat as if I had vanquished Cæsar. To the devil with the slut, that made us toil so hard, and deem ourselves so fortunate in having won her. There never was a more infernal woman. Whilst she had one of us caged she was trapping an other, so that the place might never be vacant. I would die rather than not have my revenge."

They all asked Duracier what he thought of the matter, and in what manner she ought to be punished ; adding that they were ready to put their hands to the work.

"It strikes me," said he, "that we ought to tell the facts to the king our master, who esteems her as a goddess."

"We will not do that," said Astillon ; "we can revenge ourselves very well without our master's aid. Let us wait for her to-morrow when she goes to mass, every man with an iron chain round his neck, and when she enters the church, we will salute her as is fitting."

This suggestion was unanimously approved. Everyone provided himself with a chain, and next morning, dressed all in black, with their chains round their necks, they presented themselves to the countess as she was going to church. When she saw them in that trim she burst out laughing, and said to them, "Whither go these people that look in such doleful plight?"

"As your poor captive slaves, madam," said Astillon, "we are come to do you service."

"You are not my captives," she replied, "and I know no reason why you should be bound more than others to do me service."

Valbenon then advanced. "We have so long eaten your bread, madam," he said, "that we should be very ungrateful not to do you service."

She pretended not to have the least idea of what he meant, and preserved an unruffled air, thinking thereby to disconcert them ; but they played their parts so well that she could not but be aware that the thing was discovered. Nevertheless, she quite baffled them ; for, as she had lost honour and conscience, she did not take to herself the shame they sought to put upon her ; but as one who preferred her pleasure to all the honour in the world, she showed them no worse a countenance for what they had done, and carried her head as high as ever, whereat they were so astounded that they felt themselves as much ashamed as they had meant to make her.*

If you do not think, ladies, that this tale sufficiently shows that women are as bad as men, I will tell you others. It strikes me, however, that this one is enough to show you that a woman who has lost shame does evil a thousand times more audaciously than a man.

There was not a lady in the company who, on hear-

* "The adventure related by Margaret in this novel is one of the most piquant in the whole Heptameron. It would be very interesting to know the real names of the persons concerned. Brantome has not disclosed them ; he only says : 'I knew a very great lady, a widow. * * * * Although she was in a manner adored by a very great person, yet she could not do without some other lovers in private, that she might not lose any time, or remain idle. I refer to that lady in the Cent Nouvelles of the Queen of Navarre who had three lovers at once, and was so clever that she managed to entertain them all three very affably.'—(Dame Galantes, Discours iv.) As for the principal hero, the name of Hastillon, by which he is designated, warrants us in making a conjecture. May he not have been Jacques de Chastillon, chamberlain of Charles VIII. and Louis XII., and lieutenant of the hundred gentlemen of Charles VIII., who was killed at the siege of Ravenna in 1512? Brantome has devoted to him the nineteenth Discours of his work on Les Capitaine Francais."—Bibliophiles Francais.

ing this story, did not make so many signs of the cross, that one would have thought she saw all the devils in hell.

“Let us humble ourselves, mesdames,” said Oisille, “at the contemplation of such horrible conduct, the more so as the person abandoned by God becomes like him with whom she unites. As those who attach themselves to God are animated by his spirit, so those who follow the devil are urged by the spirit of the devil; and nothing can be more brutified than those whom God abandons.”

“Whatever this poor lady did,” said Ennasuite, “I cannot applaud those who boasted of their prison.”

“It is my belief,” said Longarine, “that a man finds it as hard to keep his good fortune secret as to pursue it. There is no hunter who does not take pleasure in blowing his horn over his quarry, or lover who is not very glad to proclaim the glory of his victory.”

“That is an opinion,” said Simontault, “which I will maintain to be heretical before all the inquisitors in the world: for I lay it down as a fact that there are more men than women who keep a secret. I know, indeed, that some might be found who would rather not be so well treated than that anyone in the world should know of it. Thence it is that the Church, as a good mother, has appointed priests and not women for confessors, for women can conceal nothing.”

“That is not the reason,” replied Oisille, “but because women have such a hatred of vice that they would not give absolution so easily as men, and would impose too severe penances.”

“If they were as austere in imposing penance as they are in responding,” said Dagoucin, “they would render more sinners desperate than they would save.

The Church, therefore, has ordained wisely in all ages. I do not pretend, for all that, to excuse the gentlemen who boasted of their prison ; for it never was to a man's honour to tell ugly tales of a woman."

"Nay," said Geburon, "for the sake of their own honour even they should never have avowed the fact. The books of the Round Table inform us that it is not glorious for a knight to vanquish another who has no valour."

"I am surprised the poor woman did not die of shame in the presence of her prisoners," said Longarine.

"Those who have lost shame can hardly ever recover it," said Oisille, "unless they have lost it through deep love. Of such lost ones I have seen many come back."

"I suspect you have seen them come back as they came," said Hircan, "for deep love is very rare in women."

"I am not of your opinion," said Longarine, "for some I know have loved to death."

"I am so curious to hear a story of one such woman," said Hircan, "that my voice is for you. I shall be very glad to find in women a love of which I have always deemed them incapable."

"You will believe it when you have heard the story," said Longarine, "and you will be convinced that there is no stronger passion than love. As it makes one undertake things almost impossible, with a view to obtain some pleasure in this life, so does it above all other passions undermine the existence of him or her who loses the hope of succeeding, as you shall see from what I am going to relate."

NOVEL L.

A lover, after a blood-letting, receives favour from his mistress, dies in consequence, and is followed by the fair one, who sinks under her grief.

LESS than a year ago there was in Cremona a gentleman named Messire Jean Pierre, who had long loved a lady in his neighbourhood ; but for all he could do he had never been able to obtain from her the response he longed for, though she loved him with all her heart. The poor gentleman was so distressed at this that he seciuded himself at home, resolving to abandon a vain pursuit in which he was wasting his life. Thinking to detach himself from his cruel fair one, he remained some days without seeing her, and fell into such a profound melancholy that no one would have known him, so altered were his looks. His relations sent for physicians, who, seeing his face yellow, thought it was an obstruction of the liver, and bled him. The lady who had been so coy, knowing very well that his illness was nothing but grief that she had not responded to his love, sent a trusty old woman with orders to tell him that, as she could no longer doubt that his love was genuine and sincere, she had made up her mind to grant him what she had so long refused ; and to that end she had contrived means to leave home and go to a place where he might see her without impediment.

The gentleman, who had been let blood that morning from the arm, finding himself more relieved by this embassy than by all the remedies of his physicians, sent her word that he would not fail to meet her at the appointed hour, and that she had performed a manifest miracle, inasmuch as by a single word she had cured a man of a malady for which all the faculty could find no remedy. The evening he so longed for being come, he went to the trysting-place with a joy so extreme that, as it could not augment, it could not of necessity but diminish and come to an end. He had not long to wait for her he loved more than his soul; nor did he waste time in making long speeches. The fire that consumed him made him rush promptly to the pleasure he promised himself, and which he could hardly believe was within his reach. Too much intoxicated with love and voluptuous delight, and thinking he had found the remedy that would prolong his life, he found that which hastened his death; for heedless of himself in his ardent passion for his mistress, he did not perceive that his arm had come unbound. The wound opened afresh, and the poor gentleman lost so much blood that he was quite bathed in it. Believing that the excess he had indulged in was the cause of his lassitude, he attempted to return home. Then love, which had too much united them, so dealt with him that on quitting his mistress his soul at the same time quitted his body. He had lost so much blood that he fell dead at the lady's feet.

The awful surprise, and the thought of what she had lost in so perfect a lover, of whose death she was the sole cause, put her beside herself. Reflecting, besides, on the shame that would devolve on her if a dead body was found in the house with her, she called to her aid a trusty woman-servant, and they carried the body into the street. But not choosing to leave it alone, she took the sword of the deceased, and being resolved to follow his destiny, and punish her heart, which was the cause of her calamity, she pierced herself with the sword, and fell dead on her lover's body. That sad spectacle was the first thing that met the eyes of her father and mother when they came out of their house in the morning. After the lamentations due to so tragic an event, they had them both interred together.

This, ladies, was an extreme disaster, which could only be ascribed to a love as extreme.

"That is what I like to see," said Simontault; "a love so reciprocal that when the one dies the other will not survive. Had I, by God's grace, found such a mistress, I believe that no man would ever have loved more perfectly than I."

"I am sure," said Parlamente, "that love would never have so deprived you of your wits but that you would have taken care to tie up your arm better. Men no longer lose their lives for ladies. That time is gone by."

"But the time is not gone by," retorted Simontault, "when ladies forget their lovers' lives for sake of their own pleasure."

"I do not believe," said Ennasuite, "that there is a woman in the world who would take delight in any man's death, though he were her enemy; but if men choose to kill themselves, the ladies cannot hinder them."

"She, however, who refused bread to the poor famishing man," said Saffredent, "must be regaredd as his murderess."

"If your prayers were as reasonable as those of the beggar who asks for bread," said Oisille, "it would be too cruel on the part of the ladies to deny your petition. But, thank Heaven, this malady kills none but those whose time is come."

"I cannot think, madam," replied Saffredent, "that there is any greater need than that one which makes a man forget all others. When one loves well, one knows no other bread than the glances and the words of the beloved being."

"If you were starved for a while you would tell a very different story," said Oisille.

"I confess," he replied, "that the body might grow weak under that discipline, but not the heart and the will."

"That being the case," said Parlamente, "God has been very gracious to you in making you fall into the hands of women who have given you so little satisfaction that you must console yourself for it by eating and drinking. You take so kindly to that sort of consolation that methinks you ought to thank God for that merciful cruelty."

"I am so inured to suffering," he replied, "that I begin to take pleasure in the ills which others bemoan."

"It may be," said Longarine, "that your lamentations exclude you from the company to which you would otherwise be welcome, for there is nothing so disagreeable as an importunate lover."

"Or as a cruel lady, you may add," said Simontault.

"If we were to wait till Simontault had delivered all his maxims," said Oisille, "I see that we should come in for complines instead of vespers. Let us, then, go and thank God that this day has passed without any dispute of more consequence."

She then rose, and was followed by all the rest; but Simontault and Longarine ceased not to dispute, but so gently that, without drawing the sword, Simontault gained the victory, and proved that there is no greater need than a great passion. Thereupon they entered the church where the monks were waiting for them. After vespers they went to table, and conversed during the repast;

nor did the conversation end with it, but would have been prolonged far into the night, if Oisille had not advised them to go and refresh their spirits with sleep. She added that she was afraid the sixth day would not pass off so agreeably as the five others; for even if they should have recourse to invention, it would be impossible to produce better tales than those which had been already told.

“As long as the world lasts,” said Geburon, “there will every day be done things worthy of memory. The wicked are always wicked, and the good always good: and as long as wickedness and goodness reign on earth, something new will always be taking place, although Solomon says that nothing new happens under the sun. As we have not been called to the privy council of God, and consequently are ignorant of first causes, all things seem new to us, and the more wonderful the less we could or would do them. So do not be afraid that the days to come will not be as good as the past, and think only of doing your own duty well.”

Oisille said she commended herself to God, in whose name she bade them good night. And so the whole company retired.

SIXTH DAY.

NEXT morning Madame Oisille, even earlier than usual, went to prepare her exhortation in the hall ; but the rest of the company being informed of this, their desire to hear her good instructions made them dress so speedily that she was not kept waiting long. As she knew their hearts, she read the epistle of St. John, which speaks only of love. This was so palatable to the company that, although this morning's devotion was longer than usual, they all thought it had not occupied more than a quarter of an hour. After it was over they went to mass, and commended themselves to the Holy Ghost. When they had dined and taken a little rest, they went to the meadow to continue their novels. Madame Oisille asked who should begin the day. "I call upon you to do so, madam," said Longarine, "for you gave us such a fine lecture this morning that it is impossible you should tell a story which should not correspond to the glory you acquired thereby."

"I regret," replied Oisille, "that I cannot relate anything to you so profitable as what you heard this morning. What I shall tell you, however, will be conformable to the precepts of the Scriptures, which warn us not to put our trust in princes, or in any sons of man, who cannot save us. For fear you should forget this truth for want of an example, I will give you one that is quite true, and so recent that those who beheld the sad spectacle have hardly yet dried away their tears."

NOVEL LI.

Perfidy and cruelty of an Italian duke.

THE Duke of Urbino, surnamed the Prefect, who married the sister of the first Duke of Mantua, had a son about eighteen or twenty years of age, who was in love with a girl of good family. Not being free to converse with her as he wished, in consequence of the custom of the country, he had recourse to a gentleman who was in his service, and who was in love with a handsome, virtuous young damsel in the service of the duchess. The cavalier employed this damsel to make known his passion to his mistress, and the poor girl took pleasure in rendering him service, believing that his intentions were good, and that she might with honour take upon her to be his ambassadress. But the duke, who looked more to the interest of his house than to his son's pure affection, was afraid that this correspondence would end in marriage; and he set so many spies on the watch that at last he was informed that the girl had meddled with carrying letters from his son to her of whom he was so passionately enamoured. Burning with rage, he resolved to put it out of his power to do so any more; but as he was not sufficiently careful to conceal his resentment, the girl was warned of it in time. She knew the prince to be malicious and without conscience, and was so terrified that she went to the duchess and implored permission to retire until the fit of anger had passed away. The duchess told her that before she gave her leave she would try to find how her husband took the matter. She did so, and found that the duke spoke of it with great bitterness, whereupon she not only gave her young lady permission, but even advised her to retire into a convent until the storm should have blown over ; and this she did as secretly as possible.

The duke, however, missed her, and asked his wife, with a countenance of feigned good-humour, where the damsel was. The duchess, who supposed that he knew the truth, told it him without reserve. He pretended to be sorry for this, and said there was no need for her to do so, that he meant her no harm, and that the duchess had better make her come back, for it did no good to have a talk made about such matters. The duchess told him that if the poor girl had been so unfortunate as to incur his displeasure, it was better that she should abstain from appearing in his presence for some time ; but he would not be so put off, but insisted on her return.

The duchess made known the duke's pleasure to the damsel ; but the latter was not satisfied, and begged her mistress would excuse her from running such a risk, knowing as she did that her husband the duke was not so ready to grant forgiveness. The duchess, however, pledged her life and honour that no harm should happen to her ; and the damsel, who felt sure that her mistress loved her, and would for no consideration deceive her, trusted to her promise, believing that the duke would never violate a promise made by his wife on her life and honour, and she returned to court. As soon as the duke was aware of this, he entered his wife's chamber ; and the moment he set eyes upon the poor damsel, he ordered his gentlemen to arrest her, and take her to prison. The duchess, who had induced her to quit her asylum upon the faith of her word, was filled with horror, and throwing herself at her husband's feet, besought him, for his own honour and that of his house, not to do such an act. But no supplications she could make, no arguments she could urge, had power to soften his hard heart, or turn him from his stubborn purpose to be revenged. Without answering his wife a word, he abruptly quitted the room, and without form of justice, forgetting God and the honour of his house, this cruel duke had the poor girl hanged.

I will not undertake to depict the indignation of the duchess; enough to say that it was such as might have been expected of a lady of honour and spirit, who, contrary to her plighted faith, saw a person whom she would have saved put to death by her husband. Much less will I attempt to portray the affliction of the poor gentleman, the unfortunate girl's lover. He did all he could to save his mistress's life, and even offered to die in her place; but nothing could move the duke, who knew no other felicity than taking vengeance on those he hated. Thus was this poor innocent put to death by this cruel duke, against all equity and honour, to the great regret of all who knew her.

Here you see, ladies, what a bad heart is capable of when it is united with power.

"I have heard," said Longarine, "that the Italians were prone to all capital vices; but I could never have supposed they would carry vindictiveness and cruelty so far as to put a person to such a miserable death for so slight a cause."

"You have mentioned one of the three vices," said Saffredent, laughing; "let us know, Longarine, what are the other two."

"I would do so willingly," she replied, "if you did not know them ; but I am sure you are acquainted with them all."

"You think me, then, very vicious?" said Saffredent.

"Not at all," returned Longarine; "but I believe you know so well the loathsomeness of vice, that you can better avoid it than another."

"Do not be surprised at this excess of cruelty," said Simontault, "for they who have been in Italy relate such horrible things of the kind, that what we have heard is but a trifle in comparison with them."

"When the French took Rivolte," said Geburon, "there was an Italian captain who had the reputation of a brave man, and who, seeing a man lie dead who was not otherwise his enemy than in having been a Guelph whilst he was a Ghibelline, tore out his heart, broiled it, ate it greedily, and replied to those who asked him was it good, that he had never eaten anything more delicious. Not content with this fine deed, he killed the dead man's wife, who was pregnant, ripped her open, tore out the child, and dashed it to pieces against the wall ; and then stuffed the bodies of the husband and wife with oats for his horses to eat. Judge if this man would not have put to death a girl whom he suspected of having done anything offensive to him."

"This duke," said Ennasuite, "was more afraid his son should marry one who was not wealthy enough, than desirous of giving him a wife to his liking."

"There is no doubt," said Simontault, "that the tendency of the Italians is to love more than nature the things that are only made for nature's service."

"Their case is still worse," said Hircan, "for they make their God of things that are contrary to nature."

"Those are the sins I meant," said Longarine ; "for we know that to love money beyond what is necessary for our wants is idolatry."

Parlamente said that "St. Paul had not forgotten their vices, no more than those of such as think themselves surpassing in prudence and human reason, on which they count so much that they do not render to God the honour that is His due. Therefore, the Almighty, jealous of His glory, renders more insensate than the brute beasts those who think they have more sense than other men, and allows them to do acts contrary to nature, which shows evidently that their sense is reprobate."

"That is the third sin," said Longarine, interrupting her, "to which the Italians are addicted."

"In good sooth, I like this remark," said Nomerfide. "Since those who are regarded as having the subtlest wits, and are the best speakers, are punished in this manner, and brutified more than the brutes themselves, it must be concluded that persons who are humble and low and of little reach, like myself, are endowed with angelic sapience."

"I assure you," said Oisille, "I am not far from your way of thinking; and I am persuaded that there are none more ignorant than those who imagine themselves knowing."

"I never knew a mocker who was not mocked," said Geburon, "a deceiver who was not deceived, or a proud man who was not humbled."

"You put me in mind of a trick I should like to relate to you if it was seemly," said Simontault.

"Since we are here to tell the truth, tell it, whatever it be," said Oisille.

"Well, since you desire it, madam, I will tell it you," he replied.

NOVEL LII.

A nasty breakfast given to an advocate and a gentleman by an apothecary's man.

IN the time of the last Duke Charles there was at Alençon an advocate named Antoine Bacheret, a merry companion, and fond of breakfasting o' mornings. One day, as he was sitting before his door, he saw a gentleman pass whose name was Monsieur de la Tireliere. He had come on foot upon business he had in town, and the day being cold, he had not forgotten to take with him his great robe, lined with foxskin. Seeing the advocate, who was much such a man as himself, he asked him how he was getting on, and observed that a good breakfast would not amiss. The advocate replied that a breakfast would be found soon enough, provided someone could be found to pay for it. Thereupon La Tireliere took him by the arm, saying, "Come along, gaffer, perhaps we shall fall in with some fool who will pay for us both."

There happened to be behind them an apothecary's man, a cunning and inventive young fellow, whom the advocate was perpetually making game of. That moment the thought of having his revenge came into his head, and without going more than ten steps out of his way, he found behind a house a fine, big sir reverence, well and duly frozen, which he wrapped up so neatly in paper that it might be taken for a small sugar-loaf. He then looked out for his men, and passing them like a person in great haste, entered a house, and let fall the sugar-loaf from his sleeve, as if inadvertently. The advocate picked it up with great glee, and said to La Tireliere, "This clever fellow shall pay our scot ; but let us be off quickly for fear he comes back."

The pair having entered a cabaret, the advocate said to the servant girl, "Make us a good fire, and give us some good bread and good wine, and something nice with it ;" for he fancied he had wherewithal to pay. They were served to their liking ; but as they grew warm with eating and drinking, the sugar-loaf, which the advocate carried in his bosom, began to thaw, and gave out such a stench that, thinking it came from elsewhere, he said to the servant, "You have the most fetid and stinking house I ever was in." La Tireliere, who had his share of this fine perfume, said the same thing. The servant, incensed at thus being accused of sluttishness, replied, "By St. Peter, my masters, the house is so neat and clean that there is no nastiness in it but what you have brought in with you." The two friends rose from table, spitting and holding their noses, and stood near the fire ; and presently, while warming himself, the advocate took his handkerchief out of his bosom, disgustingly smeared with the syrup of the melted sugar-loaf, which he produced with it. You may well believe that the servant made fine fun of them after the insult they had offered her, and that the advocate was sorely confounded at finding himself the dupe of an apothecary's man, whom he had always made the butt of his wit. The servant, instead of taking pity on them, made them pay as handsomely as they had been served ; and said that no doubt they must be greatly intoxicated, since they had drunk both by nose and mouth. The poor wights slunk away with their shame and their cost.

They were no sooner in the street than they saw the apothecary's man going about and asking everyone if they had seen a loaf of sugar wrapped up in paper. They tried to avoid him, but he shouted to the advocate, "Monsieur, if you have my loaf of sugar I beg you will give it back to me ; for it is a double sin to rob a poor servant." His shouts brought many people to the spot out of curiosity to witness the dispute ; and the real state of the case was so well verified that the apothecary's man was as glad to have been robbed as the others were vexed at having committed such a nasty theft. They comforted themselves, however, with the hope of one day giving him tit for tat.

The like often happens, ladies, to those who take pleasure in such tricks. If the gentleman had not wanted to eat at another's expense, he would not have had such a nasty draught at his own. It is true that my story is not very decorous, but you gave me permission to speak the truth. I have done so, to show that when a deceiver is deceived no one is sorry for it.

"It is commonly said that words do not stink," said Hircan ; "but those who utter them cannot help smelling of them."

"It is true," said Oisille, "that words of this sort do not stink ; but there are others called dirty, which have such a bad odour that the soul suffers from them more than the body would suffer from smelling a sugar-loaf like that you have spoken of."

"Do tell me, pray," rejoined Hircan, "what words you know so dirty that they make a woman of honour suffer both in body and soul."

"It would be a fine thing," replied Oisille, "if I were to say to you words which I would not advise any woman to say."

"I understand now what those words are," said Saffredent. "Women like to appear demure, and do not commonly use such language. But I should like to ask those present why they laugh so readily when they are uttered before them, since they will not themselves utter them. I cannot understand their laughing at a thing which is so offensive to them."

"It is not at those pretty words we laugh," said Parlamente, "but by reason of the natural propensity everyone feels to laugh either when we see some one fall, or when we hear something said out of place, as it often happens to the best speakers to say one thing instead of another. But when men talk filth intentionally, and with premeditation, I know no honourable woman but feels intense aversion for such people, and, far from listening to them, shuns their society."

"It is true," said Geburon, "that I have seen women cross themselves on hearing that sort of words which seemed more disgusting the more they were repeated."

"But," said Simontault, "how often have they put on their masks to laugh behind them as heartily as they pretended to be vexed?"

"Even that were better than to show that one took pleasure in such language," said Parlamente.

"So, then," remarked Dagoucin, "you praise hypocrisy in ladies as much as virtue?"

"Virtue would be much better," replied Longarine; "but when it is wanting we must have recourse to hypocrisy, as we use high-heeled shoes to hide our littleness. If we can hide our defects, even that is no little advantage."

"By my faith, it would be better sometimes to let some little defect appear," said Hircan, "than to hide it so carefully under the cloak of virtue."

"It is true," said Ennasuite, "that a borrowed garment dishonours him who is obliged to return it, as much as it did him honour to wear it. There is a lady in the world who, in her over-anxiety to hide a small fault, has committed a much greater one."

•

"I think I know whom you mean," said Hircan; "but at least do not name her."

"Oh! you have my voice," said Geburon, "on condition that when you have told the tale, you will tell us the names, which we will swear never to mention."

"I promise it," said Ennasuite, "for there is nothing which may not be said decorously."

NOVEL LIII.

Madame de Neufchastel, by her dissimulation, forced the Prince of Belhoste to put her to such a proof as turned to her dishonour.

ON one occasion, when King Francis I. went with but a small suite to spend some days at a very handsome château, to enjoy the chase and other recreations, he was accompanied by the Prince of Belhoste, as much distinguished for every excellence of mind and person as any at court. He had married a wife who was not of a great family, but whom he loved as much as any husband can love a wife. He put such confidence in her that when he loved elsewhere he made no secret of it to her, well knowing that she had no other will than his. This lord conceived a strong regard for a widow named Madame de Neufchastel, who was considered the handsomest woman of her time. If the prince was greatly

•

Madame de Neufchastel.

Photographed from Life.
Copyright, 1902, by D. Trenor

attached to this widow, the princess his wife was no less so, often invited her to table, and thought so highly of her that, far from being displeased that her husband loved her, she was delighted to see that he addressed his attentions to so worthy and virtuous an object. This friendship was of such long duration, and so perfect, that the prince busied himself with Madame de Neufchastel's affairs as much as with his own, and the princess his wife did likewise.

The widow's beauty attracted round her many great lords and gentlemen as suitors, some of whom were actuated only by love, others had an eye to her wealth ; for, in addition to her beauty, she was very rich. One gentleman especially, named the Seigneur des Cheriots, was so assiduous in his wooing that he never failed to present himself at her lever and her coucher, and spent as much time in her society as he possibly could. The prince, who thought that a man of such mean birth and appearance did not deserve to be treated so favourably, was not at all pleased with his assiduities, and often remonstrated with the widow on the subject ; but as she was a duke's daughter, she excused herself, saying that she talked generally to everybody, and that their intimacy would be less observed when it was seen that she did not talk more to one than to another. After some time, this Sieur des Cheriots pressed his suit so much that she promised to marry him, more in consequence of his importunity than of her preference for him, on condition that he would not require her to declare the marriage until her daughters were married. After this promise, the gentleman used to go to her chamber without scruple, at any hour he pleased ; and there was only a femme-de-chambre and a man who were privy to the affair.

The prince was so displeased at seeing the gentleman becoming more and more domesticated with her he loved, that he could not help saying to her, "I have always prized your honour as that of my own sister. You know with what propriety I have always addressed you, and what pleasure I feel in loving a lady so discreet and virtuous as you; but if I thought that another obtained by importunity what I would not ask for against your inclination, I could not endure it, nor would it do you honour. I say this to you because you are young and fair; and have hitherto enjoyed a good reputation; but you are beginning to be the subject of reports greatly to your disadvantage. Though this person has neither birth, fortune, credit, knowledge, nor good looks in comparison with you, it would have been better, nevertheless, that you had married him than have given rise to suspicion, as you are doing. Tell me then, I entreat, if you are resolved to love him; for I do not choose to have him for a companion, but will leave you wholly to him, and will no longer entertain for you the sentiments I have hitherto cherished."

The poor lady, fearing to lose his friendship, began to cry, and vowed to him that she would rather die than marry the gentleman in question; that he was so importunate that she could not hinder his entering her room at the hours when everyone else visited her. "I do not speak of those hours," said the prince, "for I can visit you then as well as he, and everyone sees what you do; but I have been told that he comes to you after you are in bed, which I think so bad, that if you continue it without declaring that he is your husband, I look upon you as the woman most ruined in reputation that ever was."

She assured him with all the oaths she could think of that she regarded the man neither as husband nor lover, but as the most importunate person in the world. "Since that is the case," said the prince, "I promise that I will rid you of him."

"What!" replied the widow, "would you put him to death?"

"No, no," said the prince; "but I will let him know that he must not give occasion in this way for people to speak ill of ladies in the king's residence. I swear to you, by the love I bear you, that if he does not correct himself after I have spoken to him, I will correct him in such a manner that he shall be an example for others."

With these words the prince went away, and on leaving the room he met the Seigneur des Cheriots coming thither, and spoke to him to the same purpose, assuring him that the first time he found him there at any other hour than one in which it was proper for gentlemen to visit ladies, he would give him such a fright as he should not forget as long as he lived, and would teach him not to trifle with a lady whose relations were persons of such consequence. The gentleman protested that he had never been there except like other visitors; and that if the prince found him transgressing in that respect, he would give him leave to do the worst he could.

Some days afterwards, the gentleman, fancying that the prince had forgotten what he had told him, went to see the lady in the evening, and stayed very late. The prince told his wife that Madame de Neufchastel had a severe cold, and the good lady begged him to go see her for them both, and apologise for her, as she was prevented from accompanying him by indispensable business. The prince waited till the king was in bed, and then went to say good evening to the widow. He had just reached the foot of the staircase, and was about to go up, when he met a valet de chambre coming down, who swore, in reply to the prince's questions, that his mistress was in bed and asleep. The prince retraced his steps, but presently, suspecting that the valet had told a lie, he looked back, and saw the man returning hastily. He stopped, therefore, and walked up and down the yard before the door to watch if the valet reappeared, and a quarter of an hour afterwards he saw him come down, and peer about in all directions to see who was in the yard. The prince, entertaining no doubt now that Seigneur des Cheriots was with the widow, and durst not come out for fear of him, continued his promenade for a long while. Recollecting that one of the lady's chamber windows looked upon a little garden, and was not very high, he called to mind the proverb which says, "Whoso cannot pass through the door let him jump through the window." He therefore called one of his valets, and said, "Go into that garden, and if you see a gentleman come down from a window, draw your sword, and the moment he is down, make your sword clash upon the wall, and shout, 'Kill! kill!' but do not touch him." The valet went to where his master ordered him, and the prince walked up and down till near midnight.

The Seigneur des Cheriots, hearing that the prince was still in the yard, resolved to escape by the window, and throwing his cloak into the garden, he followed it with the help of his good friends. The valet no sooner espied him than he made a great clatter with his sword, and shouted, "Kill him, kill him!" The poor gentleman, mistaking the valet for the master, was so frightened that, without stopping to pick up his cloak, he ran off as fast as his legs could carry him, and was met by the archers of the watch, who were greatly surprised to see him running so. He durst not say anything else to them than to beg earnestly they would open the gate for him, or take him to their quarters till the next day ; which they did, not having the keys.

Then it was that the prince went to bed. He found his wife asleep, woke her, and asked her to guess what o'clock it was.

" I have not heard the clock strike since I came to bed," said she.

" It is past three o'clock," said he.

" Good Heavens ! monsieur, where have you been staying so long ?" exclaimed the wife. " I am afraid you will be the worse for it."

" Watching will never make me ill, my dear," he replied, " so long as I keep those awake who think to deceive me," and so saying he laughed so heartily that she begged him to tell her what it was for. He told her the whole story, and showed her the wolf's skin, which his valet had carried home with him. After they had diverted themselves at the expense of the widow and her gallant, they went to sleep with as much composure as the other pair felt fear and uneasiness lest their intrigue should be discovered.

Now the gentleman, reflecting that he could not dissemble before the prince, came to his levee next morning, and besought the prince not to expose him, and to order his cloak to be restored to him. The prince pretended not to understand him, and played his part so well that the poor gentleman did not know what to make of it. But at last he received such a rating as he had not expected ; for the prince assured him that if ever he was found there again, he would speak to the king and have him banished from the court.

Judge, ladies, I pray you, if this poor widow would not have done better to speak frankly to him who did her the honour to love and esteem her than by her dissimulation to reduce him to the necessity of seeking evidence so dishonouring to herself.

"She knew," said Geburon, "that if she told him the truth she would wholly lose his esteem, which she wished to preserve by all means."

"It strikes me," said Longarine, "that since she had chosen a husband to her liking, she had no reason to care for losing the love of all her other admirers."

"I believe," said Parlamente, "that if she had ventured to declare her marriage she would have contented herself with her husband; but wishing to conceal it until her daughters were married, she could not make up her mind to let go so good a means of cloaking her real sentiments and conduct."

"That is not it," said Saffredent; "but the fact is, that the ambition of women is so great that they never content themselves with one lover. I have heard that the best of them like to have three—one for honour, one for interest, and the third for pleasure; and each of the three believes himself the most favoured; but the first two serve the last."

"You speak of women who know neither love nor honour," said Oisille.

"There are women, madam, of the character I describe, whom you regard as the most virtuous women in the country," replied Saffredent.

"Rely upon it," said Hircan, "that a clever woman will always contrive to live where others would die of hunger."

"But when their slyness is known their case is mortal," said Longarine.

"Nay, they thrive all the better for it," said Simon-tault. "It is no small glory for them to be reputed more cunning than their companions. Such a reputation brings more lovers under subjection to them than does their beauty. In fact, one of the greatest pleasures known to lovers is to conduct their amours slyly."

"You are speaking of criminal love," said Ennasuite; "for lawful love has no need of concealment."

"Put that notion out of your head, I beseech you," said Dagoucin, "for the more precious a drug is the less it should be exposed to the air. Secrecy is necessary whether one loves enviously or the reverse; and that for fear of false judgment on the part of those who cannot believe a man capable of loving a woman honourably. Such persons judge others by themselves; and, as they love their pleasure only, they imagine that everyone is like themselves. If we were all of good faith, dissimulation would be needless, at least with regard to those who would rather die than harbour a bad thought."

"I assure you, Dagoucin," said Hircan, "your philosophy is so sublime that there is not one person in this company who can compass or believe it. To hear you talk, one would say you meant to persuade us that men are either angels, or stones, or devils."

"I know well," replied Dagoucin, "that men are men, and subject to all the passions; but I know that there are those among them who would rather die than for their pleasure the lady they love should do aught against her conscience."

"To say they would rather die is saying a great deal," said Geburon. "I could not believe it, though I were told it by the most austere monk in the world."

"I am disposed to believe," said Hircan, "there is no one whose desires do not run quite the other way. People pretend, however, not to like grapes when they are too high for them to reach."

"But," said Nomerfide, "I suppose the prince's wife was very glad that he came to know what women are."

"I assure you it was quite the reverse," said Enna-suite; "she was very sorry for it, because she loved the widow."

"She was a match for the woman who laughed when her husband kissed her servant," said Saffredent.

"Decidedly you shall tell us that story," said Enna-suite.

"It is short," he replied, "but it will make you laugh, which is better than being long."

NOVEL LIV.

A lady laughed to see her husband kissing her servant, and being asked the reason, replied that she laughed at her shadow.

THERE lived between the Pyrenees and the Alps a gentleman named Thogas, who had a wife and children, a very fine house, and so much wealth and pleasure that he had great reason to be content. The only drawback to so many sources of enjoyment was a violent pain under the roots of the hair, on account of which the physicians advised him to desist from sleeping with his wife. To this she readily consented, preferring her husband's health and life before all things, and had her bed put at the other corner of the room, directly opposite her husband's, so that they could neither of them put their heads out without seeing each other. This lady had two chamberwomen. The husband and wife used often to read entertaining books in bed, the servant women holding the candle, the younger for the husband, and the other for the wife. The gentleman, finding the servant younger and handsomer than his wife, took such pleasure in contemplating her, that he used to leave off reading to converse with her. His wife heard all, and was not displeased that her valets and her handmaids should amuse her husband, being sure that he loved none but herself.

One evening, after reading longer than usual, the lady looked along her husband's bed, and saw only the back of the servant who was holding the candle to him ; whilst of her husband she saw nothing but his shadow, projecting on the white wall forming the side of the chimney which jutted into the room. She perfectly distinguished the faces of both, and saw by their shadows, as clearly as she could have seen by the substance of each, if they were apart, or met, or laughed. The gentleman, who was not aware of this, and never supposed that his wife could see him, kissed his servant. For that time the wife said not a word ; but seeing that the shadows often repeated the same movement, she was afraid there was reality beneath it, and she burst into such a loud laugh that the shadows separated in alarm. The gentleman asked her why she laughed so heartily, and begged she would let him have part in her merriment. " I am such a simpleton, my dear," she replied, " that I laugh at my shadow." Question her as he would, there was no getting any other answer from her. There was an end, however, to that shadowy dalliance.

I have been reminded of this incident by what you said of the lady who loved her husband's mistress.

" In faith," said Ennasuite, " if my servant had served me so, I would have got up and smashed the candle on her nose."

"You are very terrible," said Hircan ; "but it would have been a bad business for you if your husband and the servant had turned round upon you and beaten you soundly. What need to make such a pother about a kiss ? The wife would have done still better not to say a word, but leave her husband to divert himself. That would, perhaps, have cured him."

"Perhaps, on the contrary, she feared that the end of the diversion would make him worse," said Parlamente.

"She was not one of those of whom our Lord speaks," said Oisille, "when he says, 'We have mourned and you have not wept, we have sung and you have not danced,' for when her husband was ill she wept, and when he was merry she laughed. All good women ought thus to share with their husbands good and evil, joy and sorrow, and should love, serve, and obey them as the Church does Jesus Christ."

"Our husbands, madam," said Parlamente, "ought likewise to behave to us as Jesus Christ does to the Church."

"And so we do," said Saffredent, "and we would do something more if it were possible ; for Jesus Christ died only once for his Church, and we die daily for our wives."

"Die?" exclaimed Longarine ; "it strikes me that you and the rest of you here are worth more crowns than you were worth sous before you were married."

"I know why," said Saffredent. "It is because our worth is so often proved. Nevertheless, our shoulders feel the effects of having so long worn harness."

"If you had been constrained," retorted Ennasuite, "to wear harness for a month, and to lie on the bare ground, you would be very glad to get back to your good wife's bed and wear the harness of which you now complain. But they say that people can bear anything except ease, and that no one knows the value of repose until he has lost it."

"This good woman, who laughed when her husband was merry," said Oisille, "was glad to enjoy her repose under any circumstances."

"It is my belief," said Longarine, "that she loved her repose better than her husband, since nothing could move her, do what he might."

"She took to heart what might be injurious to his conscience and his health," said Parlamente; "but at the same time she was not a woman to make a fuss about trifles."

"You make me laugh when you talk of conscience," said Simontault. "That is a thing about which I would never have a woman make herself uneasy."

"You deserve," said Nomerfide, "to have a wife like her who plainly showed, after her husband's death, that she cared more for his money than his conscience."

"Pray tell us that tale," said Saffredent.

"I had not intended to tell so short a tale," replied Nomerfide; "but since it comes so à propos, you shall have it."

NOVEL LV.

Cunning device of a Spanish widow to defraud the mendicant friars of a testamentary bequest made to them by her husband.

THERE was at Saragossa a merchant who, feeling his end approach, and seeing that he must quit his possessions, which he had, perhaps, acquired with bad faith, thought to make satisfaction in part for his sins after his death, by giving some little present to God, as if God gave his grace for money. After giving orders respecting his house, he desired that a fine Spanish horse, which constituted nearly the whole of his wealth, should be sold, and the money bestowed on the poor Mendicants; and he charged his wife to do this without fail immediately after his death. The burial being over, and the first tears shed, the wife, who was no more of a simpleton than Spanish women are in general, said to the manservant, who, like her, had heard her husband deliver his last will, "Methinks I lose enough in losing my husband, whom I so tenderly loved, without losing also the rest of my property. I would by no means, however, contravene the orders he laid upon me, but would rather improve upon his intentions. The poor man, beguiled by the avarice of the priests, thought to make a sacrifice to God, in giving away after his death a sum, one crown of which he would not have given in his lifetime, however pressing might be the need, as you very well know; it has occurred to me, then, that we will do what he ordered us much better than he could have done it himself had he lived a few days longer, but no one in the world must know a word about it."

The man having promised to keep the secret, she continued: "You will take the horse to the market, and when you are asked the price you will say one ducat. But I have a very good cat which I want to sell also. You will sell it along with the horse, and charge for it ninety-nine ducats, making of the two one hundred ducats, which is the price at which my husband wished to sell the horse alone."

The man promptly obeyed his mistress's order. As he was walking the horse about in the market-place, carrying the cat under his arm, a gentleman who knew the horse, and had before wished to buy it, came up and asked what he would take for it at a word. "A ducat," said the man.

"I would thank you not to make game of me," said the gentleman.

"I assure you, sir," said the man, "it will cost you no more. It is true you must buy this cat at the same time, and I want ninety-nine ducats for it."

The gentleman, who thought it a pretty good bargain, paid him forthwith a ducat for the horse, and then the remainder for the cat, and had his two purchases taken home. The man, on his side, went off with the money to his mistress, who was delighted to get it, and failed not to bestow on the poor Mendicants, according to her husband's intentions, the ducat for which the horse had been sold, and kept the rest to provide for her own wants and those of her family.

Don't you think she was wiser than her husband, and did she not take more care of the fortune of her family than of his conscience?

"I believe she loved her husband," said Parlamente; "but seeing that most men wander in their wits on their death-bed, and knowing his intentions, she interpreted them to the advantage of her children; and in this, I think, she showed laudable prudence."

"Do you not think it a great fault," said Geburon, "to contravene the last wishes of our deceased friends?"

"A very great one," replied Parlamente, "when the testator is in his sound senses, and not raving."

"Do you call it raving," returned Geburon, "to bequeath one's property to the Church and to the poor Mendicants?"

"I do not call it raving," she answered, "to give to the poor what God has given to us ; but to give away as alms what belongs to another appears to me no great proof of good sense. How commonly you see the greatest usurers in the world erecting the finest and most sumptuous chapels, as thinking to make their peace with God for a hundred thousand ducats' worth of robbery by ten thousand ducats' worth of building, just as though God did not know how to count."

"Truly, I have often wondered," said Oisille, "how they think to make their peace with God by means of things which he himself reprobated when he himself was on earth, such as great buildings, gildings, paintings, and decorations. But if they rightly understood what God has said, that the only offering he requires of us is a humble and contrite heart, and another text in which St. Paul says that we are the temple of God in which he desires to dwell, they would have taken pains to adorn their consciences while they were alive, and not have waited for the time when a man can no longer do either good or ill ; nor would they have done what is still worse, in laying upon those they leave behind the burden of giving their alms to those they would not have deigned to look upon all through their lives. But He who knows the heart cannot be deceived, and will judge them not according to their works merely, but according to the faith and charity that was in them."

"Wherefore is it, then," said Geburon, "that these Cordeliers and Mendicants talk to us of nothing at death but making great bequests to their monasteries, assuring us that they will put us into Paradise, whether we will or not ?"

"How now, Geburon," said Hircan ; "have you forgotten the wickedness you have related to us of the Cordeliers, that you ask how it is possible for such men to lie? I declare to you I do not think there are in the world greater lies than theirs. It may be that those among them are not to be blamed who speak on behalf of their whole community; but there are many of them who forget their vow of poverty to gratify their own avarice."

"It strikes me, Hircan," said Nomerfide, "that you know of some such case; if it is worthy of this company, I beg you will tell it us."

"I will do so," he replied, "although I dislike speaking of such people, for methinks they are of that class of whom Virgil says to Dante, 'Pass on, and heed them not.' However, to show you that they have not laid aside their passions with their mundane garments, I will tell a thing that happened."*

NOVEL LVI.

A pious lady having asked a Cordelier to provide a good husband for her daughter, he marries another Cordelier to the young lady, and possesses himself of her dowry—the cheat is discovered and punished.

A FRENCH lady who visited Padua heard that there was a Cordelier in the Episcopal prison. Observing that everyone talked and joked about him, she inquired the reason, and learned that this Cordelier was an old man, confessor to a very respectable and devout lady, who had been some years a widow, and had but one daughter, whom she loved so much that she spared no pains to amass wealth for her and procure her a good match. As her daughter grew up, her whole thought was how to find her a husband who might live happily with them both ; that is to say, a conscientious person like herself. As she had heard it laid down by some stupid preacher that it was better to do wrong by the advice of the doctors of the Church than to do right trusting in the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, she applied to her confessor, an aged monk, who was a doctor of theology, and bore a blameless reputation throughout the town, never doubting but that she should secure her own peace and her daughter's through the advice and the prayers of the good father.

* The opinions expressed in this novel and epilogue were too bold for the first editors of the Heptameron, Boaistuau and Gruget, who altered some passages in the former, and substituted for the latter a much shorter epilogue, containing only common-place reflections on avarice, &c.

She besought him earnestly to choose a husband for her daughter—such a husband as he knew would be suitable to a girl who loved God and her honour. He told her he must first of all implore the grace of the Holy Spirit by fasting and prayer, and then, God lending him light, he hoped he should be able to find what she sought. Upon that he went away to ponder over the affair. As the mother had told him that she had five hundred ducats ready to hand over to her daughter's husband, and that she would maintain both husband and wife, and supply them with lodging, furniture, and clothes, he be-thought him of a handsome strapping young brother of his order, on whom he would bestow the pretty girl, the house, furniture, board, and clothing, while he himself would keep the five hundred ducats to assuage his burning covetousness. After he had talked with his man and arranged everything, he went to the mother and said to her : “ I believe, madam, that God has sent me his angel Raphael, as of old to Tobias, to enable me to find a spouse for your daughter. I have in my house the most respectable young gentleman in Italy, who has seen your daughter, and is deeply in love with her. When I was to-day at prayer, God sent him to me, and he declared how much he longs for this marriage ; and I, knowing his family and his relations, and that he comes of a notable race, promised to speak to you on the subject. I know of but one inconvenience attending this match, which is, that wishing to save one of his friends whom another man would have slain, he drew his sword to part them ; but it happened that his friend killed the other, in consequence of which, though he never struck a stroke, he is nevertheless a fugitive, because he was present at the murder, and had drawn his sword. His parents have advised him to retire to this city, where he wears the dress of a student, and where he will remain incognito until this affair of his is arranged, which it is hoped it will be before long. You see, consequently, that it would be necessary for the marriage to be secret, and that you should not object to his going every day to the public lectures, and coming home in the evening to sup and sleep in your house."

"I see a great advantage to myself in what you tell me, sir," said the mother ; "for at least I shall have by me what I desire most in the world."

The Cordelier produced the gallant in very good trim, and with a handsome doublet of crimson satin. He was so well received that the betrothal took place without more delay, and midnight had no sooner struck than mass was said, they were wedded and bedded, and remained together until daybreak, when the bridegroom said to his bride that, in order to maintain his incognito, he was obliged to leave her and go to the college. After putting on his crimson satin doublet and his long robe, not forgetting his black silk coif, he took leave of his wife, who was still in bed, and assured her that every evening he would come and sup with her, but that she must not expect him at dinner. Thereupon he went away, and left his wife the happiest woman in the world in her own esteem, for having met with so excellent a match. Away went the young Cordelier to the old father, and handed over the five hundred ducats, according to their previous agreement, and in the evening he returned to her who regarded him as her husband ; nor did he fail to make himself so beloved by her and by his mother-in-law that they would not have exchanged him for the greatest prince in the world.

This went on for some time ; but as God has pity on those who honestly err, it came to pass that the mother and daughter had a mind to go hear mass at the church of the Cordeliers, and to pay a visit at the same time to the good father confessor through whose instrumentality they thought themselves so well provided, the one with a son-in-law, the other with a husband. Chance so ordained that, not finding the confessor there, nor anyone else they knew, they were content to hear high mass, which was just beginning, whilst they awaited the confessor's arrival. The young wife, attending closely to the divine service, was greatly surprised when the priest turned to say dominus vobiscum, for she fancied she beheld her husband, or some one singularly resembling him. She said not a word, however, but waited till he appeared again, when she had a still better view of him than before, and no longer doubting that it was he, "Oh, mother !" she exclaimed, "what do I see ?"

"What is it ?" said the mother.

“My husband saying mass, or somebody the most like him in the world.”

“Pray, my dear,” said the mother, who had not taken much notice of the priest, “don’t let such a notion into your head. It is absolutely impossible that such pious men should practise such a cheat. It would be a great sin in you to believe any such thing.”

For all that, the mother did not fail to use her eyes, and when it came to saying Ite missa est, she saw for certain that no twin brothers were ever more like each other. Nevertheless, so simple was she that she would fain have said, “God preserve me from believing my eyes.” However, as the matter was one which so deeply concerned her daughter, she determined to sift it to the bottom and know the truth. The husband, who had not perceived them, having returned home, she said to her daughter, “We shall now know the truth about your husband if you choose. When he is in bed I will come in, and you will pull off his coif from behind before he is aware of it. We shall see then if he is tonsured like the one who said mass.”

So said, so done. The wicked husband was no sooner in bed than the old lady came in, and took him by both hands as if in play, whilst the daughter lifted up the back of his cap, and discovered his fine shorn crown. Appalled at the sight they instantly called in the domestics, who seized and bound him, and kept him fast till morning, in spite of all his excuses and fine words, which moved no one. Next morning the mother sent for her confessor, under pretence that she had some great secret to communicate to him. He came with speed, and had no sooner entered her doors than she had him seized like the other, upbraiding him with the cheat he had put upon her. After this she committed them both into the hands of justice; and if the judges were honest men, it is not likely that this crime was left unpunished.

You see from this, ladies, that those who take the vow of poverty are not exempt from being tempted by avarice, and this is what leads them to the commission of so much mischief.

"Or rather of so much good," said Saffredent; "for how often did the monk make good cheer with the five hundred ducats which the old woman would have hoarded? Besides, the poor girl who had longed so much for a husband was put by his means into a condition to have two, and to judge the better of all hierarchies."

"You always entertain the falsest opinions I ever heard," said Oisille. "This comes of your believing that the temperaments of all women are like your own."

"By your leave, madam, that is not it," said Saffredent; "and I would with all my heart that women could be as easily satisfied as men."

"That is a bad saying," replied Oisille, "for there is no one here but knows the very contrary, and that what you say is not true. The tale we have heard is a convincing proof of the ignorance of poor women, and the wickedness of those whom we regard as better than the generality of men; for neither the mother nor the daughter would do anything by themselves, but submitted to the advice of those whom they believed to be wise and good."

"There are women so hard to please," said Longarine, "that it seems as if nothing less than angels will suit them."

"Thence it comes," said Simontault, "that they often meet with devils; and especially those of them who, not trusting in God's grace, imagine that by their own good sense, or by that of others, they shall find in this world the felicity which can only come from God."

"Why, Simontault!" exclaimed Oisille, "I was not aware that you knew so much good."

"Madam," replied he, "it is a pity I am not much tried and proved, because, for want of being known to you, I see you have formed a bad opinion of me. I may fairly, however, practise a Cordelier's trade, since a Cordelier has put his hand to mine."

"Then you call deceiving women your trade," said Parlamente; "thus, out of your own mouth, you condemn yourself."

"If I had deceived a hundred thousand of them," he returned, "I should not yet have revenged myself for the woes which one alone of their sex has made me endure."

"I know," retorted Parlamente, "that you complain perpetually of women; yet we see you so merry and in such good case, that there is no appearance of your having suffered as much as you say. But the Fair Lady without Mercy replies that 'it suits well to say so, by way of deriving some comfort from it.' " *

"You quote a notable doctor," said Simontault, "who is not only disagreeable, but makes all those ladies so who have read and followed his doctrine."

"Nevertheless, his doctrine is as profitable to young ladies as any I know," rejoined Parlamente.

"Were it to come to that," said Simontault, "that the ladies were without mercy, we might well let our horses rest and our harness rust until the next war, and do nothing but think of household affairs. I pray you tell me, is it to a lady's credit that she should be without pity, charity, love, or compassion?"

* A passage from Alain Chartier's poem, previously quoted in Novel XII.

"Without charity or love, no," replied Parlamente, "that she should not be, but that word compassion sounds so badly among women that they cannot use it without wronging their honour. For what is this pity or compassion? It is properly granting the favour one asks for. Now we know well what is the favour men usually crave."

"With your good leave, madame," said Simontault, "some there are so moderate that the only favour they ask is liberty to speak."

"You remind me of one who was contented with a glove," said Parlamente.

"Let us know something about a lover who was so easy to deal with," said Hircan.

"I will tell you the tale with pleasure," she replied.

NOVEL LVII.

Of a ridiculous milord who wore a lady's glove on his dress-coat.

MONSIEUR DE MONTMORENCY was sent to England by King Louis XI. in the capacity of ambassador. He conducted himself so well there that he won the friendship of the king and all the other princes, and they even communicated to him many secret affairs on which they wished to have his advice. One day, when he was at an entertainment given by the king, he was seated beside a milord of high family, who wore, fastened to his doublet, a small glove such as women use. The glove was fastened with golden hooks, and the seams were adorned with such a great quantity of diamonds, rubies, emeralds and pearls, that the value of the glove was something extraordinary. Monsieur de Montmorency cast his eyes on it so often that the milord perceived he wished to ask him the reason of his magnificence ; and, thinking the explanation would redound to his honour, he said to the ambassador, “ I perceive, monsieur, that you are surprised I have so much enriched this poor glove ; but I will tell you the reason. I look upon you as a gallant man, and I am sure you know what love is. You must know that I have all my life loved a lady whom I still love and shall love even after I am dead. As my heart was bolder to make a good choice than my tongue to declare it, I remained for seven years without daring even to show any signs of loving her, for fear, if she perceived them, I should lose the opportunities I had of being frequently with her—a thought which terrified me more than death. But one day, being in a meadow and gazing upon her, I was seized with such a palpitation of the heart that I lost all colour and countenance. She having noticed this, and asked me what was the matter, I replied that I felt intolerably sick at heart. Thinking that this sickness was one in which love had no share, she expressed her pity for it ; and that made me to entreat that she would put her hand on my heart, and see how it beat. She did so, more from charity than affection, and as I held her gloved hand on my heart, its motions became so violent that she perceived I had spoken the truth. Then I pressed her hand on my bosom, and said to her, ‘ Receive this heart, madam, which struggles to escape from my bosom and put itself in the hands of her from whom I hope for grace, life and pity. It is this heart, madam, which now constrains me to declare the love I have long cherished for you in secret, for neither my heart nor I, madam, can longer withstand so potent a god.’ Surprised at so unexpected a declaration, she would have withdrawn her hand, but I held it so fast that her glove remained with me instead of that cruel hand. As I never had before or since any other approach to nearer intimacy with her, I placed this glove over my heart as the fittest plaister I could apply to it. I have enriched it with all the finest jewels in my possession; but what is dearer to me than all of them is the glove itself, which I would not give for the realm of England, for there is nothing I prize in the world so much as to feel it on my bosom."

The Seigneur de Montmorency, who would rather have had a lady's hand than her glove, highly extolled his gallantry, and told him he was the most genuine lover he had ever seen, and worthy of better treatment, since he set so much store by such a trifle. "But," said he, "there is some comfort even in ill luck, as the proverb says. You were so much in love that if you had had something better than the glove you would perhaps have died of joy." The milord admitted this probability, without perceiving that Monsieur de Montmorency was making game of him.

If all the men in the world were of this character, the ladies might trust them, since it would cost them no more than a glove.

"I have been so well acquainted with Monsieur de Montmorency," said Geburon, "that I am sure he would not have been so easily satisfied as the Englishman, otherwise he would not have achieved so many successes as he did in love; for, as the old song says, 'Of a faint heart in love no one hears any good.'"

"You may be sure the poor lady withdrew her hand in great haste when she felt the agitation of the heart," said Saffredent. "She thought, no doubt, that the milord was about to expire ; and there is nothing, they say, which women abhor so much as to touch dead bodies."

"If you had frequented hospitals as much as taverns," said Ennasuite, "you would not say that ; for you would have seen women lay out dead bodies for burial, which men with all their boldness were often afraid to approach."

"It is true," said Simontault, "that there is no one on whom penance has been imposed who has not done the reverse of that which afforded him pleasure : witness a lady I once saw in a distinguished house, who, to compensate for the pleasure she had taken in kissing a man she loved, was found at four o'clock in the morning kissing the dead body of a man who had been killed the preceding day, and for whom she had never had any especial love more than for another. Every one was then aware that she was doing penance for her past pleasures."

"That is just the way," said Oisille, "in which men poison all the good acts done by women. My opinion is that we ought to kiss neither the living nor the dead, except after the manner which God commands."

"For my part," said Hircan, "I care so little for kissing any other woman than my wife, that I willingly subscribe to any terms that may be made on the subject ; but I pity the young folk whom you would deprive of such a small gratification, annulling the precept of Saint Paul, who ordained that people should kiss in osculo sancto."

"If Saint Paul had been a man like you," said Nomerfide, "we should have demanded palpable evidence of the spirit of God which spoke in him."

"To the last you will rather doubt Holy Writ than give up a hair's breadth of one of your petty ceremonies," said Geburon.

"God forbid," replied Oisille, "that we should doubt Holy Writ, though we put little faith in your lies. There is no woman but knows that her proper creed consists in never doubting the word of God, and always distrusting that of men."

"I believe," said Simontault, "that there are more men deceived by women than women deceived by men. Their want of love for us hinders them from believing the truth; whilst we, on the contrary, love them to such excess, that we readily believe their falsehoods, and find ourselves their dupes before we have imagined the possibility of their duping us."

"I suppose," said Parlamente, "you have heard some fool complain of having been duped by some light woman. In fact, what you state carries so little weight with it, that it has need of being supported by some example. So, if you have one to adduce, let us hear it. I do not mean to say that we are bound to believe you; but it will not pain our ears to hear you malign us, for we know the truth of the matter."

"Well, that being so," said Simontault, "you shall be satisfied."

NOVEL LVIII.

How a lady of the court pleasantly revenged herself on her faithless lover.

AT the court of Francis I. a lady of lively wit, by her beauty, her good breeding, and pleasing tongue, had won the hearts of several gentlemen, with whom she contrived to pass the time very well without exposing her honour, playing with them so pleasantly that they knew not on what to reckon; for the most confident were in despair, and the most despairing were not without hope. However, whilst making sport of most of them, she could not help greatly loving one of them, whom she called her cousin—a name which served as a pretext for a closer intimacy. But, as there is nothing stable in the world, their friendship often turned into anger, and then again became stronger than ever, in such wise that the whole court could not be ignorant of it. One day this lady, in order to let it be seen that she was passionless, as well as to tease him on account of whose love she had suffered much annoyance, showed him a more gracious countenance than ever she had done before. The gentleman, who was not deficient in boldness either in war or in love, began hotly to press the suit he had often before addressed to her. She pretended she could no longer resist, granted what he asked, and told him that, in order to do so, she would go up to her chamber, which was on a garret-floor, where she knew there was nobody, and as soon as he saw her go he was to follow her; and then, as she said, so graciously was she disposed towards him, that he would find her alone.

The gentleman believed her, and went with great delight to amuse himself with the other ladies, until he should see her depart. His fair one, who was not deficient in any of the sly ways of women, went up to Madame Margaret, the king's daughter, and the Duchess of Montpensier, and said to them, "I will show you, if you like, the finest sport you have ever seen." The princesses, who were no friends to melancholy, begged she would tell them what the sport was. "There is such a one, whom you both know," she said, "a charming man, if there ever was one, but the most audacious in the world. You know how many tricks he has played me ; and you know, also, that when I loved him most he quitted me for others ; which vexed me more than I suffered to appear. But now God has given me an opportunity to be revenged. I am now going to my room, which is overhead ; and if you will watch you will presently see him come up after me. When he shall have passed the galleries, and is about to ascend the stairs, go both of you to the window, help me to cry ‘Thief ! thief !’ and you will see what a rage he will be in. I am sure his anger will not become him badly ; and if he does not openly abuse me, I am sure he will not fail to do so in his heart.”

This plan was agreed on, not without much laughter beforehand ; for there was no gentleman who waged war more on the ladies, all of whom loved and esteemed him so much, that for nothing in the world would they have exposed themselves to his raillery. As soon as the concocter of the plot had left them, the two princesses, who anticipated a large share in the glory which she was to win from the gentleman, set themselves on the watch, and when he went out they followed him into the gallery. There, suspecting nothing, he muffled himself in his cloak to hide his face, and descended the stairs to the court, but, seeing some one by whom he did not wish to be observed, he traversed the court and returned by another way, all the while without perceiving the princesses, who saw all his movements. When he reached the staircase leading to the fair one’s chamber, the princesses posted themselves at the window, and presently they heard the lady above crying “Thief ! thief !” with all her might. The two princesses repeated the cry so loudly that they were heard all over the château. I leave you to imagine the vexation of the gentleman as he ran away, not so well muffled but that he was known by those who were in the secret. They often rallied him on the affair afterwards; nor did she who had played him the trick spare him, but told him to his face that she had well revenged herself. But he had such ready answers, and defended himself so cleverly, that he would have had them believe he had suspected their design, and that he had only promised to go to the lady to make sport of her in some way, assuring them he would never have given himself the trouble for her sake, for he had long ceased to love her. But the ladies would not own themselves defeated in that way, and the affair is still undecided.

If he really believed the lady, which is not probable, since he was so wary and so bold that few or no men of his age and time surpassed him, whereof his glorious death is good evidence, it strikes me that one cannot help admitting that gallant men who are in love are often the dupes of ladies from excess of credulity.*

“In faith,” said Ennasuite, “I applaud the lady for what she did; for when a man loves a lady and quits her for another, she can never revenge herself too much.”

* The Bibliophiles Francais surmise that the Queen of Navarre has made herself the heroine of this novel. The doctrines she has several times laid down in her epilogues respecting love and the relations of courtesy between the sexes, are quite in harmony with what she there says respecting the serviteurs whom a lady may entertain without giving her husband any reason for suspicion. Nothing can be conjectured as to the name of the gallant on whom the trick was played.

In the following novel Margaret returns to the same subject, and relates how the same lady contrived to convict her husband of infidelity, and force him to take her to court, from which he had removed her through jealousy. If we compare this with what is known of Margaret's married life, the conjecture of her last editors appears so much the more plausible.

"True, if she is loved," said Parlamente; "but some there are who love without making sure they are loved; and when they perceive that their gallants love elsewhere, they accuse them of inconstancy. But women of discretion never suffer themselves to be thus deceived. They pay no heed to anything but the truth, for fear of being exposed to the irksome consequences of falsehood; for the true and the false talk the same language."

"If all women were of your way of thinking," said Simontault, "men might box up their supplications. But for all that you and others like you can say, we will never believe that women are as incredulous as they are fair. Under this conviction we will live as content as you would wish to render us uneasy by your maxims."

"As I very well know the lady who played this good trick," said Longarine, "I can have no difficulty in believing any sly things that may be attributed to her. Since she did not spare her own husband, it is not likely that she would spare her lover."

"What, her husband?" said Simontault. "Then you know more than I; so pray tell us what you know."

"I will, since you wish it," she replied.

NOVEL LIX.

The same lady, whose husband was jealous of her without just cause, contrives to detect him in such a position with one of her women that he is obliged to humble himself, and allow his wife to live as she pleases.

THE lady of whom you told the tale was married to a man of good and ancient family, whose fortune was not inferior to his birth. Their marriage was solely the result of their mutual love. The wife, who was of all women in the world the most ingenuous, made no secret of it to her husband that she had lovers, whom she made game of, and only used for her pastime. Her husband had his share in this pleasure; but in the long run he grew dissatisfied with this manner of proceeding. On the one hand, he took it amiss that she had long visits from persons he regarded neither as relations nor as friends, and on the other he was not pleased with the expenditure he was compelled to make in attending the court. For this reason he retired to his own house as often as he could; but he received so many visits there that his expenses were hardly diminished. Wherever he was his wife always found means to divert herself, whether with play, or dancing, or other amusements, to which young ladies may decorously addict themselves. When her husband sometimes told her that they spent too much, she would reply that he might be assured she would never make him a cuckold, but only a rogue. In fact, she was so fond of magnificence in attire, that she insisted on having dresses as rich and fine as any seen at the court, to which her husband took her as seldom as possible, notwithstanding her eager desire to be always there. For this reason she made herself so complaisant to her husband that it was with difficulty he refused her most extravagant requests.

One day when she had failed in all her devices to induce him to take her to court, she perceived that he looked very wistfully at a chambermaid of hers, and thought she might turn this circumstance in some way to her own advantage. She questioned the girl in private, and managed so cleverly, by dint of promises and threats, that she made her confess that since she had been in her service not a day had passed in which her master had not made love, to her ; but that she would rather die than do anything contrary to God and her honour, the more so as the lady had done her the honour to receive her into her service, which would make the crime double.

The lady, on learning her husband's infidelity, was at once vexed and rejoiced. She was vexed that at the very time when he testified so much regard for her, he was furtively seeking means to put an affront upon her under her very eyes, and to quit her for a girl she regarded as greatly inferior to herself in beauty and attractions. She was rejoiced, because she hoped to surprise her husband in the fact, and to work him in such a way that he would never again reproach her with her lovers or her fondness for residing at court. To this end she begged the girl to yield gradually to her husband's solicitations upon certain prescribed conditions. The girl made some objections ; but her mistress having made herself warrant for her life and honour, she promised to do whatever she pleased.

The next time the husband accosted the girl he found her quite changed, and pressed her to comply with more than his usual vivacity ; but knowing her part by rote, she represented to him that she was a poor girl, and would become poorer than ever if she yielded to him, because she would be dismissed by her mistress, in whose service she hoped to save enough to get her a good husband. The gentleman replied, that she had no need to be uneasy on that score, for he would settle her better in marriage than her mistress could do ; and, moreover, he would manage the intrigue with such secrecy that no one should ever be able to say a word against her. Thereupon the bargain was concluded. When the parties came to deliberate on the place where it was to be sealed, the girl said she knew no better place, or less likely to be suspected, than a little house in the park, in which it happened, fortunately, that there was a chamber and a bed. The gentleman, who could never have made objections to any place proposed, was quite satisfied with this, and awaited with great impatience the day and hour agreed on.

The girl kept her word with her mistress, told her all that had passed between her master and herself, and that the rendezvous was for the next day after dinner. She would not fail, she said, to give her mistress a signal when it was time for her to keep the appointment, and begged she would not fail to notice it, and be upon the spot in time to deliver her from the peril to which she exposed herself for her sake. The lady vowed she might depend upon her, begged her to have no fear, and assured her she would never forsake her, and would perfectly secure her from her master's resentment.

Next day after dinner the gentleman showed a fairer face to his wife than he had ever done ; this was by no means agreeable to her ; but she dissembled so well that he never suspected what was passing in her mind. When dinner was over, she asked him how he would while away the time. He said he knew nothing better for the purpose than to play at cent.* The company then sat down to play, but she would not be of the party, saying she would be as much amused looking on. Before he sat down to play he did not forget to tell the girl to remember her promise. The game had no sooner begun than she went out of the room, making a sign to her mistress that she was setting out on the pilgrimage she had to make. The signal was not lost upon the wife, but the husband saw nothing. An hour afterwards, however, one of his valets having made him a sign from a distance, he told his wife he had a headache, and must go into the open air and rest a little. She knew what ailed him quite as well as he did himself, and asked him should she hold his cards. He begged her to do so, and said he would soon be back. There was no need to hurry himself, she said, for she could play for two hours without being tired. The husband then retired to his chamber, and thence to the park. His wife, who knew a short way, waited a little, and then suddenly pretending to have the colic, she gave up her hand to another.

* To play at cent. This probably means the game now called picquet ; it is an old game, and is among those enumerated by Rabelais, in book i. ch. xxii. of Gargantua,

The moment she left the room she threw off her high pattens, and ran as fast to the place where she did not choose the bargain to be concluded without her, and arrived in good time, almost as soon as her husband. She remained behind the door to hear the fine things he said to her servant, and when she saw that he was approaching the criminal point, she caught hold of him behind, and said, "I am too near for you to take another." It is needless to ask if he was then in a towering passion, both at being frustrated of his expected pleasure, and at seeing that his wife, whose good-will he was afraid of losing for ever, knew more than he would have had her know. Believing, however, that it was a trick played upon him by the girl, he ran at her with such fury, without speaking to his wife, that if the latter had not held his hands he would have killed her. He said, in a transport of rage, that she was the worst baggage he had ever known, and that if his wife had waited, she would have seen that he only came there to try and make a fool of her; and that, instead of what she expected, he would have given her a flogging. But the wife knew better than to accept such flimsy excuses, and rated him so roundly that he was greatly afraid she would leave him. He made her all the promises she desired, and touched by her sage remonstrances, he confessed that he was wrong to take it amiss that she had lovers. He agreed with her that a handsome and respectable woman is not the less virtuous for being loved, provided she say and do nothing contrary to her honour ; but that a man is unpardonable who takes pains to pursue a girl who does not love him, and to wrong his wife and his own conscience. He ended by promising that he would no longer prevent her from going to court, nor ever take it amiss that she had lovers, convinced, as he was, that she retained them only for her diversion, not for any regard she had for them.

He said, in a transport of rage, that she was the worst baggage he had ever known.

This language was not displeasing to the lady, who thought she had gained a great point ; however, she pretended quite the reverse, saying she did not care to go to court, and that there was nothing dearer to her than his affection, without which all companies were odious to her. A woman, she said, who was loved by her husband, and who loved him as she did hers, carried with her a safe-conduct, warranting her to speak with all the world and be blamed by no one. The poor gentleman took such pains to assure her of the love he cherished for her, that at last they went back good friends. To avoid a recurrence of the mischief, he begged her to dismiss the servant who had caused all this hubbub. She did so ; but it was by marrying her well and respectably at the expense of her husband, who, to make his wife forget the prank he had played, took her soon to court with such pomp and magnificence that she had full reason to be satisfied.

This, ladies, was what made me say I was not surprised at the trick she had played on one of her lovers after the one I knew she had played on her husband.

"You have depicted to us a very sly wife, and a very stupid husband," said Hircan. "Since he had gone so far, he ought not to have stopped on so fair a road."

"And what should he have done?" inquired Longarine.

"What he wanted to do," replied Hircan, "for his wife was not less angry at knowing what he had intended to do than if he had actually done it. Perhaps she would have liked him better if he had shown himself bolder and a better fellow."

"That's all very well," said Ennasuite, "but where do you find men who can force two women at once? The wife would have defended her rights, and the girl her maidenhead."

"That is true," said Hircan; "but a strong and bold man will fearlessly attack two weak persons, and be sure to get the better of them."

"I admit that if he had drawn his sword he might have killed them both," returned Ennasuite, "but I don't see how he could have escaped from them otherwise. Tell us, pray, what would you have done, had you been in his place?"

"I would have thrown my arms round my wife and carried her out of doors, and then I would have done what I pleased to the servant by fair means or by force."

"It is enough, Hircan," said Parlamente, "that you know how to do wrong."

"I am sure, Parlamente," he replied, "that I do not scandalize the innocent before whom I speak, or wish to maintain a bad cause. I neither praise the enterprise which was bad in itself, nor the enterpriser who stopped short half-way for fear rather than for love. I applaud a man who loves his wife as God ordains ; but when he does not love her, I do not think the better of him for fearing her."

"Truly," returned Parlamente, "if love did not make you a good husband, what you would do for fear would be no great thing, and so I should esteem it."

"The love I have for you, Parlamente," said Hircan, "subjects me as much to your wishes as the fear of death and hell could do."

"You may say what you will," his wife replied, "but I have reason to be content with what I have seen and known of you. As for what I have not known, I have no wish to doubt, and still less to inquire about it."

"It is in my opinion," said Nomerfide, "a great folly in women to pry so curiously into what their husbands do ; but it is no less a one in husbands to want to know every step taken by their wives. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof, without taking so much thought for the morrow."

"Nevertheless it is sometimes necessary," said Oisille, "to inquire into matters in which the honour of a house is concerned ; that is to say, for the purpose of setting things right, and not from a wish to judge ill of persons, for everyone is liable to error."

"Many have come to mischief for want of inquiring into their wives' freaks," said Geburon.

"If you know any instance of the kind, pray tell it us," said Longarine.

"I will do so with pleasure," he replied, "since you desire it."

NOVEL LX.

A woman of Paris quits her husband for one of the king's chanters, counterfeits death, and is buried, but secretly disinterred alive and well—Her husband marries another wife, and fifteen years afterwards is obliged to repudiate her, and take back his first wife.

THERE was in Paris a man so good-natured that he would have scrupled to believe that a man had lain with his wife though he had seen it with his own eyes. This poor man married the most profligate woman in the world, but never noticed her licentiousness, and treated her as though she were the best of wives. But one day, when King Louis XII. was in Paris, this woman went and gave herself up to one of that prince's chanters; and when she found that the king was quitting Paris and that she was about to lose her lover, she resolved to go with him and quit her husband. The chanter had no objection to this, and took her to a house he had near Blois, where they lived long together. The poor husband, not finding his wife, searched for her in all directions, and learned at last that she had gone off with the chanter. Wishing to recover his lost sheep which he had badly guarded, he wrote her several letters, begging her to return and promising to receive her, provided she would lead a good life for the future; but she took such pleasure in the chanter's singing that she had forgotten her husband's voice, made no account of his fair words, and snapped her fingers at him. The incensed husband then gave her notice that he would claim her legally through the Church, since she would not return to him of her own accord ; whereupon, fearing that if justice meddled with the matter she and her chanter would come badly off, she devised a scheme worthy of such a woman.

She pretended to be sick, sent for some worthy women of the city to visit her, and they came the more willingly as they hoped to make her illness instrumental towards bringing her back from her vicious ways. To this end each of them addressed the best remonstrances she could to her, and the seemingly dying woman listened to them with tears, confessed her sin, and played the part so well, that the whole company had pity on her, believing her tears and her repentance to be sincere. They tried to console the poor penitent, told her that God was not so terrible by a great deal as some indiscreet preachers represented him to be, and assured her He would never withhold his mercy from her ; and then they sent for a good man to hear her confession. Next day the priest of the parish came and administered to her the holy sacrament, which she received with so much devotion that all the good women of the town who were present were moved with tears, and praised the divine goodness for having had pity on the poor creature. Afterwards, upon her feigning that she could no longer swallow food, the priest brought her extreme unction, which she received with many fine signs of devotion ; for she could hardly speak, at least so it was believed. She lay a long while in the same state ; but at last the spectators imagined that she gradually lost her sight, her hearing, and her other senses, whereupon everybody began to cry, " Jesus ! Lord ! have mercy !" Night being now at hand, and the ladies having some way to go, they all retired. As they were leaving the house, word was brought them that she had just expired. They said a De profundis for her, and went away.

The priest asked the chanter where he would have her buried. He replied that she had expressed a wish to be buried in the cemetery, and that it would be advisable under the circumstances that the interment should take place by night. The unfortunate woman was laid out for burial by a servant, who took good care not to hurt her ; and then she was carried by torchlight to the grave which the chanter had caused to be dug. When the body was carried past the houses of those who had seen the deceased receive extreme unction, they all came out and accompanied her to the grave, where the priests and the women left her, but the chanter remained after them. The moment he saw that the company were far enough off, he and his servant woman lifted the pretended dead woman out of the grave more alive than ever, and took her back to his house, in which he kept her long concealed.

The husband, who was bent on recovering his wife, went to Blois to demand justice, and found that she was dead and buried. The fact was certified to him by all the ladies of Blois, who related to him what a fine end she had made ; and greatly did the good man rejoice, believing that the soul of his wife was in Paradise, and himself disencumbered of her wicked body. He returned to Paris with a glad heart, and entered into a second marriage with a respectable young woman, a good housewife, by whom he had several children, and with whom he lived fourteen or fifteen years. But at last rumour, which keeps no secrets, informed him that his first wife was not dead, and that she was still with her chanter. The poor man dissembled as much as he could, affecting to know nothing, and heartily wishing that the rumour might be false ; but his virtuous wife heard of it, and was so distressed that she almost died of grief. Could she have concealed her misfortune without wounding her conscience, she would gladly have done it ; but that was impossible, for the Church took up the matter at once, and began by separating them until the truth should have been ascertained. The fact having been verified, the poor man was constrained to quit his good wife and go after his bad one. He came to Blois shortly after Francis I. became king. He found there Queen Claude and the regent-mother, laid his complaint before them, and demanded of them her whom he would fain not have found ; but he was forced to seek her, to the great pity of all beholders.

His wife, on being confronted with him, insisted for a long time that he was not her husband ; which he would gladly have believed if he could. Angry but unabashed, she then told him she would rather die than go back to him. The good man was very well satisfied with this declaration ; but the ladies, before whom she spoke so impudently, condemned her to return to her husband, and so sharply admonished and threatened the chanter that he was constrained to tell his ugly mistress he did not want to have anything more to do with her, and that she must go back to her husband. Thus repulsed on all sides, the wretched creature went away with her husband, and was better treated by him than she deserved.

I repeat, ladies, that if the poor husband had taken heed to his wife, he would not thus have lost her ; for a thing well watched is not easily lost, and doubtless the proverb is true, which says that negligence makes the thief.

"It is strange," remarked Hircan, "strong love is where it seems least reasonable."

"I have heard," said Simontault, "that one might sooner break two marriages than the love of a priest and his servant."

"I believe it," said Ennasuite, "for those who bind others in marriage know how to fasten the knot so tightly that it is only to be undone by death; the doctors, too, maintain that spiritual language is more persuasive than other, and consequently spiritual love surpasses every other kind."

"I cannot pardon ladies," said Dagoucín, "who forsake a well-bred husband or lover for a priest, however good-looking."

"Leave our holy mother the Church alone, I pray you," said Hircan, "and be assured that it is a great pleasure for poor timid women to sin in secret with those who can absolve them; for some there are who are much more ashamed of confessing a sin than of committing it."

"You speak of such as know not God," said Oisille, "and imagine that secret things will not be revealed before the whole host of Heaven. But I do not believe that it is for sake of confession that such women seek confessors. The enemy has so blinded them that they think much more of settling down upon a place that seems to them the most secret and secure, than of having absolution for the guilt of which they do not repent."

"Repent, indeed!" exclaimed Saffredent. "They think themselves much more saintly than other women, and I am sure that there are some who think it a great honour to them to persevere in intrigues of this sort."

"From the way in which you express yourself," said

Oisille, "one would think you knew some such person. That being the case, I beg you will begin the day to-morrow by telling us what you know. There goes the last bell for vespers ; for the monks went away after our tenth novel, and left us to decide our dispute between ourselves."

So saying she rose, and the company following her example, they went to church, where they found they were waited for. After vespers they supped, and not without talking over several fine tales. After supper they all went, according to custom, to divert themselves in the meadow, and then to bed, to have their memories clearer next day.

SEVENTH DAY.

MADAME OISILLE failed not to administer to them in the morning the wholesome pasture she drew from the reading of the acts and virtuous deeds of the glorious knights and apostles of Jesus Christ, and told them that those narratives were enough to fill one with the wish to have lived in such times, and make one deplore the deformity of this age compared with that. After reading and explaining to them the beginning of that excellent book, she begged them to go to church in the union with which the apostles addressed their prayers to Heaven, and solicit the grace of God, who never refuses it to those who ask for it with faith. Everyone thought the advice very good, and they arrived in church just as the mass of the Holy Ghost was beginning. This was so à propos that they listened to the service with great devotion. Again at dinner the conversation turned on the lives of the blessed apostles, and the subject was so pleasing that the company had nearly forgotten to return to the rendezvous for the novels. Nomerfide, who was the youngest of them, observed this, and said: "Madame Oisille has put us so much upon devotion that the time for relating novels is passing away without our thinking of retiring to prepare our novels." Thereupon the company rose, went for a short while to their respective chambers, and then repaired to the meadow as they had done the day before.

When all were comfortably seated, Madame Oisille said to Saffredent, "Though I am quite sure you will say nothing to the advantage of women, yet I must remind you that you promised us a novel yesterday evening."

"I stipulate, madam," replied Saffredent, "that I shall not pass for an evil speaker in speaking the truth, nor lose the good-will of virtuous ladies by relating what wantons do. Experience has taught me what it is to be deprived of their presence, and if I were likewise deprived of their good graces, I should not be alive at this moment."

So saying, he cast his eyes on the opposite side to that where sat she who was the cause of his weal and woe; but at the same time he looked at Ennasuite, and made her blush as if what he had said was meant for her. However, he was not the less understood by the right person. Madame Oisille having then assured him he might fairly speak the truth at the cost of whom it concerned, he began as follows.

NOVEL LXI.

A husband became reconciled to his wife after she had lived fourteen or fifteen years with a canon.

THERE lived near the town of Autun a very handsome woman, fair complexioned, very tall, and of as goodly a presence as any woman I ever saw. She had married a respectable man, who seemed younger than herself, and with whom she had reason to be satisfied. Shortly after their marriage he took her to Autun, where he had business. Whilst the husband was engaged as a suitor in the courts of justice, the wife went to church and prayed for him. She continued her visits to that holy place so long that a very rich canon fell in love with her, and took his measures so well that the poor wretch gave herself up to him ; but the husband had no suspicion of this, and was more intent to taking care of his property than of his wife.

When the time came for the husband and wife to return to their home, which was distant seven good leagues from the town, great was the regret on her part. The canon promised to go see her often, which he did under pretence of journeys, in which he always called at their house. The husband was not such a fool as not to understand the canon's purpose, and accordingly, when he next came there he did not see the wife, for her husband had taken good care to prevent it. The wife pretended not to notice this jealousy, of which she was well aware, but she was bent on counteracting the precautions it led to, deeming it a hell to be deprived of the sight of her idol. One day when her husband was abroad, she gave her men and women servants so much to do that she remained alone and unobserved in the house. Immediately, taking what was necessary for her, and without any other company than her extravagant love, she started off on foot for Autun, where she arrived not so late but that she was recognized by her canon, who kept her close and concealed for more than a year, in spite of all the monitions and excommunications launched at him at the husband's suit.

Finding all other expedients fail, the husband laid his plaint before the bishop, whose archdeacon, as good a man as any in France, personally visited all the houses of the canons, until he found the woman who was supposed to be lost, committed her to prison, and condemned the canon to a heavy penance. The husband, hearing that his wife had been recovered by the exertions of the good archdeacon, and of several other worthy people, was willing to take her back upon her oath that, for the future, she would behave like an honest woman ; an oath which the simple man, who loved her much, readily believed that she would keep. He took her back into his house, and treated her in all respects as before, except that he gave her two old servant women, one of whom was always with her when the other was elsewhere. But for all her husband's good treatment, her extravagant love for the canon made her regard all her repose as a torment. Though she was a very fine woman, and he a man of strong and vigorous temperament, yet she had no children by him, for her heart was always seven leagues away from her body. Nevertheless, such was her dissimulation, that her husband believed she had forgotten the past, as he had done on his part ; but her heart was too wicked to be capable of so happy and laudable a change.

At the very time when she saw that her husband loved her most and distrusted her least, she feigned illness, and carried on the deception so well that the poor husband was in great distress on her account, and spared nothing for her cure. At last he and all his household believed that she really was sinking to the grave. Seeing that her husband was as much afflicted at this as he had reason to be rejoiced, she begged he would authorize her to make her will ; which he freely did, with tears in his eyes. Having the power to make a will, because she had no children, she bequeathed to her husband all she had in her gift, beseeching his pardon for the affront she had put upon him. Then she sent for the parish priest, confessed, and received the holy sacrament of the altar with such devotion that everyone wept at witnessing so fine and so glorious an end. In the evening she begged her husband to have extreme unction brought her, and told him she was sinking so fast she was afraid she should not live to receive it. Her husband had it brought with the utmost speed, and she received it with a devotion that excited every one's admiration. After partaking of these fine mysteries, she said to her husband that since by God's grace she had received all that the Church had ordained, she felt her conscience so calm that she wished to repose a little, and begged that he would do the same, seeing what great need he had of it, after having wept and watched so long beside her bed. The husband and the men-servants having gone to sleep, the two old women who had kept guard over her so long while she was in health having now no fear of losing her but by death, went to sleep likewise. As soon as she heard them snoring soundly, she got up in her shift and stole out of the room, listening to hear if there was anybody stirring in the house. Finding all quiet, she passed out through a little garden door which was not locked, and walked all night, in her shift and barefooted, in the direction of Autun, to repair to the saint who had hindered her from dying.

The road, however, was so long that daylight overtook her before she reached her journey's end. Looking round then on all sides, she saw two men on horseback coming towards her at full gallop, and making no doubt that one of them was her husband who was in pursuit of her, she hid her whole body in the mud of a marsh, and her head between the rushes, and heard her husband say to his servant, as he rode by, like a man in despair, "O the wicked wretch! Who would ever have imagined that she would have thought of cloaking such an infamous and abominable act under the holy sacraments of the Church?"

"Since Judas did not scruple to betray his master when partaking of the like food," replied the servant, "can you wonder at a woman's betraying her husband in that manner?"

The husband rode on, and the wife remained among the rushes, more joyous at having duped and baffled him than ever she had been at home in a good bed, where she thought she was held in slavery. The husband searched for her all over Autun, but having clearly ascertained that she had not entered the town, he retraced his steps, and on his way did nothing but inveigh against her and his great loss, threatening her with nothing less than death if he caught her; but she was as inaccessible to fear as to the sense of cold, although the weather and the place might well have made her repent of her horrible journey. Anyone who knew not how the fire of hell heats those who are full of it would have wondered how this woman, coming out of a warm bed, could have endured such severe cold for a whole day. She did so, however, without losing courage, and resumed her journey to Autun as soon as night came. Just as they were about to close the town gates this pilgrim arrived, and went straightway to her saint, who was so astonished to see her in such a trim that he could hardly believe it was she. After turning her about and examining her well on all sides, he found that she had flesh and bones, which a spirit has not; he was satisfied she was not a phantom, and they agreed so well together that she remained with him for fourteen or fifteen years.

For a while she lived secluded, but at last she lost all fear; and what was worse, she prided herself so much on the honour of having such a lover that she took precedence at church of most of the respectable women of the town, the wives of officers as well as others. She had children by the canon, and, among others, a daughter, who was married to a rich merchant with so much magnificence that all the ladies of the town were indignant, but had not influence enough to correct such an abuse.

It happened at this time that Queen Claude, consort of King Francis, passed through Autun, accompanied by the regent-mother and her daughter, the Duchess of Alençon. Then came a femme de chambre of the queen, named Perrette, to the duchess, and said to her, "Hearken to me, madam, I beseech you, and you will do as good an act as if you went to hear the service of the day, or even better." The duchess willingly listened, knowing that from her lips would come nothing but what was meet to be heard. Perrette told her how she had engaged a little girl to help her to soap the queen's linen, and that, on asking her news of the town, the girl had told her of the vexation felt by the honourable ladies thereof at being obliged to yield precedence to this canon's wife, part of whose history she related to her. The duchess immediately went to the queen and the regent-mother, and repeated to them what she had heard ; and without other form of process they immediately sent for that wretch, who did not conceal herself ; far, indeed, of being ashamed, she was proud of the honour of being the mistress of the house of so rich a man. Accordingly, she presented herself with effrontery before the princesses, who were so astounded at her impudence that at first they knew not what to say to her ; but afterwards the regent-mother spoke to her in terms that would have drawn tears from any woman of good understanding. Instead, however, of weeping, the wretched woman said to them, with great assurance.

"I beseech you, mesdames, not to let my honour be touched ; for, thank God, I have lived with the canon so well and so virtuously that no one can say a word against me on that score. Let it not be supposed that I offend God ; for it is three years since the good canon has touched me, and we live as chastely and with as much love as if we were two dear little angels, without there ever having been between us a word or a wish to the contrary. Whoever, then, shall disunite us will commit a great sin ; for the good man, who is nearly eighty years old, will not live long without me, who am forty-five.”

You may imagine what these ladies said to her, and how they reproved her for her obduracy : but say what they would to her, old as she was, and illustrious and worshipful as were the persons who addressed her, there was no shaking her obstinacy. To humble her, the princesses sent for the good archdeacon of Autun, who sentenced her to a year’s imprisonment on bread and water. They also sent for her husband, who, in consideration of their good exhortations, promised to take her back after her penance. But finding herself a prisoner, and knowing that the canon was resolved never to take her back, she thanked the ladies for having taken a devil off her shoulders ; and her repentance was so great and so perfect that her husband, instead of waiting the year’s end to take her back, did not wait a fortnight before he claimed her of the archdeacon, and they have since that lived together in peace and harmony.

You see, ladies, how wicked ministers convert St. Peter’s chains into chains of Satan, so strong and hard to break that the sacraments, which cast out devils, are means of retaining them longer in the consciences of such people ; for the best things become the most pernicious when they are abused,

"Truly she was a great wretch," said Oisille, "but no less true is it that she was severely punished in appearing before such judges. In fact, the regent-mother's mere look had such a virtue, that there was no good woman who did not fear to stand before her, thinking herself unworthy of her sight ; or who, if regarded by her with gentleness, did not think herself deserving of great honour, knowing that the regent-mother was one who could not look with a favourable eye upon any but virtuous women."

"It would be a fine thing," said Hircan, "that one should stand more in awe of the eyes of a woman than of the holy sacrament, which, if not received in faith and charity, is received to eternal damnation."

"I promise you," said Parlamente, "that those who are not inspired of God are more afraid of temporal than of spiritual powers. I believe, too, that this wretched woman was much more mortified by her imprisonment and by the loss of her canon than by all the remonstrances and rebukes that could be addressed to her."

"But you forget the principal thing that determined her to return to her husband," said Simontault, "and that was that the canon was eighty years old, and her husband was younger than herself ; so the good lady was a gainer on both hands. But had the canon been young she would never have quitted him ; the remonstrances of the ladies would have availed no more than the sacraments."

"I think she did right," said Nomerfide, "not to confess her sin too easily ; for one should only tell that sort of offence humbly to God, and deny it stoutly before men, since, though the thing be true, by dint of lying and swearing one throws doubt on its truth."

"It is difficult, however, for a sin to be so secret as never to come to light," said Longarine, "unless God himself conceals it for sake of those who repent of it truly for love of Him."

"What would you say of women," said Hircan, "who have no sooner committed a folly than they go and tell it?"

"The thing seems so surprising," said Longarine, "that it seems to me a token that they do not dislike the sin. I have already said that the sin which is not covered by the grace of God can hardly be denied before men. There are many who take pleasure in talking of such things, and glory in publishing their vices, and others who accuse themselves of self-contradiction."

"That is a very clumsy kind of self-contradiction," said Saffredent, "but if you know any example of it, I beg you will relate it."

"Hearken, then," said Longarine.

NOVEL LXII.

A lady recounting an adventure of gallantry that had occurred to herself, and speaking in the third person, inadvertently betrayed her own secret.

IN the time of King Francis I. there was a lady of the blood royal who had honour, virtue, and beauty, and who knew how to tell a story with grace, and also to laugh at a good one when she heard it.* This lady, being at one of her houses, was visited by all her dependents and neighbours, by whom she was greatly beloved. Among other visits she received one from a certain lady who, seeing that everyone told the princess tales to divert her, wished to do like the rest, and said, "I have a good story to tell you, madam ; but you must promise not to speak of it. It is quite true, and I can conscientiously give it you as such.

* The lady of the blood royal whom Margaret eulogizes so highly was probably her mother, who was very fond of hearing all sorts of court gossip.

"There was a married lady who lived on very creditable terms with her husband, though he was old and she young. A gentleman in her neighbourhood, seeing she had married this old man, fell in love with her, and solicited her for several years, but she only replied to him as became a virtuous woman. One day it occurred to the gentleman that if he could come upon her at a moment advantageous to himself, she would perhaps not be so cruel. After he had long weighed the danger to which he exposed himself, love smoothed over all difficulties, dissipated his fear, and determined him to seek time and opportunity. Keeping good watch for intelligence, he learned that the lady's husband was going away to another of his houses, and intended to set out at day-break to avoid the heat, whereupon he repaired to the lady and found her asleep in bed. Seeing that the maid-servants were not in the chamber, he got into the lady's bed, booted and spurred as he was, without having had the wit to lock the door. She awoke, and was very much vexed to see him there ; but in spite of all her remonstrances there was no stopping him—he violated her, and threatened, if she made a noise, to tell everybody she had sent for him ; which frightened her so much that she durst not cry out. One of the servants came back some moments afterwards into the chamber. The gentleman jumped up with such celerity that she would have noticed nothing, if his spur had not stuck in the top sheet, and carried it clean off the bed, leaving the lady quite naked."

The lady here could not help saying: "Never was woman more astonished than myself."

So far the lady had told her story as if of another : but here she could not help saying :

"Never was woman more astonished than I when I found myself thus naked."

The princess, who had listened to the whole tale without a smile, could not then restrain her laughter, and said, "I see you were quite right in saying you knew the story to be true." The poor lady tried hard to mend the matter ; but there was no possibility of finding a good plaister for it.

I assure you, ladies, if the act had given her real pain she would have been glad to have lost the recollection of it ; but as I have already said, sin is sure to discover itself unless it be covered by the mantle which, as David says, makes man blessed.

"Truly, of all the fools I ever heard of this was the greatest, to set others laughing at her own expense," said Ennasuite.

"I am not surprised that speech follows action," said Parlamente : "for it is easier to say than to do."

"Why," said Geburon, "what sin had she committed ? She was asleep in her bed, and he threatened her with death and infamy. Lucretia, who has been so much lauded, did quite as much."

"It is true," said Parlamente, "there is no righteous person who may not fall ; but when one has felt at the instant great disgust at one's fall, one remembers it only with horror. To efface its memory Lucretia killed herself ; but this wanton chose to make others laugh at it in her own case."

"It seems to me, nevertheless," said Nomerfide, "that she was a good woman, since she was urgently solicited several times, but would not consent. Accordingly, the gentleman was obliged to use fraud and violence in order to succeed."

"What!" said Parlamente, "do you suppose that a woman's honour is spotless when she succumbs after two or three refusals? At that rate there would be many a woman of honour among those who are regarded as having none. Plenty of women have been known for a long time to repulse him to whom their hearts were already given. Some do it because they fear infamy; others to make themselves the more loved and esteemed by a feigned resistance. A woman, therefore, ought not to be held in any consideration unless she remains firm to the end."

"If a young man were to refuse a handsome girl," said Dagoucin, "would you not regard that as a great act of virtue?"

"Assuredly," said Oisille, "if a young man in good health made such a refusal, I should think the act very laudable, but not hard to believe."

"I know some," said Dagoucin, "who have refused adventures which all their comrades sought for with avidity."

"Pray take my place," said Longarine, "and tell us what you know in that way; but recollect that we are pledged to speak the truth."

"I promise to tell it you," said Dagoucin, "without cover or disguise."

NOVEL LXIII.

Notable chastity of a French lord.

THERE were in Paris four girls, two of whom were sisters, so handsome, so young, and so fresh, that they had the choice of all the gallants. The gentleman whom the king then reigning had made provost of Paris, seeing that his master was young, and of an age to desire such company, managed so dexterously with the four, making each of them believe that she was for the king, that they consented to what the provost desired. This was that they should all be present at a banquet to which he invited his master, communicating to him his design, which was approved by the king, and by two great lords of the court, who were not sorry to have a finger in the pie. While they were at a loss for a fourth, in came a young lord, a handsome, well-bred man, and younger by ten years than the others. He was at once invited to the treat, and accepted the invitation with a good grace, though in reality he had no mind for it, for two reasons. He had a wife with whom he was very happy, who bore him fine children; and they lived so tranquilly together that for no consideration would he have given her cause to suspect him. Besides, he loved one of the handsomest ladies then in France, and esteemed her so much that all others seemed ugly to him in comparison with her; so that in his early youth, and before he was married, there was no means of making him see and frequent other women, however fair, for he had more pleasure in seeing his mistress, and loving her perfectly, than he could have had from all he could have obtained of another.

This young lord went to his wife, told her what the king had in view, and said he would rather die than do what he had promised. "As there is no man," he said, "whom I would not dare to attack in anger, so I would rather die than commit a murder in cold blood, unless honour compelled to it. In like manner I would rather die than violate conjugal fidelity at another's caprice, unless extreme love, such as blinds the best, extorted such a violation from me."

His wife, seeing in him so much virtue with so much youth, loved him more than ever, and asked him how he could excuse himself, seeing that princes often take it amiss that others do not applaud what they like. "I have heard say," he replied, "that the wise man is always ready at a critical moment with an illness or a journey. So I intend to be sick four or five days beforehand; and, provided you play the sorrowing wife, I trust I shall get out of the scrape."

"That is what one may call a good and holy hypocrisy," said his wife. "I will not fail to wear as sad a face as possible; for one is very fortunate when one can avoid offending God and provoking the sovereign's resentment."

So said, so done; and the king was very sorry to hear through the wife of the husband's illness, which, however, was not of long duration. Certain affairs having then supervened to claim the king's attention, he forgot his pleasure to think of his duty, and suddenly quitted Paris. One day, recollecting his unfulfilled project, he said to the young prince, "We were great fools to quit Paris with such haste as not to have seen the four girls who have been represented to us as the handsomest in my realm."

"I am very glad," replied the prince, "that you have not done so, for I was greatly afraid during my illness that I alone should lose such a good fortune."

The king never suspected the dissimulation of the young lord, who thenceforth was more beloved by his wife than ever.*

Parlamente burst out laughing, and said, "He would have shown his love for his wife much more if he had done it for her sake only; but, in any point of view, such conduct was certainly most commendable."

"It seems to me no such great merit in a man to be chaste for his wife's sake," said Hircan. "He is bound to it by so many reasons that he can hardly do otherwise. In the first place, God commands it; he is pledged to it by his marriage vow; and besides, the satiated appetite is not subjected to temptation like the craving one. But for the free love one cherishes for a mistress whom one does not enjoy, obtaining from her no other pleasure than that of seeing and speaking to her, and often nothing but mortifying replies, when this love is so faithful and so constant that it will not change, happen what may, then I maintain that chastity displayed on occasions of this sort is not only laudable but miraculous."

"It is no miracle," said Oisille, "for when the heart is devoted, nothing is impossible for the body."

"Yes, for angelic bodies," observed Hircan.

"I do not mean to speak only of those who by God's grace are all transmuted into him," said Oisille, "but also of the most carnal among men; and if you examine, you will find that those who have set their hearts and affections on seeking perfection in the sciences have not only forgotten the delights of the flesh, but even things which are most necessary to nature, such as food and drink. In fact, as long as the soul is in the body by affection, the flesh remains, as it were, insensible. Thence it comes that those who love handsome and virtuous women take such delight in seeing and hearing them speak that the flesh then suspends all its desires. Those who cannot experience this contentment are carnal persons, who, enveloped in too much fat, know not whether they have a soul or not; but when the body is subjected to the spirit, it is almost insensible to the imperfections of the flesh, so that the strong persuasions of persons of this character may render them insensible. I knew a gentleman who, to show that his love for his mistress surpassed any other man's, was willing to give proof of this by holding his bare fingers over the flame of a candle. He had his eyes bent on his mistress at the same moment, and he bore the fire with such fortitude that he burnt himself to the bone; and yet he said that he felt no pain."

* This novel is wanting in the edition of 1558, published by Boaistuau; it appeared for the first time in that of Gruget in 1559. The king who figures in it is Francis I.; and the gentleman whom the king had made provost of Paris is Jean de la Barre, who is mentioned in Novel I.

"Methinks," said Geburon, "that the devil to whom he was a martyr ought to make a St. Lawrence of him, for there are few who endure such a great fire of love as not to fear that of the smallest taper. If a lady had put me to so severe a trial, I should demand a great recompense of her; or, failing it, I should cease to love her."

"You would then insist on having your hour after your mistress has had hers," said Parlamente. "So did a Spanish gentleman of Valencia, whose story was related to me by a very worthy commander."

"Pray take my place, madam, and tell it us," said Dagoucin, "for I suspect it is a good one."

"The story I am going to relate, ladies," said Parlamente, "will make you think twice before you refuse a good offer, and not trust that the present state of things will last for ever. You shall see that it is subject to change; and that will oblige you to have a care for the future."

NOVEL LXIV.

A gentleman, having been unable to marry a person he loves, becomes a Cordelier in despite—Sore distress of his mistress thereat.

THERE was in Valencia a gentleman who for five or six years had loved a lady with so much propriety that the honour and conscience of neither had suffered any blemish. The gentleman's intention was to marry her—an intention the more reasonable as he was handsome, rich, and of good family. Before engaging in the lady's service, he had an explanation with her on the subject of marriage, respecting which she referred him to her relations. They assembled to consider the question, and resolved that the match was a very suitable one, provided the young lady was willing. But she, whether thinking to do better, or willing to dissemble her love for the gentleman, started so many objections that the assembly broke up, regretting that they had not been able to bring the affair to a conclusion, advantageous as it would have been on both sides. The most sorely disappointed of all was the poor lover, who would have borne his rejection with patience if he could have persuaded himself that it was not the maiden's fault, but her relations'. But as the truth was well known to him, his affliction was so extreme that, without speaking to his mistress or anyone, he went home, and, after setting his affairs in order, retired to a deserted spot to try to forget his love, and turn it wholly towards our Lord, to whom he was more bound in gratitude than to his mistress.

During his abode there he heard nothing from the lady or her relations, and resolved, after having missed the happiest life he could have hoped for, to choose the most austere and disagreeable he could imagine. In this dismal state of mind, which might well be called despair, he betook himself, with a view to becoming a monk, to a Franciscan monastery, which was not far from the residence of several of his relations. As soon as they were aware of his purpose, they did all they could to dissuade him from it, but his resolution was so fixed that nothing could shake it. As the cause of the mischief was known to them, they sought a remedy at the hands of her who had given occasion to such a precipitate fit of devotion. She was greatly surprised and distressed at this news; and as her intention had only been to try her lover's fervour by refusing him for a while, and not to lose him for ever, as she saw she was about to do, she wrote him a letter earnestly beseeching him to forego his dismal resolution, and return to her who loved him, and was ready to be wholly his own, as she had always desired to be, even when she affected coyness for the purpose of proving the sincerity of his love, whereof she was now fully convinced.

This letter, conveyed by one of her friends, who was charged to accompany it with all possible remonstrance, was received by the gentleman Cordelier with so sad a countenance, and with so many tears and sighs, that it seemed as though he would fain have drowned and burned the poor paper. His only reply was to tell the bearer that the mortification of his excessive passion had cost him so dear that it had taken from him the wish to love and the fear to die. That being the case, he begged her who was the occasion of it, and who had not chosen to respond to his passion, to torment him no more now that he had overcome it, and to content herself with the harm she had already done him. "I could find no other remedy," he said, "than the austere life I have chosen. Continual penance makes me forget my grief. I so weaken my body by fastings and castigations that the thought of death is for me a sovereign consolation. Let her, then, who sends you to me, spare me, I entreat, the misery of hearing her mentioned, for the mere recollection of her name is to me an intolerable purgatory."

The bearer returned with this unwelcome reply, and reported it to her who had sent him. It was with inconceivable regret she heard it: but love, which will not suffer the spirit to be utterly cast down, put it into her head that if she could see him she would effect more by her eyes and her tongue than she had by her pen. She went then to the monastery, accompanied by her father and her nearest relations. She had omitted nothing that she thought could set off her beauty, in the belief that, if he once saw her and heard her, it was impossible but that a fire so long cherished should kindle up more strongly than ever. She entered the monastery towards the end of vespers, and sent for him to meet her in a chapel of the cloisters. Not knowing who wanted him, he obeyed the summons, and went to encounter the rudest shock he had ever sustained. He was so pale and worn that she could hardly recognize him ; nevertheless, as he seemed to her as comely and as lovable as ever, love constrained her to stretch out her arms, thinking to embrace him ; but she was so touched by the sad state in which he appeared, and the idea of it caused such a sinking at the heart, that she fainted away. The good monk, who was not destitute of brotherly charity, raised her up, and seated her on a bench in the chapel. Though he had not less need of aid than she, he nevertheless affected to ignore her passion, fortifying his heart in the love of his God against the present opportunity, and he succeeded so well that he seemed to be unconscious of what was before his eyes.

Recovering from her weakness, and turning upon him eyes so lovely and so sad that they might have softened a rock, the maiden said everything she could think of as most likely to persuade him to quit that place. To all her arguments and entreaties he made the best replies he could ; but at last, finding that his heart was beginning to yield to his mistress's tears, and seeing that Love, whose cruelty he had long experienced, had in its hand a gilded arrow ready to inflict on him a new and mortal wound, he fled from Love and from his mistress, as his only means of safety. Shut up then, in his cell, and unable to let her depart in that uncertainty, he wrote her a few words in Spanish, which appear to me so expressive that I will not translate them for fear of impairing their grace : *Volved donde veniste anima mi, que en las tristes vidas es la mia. The lady, seeing from this that no hope remained, resolved to follow his advice and that of her friends, and returned home, to lead a life as melancholy as that of her lover in his monastery was austere.

* "Return whence thou camest, my soul, for among the sad lives is mine."

You see, ladies, how the gentleman revenged himself on his rigorous mistress, who, intending only to try him, drove him to such despair that, when she would have relented towards him, it was too late.

"I am sorry he did not throw off the grey gown and marry her," said Nomerfide. "Theirs, I think, would have been a perfectly happy marriage."

"In faith, I think he did very wisely," said Simon-tault; "for all who have well considered the inconveniences of marriage are agreed that there are none greater in the austerities of the monastic life. As he was already weakened by fastings and abstinences, he was afraid to load himself with a burden he would have been obliged to bear all his life long."

"She did wrong, I think, by so weak a man," said Hircan, "to tempt him by a proposal of marriage, since that is a matter in which the most vigorous and robust find themselves hard bestead. But if she had talked to him of an intimacy free from all but voluntary obligation, there was no knot but would have been untied. But since, by way of drawing him out of purgatory, she offered him a hell, I maintain that he was right to refuse, and make her feel the pain which her refusal had caused him."

"Many there are," said Ennasuite, "who, thinking to do better than others, do either worse, or the reverse of what they had expected."

"Truly you put me in mind," said Geburon, "though the fact is not quite to the point, of a woman who did the contrary of what she intended, which was the cause of a great tumult in the church of Saint Jean de Lyon."

"Pray take my place," said Parlamente, "and tell us the story."

"Mine will be neither so long nor so sad as yours," he replied.

NOVEL LXV.

Simplicity of an old woman who presented a lighted candle to Saint Jean de Lyon, and wanted to fasten it on the forehead of a soldier who was sleeping on a tomb—What happened in consequence.

THERE was a very dark chapel in the church of Saint Jean de Lyon, and in front of the chapel a stone tomb, with figures of great personages as large as life, and several men-at-arms represented in sleeping postures round them. A soldier walking one day about the church (it was in the heat of summer) felt inclined to sleep. He cast his eyes on this chapel, and seeing it was dark and cool, he went and lay down among the other recumbent figures on the tomb, and fell asleep. Presently up came a very pious old woman, who, after performing her devotions with a candle in her hand, wanted to fix it to the tomb, and the sleeping man being more within her reach than the other figures, she set about sticking the candle on his forehead, imagining that it was stone ; but the wax would not stick. The good woman, supposing that this was in consequence of the coldness of the image, clapped the lighted end of the candle to its forehead, but the image, which was not insensible, began to roar. The good woman was frightened almost out of her wits, and shrieked out "Miracle, miracle!" so loudly that all the people in church ran, some to the bells, others to the scene of the miracle. She took them to see the image which had stirred, which made many laugh; but certain priests, not contenting themselves with laughing, resolved to turn the tomb to account, and make as much money of it as of the crucifix on their pulpit, which is said to have spoken; but the display of an old woman's silliness put an end to the comedy.*

If everyone knew what are their follies they would not be deemed holy, nor their miracles true. I pray you then, ladies, take care, henceforth, to what saints you give your candles.

"How strange it is," said Hircan, "that be it in what manner it may, women must always do wrong!"

"Is it doing wrong to carry candles to the tomb?" said Nomerfide.

"Yes," replied Hircan, "when the lighted end is put to a man's forehead; for no good deed should be called a good deed when mischief comes of it. The poor woman thought of course she had made a grand present to God in giving Him a paltry candle."

"God does not look to the value of the present," said Oisille, "but to the heart that offers it. Perhaps this poor woman loved God more than those who gave great torches; for, as the gospel says, she gave out of her need."

"I do not believe, however," said Saffredent, "that God, who is supreme wisdom, can look with favour on women's folly. Simplicity is acceptable to Him, it is true ; but the Scriptures inform me that He scorns the ignorant ; and if we are there commanded to be simple as doves, we are also enjoined to be prudent as serpents."

* The end of this novel, and the whole epilogue, were suppressed in the first edition. Gruget restored the epilogue in the second edition, but not the passage relating to the crucifix.

"For my part," said Oisille, "I do not regard as ignorant her who carries before God her lighted candle, as making amende honorable, kneeling on the ground, and candle in hand, to her sovereign Lord, in order to confess her guilt, and pray with lively faith for His grace and salvation."

"Would to God that everyone acquitted herself in this way as well as you," said Dagoucin ; "but I do not believe that poor ignorant women do the thing with this intention."

"Those women who are least capable of expressing themselves well," rejoined Oisille, "are often those who have the most lively sense of the love and the will of God ; consequently, it is not prudent to judge any but oneself."

"It is no wonderful thing to have frightened a sleeping groom," said Ennasuite, laughing, "since women of as mean condition have frightened great princes without setting fire to their foreheads."

"I am sure you know some story of the sort which you wish to tell us," said Dagoucin, "so take my place, if you please."

"The story will not be long," said Ennasuite ; "but if I could recount it to you as it occurred, you would have no mind to cry."

NOVEL LXVI.

Amusing adventure of Monsieur de Vendôme and the Princess of Navarre.

THE year when Monsieur de Vendôme married the Princess of Navarre, the king and queen, their father and mother, after having been regaled at Vendôme, accompanied them into Guienne. They visited the house of a gentleman in which there were several ladies, young and fair, and where the company danced so long that the young married pair, being tired, retired to their chamber, where they threw themselves on the bed in their clothes, the doors and windows being closed, and no one remaining with them. They were wakened from their sleep by the sound of some one opening their door from without. Monsieur de Vendôme drew back the curtain, and looked out to see who it might be, supposing that it was one of his friends who wished to surprise him. But instead of that he saw a tall old chamber-woman, who walked straight up to their bed. It was too dark for her to distinguish their features, but she could see that they were very close together, and cried out, "Ah, thou naughty, shameless wanton ! 'tis long I have suspected thee for what thou art ; but not having proofs to show, I durst not speak of it to my mistress, but now I have seen thy infamy I am resolved to conceal it no longer. And thou, villanous apostate, that hast done this house the scorn to beguile this poor wench, were it not for the fear of God I would beat the life out of thee on the spot. Get up, in the devil's name, get up ! It seems thou art not even ashamed."

Monsieur de Vendôme and the princess, to prolong the scene, hid their faces against each other, and laughed so heartily that they could not speak. The chamber-woman, seeing they did not budge for her rebuke, or show any signs of rising, went to drag them out of bed by the legs and arms ; but then she perceived by their dresses that they were not what she took them for. The moment she recognized their faces she fell on her knees, and implored their pardon for the fault she had committed in disturbing them. Monsieur de Vendôme, wishing to know more of the matter, got up at once, and begged the good woman to tell him for whom she had taken them. At first she would not do so ; but after making him promise on oath that he would never mention it, she told him that the cause of her mistake was a demoiselle belonging to the house, with whom a prothonotary* was in love ; and she had long watched them,

* The office of Apostolic Prothonotary was instituted in the early times of the Romish Church by Pope Clement I. There were originally twelve such officers, and their duty was to write the lives of the saints and the other apostolic records. Gradually their number increased, and their functions diminished in importance, so that in the fifteenth century the title of prothonotary was merely an honorary dignity conferred as a matter of course on doctors of theology of noble family, or otherwise of a certain importance. Brantome says, in the beginning of his 28th Discours on the great captains and illustrious men of France : “Monsieur de l’Escun, brother of M. de Lautrec, was a good captain, but more intrepid and valiant than remarkable for the morality of his conduct. He had been destined for the long robe, and studied for a long time at Pavia in the time of the grand master Chaumont, when Milan was in our peaceable possession. He was called the Prothonotary of Foix, but I think he was what the Spaniard calls un letrado que no tenia muchas letras—that is to say, a literatus who had little acquaintance with letters ; and indeed it was usual in those days with prothonotaries, and even with those of good family, not to have because she was vexed that her mistress put confidence in a man who offered her such an affront. She then retired, and left the prince and princess shut in as she had found them. They laughed long at the adventure; and though they often told the tale, nevertheless they would never name the persons for whom they had been mistaken.

You see, ladies, how the good woman, thinking to do a righteous act, informed these princely strangers of things whereof the domestics of the house had never heard a word.*

“I think,” said Parlamente, “I know where the adventure happened, and the name of the prothonotary. He has already governed many ladies’ houses, and when he cannot win the good graces of the mistress, he never misses one of the demoiselles; with that exception, he is a well-behaved and worthy man.”

“Why do you say with that exception,” said Hircan, “since it is for that very thing that I esteem him a worthy man?”

“I see,” said Parlamente, “that you know the malady and the patient, and that if he needed an apology you would not fail to be his advocate. However, I should not like to trust an intrigue to a man who did not know much learning, but to enjoy themselves, hunt, make love, and generally to cuckold the poor gentlemen who were gone to the wars. There was a song in those days in which a lady says :

‘Passerez vous tousjours par cy (bis)
Prothenotaire sans soucy ?’ ”

* This novel was omitted in the first edition of the Heptameron. It was in 1548 that Antoine de Bourbon, Duke of Vendome, married Jeanne de Navarre, only daughter of Margaret, and mother of Henri IV., King of France.

how to conduct his own without letting it be known even to the chamber-women."

"Do you suppose," said Nomerfide, "that men care whether such things are known or not? Provided they attain their end, that is enough for them. Be assured that if nobody spoke of the matter they would publish it themselves."

"There is no need for men to say all they know," said Hircan, angrily.

"Perhaps," replied Nomerfide, blushing, "they would say nothing to their own advantage."

"To hear you talk," said Simontault, "it seems as though men took pleasure in hearing women spoken ill of, and I am sure you think me one of that sort. For that reason I have a great mind to say some good of them, that I may not be regarded as a slanderer."

"I give you my vote," said Ennasuite, "and pray you to constrain yourself a little in order to do your devoir to our honour."

"It is no new thing, ladies," said Simontault, "to hear of your virtues. In my opinion, when some one of your noble actions presents itself, far from being hidden it ought to be written in letters of gold, to serve as an example to women, and to give men cause for admiration, to see in the weaker sex what weakness recoils from. It is this that prompts me to relate what I heard from Captain Robertval and several of his company."

NOVEL LXVII.

Love and extreme hardships of a woman in a foreign land.

THE king having given the command of a small squadron to Robertval for an expedition he had resolved to make to the island of Candia, that captain intended to settle in the island, in case the air proved good, and to build towns and castles there. Everyone knows what were the beginnings of this project. In order to people the country with Christians, he took with him all sorts of artisans, among whom there was one who was base enough to betray his master, so that he was near falling into the hands of the natives. But it was God's will that the conspiracy should be discovered; and so did no great harm to Captain Robertval, who had the traitor seized, intending to hang him as he deserved. He would have done so but for the wife of this wretch, who, after sharing the perils of the sea with her husband, was willing to follow his bad fortune to the end. She prevailed so far by her tears and supplications, that Robertval, both for the services she had rendered him, and from compassion for her, granted what she asked. This was, that her husband and herself should be left on a little island in the sea, inhabited only by wild beasts, with permission to take with them what was necessary for their subsistence.

The poor creatures, left alone with fierce beasts, had recourse only to God, who had always been the firm hope of the poor wife. As she had no consolation but in her God, she took with her for her preservation, her nurture, and her consolation, the New Testament, which she read incessantly. Moreover, she worked along with her husband at building a small dwelling. When the lions and other wild beasts approached to devour them, the husband with his arquebuse, and the wife with stones, defended themselves so well that not only the beasts durst not approach them, but even they often killed some of them which were good to eat. They subsisted for a long time on such flesh and on herbs after their bread was gone. However, in the long run, the husband could not resist the effects of such diet ; besides, they drank such unwholesome water that he became greatly swollen, and died in a short while, having no other service or consolation than his wife's, who acted as his physician and his confessor ; so that he passed with joy from his desert to the heavenly land. The poor woman buried him in a grave which she made as deep as she could ; the beasts, however, immediately got scent of it, and came to devour the body, but the poor woman, firing from her little dwelling with her arquebuse, hindered her husband's body from having such a burial. Thus living like the beasts as to her body, and like the angels as to her spirit, she passed the time in reading, contemplation, prayers, and orisons, having a cheerful and contented spirit in a body emaciated and half dead.

But He who never forsakes his own in their need, and who displays his power when all seems hopeless, did not suffer that the virtue with which this woman was endowed should be unknown to the world, but that it should be known there for his glory. After some time, one of the vessels of Robertval's fleet passing before the island, those on deck saw a woman, who reminded them of the persons they had put ashore there, and they resolved to go and see in what manner God had disposed of them. The poor woman, on seeing the vessel approach, went down to the sea-beach, where they found her on landing. After thanking God for their arrival, she took them to her poor little hut, and showed them on what she had subsisted during her melancholy abode there. They could never have believed it, had they not known that God can nourish his servants in a desert as at the finest banquets in the world. As she could not remain in such a place, they took her straightway with them to Rochelle; and there, when they had made known to the inhabitants the fidelity and perseverance of this woman, the ladies paid her great honour, and were glad to send their daughters to her to learn to read and write. She maintained herself for the rest of her days by that honourable profession, having no other desire than to exhort everyone to love God and trust in Him, holding forth as an example the great mercy with which He had dealt towards her.

Now, ladies, you cannot say but that I laud the virtues which God has implanted in you—virtues which appear the greater, the weaker the being that displays them.

“We are not sorry,” said Oisille, “that you praise in us the graces of our Lord, for in truth it is from Him that comes all virtue; but neither man nor woman contributes to the work of God. In vain both bestir themselves and strive to do well; they do but plant, and it is God that gives the increase.”

“If you have well read Scripture,” said Saffredent, “you know that St. Paul says that he has planted and Apollos has watered; but he does not speak of women having put their hands to the work of God.”

“You do like those bad men who take a passage of Scripture which makes for them, and pass over that which is contrary to them,” said Parlamente. “If you have read St. Paul from one end to the other, you will find that he commends himself to the ladies who have toiled much with him in the propagation of the Gospel.'

"Be that as it may," said Longarine, "this woman is worthy of great praise, both for her love for her husband, for whom she risked her life, and her confidence in God, who, as you see, did not abandon her."

"As for the first point," said Ennasuite, "I believe there is no wife present who would not do as much to save her husband's life."

"And I believe," said Parlamente, "that there are husbands such mere beasts that it could be no surprise to their wives to find themselves reduced to live among their fellows."

Ennasuite could not help replying, as taking this to have been said on her account, "If beasts did not bite me, their company would be more agreeable to me than that of men, who are irascible and unbearable. But I do not retract my assertion, and I say again, that if my husband was in the like danger, I would not forsake him, though it were to cost me my life."

"Beware," said Nomerfide, "how you love to such a degree that the excess of your love may be mischievous both to you and to him. There is a medium in all things, and for want of a right understanding love is often converted into hatred."

"It seems to me," said Simontault, "that you have not pushed the matter so far without purposing to confirm your principle by some example. Therefore, if you know one let us hear it."

"Well, then, my tale shall be short and gay, as usual," replied Nomerfide.

NOVEL LXVIII.

A woman gives her husband powder of cantharides to make him love her, and goes near to killing him.

THERE was formerly at Pau, in Bearn, an apothecary whose name was Maître Etienne. He had married a good thrifty woman, with such a share of beauty as ought to have contented him ; but as he tasted different drugs, so too he had a mind to taste different women, the better to judge of all. This was so disagreeable to his wife that she lost all patience, for he never noticed her except in Passion week, by way of penance. The apothecary being one day in his shop, and his wife hid behind the door, listening, in came a woman of the place, who was *commère to the apothecary, and was sick of the same complaint as the listener behind the door. "Alas ! compère, my friend," she said to the apothecary, sighing deeply, "I am the most unfortunate woman in the world. I love my husband more than myself. I have not a thought but how to serve and obey him ; but it is all labour in vain, and he loves the worst and nastiest woman in the town better than he does me. If you know any drug that can change his constitution, pray give it me, compère. If it succeeds with me, and I am well treated by my husband, I am sure I will recompense you to the utmost of my power."

* In France, the godfather and godmother of a child are called in reference to each other compere and commere, terms which imply mutual relations of a peculiarly friendly kind. The same usage exists in all Catholic countries. One of the novels in the Decameron is founded on a very general opinion in Italy that an amorous connection between a compadre and his commadre partook almost of the nature of incest.

The apothecary, to comfort her, told her he knew of a marvellous powder, and that if she made her husband take it in his broth or in his roast meat, like duc powder, he would regale her in the best possible manner. The poor woman, wishing to see this miracle, asked him what it was, and if she could not have some of it. He told her she had only to take some powder of cantharides, of which he had good store. Before they parted she made him prepare this powder, and took as much of it as she needed; and subsequently she thanked him for it many times; for her husband, who was strong and vigorous, and who did not take too much of it, found himself none the worse for it, and she all the better.

The apothecary's wife, who had overheard the whole conversation, thought to herself that she had no less need of the recipe than his commère. She marked the place where her husband put away the rest of the powder, and resolved to use it when an occasion should offer. She had not long to wait. Her husband, feeling himself incommoded with a coldness of stomach, begged her to make him some good broth. She told him that a roast with duc powder would do him still more good, and he begged her to make him one forthwith, and to get some cinnamon and some sugar out of the shop. She did so, and did not forget the remainder of the powder which he had given to his commère, without regarding either weight, or dose, or measure. The husband ate the roast, which he found very good, and soon experienced its effect, which he thought to appease with his wife; but it was impossible, for he felt all on fire, so that he did not know on what side to turn. He told his wife she had poisoned him, and insisted on knowing what she had put in the broth. She did not disguise the truth, but told him plainly that she had as much need of that recipe as his commère. The poor apothecary was in such torture that he could not belabour her with anything harder than bad words. He ordered her out of his sight, and sent her to the Queen of Navarre's apothecary to beg he would come and see him, which he did, and administered the remedies suitable to the case. The queen's apothecary set the patient on his legs again in a very little time, and censured him sharply for making another take drugs which he would not willingly take himself; adding, that his wife had done as she ought, seeing the desire she had to make herself loved by him. The poor man was obliged to have patience, and own that God had justly punished him in exposing him to the raillery to which he would have subjected another.

To me it seems, ladies, that this woman's love was not less indiscreet than excessive.

"Do you call it loving her husband," said Hircan, "to make him suffer for the pleasure she expected of him?"

"I imagine," said Longarine, "she had no other intention than to regain her husband's regard, which she thought she had lost. There is nothing women would not do for such a blessing."

"Nevertheless," said Geburon, "in matters of food and drink, a woman ought on no account whatever to give her husband anything of which she is not sure, as as well by her own experience as by that of persons of knowledge, that it can do him no harm; but ignorance must be excused. The woman in question was excusable, for the passion which blinds people most is love, and the person most blinded is the woman who has not the strength to carry such a great burden judiciously."

"Geburon," replied Oisille, "you depart from your own good custom to conform to the sentiments of your companions. Yet there are women who have patiently sustained love and jealousy."

"Ay," said Hircan, "and pleasantly too; for the most sensible are those who take as much pleasure in laughing at their husbands' doings, as the husbands in secretly playing them false. If you will allow me to speak before Madame Oisille closes the day, I will tell you a tale about a husband and a wife who are known to all the company."

"Begin, then," said Nomerfide; and Hircan, laughing, began thus.

NOVEL LXIX.

An Italian suffered himself to be duped by his servant maid, and was caught by his wife bolting meal in place of the girl.

At the château of Odoz, in Bigorre, dwelt one of the king's equerries, named Charles, an Italian. He had married a very good and virtuous lady, who had grown old after bearing him several children. He, too, was not young, and lived on peaceable and friendly terms with his wife. It is true he sometimes talked to his women servants, which his good wife pretended never to observe, but she always dismissed the girls very quietly when she knew that they had forgotten their station in the house. One day she took one who was an honest, good girl, told her what was her husband's humour and her own, and warned her that she would turn off a girl the moment she knew she was not well behaved. The servant, being anxious to remain in her mistress's service and gain her esteem, resolved not to swerve from the path of virtue. Though her master often addressed improper language to her, she never would hearken to him, but told all to her mistress, who laughed with her at her husband's folly.

One day the servant was bolting meal in a back room, with her surcoat over her head after the manner of the country. This surcoat is made like a crèmeau, but it completely covers the back and shoulders. Her master, finding her in that trim, was very pressing with her; and she, who would as soon have died as done what he wished, pretended to consent, and begged he would first let her go and see whether or not her mistress was engaged in any way, so that they might not be surprised by her. He willingly consented to this, and then she begged him to put on her surcoat and continue to bolt during her absence, so that her mistress might not miss the sound of the bolting machine. This he did with glee, in the hope of having what he desired. The servant, who loved a good laugh, ran to her mistress, and said, "Come and see your husband, whom I have taught to bolt, in order to get rid of him." The wife made haste to see this new servant, and found her husband with the surcoat on his head, working away at the bolting machine, and laughed at him so heartily, clapping her hands, that it was as much as she could do to say to him, "How much a month dost thou ask for wages, wench?" The husband, hearing his wife's voice, and seeing that he was duped, threw away the surcoat and the bolting machine, and darted at the servant, whom he called all sorts of bad names. If his wife had not interposed he would have paid her for her courtesy ; however, the storm was at last appeased to the content of all parties, who afterwards lived peaceably together.*

What say you of this wife, ladies? Was she not wise to make sport of her husband's sport?

"It was no sport for the husband to miss his aim," said Saffredent.

"I imagine," said Ennasuite, "that he had more pleasure in laughing with his wife than in half killing himself with his servant at his age."

"I should have been sorely annoyed to have been found with that fine crèmeau over my head," said Simontault.

"I have heard," said Parlamente, "that it was not your wife's fault that she did not catch you pretty nearly in the same trim ; and since that time, they say, she has never known rest."

"Be content with the adventures of your own house," replied Simontault, "without looking after mine. My wife has no cause to complain of me ; but even if I were such as you say, she would not notice it, for she is not at all stinted."

"Women of honour need nothing but the love of their husbands, the only persons who can content them," said Longarine ; "but those who desire a brutal pleasure will never find it where propriety prescribes."

"Do you call it brutal pleasure when a woman wishes to have from her husband what belongs to her?" said Geburon.

* This is the same story as Le Conseilleur au Bluteau, the 18th of the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles.

The wife found her husband, with the surcoat on his head, working away at the bolting machine.

“I maintain,” replied Longarine, “that a chaste wife, who loves truly, finds more contentment in being perfectly loved, than in all the pleasures which the flesh can desire.”

“I am of your opinion,” said Dagoucin ; “but their lordships here will neither hear of it nor confess it. I believe that if mutual love does not content a woman, a husband will content her no more ; for if she does not conform in love to the seemly ways of women, she must be possessed by the infernal lust of the brutes.”

“Truly you remind me,” said Oisille, “of a fair lady who was well married, and who, for want of contenting herself with that seemly love, became more carnal than swine, and more cruel than lions.”

“I pray you, madam, to finish the day by telling us that story,” said Simontault.

“I cannot, for two reasons,” replied Oisille ; “first, because it is long ; and secondly, because it is not of our time. It has been written, however, by an author worthy of credit ; but we are vowed to relate nothing here that has been written.”

“That is true,” observed Parlamente ; “but as I believe I know the tale you mean, I must tell you it is written in such antiquated language that I do not think anyone present, except us two, has heard of it. Therefore it will be as good as new.”

The whole company then besought her to tell the story without troubling herself about its length, for they had still a good hour to spare for vespers. Madame Oisille, therefore, yielded to their entreaties, and began as follows.

NOVEL LXX.

The horrible incontinence and malice of a duchess of Burgundy was the cause of her death, and of that of two persons who fondly loved each other.

THERE was in the duchy of Burgundy a duke who was a very agreeable prince and of very goodly person. He had a wife with whose beauty he was so satisfied that it blinded him to her disposition, and he thought only of pleasing her, whilst she, on her part, made a show of responding only to his affection. This duke had in his household a young gentleman so accomplished in all that can be desired in a man that he was loved by everybody, and especially by the duke, about whose person he had been brought up from childhood, and who, knowing him to possess so many perfections, had the warmest regard for him, and trusted him in all affairs suitable to his years. The duchess, who was not a virtuous woman, not satisfied with her husband's love and the kind treatment she received from him, often cast her eyes on this gentleman, and found him so much to her taste that she loved him beyond measure. She was evermore trying to make this known to him by languishing and tender glances, sighs, and impassioned airs ; but the gentleman, who never studied anything but virtue, knew nought of vice in a lady who had so little excuse for it ; so that the glances, sighs, and impassioned airs of the poor wanton brought her nothing but bitter disappointment. She carried her extravagance so far that, forgetting she was a wife who ought, though solicited, to grant no favour, and a princess who was made to be adored, yet disdain such servants, she resolved to act like a man transported with passion, and to discharge her bosom of a burden that was insupportable.

One day then, when the duke went to council, to which the gentleman was not admitted, being too young, she beckoned to him, and he came, thinking she had some order to give him. Leaning then on his arm, like a woman wearied by too much repose, she walked about with him in a gallery, and said, "I am surprised that, being as you are, young, handsome, and full of engaging qualities, you have been able hitherto to live in continual intercourse with so many fair ladies without loving any of them." And then, with one of her most gracious looks, she paused for his answer.

"Madam," he replied, "if I were worthy that your greatness should descend to think of me, you would have more reason for surprise to see so insignificant a man as I am offer his services only to meet with refusal or mockery."

Upon this discreet reply the duchess loved him more than ever, and vowed that there was not a lady in the court but would be too happy to have a lover of his merit; that he might try, and that she assured him he would succeed without difficulty. The gentleman kept his eyes constantly bent on the ground, not daring to look on the countenance of the duchess, which glowed enough to warm an icicle. Just when he was about to excuse himself, the duke sent for the duchess to come to the council upon an affair in which she was interested. She went with much regret. As for the gentleman, he pretended not to have understood what she said, which vexed and confused her so much that she knew not what to impute it to but the silly fear with which she thought the young man possessed. Seeing, then, that he did not understand her language, she resolved a few days afterwards to overleap fear and shame, and declare her passion to him in plain terms, never doubting but that beauty like hers could not fail to be well received. Nevertheless, she would have been glad to have had the honour to be solicited; but, after all, she preferred pleasure to honour.

After having several times again tried the same means she had first essayed, and always with the same unwelcome result, she plucked him by the sleeve one day, and told him she wanted to speak to him on an affair of importance. With all due respect and humility the gentleman followed her to a window recess, where, finding that she could not be seen from the chamber, she resumed the subject of her past conversation with a trembling voice, indicative alike of desire and fear. She reproached him for not having yet made choice of a lady, and assured him that wherever he fixed his affections she would spare no pains to ensure his success. The gentleman, not less distressed than astonished at such language, replied, "My heart is so tender, madam, that if I were once refused I should never know joy; and I am so well aware of my slender merit that I am sure there is no lady in the court who would accept my services."

The duchess blushed at these words, and imagining that his heart was lost, protested he had only to wish, and she would answer for it that she knew the fairest lady in the court would receive him with extreme joy, and make him consummately happy. "I do not believe, madam," he replied, "that there is any woman in this court so unfortunate and so infatuated as to have made me the object of her predilections."

Seeing that he would not understand her, she proceeded to give him a more direct glimpse of her passion ; and as the gentleman's virtue gave her cause for fear, she spoke by way of interrogation. " If fortune," she said, " had so favoured you that it was myself who was thus well inclined to you, what would you say ?"

The gentleman, who thought he was dreaming to hear her speak thus, dropped on one knee on the ground, and replied, " When God shall do me the grace, madam, to make me possessor of the goodwill of the duke my master, and of yourself, I shall deem myself the happiest of men. It is the sole recompense I crave for my faithful services, bound as I am above all others to sacrifice my life for you both. I am convinced, madam, that the love you have for my lord your spouse is so pure and great, that not even the greatest prince and the most accomplished man in the world, to say nothing of myself, who am but a worm of the earth, could impair the union that subsists between my master and you. As for me, whom he has nurtured from childhood, and made what I am, I would not for my life entertain a thought other than that which becomes a faithful servant as regards either his wife, sister, or mother."

The duchess would not suffer him to proceed, but seeing she was in danger of receiving a shameful refusal, she broke in upon him suddenly, " Wicked and arrogant fool ! who requires any such thing of you ? Because you are good-looking you imagine that the very flies are enamoured of you ; but if you were presumptuous enough to address yourself to me, I would soon let you know that I love, and will love, none but my husband. I have spoken to you as I have done only for my diversion, to sift you, and make you my laughing-stock, as I do all amorous coxcombs."

"I have all along been assured that it was just as you say, madam," replied the gentleman.

She would hear no more, but turned abruptly from him, and to avoid her ladies who followed her into her chamber, she shut herself up in her closet, where she gave way to an indescribable burst of bitter feeling. On the one hand, the love in which she had failed caused her mortal sadness ; and on the other, her despatch against herself for entering upon so injudicious a dialogue, and against the gentleman for having answered so prudently, put her into such a fury that at one moment she wished to kill herself, at the next she would live to be revenged on him she regarded as her deadliest enemy. After a long fit of tears she feigned indisposition, to avoid appearing at the duke's supper, at which the gentleman was usually in attendance. The duke, who loved his wife more than himself, failed not to go and see her ; when, in order to arrive the more easily at her ends, she told him she believed she was pregnant, and that her pregnancy had caused a rheum to fall upon her eyes, which gave her great pain. The duchess kept her bed for two or three hours in so sad and melancholy a mood that the duke suspected there was something else the matter besides pregnancy. He went to sleep with her that night ; but seeing that, in spite of all the caresses he could bestow upon her, she continued to sigh incessantly, he said, "You know, my dear, that I love you as my own life, and that if you die I cannot possibly survive you. If, then, you value my health and life, tell me, I entreat, what makes you sigh thus ; for I cannot believe that pregnancy alone can produce that effect."

The duchess, seeing her husband in the very mood she wished, hastened to turn it to her vengeful purpose. "Alas ! monsieur," she said, embracing him with tears,

“my worst suffering is to see you the dupe of those whose duty it is to preserve your honour and all that is yours.” This made the duke wondrously eager to know what she meant, and he begged her to speak openly, without fear or disguise. “I shall never be surprised,” she said at last, after repeated refusals, “if strangers make war on princes, since those who are most bound to them undertake to wage such a horrible war against them that the loss of domains is nothing in comparison with it. I say this, monsieur, with reference to a gentleman” (here she named her enemy) “whom you have fed, reared, treated more like a relation than a domestic, and who, by way of gratitude, has had the impudence and the baseness to attempt the honour of your wife, on which depends that of your house and your children. Though he long laboured to insinuate to me things that left me no doubt of his black perfidy, yet my heart, which is only for you, and thinks only on you, could not comprehend him; but at last he explained himself, and I replied to him as my rank and my honour required. I hate him, however, so that I cannot bear the sight of him; and this it was, monsieur, which made me keep my room and lose the happiness of your company. I beseech you, monsieur, not to keep such a pestilence near you; for after such a crime, the fear of your being made acquainted with it might very likely induce him to do something worse. You now know, monsieur, the cause of my grief, which seems to me most just and most worthy that you should right it without delay.”

The duke, who on the one hand loved his wife and felt himself outraged, and on the other hand loved the gentleman, of whose fidelity he had often had practical proof, could hardly believe this lie was truth. He withdrew to his chamber in great perplexity and anger, and sent word to the gentleman that he was not to appear any more in his presence, but was to retire to his own home for some time. The gentleman, ignorant of the cause of an order so peremptory and so unexpected, was the more keenly affected by it, as he thought he had deserved the very opposite treatment. Conscious of his innocence in heart and deed, he got one of his comrades to speak to the duke on his behalf, and deliver him a letter, wherein he most humbly entreated that, if he had the misfortune to be removed from his master's presence in consequence of some report to his prejudice, the duke would have the goodness to suspend his judgment until he should have inquired into the truth; and then he durst hope it would be found he had in nowise offended. This letter somewhat appeased the duke; he sent for the gentleman to come secretly to his chamber, and said to him, with great gravity, "I could never have believed that, after having had you nurtured like my own child, I should have cause to repent of having so highly advanced you, forasmuch as you have sought to outrage me in a manner that would have been worse to me than the loss of life and fortune, namely, by attempting the honour of her who is the half of myself, and seeking to cover my house with perpetual infamy. You may believe that I feel this insult so deeply, that if I was quite sure that the fact was true you would by this time be at the bottom of the water, to punish you secretly for the affront you have secretly sought to put upon me."

The gentleman was not dismayed by this speech: on the contrary, he spoke with the confidence of innocence, and besought the duke to have the goodness to tell him who was his accuser, the accusation being one of those which are better discussed with the lance than with the tongue. "Your accuser," replied the duke, "has no other arms than her chastity. It was my wife, and no one else, who told me this, praying me to take vengeance upon you."

Amazed as the poor gentleman was at the prodigious malice of the duchess, he would not accuse her, but contented himself with saying, "My lady may say what she pleases. You know her, monsieur, better than I; and you know if I have seen her elsewhere than in your company, except once only when she spoke to me a very little. Your judgment is as sound as that of any prince in Christendom. Therefore, my liege, I beseech you to consider if you have ever seen anything in me which can have caused you suspicion. It is a fire which it is impossible long to conceal in such wise that those who labour under the same malady shall not have some inkling of it. I beg, my liege, that you will be graciously pleased to believe two things of me: one is, that I am so true to you that, though my lady your spouse were the finest woman in the world, love would not be capable of making me do anything contrary to my honour and my duty; the other is, that even were she not your spouse, she is, of all the women I have ever seen, the one I should be least inclined to love: and there are enough of others on whom I should sooner fix my choice."

The duke's anger was somewhat mitigated by these words. "Well," said he, "I did not believe it; so you may go on as usual with the assurance that if I find that the truth is on your side, I will love you more than ever; but if the contrary appears, your life is in my hand." The gentleman thanked him, and declared his willingness to submit to the severest penalty his master could devise if he were found guilty.

The duchess, seeing the gentleman continue to serve as usual, could not patiently endure it, and said to her husband, "It would be no more than you deserved, monsieur, if you were poisoned, since you have more confidence in your mortal enemies than in your nearest friends."

"Do not make yourself uneasy, my dear," replied the duke; "for if it appears that what you told me is true, I assure you he has not twenty-four hours to live. But as he has protested the contrary to me on oath, and as, besides, I never perceived anything of the sort, I cannot believe it without good proofs."

"Truly, monsieur," she returned, "your goodness makes my malice greater. What greater proof would you have than that a man like him has never had any amour imputed to him. Be assured, monsieur, that but for the vain and presumptuous idea with which he has flattered himself of becoming my servant, he would not be without a mistress at this time of day. Never did a young man live so solitary as he in good company; and the reason can only be that his heart is set so high that his vain hope stands him in stead of everything else. If you believe that he conceals nothing from you, swear him as to his amours. If he tells you that he loves another, why then believe him; I am content you should; but if not, be assured that what I say is true."

The duke approved of his wife's suggestion, and taking the gentleman into the country, said to him, "My wife continues still to speak to me of you to the same purpose, and mentions a circumstance which gives me some suspicion. To be plain with you, it excites surprise that you, a young and gallant man, have never been known to be in love; and this very thing makes me fear that you entertain the sentiments you have been charged with, and that the hope you cherish is so pleasing to you that you cannot think of any other woman. I pray you, then, as a friend, and order you as a master, to tell me truly do you pay your court to any lady in this world?"

The poor gentleman, who would fain have concealed his love as carefully as he would have preserved his life, seeing his master's extreme jealousy, was constrained to swear to him that he loved a lady so beautiful that the beauty of the duchess and of all the ladies of her suite was mean in comparison, not to say ugliness and deformity; at the same time, he besought the duke not to insist on his naming the lady, because the intimacy between him and his mistress was such that it could only be broken by whichever of the two first disclosed it. The duke promised he would never press him on that point, and was so satisfied with him that he behaved more graciously to him than ever. The duchess perceived it, and employed her usual artifices to find out the reason; nor did the duke conceal it from her. Strong jealousy was now added to her thirst of vengeance, and she besought the duke to insist that the gentleman should name his mistress, declaring that if he refused to do so, her husband would be the most credulous prince in the world to put faith in so vague a statement.

The poor prince, who was led by his wife as she pleased, went and walked alone with the gentleman, and told him that he was in still greater embarrassment than ever, being afraid that what he had told him was only an excuse to hinder him from coming at the truth, which made him more uneasy than before; therefore he besought him most earnestly to tell him the name of her he loved so much. The poor gentleman implored the duke not to constrain him to break the promise he had given to a person he loved as his life, and which he had kept inviolate until that moment. It would be tantamount to requiring him to lose in one day what he had preserved for more than seven years, and he would rather die than do that wrong to a person who was so faithful to him. His refusal threw the duke into such a violent fit of jealousy that he exclaimed furiously, "Take your choice: either tell me the name of her you love above all others, or quit my dominions on pain of death if you are found in them after eight days."

If ever faithful servant was smitten with keen anguish it was this poor gentleman, who might well say, Angustiæ sunt mihi undique. On the one hand, if he told the truth he lost his mistress, should it come to her knowledge that he had broken his word to her; on the other, if he did not tell it, he was exiled from the country where she resided, and could never see her more. Thus pressed on all sides, a cold sweat broke out upon him, as if his anguish had brought him to the brink of the grave. The duke perceiving his embarrassment, imagined he loved only the duchess, and that his confusion arose from the fact that he could not name anyone else. In this belief he said to him sternly, "If you had told me the truth, you would have less difficulty in doing what I desire; but I believe that it is your crime that occasions your embarrassment."

The gentleman, stung by these words, and urged by the love he bore his master, resolved to tell him the truth, assuring himself that the duke was a man of so much honour that he would keep his secret inviolate. He fell on his knees then, and said to him, with his hands pressed together, "My liege, the obligations I am under to you, and the love I bear you, constrain me more than the fear of death. You are possessed with so false a prejudice against me that, to undeceive you, I am resolved to tell you what no torments could extort from me. The only favour I ask of you, my liege, is that you will swear on the faith of a prince and a Christian, never to reveal the secret which you force from me." The duke promised him, with all the oaths he could think of, never to tell his secret to anyone, either by word, act, or signs ; and the gentleman, relying on the good faith of a prince whom he knew, put the first hand to his own undoing, saying to him, "It is seven years, my lord, since having known your niece, the Lady du Verger, as a widow and disengaged, I tried to acquire her goodwill. As I was not of birth to marry her, I contented myself with being received by her as a lover, in which I succeeded. Our intercourse has been conducted hitherto with so much prudence that no one has come to the knowledge of it except you, my lord, into whose hands I put my life and honour, entreating you to keep the secret, and to have no less esteem for my lady your niece, than whom I do not think there is under heaven a creature more perfect."

The duke was delighted with this declaration, for knowing the extraordinary beauty of his niece, he doubted not that she was more capable of pleasing him than his wife. But not conceiving it possible that such a mystery should have been carried on without adequate means, he begged to know how her lover managed to see her. The gentleman told him that his mistress's chamber opened on a garden, and that on the days when he was to visit her a little gate was left open, through which he entered on foot, and advanced until he heard the barking of a little dog, which the lady let loose in the garden after her women had all retired ; that then he went to her, and conversed with her all night, and on his departure appointed the day when he was to come again, in which he had never failed, except for indispensible reasons. The duke, who was the most curious of men, and who had been very gallant in his time, begged him, as well to dissipate his suspicions as for the pleasure of hearing so singular an adventure recounted, to take him with him, not as a master, but as a companion, the next time he went thither. The gentleman, having gone so far, assented, and told him his assignation was for that very day. The duke was as glad of this as if he had won a kingdom, and feigning to retire to his garderobe to rest, had two horses brought, one for the gentleman and the other for himself, and they travelled all night from Argilly, where the duke resided, to Le Verger, where they left their horses at the entrance of the park.

The gentleman made the duke enter through the little gate, and begged him to place himself behind a large walnut tree, whence he might see if what he had told him was true or not. They had not been long in the garden before the little dog began to bark, and the gentleman walked towards the tower, whilst the lady advanced to meet him. She saluted him with an embrace, and told him it seemed a thousand years since she had seen him. Then they entered the chamber, the door of which they locked. The duke having seen the whole of this mystery, felt more satisfied; nor had he time to grow weary, for the gentleman told the lady that he was obliged to leave her sooner than usual, because the duke was going to the chase at four o'clock, and he durst not fail to attend him. The lady, who preferred honour to pleasure, did not attempt to hinder him from doing his duty; for what she prized most in their honourable intimacy was that it was a secret for all mankind.

The gentleman quitted the house at one o'clock in the morning, and his lady, in mantle and kerchief, escorted him not so far as she wished, for he made her go back for fear she should meet the duke, with whom he mounted again and returned to the château of Argilly. On the way, the duke never ceased protesting to the gentleman that he would rather die than ever divulge his secret ; and his confidence in him was so confirmed that no one at court stood higher in favour. The duchess was enraged at this. The duke forbade her ever to mention the subject any more to him, saying that he knew the truth, and was satisfied, for the lady whom the gentleman loved was handsomer than herself. These words so stung the heart of the duchess that they threw her into an illness worse than fever. The duke tried to console her, but nothing would do unless he would tell her who was that fair lady who was so devotedly loved. So much did she importune him, that at last he quitted the chamber, saying to her, "If you speak to me any more of these things, we will part." This made her still more ill, and she pretended to feel her infant move ; whereat the duke was so rejoiced that he went to bed to her ; but when she saw that his passion for her was at the height, she turned from him, saying, "Since you love neither wife nor child, monsieur, I entreat you let both die." These words she accompanied with so many tears and cries, that the duke was greatly afraid she would miscarry ; wherefore, taking her in his arms, he entreated her to tell him what she wanted, protesting he had nothing that was not at her command. "Ah ! monsieur," she replied, sobbing and crying, "what hope can I have that you would do a difficult thing for me, since you will not do the easiest and most reasonable thing in the world, which is to tell me the name of the mistress of the worst servant you ever had ? I thought that you and I had but one heart, one soul, and one flesh, but I see that you regard me as a stranger, since you conceal your secrets from me as if I was an alien. You have confided to me many important secrets, and have never known that I divulged a tittle of them. You have had such proof that I have no will but yours, that you ought not to doubt but that I am more you than myself. If you have sworn never to tell any one the gentleman's secret, you do not violate your oath in telling it to me, for I neither am nor can be other than yourself. I have you in my heart ; I hold you between my arms ; I have a child in my womb in whom you live ; yet I cannot have your love as you have mine. The more faithful I am to you, the more cruel and austere you are to me. This makes me long a thousand times for the day when a sudden death may deliver your child from such a father, and me from such a spouse. I hope it will soon come, since you prefer a faithless servant to your wife, to the mother of a child which is your own, and which is on the point of perishing because you will not tell me what I have the greatest longing to know."

So saying, she embraced and kissed her husband, watering his face with her tears, and sobbing and crying so violently that the poor prince, fearing he should lose both mother and child, resolved to tell her the truth ; but he swore that if ever she mentioned it to any one in the world she should die by no hand but his own. She accepted the condition ; and then the poor abused duke told her all he had seen from beginning to end. She pretended to be satisfied, but in her heart it was quite otherwise. However, as she was afraid of the duke, she dissembled her passion as well as she could.

The duke, holding his court on a great feast day, had called to it all the ladies of the country, his niece among the rest. After the banquet the dances began, and every one did his devoir ; but the duchess was too much vexed by the sight of her niece's beauty and grace to enjoy herself, or hide her spleen. Making all the ladies sit down, she turned the conversation on love ; but seeing that Madame du Verger said not a word, she said to her, with a heart rankling with jealousy, "And you, fair niece, is it possible that your beauty is without a lover?"

"Madam," replied the Lady du Verger, "my beauty has not yet produced that effect ; for since my husband's death I have had no lovers but his children ; nor do I desire any others."

"Fair niece, fair niece," rejoined the duchess, with execrable spite, "there is no love so secret as not to be known, nor any little dog so well trained as not to be heard to bark."

I leave you to imagine the anguish of poor Madame du Verger at finding that an affair she had thought so secret was published to her shame. The thought of her honour, so carefully guarded, and so unhappily lost, was torture to her ; but the worst was her fear that her lover had broken his word to her, which she did not believe he could ever have done unless he loved some fairer lady, and in doting fondness had suffered her to extort the secret from him. However, she had so much self-command that she did not let her emotion be seen, but laughingly replied that she did not understand the language of brutes. But her heart was so wrung with grief that she rose, and, passing through the duchess's chamber, entered a garderobe in sight of the duke, who was walking about. Thinking herself alone, she threw herself on a bed. A demoiselle, who had sat down beside it to sleep, roused herself and peeped through the curtains to see who it might be, and perceiving it was the duke's niece, who thought herself alone, she durst not speak, but remained as still as possible to listen, whilst the poor lady in a dying voice thus began her lamentation :

“ Alas ! what have I heard ! What words of death have smitten my ears ! O thou who was loved as man was never loved before, is this the reward of my chaste and virtuous love ? O my heart ! hast thou made so dangerous a choice, and attached thyself to the most faithless, artful, and mischievous-tongued of all men, mistaking him for the most faithful, upright, and secret ? Is it possible, alas ! that a thing hidden from all the world has been revealed to the duchess ? My little dog, so well trained, sole agent of my long and virtuous friendship, it was not you that betrayed my secret : it was a man, with a voice more piercing than a dog’s, and a heart more ungrateful than any beast’s. It was he who, contrary to his oath and his word, divulged the happy life we long led without injuring anyone. O my friend ! for whom alone my heart cherished love, a love wherewith my life has been preserved, has the beauty of the duchess metamorphosed you, as that of Circe did her lovers ? Has she turned you from virtue to vice, from good to bad, from a man into a savage beast ? O my friend ! though you have broken your word to me, I will keep mine, and never see you more after having revealed our intimacy. But as I cannot live without seeing you, I willingly yield to the excess of my sorrow, and will never seek any remedy for it either from reason or from medicine. Death alone shall end it, and that death will be more welcome to me than to remain in the world without my lover, without honour, and without contentment. Neither war nor death has taken my lover from me ; my sins and transgressions have not deprived me of honour ; nor has my bad conduct bereft me of happiness.

It is cruel fortune that has made an ingrate of the most favoured of all men, and has brought upon me the contrary of what I deserved. O duchess, how delighted you were to make that jeering allusion to my little dog ! Revel in a bliss that belongs to me alone. Laugh at her who thought to escape derision whilst loving virtuously and concealing it with care. How that word wrung my heart ! How it made me red with shame and pale with jealousy ! Heart, heart, I feel thou art undone. Ill-requited love burns thee, jealousy and grief turn thee to ice, and forbid thee all consolation. Through having too much adored the creature, my soul has forgotten the Creator. It must return to Him from whom a vain love detached it. Be assured, my soul, thou wilt find a Father more tender than the friend for whom thou hast often forgotten Him. O God, my creator, who art the true and perfect love, by whose grace the love I have borne my friend has been sullied by no vice, save that of loving too much, be pleased to receive in the greatness of Thy mercy the soul and spirit of her who repents of having broken Thy first and righteous command. Through the merits of Him whose love is incomprehensible, forgive the fault which excess of love made me commit, for my trust is in Thee alone. Farewell, my friend, whose unworthiness of that name breaks my heart." So saying she fell backwards, her face ghastly, her lips blue, and her extremities cold.

At the same moment the gentleman she loved entered the reception-room, where the duchess was dancing with the other ladies. He looked round for his mistress, and not seeing her, went into the duchess's chamber, where he found the duke, who, guessing his purpose, whispered him that she was gone into the garde-robe, and appeared to be unwell. The gentleman asked for leave to follow her, and the duke not only granted it, but urged him to do so. Entering the garderobe then, he found her at the last gasp; and, throwing his arms around her, he said, "What is this, my love? Do you want to quit me?" Roused by the well-known voice, the poor lady opened her eyes to look upon him who was the cause of her death; but that look so increased her love and anguish, that with a piteous sigh she gave up the ghost.

The gentleman, more dead than alive, asked the demoiselle how the lady's illness had begun, and she told him all she had heard. He then knew that the duke had revealed his secret. His grief was so intense that, embracing the body of his mistress, he wept over it long in silence, and at last exclaimed, "Traitor, villain, wretch that I am! Why has not the penalty for my treachery fallen on me, and not on her who was innocent? Why did not Heaven's lightning blast me the day my tongue revealed our secret and virtuous love? Why did not the earth open to swallow up a wretch who violated his faith? May my tongue be punished as was that of the wicked rich man in hell! O heart, that too much feared death and exile, may eagles tear thee perpetually as they did that of Ixion!* Alas, my dear friend! in thinking to hold you fast, I have lost you. I thought to possess you long alive, with virtue and pleasure, and I embrace you dead, and you have been dissatisfied to your last gasp with me, my heart, and my tongue. O most faithful of women! I denounce myself as the most inconstant, faithless, and perfidious of men. I would I could complain of the duke, whose word I trusted, hoping by that means to prolong our agreeable life; but ought I not to have known that no one could keep my secret better than myself? The duke was more justifiable in telling his secret to his wife than I in telling mine to him. I am the only guilty one, the only one who deserves to be punished for the greatest crime ever committed between friends. I ought to have suffered him to throw me into the river as he threatened. You at least, dear one, would then be alive, and I should have closed my life with the glory of having observed the rule prescribed by true friendship; but having broken it, I live still, and you are dead for having perfectly loved. Your pure heart could not know the baseness of mine, and live. O my God, why didst thou create me with a love so frivolous and a heart so ignorant? Why was I not the little dog that faithfully served its mistress? Alas! my little friend, I used to feel joy at the sound of your barking; but that joy is turned into sorrow, for having been the cause of another besides us two hearing your voice. Yet, sweetheart, neither love of the duchess nor of any other woman ever made me vary, though the wicked duchess has often solicited me to love her; but ignorance has undone me, for I thought by what I did to insure our intimacy for ever. But that ignorance does not make me the less guilty. I have revealed my mistress's secret, I have broken my word, and therefore it is that she is dead before me. Alas, sweetheart, will death be less cruel to me than to you, who have died only for having loved? Methinks death would not deign to touch my faithless and miserable heart. The loss of honour, and the memory of her I have lost through my fault, are more insupportable to me than ten thousand deaths. If anyone had cut short your days through mischance or malice, I should use my sword to avenge you. It is not reasonable, then, that I should pardon that murderer, who has caused your death by a deed more vile than if he had killed you with a sword. If I knew a more odious executioner than myself, I would entreat him to do justice upon your perfidious lover. O love! I have offended thee from not having known how to love; and therefore thou wilt not succour me as thou hast succoured her who perfectly kept all thy laws. Nor is it just that I should make such a glorious end: it must be by my own hand. I have washed your face with my tears; I have implored your pardon; and it now only remains that my arm make my body like yours, and send my soul whither yours is gone, in the assurance that a virtuous and honorable love ends neither in this word nor in the next."

* The poor gentleman had but a confused knowledge of Greek fable, or grief had muddled his recollection of it.

Starting up then, like a frantic man, from the corpse, he drew his poniard, and stabbed himself to the heart; and then, clasping his mistress in his arms for the second time, he kissed her so fondly that he seemed more like a blissful lover than a dead man. The demoiselle seeing the deed, ran to the door and screamed for help. The duke, suspecting the disaster of those he loved, was the first to enter the garderobe, and on seeing that sad couple, he tried to separate them, in order to save the gentleman if it were possible; but he held his mistress so fast that it was impossible to tear him from her until he had expired. Nevertheless, hearing the duke exclaim, "My God! who has been the cause of this?" "My tongue and yours, monsieur," he replied, with a look of fury. So saying he breathed his last, with his face laid on that of his mistress.

The duke, wishing to know more of the matter, constrained the demoiselle to tell him all she had seen and heard, which she did from beginning to end, without forgetting anything. The duke then, knowing that he was the cause of the whole mischief, threw himself on the bodies of the two lovers, and with cries and tears implored their pardon. He kissed them repeatedly ; and then rising furiously, he drew the poniard out of the gentleman's body. As a wild boar wounded by a spear runs impetuously at him who struck the blow, so ran the duke at her who had wounded him to the soul. He found her still dancing in the reception-room, and gayer than usual, because she thought she had so well revenged herself on the Lady du Verger. Her husband seized her in the midst of the dance, and said, " You took the secret upon your life, and upon your life shall fall the forfeiture." So saying he grasped her by her head dress, and buried the poniard in her bosom.

The astonished company thought the duke was out of his senses ; but he had done the deed advisedly ; and assembling all his servants on the spot, he recounted to them the glorious and melancholy story of his niece, and the wicked conduct of his wife : a narrative which drew tears from all his hearers. The duke then ordered that his wife should be buried in an abbey which he founded, partly with a view to atone for the sin he had committed in killing his wife ; and then he had a magnificent tomb erected, in which the remains of his niece and of the gentleman were laid side by side, with an epitaph setting forth their tragic history. The duke made an expedition against the Turks, in which God so favoured him that he achieved glory and profit. Finding on his return that his eldest son was of age to govern, he became a monk, and retired to the abbey in which his wife and the two lovers were buried, and there he passed his old age happily with God.*

* " It is probable that the Queen of Navarre has contented herself with turning into prose an old fabliau entitled La Chatelaine

This, ladies, is the story you begged me to relate, and which, your eyes tell me, you have not heard without compassion. It seems to me an example from which you should profit, so as to beware of fixing your affections on men. However honourable and virtuous be that affection, it always ends badly. You see even that St. Paul would not have married people love to such excess; for the more one is attached to earthly the more one is detached from heavenly things; and the more honourable and virtuous love is, the harder it is to break its bonds. This constrains me to beg, ladies, that you will continually pray to God for His Holy Spirit, which will so inflame your hearts with the love of God that at the hour of death it will not be hard for you to quit the things of the world, for which you have too much attachment.

"The love of the two persons being so virtuous as you represent it," said Hircan, "what need was there to make a secret of it?"

de Vergy, which is found in the fourth volume of the Recueil de Barbasan, and in Legrand d'Aussy's third volume. Margaret has hardly concealed the fact that she borrowed this novel, since she says in the prologue that it was written in such old language that none of the company could understand it except herself and Madame Oisille. The story of the Chatelaine de Vergy has also been told by Bandello (Part IV., Novel V.), and after him by Belleforest, in his Histoires Tragiques. It might be supposed that Margaret merely borrowed from Bandello, for it is he who lays the scene in Burgundy, at the period when that province was ruled by a duke. It is to be remarked, however, that at the end of the last epilogue of the seventh day Margaret says that the company talked at supper of nothing but Madame du Verger, an evident alteration of La Chatelaine de Vergy, the name given to the heroine in the fabliau, whilst Bandello calls her quite differently. Moreover, the Italian writer terminates the tragic story in a different manner."—Bibliothèques Françaises.

“Because,” said Parlamente, “men are so depraved that they can never believe that love and virtue go hand in hand. They judge of the virtue of men and women according to their own passions, and consequently, if a woman has a dear friend other than one of her near relations, it is necessary for her to converse with him in secret if she would converse with him long. Whether a woman loves virtuously or viciously, her honour is alike doubted, because men judge only from appearances.”

“But,” said Geburon, “when the secret gets vent, the woman is so much the worse thought of.”

“That is true, I confess,” said Longarine; “and therefore the best course is not to love at all.”

“We appeal from that sentence,” said Dagoucin; “for if we believed that the ladies were without love, we would rather be without life. I speak of those who live only to win love; and even if it does not come to them, the hope of it supports them, and makes them do a thousand honourable things, until old age changes that fair passion into other pains. But if we thought that the ladies did not love, instead of following the profession of arms we should have to turn merchants, and instead of winning glory, to think only of amassing wealth.”

“You mean to say, then,” said Hircan, “that if there were no ladies we should be all caitiffs, as if we had no spirit but what they inspire us with. I am of the contrary opinion; and I assert that nothing is more lowering to the spirit of a man than devoting himself too much to the society of women, and loving them to excess. It was for that very reason that the Hebrews prohibited a man from going to war the year he was married, lest the love of his wife should make him recoil from the dangers he ought to seek.”

"I do not think there was much sense in that law," said Saffredent, "for there is nothing that makes a man readier to leave home than being married, the reason being that no war without is more intolerable than that within. I am convinced that to give men a taste for going into foreign parts, and not loitering by their own firesides, nothing more need be done than to marry them."

"It is true," said Ennasuite, "that marriage exonerates them from care for the house; for that they commit to their wives, and think only of acquiring glory, relying on it that their wives will attend sufficiently to their interest."

"Be it how it may," said Saffredent, "I am very happy that you are of my opinion."

"But," observed Parlamente, "you do not discuss the most remarkable point—namely, why the gentleman who was the cause of all the mischief did not die of grief as promptly as his mistress, who was innocent."

"That was because women love better than men," said Nomerfide.

"Rather," replied Simontault, "because the jealousy of women and the violence of their passion make them give up the ghost without knowing why, whilst men, with more prudence, desire to be informed of the truth. Once they have ascertained it, their good sense makes them show the greatness of their spirit. Thus it was with the gentleman, who, as soon as he knew that he was the cause of his mistress's death, manifested the greatness of his love for her at the cost of his life."

"Nevertheless," said Ennasuite, "the fidelity of her love was the cause of her death; for her heart was so constant and so true, that she could not bear to be so villanously deceived."

"Her jealousy hindered her reason from acting," returned Simontault ; “and as she believed the evil of which her lover was not guilty, her death was not voluntary, for she could not help dying ; but her lover owned he had done wrong, and died voluntarily.”

“Be it as you please,” said Nomerfide ; “but at all events the love must be great that causes such mortal sorrow.”

“Don’t be afraid,” said Hircan ; “you will not die of such a fever.”

“No more than you will kill yourself on being conscious of having done wrong,” she retorted.

Parlamente, who did not know but that the dispute was at her expense, said, laughing, “It is enough that two died for love, without two others fighting for the same cause. There is the last vesper-bell to separate you, whether you like or not.”

At these words the company rose to hear vespers. They did not forget in their prayers the souls of the true lovers, for whom the monks willingly said a De Profundis. During supper nothing was talked of but Madame du Verger. After amusing themselves a little together they retired to their respective chambers, and so ended the seventh day.

EIGHTH DAY.

THE morning being come, they inquired how their bridge was getting on, and found that it might be completed in two or three days. This was not welcome news for some of the company, who would have been glad if the work had lasted longer, in order to protract the pleasure they enjoyed from so agreeable a mode of life. Seeing, then, that they had not more than two or three days left, they resolved to employ them well, and begged Madame Oisille to give them spiritual provender as was her wont. This she did, but detained them longer than usual, because she wished to finish the chronicle of St John ; and so well did she acquit herself of the task, that it seemed that the Holy Spirit, full of love and sweetness, spoke by her mouth. Warmed by that sacred fire they went to hear high mass. After dinner they talked of the past day, and doubted if the present one would be so well filled. They retired to their several chambers for reflection, until it was time to go to the meeting place, where they found the monks already stationed. When they were all seated, the question was asked who should begin. "As you have done me the honour," said Saffredent, "to make me begin two days, methinks it would be unjust to the ladies if any of them did not also begin two."

"In that case," said Oisille, "we must either remain here a long while, or one of us ladies, or one of you gentlemen, would have to go without his or her day."

"For my part," said Dagoucin, "had I been chosen, I would have ceded my place to Saffredent."

“ And I mine to Parlamente,” said Nomerfide ; “ for I am so accustomed to serve that I know not how to command.”

The company agreed to this, and Parlamente began thus : “ Such good and wise tales have been told on the past days, ladies, that I should recommend our employing this one in relating the greatest follies we can think of, the same being really true. To set you going, then, I will begin in that way.”

NOVEL LXXI.

A woman at the point of death flew into such a violent passion at seeing her husband kiss her servant that she recovered.

THERE was at Amboise a saddler named Brimbau-dier, who worked for the Queen of Navarre. It was enough to see the man's red nose to be assured that he was more a servant to Bacchus than to Diana. He had married a worthy woman, with whom he was very well satisfied, and who managed his children and his household with great discretion. One day he was told that his good wife was very ill, at which he was greatly afflicted. He went home with speed, and found her so far gone that she had more need of a confessor than of a doctor, whereat he made the most doleful lamentations that ever were heard ; but to report them properly one ought to speak thick like him ; but it would be better still to paint one's face. After he had rendered her all the good offices he could, she asked for the cross, which was brought her. The good man, seeing this, threw himself on a bed howling and crying, and ejaculating, with his thick tongue, "O Lord, I am losing my poor wife. Was there ever such a misfortune? What shall I do?" and so forth. At last, there being no one in the room but a young servant, rather a good-looking girl, he called her to him in a faint voice, and said, "I am dying, my dear, and worse than if I was dead all out, to see your mistress dying. I know not what to say or do, only that I look for help to you, and beg you to take care of my house and my children. Take the keys that hang at my side; do everything in the house for the best, for I am not in a condition to attend to such things."

The poor girl pitied and tried to comfort him, begging him not to be so cast down, lest besides losing her mistress she should lose her good master also. "It can't be, my dear," said he, "for I am dying. See how cold my face is; put your cheeks to mine to warm them." As she did so he put his hand on her bosom, whereat she offered to make some difficulty, but he begged her not to be alarmed, for they must by all means see each other more closely. Thereupon he laid hold of her, and threw her on the bed. His wife, who was left alone with the cross and the holy water, and who had not spoken for two days, began to cry out, as well as her feeble voice enabled her, "Ah! ah! ah! I am not dead yet!" And threatening them with her hand, she repeated, "Wicked wretches, I am not dead yet!"

The husband and the servant jumped up instantly, but the sick woman was so enraged with them that her anger consumed the catarrhal humour that hindered her from speaking, so that she poured out upon them all the abuse she could think of. From that moment she began to mend ; but her husband had often to endure her reproaches for the little love he had shown for her.*

You see, ladies, how hypocritical men are, and how little is needed to console them for the loss of their wives.

“How do you know,” said Hircan, “but he had heard it was the best remedy for his wife’s case? Not being able to cure her by his care and kind offices, he wished to try if the contrary would not produce the desired effect. The experiment was a happy one ; and I am astonished that, being a woman as you are, you have so frankly portrayed the spirit of your sex, who do for spite what they cannot be brought to do by kindness.”

“Unquestionably, such provocation as that,” said Longarine, “would make me rise not only from my bed but from my grave.”

“What harm did he do her in consoling himself, since he thought she was dead?” said Saffredent. “Do we not know that marriage binds only as long as life lasts, and that death gives a man back his liberty?”

“Death releases a man from the obligation of his oath,” said Oisille ; “but a good heart never thinks itself dispensed from the obligation of loving. It was making great haste to console himself not to be able to wait until his wife had expired.”

“What seems strangest to me,” said Nomerfide, “is that having death and the cross before his eyes, those two objects were not capable of hindering him from offending God.”

“That is a fine idea,” said Simontault. “So, then,

* This novel has been imitated by Noel du Fail de la Hérissaye in his Contes d'Eutrapel, ch. v.

you would not be shocked at a naughty thing, providing it were done out of sight of the church and the cemetery?"

"Make game of me as much as you will," replied Nomerfide, "but by your leave I maintain that the contemplation of death is enough to chill the heart, however young and fiery it may be."

"I should think as you do," said Dagoucin, "had I not heard to the contrary from a princess."

"That is as much as to say that she told you some tale to that effect," said Parlamente. "Such being the case, let us hear it."

Dagoucin began thus.

NOVEL LXXII.

Continual repentance of a nun who had lost her virginity without violence and without love.

IN one of the best towns of France after Paris there was a hospital richly endowed—that is to say, with a prioress and fifteen or sixteen nuns, and a prior with seven or eight monks, who lived opposite in another building. The latter performed service every day, and the nuns contented themselves with saying their pater-nosters and the hours of Our Lady, because they had enough to do in attending the sick. One day there died a poor man, about whom all the nuns were assembled. After administering all the remedies for his bodily health, they sent for one of their monks to confess him. Then, seeing that he was sinking, they gave him extreme unction, and shortly afterwards he lost his speech. But as he was a long time dying, and it was thought he could still hear, each of the nuns busied herself in saying to him the best things she could. This continued so long that at last they grew tired, and, as it was night and late, they went to bed one after the other. One of the youngest alone remained to lay out the body, with a monk of whom she stood in more awe than of the prior or any other, on account of his great austerity both in life and in conversation. After these two had shouted three hours loud and long into the poor man's ear, they were sure he had breathed his last, and they laid him out.

Whilst performing this last act of charity, the monk began to talk of the wretchedness of life and the blessedness of death ; and half the night was spent in this pious discourse. The poor girl listened with great attention, and gazed at him with tears in her eyes. This gave him so much pleasure that, whilst speaking of the life to come, he began to embrace her as if he would fain have carried her in his arms straightway to Paradise ; she listening to him always with the same rapt spirit, and not venturing to gainsay one whom she believed to be the most devout man in the convent. The wicked monk seeing this, and talking always of God, accomplished the work which the devil had suddenly put in their hearts (for previously there had been no question of this), assuring her that a secret sin met with impunity before God ; that two persons who have no ties cannot sin in that way, provided no scandal comes of it, and to avoid any she was to be careful not to confess to anyone but himself.

They separated at last, and as she passed through a chapel dedicated to Our Lady, she wished to offer her orison as usual ; but when she came to utter the words Virgin Mary, she recollected that she had lost her virginity without violence and without love, but through a stupid fear, and she burst into such a violent fit of tears that it seemed as if her heart would break. The monk, who heard her sobs from a distance, suspected her conversion, and was afraid he should not again enjoy the same pleasure. To prevent that untoward contingency, he went up to her as she lay prostrate before the image, reproved her sharply, and told her if her conscience reproached her at all, she might confess to him and not repeat the act if she did not think proper, for she was free either to do it or not without sin. The silly nun, thinking to expiate her sin, confessed to the monk, and all the penance he imposed on her was to swear that it was no sin in her to love, and that some holy water would be sufficient to wash out so trifling a peccadillo.

She believed him rather than God, and relapsed some time after. Finally she became pregnant, and her remorse was so great that she entreated the prioress to have that monk expelled, for she knew he was so crafty that he would not fail to seduce her. The prioress and the prior, who agreed together, treated her with contempt, and told her she was big enough to defend herself against a man, and that he of whom she spoke was a most excellent man. Urged at last by her remorse, she earnestly implored their leave to go to Rome, where she believed she should recover her virginity by confessing her sin at the Pope's feet. The prior and the prioress very willingly granted her request, liking better she should be a pilgrim contrary to the rule of her order than cloistered with the scruples she had. Fearing, too, lest in a fit of despair she should reveal the sort of life that was led there, they gave her money for her journey.

Now God so ordered it that the nun arrived in Lyon at the time when the Duchess of Alençon, who was afterwards Queen of Navarre, was secretly performing a no-vaine in the church of St. John with some of her women. One evening after vespers, when that princess was kneeling before the crucifix, she heard some one going up the steps, and perceiving by the light of the lamp that it was a nun, the duchess withdrew to the corner of the altar to hear her devotions. The nun, thinking herself alone, knelt down, and, beating her breast, began to weep most piteously, crying constantly, "Alas, my God ! have pity on this poor sinner !" The duchess, wishing to know what was the matter, went up to her, and said, "What is the matter, my dear ? Whence come you, and who brought you here ?"

The poor nun, who did not know her, replied, "Alas, my dear ! my misfortune is so great that I have recourse only to God, whom I beseech, with all my heart, to enable me to speak to Madame d'Alençon, for I can relate my misfortune to no one but her, being assured that if there be a remedy for it she will not fail to find it."

"My dear," said the duchess, "you may speak to me as you would to her, for I am a very great friend of hers."

"Pardon me," said the nun ; "none but herself shall ever know my secret."

The duchess then told her she might speak out, for she had found the person she wanted. The poor woman then fell at her feet, and after many tears and cries related her whole story. The duchess consoled her so well that, without weakening her repentance, she sent her back to the priory with letters to the bishop of the place, ordering him to have that scandalous monk expelled.

I had this story from the duchess herself, and you may see from it that Nomerfide's recipe is not good for all sorts of people, since this pair, who were touching and laying out a dead body, were not the more chaste for all that.*

"Here was an invention," said Hircan, "of which I do not suppose anyone ever availed himself before : to talk of death and perform the actions of life."

"Sinning is not an action of life," observed Oisille, "for we know that sin produces death."

"Rely upon it," said Saffredent, "those poor people did not think of that point of theology. But as Lot's daughter made their father drunk in hopes of perpetuating the human race, so these good people wished to repair what death had spoiled, and to make a new body to replace that which death had taken away. So I see no harm in the matter except the tears of the poor nun, who wept without ceasing, and always returned to the cause of her tears."

"I have known many like her," said Hircan, "weeping for the sin, and at the same time laughing over the pleasure."

"I believe I know the persons to whom you allude," said Parlamente. "They have laughed long enough, methinks, to begin to cry."

"Say no more," said Hircan ; "the tragedy which began with laughter is not yet ended."

"To change the subject, then," rejoined Parlamente, "it strikes me that Dagoucin has not complied with the rule we laid down, which was to tell only laughable tales, whereas his is too piteous."

"You said," replied Dagoucin, "that we should relate only follies, and it seems to me I have not been unsuccessful in that way. But that we may hear a more agreeable one, I give my voice to Nomerfide, hoping that she will repair my fault."

* This novel is wanting in the first edition of the Heptameron.

“I have a tale ready,” said Nomerfide, “which is worthy to follow yours, for it is about a monk and a dead body. Hearken, then, if you please.”*

* “Here end the tales and novels of the late Queen of Navarre, which is all that can be recovered of them.”—Edition of 1559, by Gruget.

THE END.

1101032

The Heptameron

47171589

PQ

1631

.H3

E5

V5

HERMES TRISMEGISTUS

Liber Hermetis

Translated by

Robert Zoller

Edited by

Robert Hand

Project Hindsight

Latin Track

Volume II

The Golden Hind Press

The following is a translation by Robert Zoller of Liber Hermetis Trismegisti, from Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, (Neue Folge) 12, 1936. "Neue astrologisches texte des Hermes Trismegistos" von Wilhelm Gundel.

Table of Contents

Introduction to Liber Hermetis by Robert Hand	iii
Some Probable Latin-Greek Word Connections	vii
Remotus	vii
Ingressus	vii
Specto, Aspecto and Inspecto	vii
Condicio	viii
Obsessus, Obsessiones	viii
Introduction by Robert Zoller	ix
Here begins the book of Hermes Trismegistus	1
I. On the 36 decans of the 12 signs and Their Forms and on the Climates and Faces Which Each of the Planets have in the Same Signs	1
II. On the Masculine and Feminine Degrees of the Signs. . .	12
III. On the Bright Stars In Each Sign	13
Γ . On the Necessary Place	20
V. Concerning the First Dangerous Year.	23
VI. Concerning the Dangerous Year	24
VII. Concerning the Knowledge of the Danger: In What Time or Year It Happens	26
III. Concerning the Month in Which the Native Will Die. .	26
IX. On the Day of Death	27
X. On Finding the Revolution of the Hour	28
XI. On the Revolution of the Month	28
XII. On the Useful and Non-useful Days	30
XIII. On the Nutations of the Moon	34
XI . On the 12 Places	37
XV. On the Climacteric Years	37
XVI Concerning the Consideration of the Figure	52
XVII. On Marriage	61
XVIII. Judgement of Marriage	65
XIX. On the Parents	66

XX. On Foreign-born Parents.	69
XXI. Likewise Concerning the Parents From the Conjunctions and Preventions and From these Figures.	71
XXII. Concerning Which of the Parents Dies First	74
XXIII. Exposition of the Five Planets to whom are allotted the Greater Years.	75
XXIV. On the Four Quarters of the Figure, How You are Able to Know the Four Ages in Nativities through Them . . .	76

Introduction to Liber Hermetis

by

Robert Hand

The Liber Hermetis is among the most significant works that we expect to produce from Project Hindsight, for it contains some of the oldest surviving material on horoscopic astrology. See Robert Zoller's introduction for a clear and lucid account of the dating and origins of the Liber Hermetis. There is little that I can add to it. However, in this introduction I wish to lay out some of the difficulties that this work presents and also the splendid opportunity that it points to.

The basic difficulty that Robert Zoller and your editor have had in dealing with this work is that it is a Latin translation from a Greek source. Zoller's introduction discusses the matter of what kind of Latin was used and what that tells us about the age of the translation. But one of the main difficulties with this work is that it seems to have been translated by someone for whom Greek, or at least Greek astrological terminology, was more familiar than Latin. Technical Greek astrological terms were routinely translated very literally into Latin, often using words which anyone familiar with ordinary Latin, Medieval or Classical, would read quite differently from the way which the translator intended.

There is one particularly humorous example of this. In the second decan of Sagittarius occurs the following:

"... habens faciem investigatoris corpus vero hominis."

The literal and obvious translation of this passage is "... having the face of an investigator and the body of a man." Is an FBI agent's face not human?

We had to work backward from the literal roots of the Latin 'investigator.' It /pomes from a root meaning 'to track', a root that also appears in the English word 'vestige.' This led us to the possibility that we were dealing with an animal of some kind, especially since many of the decanic images have animal faces. An early thought was that we might be dealing with something like a bloodhound. However, continuing to work backward we realized that the Greek root that we sought, corresponding to 'vestigia,' was 'ichnos.' Scanning the Greek lexicon, just above 'ichnos' was the word 'ichneumon' or 'tracker.' This is an Egyptian weasel that eats crocodile eggs. This seems to be the sought for animal.

That is typical of the translation difficulty, the translation of Greek astrological words literally into Latin. Now this is not so different from our method of translation, but we have explanatory footnotes giving the logic of our translation and the original language where necessary. Ancient writers did not do this. We have had some assistance in this from the editor's notes by Gundel, but more work needs to be done.

Fundamentally the problem is this. We will not know exactly what many passages in the Liber Hermetis mean until we have found very close corresponding usages of words in Greek. We have already begun to do this, but the process is not complete. Therefore, this translation is, more than most of our works, a preliminary translation. This should not be regarded as a reflection on our translator. Robert Zoller has done an admirable job of slogging through some nearly impenetrable Latin and making it as clear as possible given what we know at this time. In particular we should like to warn the reader that chapters IV - XII, mostly quite short, suffer from this difficulty.

Both Robert Zoller and myself have made hypotheses about the meanings of passages that we may have to revise in the future. If the English seems unclear at times, so was the Latin. However, most of these passages correspond to other works in Greek. We expect at some date in the near future to revise these passages so that they make better sense. Remember, this is an ongoing translation project.

However, having said this, is there any point in you, the reader, trying to make any sense out of this work as it is now. The answer is most certainly yes. This book, as Zoller points out in his introduction, gives every evidence of being a compilation of essays and short works from a variety of sources. The various chapters stand alone as short works on some aspect of ancient astrology. Many of these are quite clear and anyone reading them can derive useful information. Other passages which are less clear, are unclear only because they discuss techniques with which we are unfamiliar. For example, the chapters use several kinds of profections, and while many modern astrologers have some familiarity with profections, the complexity of the usage of these in the Liber Hermetis is quite beyond anything that we are accustomed to. Return charts (revolutions) are also extensively exploited and in ways with which many of us are not familiar. Siderealists of the Fagan-Allen school will no doubt note something like an lunar returns. We also see Sun-Moon phase returns clearly described (see chapter XI).

And of course, among the most interesting items in the entire book, and also probably some of the oldest, are the descriptions of the decans and their images. Decanic images are found throughout the history of astrology, all the way up into the Renaissance. Some later image systems have been derived from Hindu sources, but the Liber Hermetis may contain the oldest system. After all, the use of decanic star images was one of the major inventions and features of Egyptian astrology. One would expect the oldest version of it to come from an Egyptian source. Images such as these associated with the decans, others elsewhere with the signs, lunar mansions and even the planets were once very prominent parts of the astrological tradition. The concept has enjoyed something of a rebirth with the Sabian Symbols and other modern degree symbol systems. Such images enable us to bypass the logical, rational intellect and its reliance on verbalizations and get directly to the heart of symbolism. The discovery of ancient image systems could be a major part of the rediscovery of our tradition.

In Part II of this translation the reader will also see some of the most extensive material available to us from anywhere in the ancient literature about the meanings of individual degrees and fixed stars. So bear with us. We believe that the difficulties of this text are more than outweighed by the new discoveries that await the careful reader.

The Liber Hermetis, as a collection of materials from various sources, also shows us a wonderful and very real potentiality. Pingree in his article on the Liber Hermetis in his text of the *Yavanjataka*¹, seems at great pains to suggest that the Liber Hermetis is much later than dates assigned to it by others. He does so by citing works later in date than the proposed date of the Liber Hermetis that contain nearly identical passages. For some reason he assumes that the Liber Hermetis was derived from them rather than the other way around, but this is not important for the point that I want to make here. It is in fact true that passages in Vettius Valens especially parallel very closely ones in the Liber Hermetis. The parallel passages in the Liber Hermetis, Valens and others may allow us to reconstruct the complete meanings of these passages. In these works there are frequent references to a master text of ancient astrology from which all of these were derived, usually attributed to Nechepso-Petosiris. Gundel thought that the Liber Hermetis might be this work. This is questionable, but from all of these works we may be able to come very close to reconstructing the content of this master text. We do not pretend that there is no variation among the ancient Hellenistic astrologers, but there is much more agreement than one might have expected. The good news and bad news are the same. The contents of this "master textbook," should we be able to reconstruct it (or possibly even construct it as an integrated unit for the first time), will be very different from the astrology of Claudius Ptolemy.

¹ See page xiv, note 2, for complete citation of the Pingree work.

Ptolemy's reputation in the ancient world caused his writings to eclipse those of other authors. This fact has been commented on by many observers. The result of this is that his peculiar subset of ancient astrology became something of a standard for all subsequent authors to follow. I say "something of a standard" because in fact Ptolemy's astrology is not workable as a practical astrology. Therefore later authors had to fill in the gaps with whatever traditions they were familiar with and then use Ptolemy as a reference point to determine whether or not these other techniques should be used. It could be argued that Ptolemy's prestige caused as much of ancient astrology to be lost as anything the Christians and Moslems did later on. This becomes especially significant when we see the astrologers of the Renaissance purging astrology of what they saw as "Arabic" inventions which were actually Greek or Egyptian. This led to the very incomplete tradition that we have today.

Ptolemy may or may not have been a practicing astrologer. But it is clear that the Tetrabiblos was not intended as a practical textbook. The Tetrabiblos in reality appears to have been a centerpiece in Ptolemy's complete system of Natural Philosophy and its chief point seems to have been to show how Ptolemy's physical system, largely Aristotelian, worked at the level of astrology, as it worked in optics, geography, harmonics, and planetary motions, all of which Ptolemy wrote about. The Tetrabiblos was probably written to make a point quite other than the one of demonstrating how astrology should be done. Yet it became a yardstick for evaluating all later astrological technique. We may now be in the position of being able to undo the damage that Ptolemy unintentionally may have done, and to restore the knowledge of ancient astrology, a foundation on which we may build the new astrology. While we are at it, we can also appreciate what Ptolemy really did accomplish once we stop regarding him as the paradigm of astrology.

Remotus — The literal Latin meaning of the word is 'remote.' However, parallel passages in Vettius Valens strongly suggest that, as it used in this text, it is equivalent to 'apostrophē. This is the word that we have translated: as 'averse to', and 'averted' in Paulus. It means that two planets 'have no aspect or other familiarity with each other. This non-relationship consists of inconjuncts - (that is,; quincunxes and semisextiles) between planets in signs that are not hearing and obeying, not like engirding, and not antiscia or contra-antiscia. /The contexts of 'remotus' in the Liber Hermetis strongly suggest that this equation is correct. Originally we were not sure and translated 'remotus' as 'remote.' However, research in parallel passages in Vettius Valens showed that every occurrence of 'remotus' in our text was paralleled by 'apostrophe' in Valens. Therefore we have changed all occurrences of 'remote' to 'averse to' or 'averted to.'

Ingressus — This word has been consistantly translated as 'transit.' It looks like 'ingress,' but it seems to have the broader meaning of the modern word 'transit.' 'Ingressus' appears to be a translation of the Greek 'epembasis,' which Neugebauer seems to feel refers to the changing of chronocratorships, or planetary period rulerships, not transits. He refers to passages in Vettius Valens that, as of this writing, we have not had a chance to refer to. However, where the word occurs in Ptolemy, chiefly in Book Γ of the Tetrabiblos, it clearly means 'transit.' The several contexts of the word in this book also suggest 'transit,' except possibly the one passage concerning the chart in Chapter XII. On the Useful and Non-useful Days.

Specto, Aspecto and Inspecto — These are all words meaning aspect. The question is whether the translator from the Greek is or is not using them to reflect the same distinctions that appear in the Greek texts concerning theōreō, epitheōreō and aktinobolēō (see our editions of Paulus and Antiochus). It appears that aspecto and specto are used interchangeably. What is not clear is whether inspecto also simply means aspect in general. To help the reader judge we have noted all occurrences of the word 'inspecto' and its various forms in the text. Robert Zoller believes that the words are being used interchangeably. Your editor is not so sure, nor is he convinced as yet of the other opinion.

Conditio — This has been translated consistently as 'sect.'

Obsessus, Obsessiones — These words have been translated as 'obsessed' and 'obession.' Several contexts suggest that this term is equivalent to our 'besieged.' However, Robert Zoller's work in medieval astrology suggests that the equivalency might not be exact. Therefore, Zoller has chosen not to use 'besieged.' We have footnoted every occurrence of these words in the text to alert you so that you can make up your own mind on this issue.

All of the notes to this translation are those of the translator, Robert Zoller, except for those initialed '[RH]' which are by myself.

Introduction

by
Robert Zoller

Modern Western astrology is the product of the late 19th century's rescension of the art. The astrology re-introduced to the west at that time was a considerably watered down version of the art adapted to what was then believed to be the exigencies of the contemporary education and economics. The astrology practiced in the 17th century (prior to the great hiatus) was a more demanding science. This 17th century astrology, (Renaissance astrology) differs primarily from Medieval astrology in its more highly evolved mathematics and its dependence upon Greek sources (especially Ptolemy, who became available in the west in the original greek only after the mid-15th century). Medieval Western (Latin) astrology was almost entirely dependent upon translations into Latin from Arabic (a few, notably the works of Abraham ibn Ezra, were translated from Hebrew into Latin via Old French). The astrology of the Liber Hermetis deals with a still older astrological tradition, Hellenistic Astrology¹. In Hellenistic Astrology

¹ I am calling this tradition Hellenistic rather than Greek Astrology because appellations such as Greek, Arabic, Latin, etc, refer to the language in which the astrological documents are found, not the ethnic origin of the writers. Just as Arabic astrological works were written by Christian, Jews, and Moslems, and by Persians, Greeks, Arabs and Turks, so Greek astrological works were written by Greeks, Greek-Egyptians, Syrians, etc. Moreover, there is a tendency to hear the word "Greek" as relating to the Golden Age of Greece. It conjures up images of Solon, Plato, Aristotle and others who have relatively little to do directly with the astrological tradition. Likewise, references to the Babylonians, Egyptians and other "ancients" found in Hellenistic astrological works, such as Ptolemy's Tetrabiblos usually refer to the Hellenistic peoples referred to by those names. Recognition of this will avoid many confusing misconceptions. I find it convenient for our study to define the Hellenistic Period as dating from the death of Alexander the Great (332 B.C.E.) to the death of Mohammed (632 C.E.). This is a good deal longer than is often the case. I feel that the entire period, from the astrological point of view has more in common than not. The Roman conquest of Egypt in the 1st century did not abolish, but rather was absorbed by Hellenism. The rise of Christianity did not alter the Roman hold on the Mideast nor end the Hellenistic Greek culture. Only the rise of Islam produced a revolutionary change both in Middle Eastern politics and culture of

we are very near the fountainhead of the astrological tradition as we know it.

The Arabs received judicial astrology as part of the spoils of Hellenism when they established the Caliphate in the 7th century. From the end of the 7th century for the next several hundred years, (while they developed into a High Culture and the west slipped into a holy barbarism) they assimilated and elaborated the Greek scientific inheritance of late antiquity. In the process they made of themselves the most scientifically advanced culture of the day excelling in mathematics, medicine, astronomy, alchemy, philosophy and astrology.

This excellence was due to the fact that despite the destruction of the Alexandrine library, much of the learned world of the Middle East that came under Moslem control in the 7th century remained intact and the new rulers found themselves surrounded by the very learned Byzantines, equally learned Persians, mathematically advanced Indians, the philosophically minded Alexandrian Egyptians and the scientifically sophisticated Syrians. From all these cultures flowed scientific and occult knowledge of which the arabs freely availed themselves despite the fact that they were at war with most of the aforementioned peoples most of the time.

The early caliphs valued the ancient learning and were enabled as well as inclined to synthesize and assimilate the sciences of their predecessors in a way the Latin West was not able to do (nor had any desire to do following the Germanic migrations of the 3rd to 7th centuries).

Under Hellenism late antiquity was developing, due to contemporary philosophical influences, a highly philosophical, mathematical and rigorous astrology which fused the scientific and logical teachings of Aristotle with the universalist, theist tendencies of Neoplatonism, and Stoicism. To these mainstream pagan philosophical influences were added, from about 150 B.C.E. on, namely, the heady wine of Gnosticism and, in particular, of religio-scientific Hermeticism. All these factors contributed to the development of Arabic astrology on which foundation the edifice of Medieval western astrology was raised in the 12th century.

Just as Gnosticism (and early Christianity) was to some degree a religious free-for-all with no standard dogma and no complete significance to astrology.

agreement upon the rituals necessary for salvation, so the astrological field in the Hellenistic Period was characterized by many teachers, many brilliant insights and techniques and plenty of differing opinions. It was as inevitable that an effort at standardization should be made in connection with the astrological field as it was in the theological field. The difference was that, while it took only two and half centuries for Church to separate the Christian lambs from the Gnostic, non-trinitarian and otherwise heretical goats; the same process in the astrological field (that is, the de-paganization and theification of astrology, i.e., the production of a vaguely religious universalism) seems to have taken approximately 600 years (100-700). The idolatrous, pagan astrology of the late antique period became acceptable to Islam (and later barely palatable to Christianity) only through the intermediate step of a philosophical astrology produced prior to Islam in the early christian centuries.

Ptolemy's Tetrabiblos must be seen as a part of this process. Nowhere in Ptolemy, Dorotheus, Manilius, Paulus Alexandrinus or Firmicus do we see more than a tip of the hat to pagan religion. While these authors were pagans themselves, they wrote for the most part as philosophers and were subsequently referred to as such by their later Arabic editors. Between the universalizing influence of Hellenistic philosophy, (especially in the 3rd to 6th Centuries), the depredations of Christian mobs driven by dogma (such as the one that killed Hypatia in the 4th century) and the revision of texts by the Arabic astrologers of the 8th to 10th centuries, all truly religious references were deleted from the astrological literature. The only exception to this seems to have been in Harran where the Hermetic cult survived until almost 1100 C.E. Even there, however, the pervasive Neoplatonic philosophy (which was cultivated as contemporary science by Jews, Christians, Pagans and Moslems alike) ultimately transformed the old religion into theurgy and systems of secret society initiations.

The Hermetic Tradition, like the Gnostic cults, was a serious contender for spiritual hegemony in the late antique period, especially among the learned. What is Hermeticism, who or what was Hermes, and what is its place in the history of western astrology?

Hermeticism was an early pagan Gnostic movement originating in the Hellenistic Middle East and clearly having Greek, Phoenician-Chaldaean, and ancient Egyptian origins. As a gnostic doctrine it was a path of Knowledge (as opposed to Faith) in which the adherent hoped to gain wisdom, knowledge of God and immortality via his own efforts and by virtue of an innate divinity within him. Unlike Valentinian Gnosticism, Hermeticism had, for instance among its Sabian practitioners, an elaborate astrological ceremonial replete with songs, prostrations, orations, readings to the planets and sacrifices. As the Hermetic book entitled Asclepius makes clear, the Hermetic Tradition was a self-confessedly and enthusiastically magical and idolatrous tradition. It claimed to have derived from ancient Egyptian origins in the cult of Thoth.

Among the Egyptians at a very early date Thoth was a Moon God. He was still so worshipped by the Harranian Sabians as late as the end of the 10th century. This fact seems pertinent considering the central role given to the Moon and its nodes ("the Head and Tail of the Dragon") in the Liber Hermetis. His chief seat was at Shmun (called Hermopolis by the later Greeks). His animal totems were the ibis and the baboon. He was also a god of wisdom. In the theology of Heliopolis he becomes the Scribe of the Gods. In the Memphite theology (c 3400 B.C.E.?) he is called The Tongue of Ptah and is the earliest God of the Word we know of. It is very tempting to see in him an antecedent for the later Hebrew and Canaanite god Yahweh who is also regarded as a god of the Word. Already c 2400 B.C.E. he is represented as a god of Magic, the spoken Word, (the words of power, i.e., enchantment), he is resorted to by Isis to help reassemble the body of the god Osiris (her husband) after his dismemberment by Set. In the Pyramid texts he also maintains his role as psychopomp. It is Thoth who, like the Greek Hermes, leads the souls of the dead into the presence of the Gods. He is seen in numerous representations before Ra in the act of judging the heart of the dead prior to assigning it its place in the underworld. He was the Lord of Maat (Truth), the Measurer, the Enumerator of the Earth, the Measurer of the Earth (Geometer), Self Created and the Judge of the Two Gods (Horus and Set). His name shows up in a number of Pharaoh's names, Thutmose, for instance.

The Greeks (apparently from Plato's day) identified Hermes and Thoth. The Greek God Hermes was considered the son of the sky god Zeus and Maia, the daughter of Atlas, and was later identified by the Romans as Mercury. By both the Greeks and the Romans he was considered equivalent to the Egyptian God Thoth or Theuth (Tehuti). The Hermes of the Hermetic Tradition bore the title "Thrice Greatest." This has been explained in a number of ways:

1. The triplication of the word "greatest" is a way of expressing superlative wisdom. The Egyptian language lacked true comparison of adjectives.

2. The author of the Hermetic texts was the third Hermes: The first being equivalent to the Old Testament prophet Enoch, the second being his grandson and the third a priest in Hellenistic Egypt.

3. Hermes was identified with Hermes Trismegistus by Herodotus in his Histories (5th century B.C.E.)¹. Plato, in two passages², mentions an Egyptian God or divine man who was supposed to be the inventor of many things: arithmetic, algebra, geometry, astronomy, draughts, dicing, but especially of writing and the alphabet. Cicero equates Hermes (the fifth Hermes he knows of) the slayer of Argus, with Theuth the Egyptian god, in his De Natura Deorum, iii, 56.

4. It has been suggested that the title, "Thrice Greatest" is a spiritual honorific denoting the achieving of the "third birth." The first is the birth from the mother common to all humans; the second is the initiation into manhood or consecration to the priesthood (paralleled in Hinduism by the receipt of the Brahman's cord); the third is the spiritual birth (conferred by illumination resulting from knowledge of the Daemon). These three stages are analogous to the three degrees of initiation in the mysteries: Katharsis (Purification), Myesis (Communion), Epopteia (Direct/Indirect Experience of the God).

Hermes was, according to tradition, the author of from 42 (according to Clement of Alexandria) to 36,525 books³ (according to Iamblichus). Clement tells us that 36 of the 42 dealt with the philosophy of the Egyptians and that the remaining six dealt with medicine.

The Corpus Hermeticum (which contains the extant philosophical Hermetic writings and which was for centuries considered to be the remnant of the Books of the Egyptians, older than or as old as the Mosaic Pentateuch) consists of 19 treatises mostly in Greek (one being in Latin) plus numerous fragments collected by Stobaeus (5th century) and excerpts from various patristic and classical authors.

¹ according to Eliade's Encyclopedia of Religions, p 287.

² Philebus 18B; Phaedrus 27 AC.

³ Note number! 365.25 = the number of days in the Solar Year.

It is now accepted that these philosophical writings in their present form date from 313-330 C.E. There is little doubt that they were written by a Hellenistic Egyptian, probably in Alexandria. While there are resemblances to both Judaism and Christianity to be found in these texts, such resemblances are superficial and are accounted for by other means than Jewish or Christian authorship (once believed). The works are heathen. There is a question as to how much of ancient Egyptian religion they represent.

In addition to the philosophical Corpus Hermeticum, there exists an extensive literature of Practical Hermetica consisting of alchemical, magical and astrological texts attributed to Hermes Trismegistos which academic scholars have, until recently, scrupulously avoided dealing with. Our text, the Liber Hermetis is generally regarded as one of these texts. David Pingree, who gives the Liber Hermetis a quite late date¹, says the following of the Hermetic astrological corpus:

"Of course, parts of the Hermetic astrological corpus must be dated to the early 2nd century B.C., as a papyrus of A.D. 138 (CCAG 8, 4;95) indicates that Nechepso and Petosiris 'established' their teachings upon Hermes' . . . but the corpus must have been constantly added to until the end of the middle ages²."

He goes on to connect the Hermetic tradition to Babylonian omen texts and cuneiform sources. Later³ he suggests the Persian Magian tribe of priests (Magusæans) who settled in Syria and Asia Minor under the Achæmenids (550-330 B.C.E.) as sharing responsibility with Berossus and his followers and the Egyptians responsible for the works of Hermes and Nechepso-Petosiris for introducing Mesopotamian celestial omens into Hellenistic civilization¹.

¹ See below.

² Cf. The Yavanajataka of Sphujidhvaja, ed. & trans. & commentary by David Pingree, Cambridge: Harvard U. Press, 1978, Vol. II, p. 430. Many thanks to Rob Hand for bringing this tome to my attention.

³ p. 445, op. cit.

The Hermetic Astrology was seen by its practitioners as a way of achieving knowledge of the Divine². Astrology was seen as a practical scientific correlative of theology³. To understand this one must realize that in Late Antiquity the idea of the Divine was already other worldly. During the period between Alexander of Aphrodisias (c 200 B.C.E.) and Proclus (6th century C.E.) there was a great syncretism of philosophies as well as of religions. Eastern influences combined with Neoplatonic dualism which held that matter could not possibly reflect ideal perfection accurately. Thus, supernal, philosophical Truth was not to be found in sensible things, but, following Plato's exhortations, philosophers should look to the mathematical and intelligible realities which lay behind appearances. For the Stoics, for instance, this meant the Law of Reason manifesting as Fate. Astrology could be seen as leading to a knowledge of the Divine, not because the things it predicted were lofty (indeed, the behaviors depicted in the Liber Hermetis are often of the basest sort) but because it was felt that behind even the grossest and most hideous appearances Reason, Law and Order (kosmos) was to be found.

¹ This roster of Hellenistic Chaldaeans, Egyptians, Greeks, and Syrians (or Assyrians) is precisely the team responsible for the creation of astrology as we know it. The only group he left out of his account is the Neoplatonists who seem to have been the philosophers mentioned by the Syrian Iamblichus as playing a role in the invention of our astrology.

² In Firmicus Maternus' Mathesis, Book VII. Chapter 1, the person to whom the book is addressed, Mavortius, is exhorted to swear an oath to keep its contents secret. Firmicus' exhortation cites the Orphic mysteries, the practice of secrecy by the Pythagoreans and "our Porphyry" as precedents for enjoining secrecy on "religious matters". Mavortius is permitted to divulge this "teaching of divinity" to those who are of "pure splendor of mind" (i.e., "enlightened" or "illuminated"), of uncorrupted soul, and of "unquestionable loyalty." Robert Schmidt points out that astrotheology is explicit in Plato's Epinomis and the first chapter of Ptolemy's Almagest asserts that one reason for studying the stars is to become like them [i.e., divine].

³ Cf. Mathesis, Book I, chapter 6, where it is asserted that astrology encourages divine worship. The planets are asserted to be the "goads" which produce "all we experience," yet through laws and Reason we may moderate "the vices of the body." Moreover chapter 4 teaches that the heavens were divine.

Knowledge of the Reasons (logoi) led to the kind of superior knowledge to which the philosopher (be he Neoplatonist or Hermetic) aspired. From a knowledge of such Reasons or Laws a philosophic induction (described in the Hermetic Pymander as the result of meditation) led to knowledge of the One, God, the Mind of the Sovereignty, etc.

It seems from Iamblichus (died c 333 C.E.)¹, who professes to know what went on in the Hellenistic Egyptian Temples, that the practical astrological Hermetica and the Philosophical Corpus were considered to be intimately related. It is also clear from what he says that philosophers (undoubtedly Neoplatonists) had their hands in the production of both the astrological material and the philosophical Corpus. He says the following:

"For the books which are circulated under the name of Hermes contain Hermaic opinions, though they frequently employ the language of the philosophers: for they were translated from the Egyptian tongue by men who were not unskilled in philosophy. But Chæremon, and any others who have at all discussed the first causes of material natures, have unfolded the last rulers of these. And such as have written concerning the planets, the zodiac, the decans, horoscopes, and what are called powerful and leading planets, these have unfolded the particular distributions of the rulers. The particulars, also, contained in the Calendars, comprehend a certain very small part of the Hermaic arrangements. And the causes of such things as pertain to the phases or occultations of the stars or to the increments and decrements of the moon, are assigned by the Egyptians the last of all."

From this quote we also learn something about the contents of the Hermetic astrological corpus so far as Iamblichus knows (or cares to say).

There is still debate as to which of the books which survive comprise the Hermetic Astrological Corpus. Different scholars give different lists¹. The Liber Hermetis Trismegisti is thought to be one of these Hermetic astrological texts². Since the entire field of Hellenistic Astrology and Alchemy have received so little attention over the centuries, and since the number of scholars working in the field are so few, the business of unravelling which works of what authors contain fragments of surviving Hermetic astrological literature is far from complete and each generation's scholars contradict those of the immediately preceding generation³.

¹ On the Mysteries of the Egyptians, Chaldeans and Assyrians, trans. Thomas Taylor, London: Stuart and Watkins 1968, Section VIII, chapter 4, pp. 304-305.

Over the centuries astrological authorities plagiarized each other freely and, due to the enormous prestige of the name Hermes Trismegistus, his name was often cited even when the contents of a given work might not have included truly Hermetic material. Often the text was plagiarized without mention of the name Hermes. The name "Hermetic" eventually comes to identify the tradition of astrology itself and not the author of the contents of the book bearing this appellation. Such is the case with the Liber Hermetis. Much of its contents are drawn from other sources which themselves contained Hermetic material. Thus, Pingree finds large sections of the Liber Hermetis drawn from Rhetorius, Valens and Firmicus. Yet he himself suggests that the material which looks like it comes from Firmicus may come from a source common to Firmicus and the Liber Hermetis (presumably from a book by Hermes?). Comparison of Firmicus' Mathesis with the Liber Hermetis supports this latter view.

¹ See, for instance, Mashallah's opinion below.

² Gundel clearly thought so and Thorndike, in History of Magic and Experimental Science, Vol.11, talks of the Hermetic texts pp 220-221. He lists the Liber Hermetis, a book of 15 stars, 15 stones, 15 herbs, 15 images to be engraved upon the stones (ascribed sometimes to Hermes, sometimes to Enoch. Centiloquium hermetis also mentioned. Liber de revolutionibus nativitatum, The Golden Bough, The Book of the Latitude and Longitude, On Elections, Canons of the Planets, The Six Principles of Things, The Book of the Moon (images of the 28 mansions of moon. The Book of Venus (also ascribed to Toz Graecus).

³ It is in this light that the heroic efforts of David Pingree must be seen. Indefatigable and immensely erudite though he be, his works and decisions cannot be seen as the final word on this extremely challenging question. His contributions are great but he is only one man attempting to unravel a knot centuries in the making. Furthermore, as an American historian of science, his interest in the material is quite different from that of the French Catholic scholar Festugière or the German Wilhelm Gundel, both of whom were classicists.

Hermes is cited as a source in numerous Hellenistic astrological works in Latin and in Greek. For instance, Hermes Trismegistus is cited by Paulus Alexandrinus in connection with "crises" in his book, *Introductory Matters*¹. It is tempting to see this reference as somehow related to Chapter XV of the Liber Hermetis "on Climacteric Years." Firmicus also cites Hermes, Hanubis, Asclepius, Petosiris and Nechepso as the source for the Thema Mundi in Book III, section 1 of Mathesis.

The Hermetic astrological writings were edited and re-edited. In the course of time most of the originals were either lost or survived only as unrecognized fragments in the works of others. Firmicus cites "Most Powerful Mercury," Hanubis, Asclepius, Petosiris and Nechepso again in the Proem of Book Γ of Mathesis, along with Abram, Orfeus and Critodemus². He says the following:

"We have written down in these books all the things which Mercury and Hanubis handed down to Aesculapius; which Petosiris and Nechepso explained and Critodemus wrote, and all the others knowledgeable in this art. We have collected and edited these theories, compared different opinions, and now present them all to the Romans."

Many of the authors on whose work the Arabic astrological corpus was founded in the 8th through 10th centuries (Al-Battani, Iaphar³, Ahaydimon⁴, Albumasar⁵, Messahalla⁶, Almetus⁷, Alfraganus⁸,

¹ Introductory Matters, by Paulus Alexandrinus translated by Robert Schmidt, with Introduction and notes by Robert Hand, The Golden Hind Press, Berkeley Springs: 1993, p.78. This work also preserves all that survives of the Panaretus of Hermes.

² See p. 118 of Bram's translation of Firmicus' Mathesis, Noyes Press, 1975. Pingree did not overlook this quote. He just ignores it.

³ This the early 10th century astrologer Ahmet abu Ja'far who Richard Lemay believes wrote The Liber Fructus or Book of Fruit or Centiloquium.

⁴ Lemay tells us (in Abu Ma'shar and Latin Aristotelianism in the 12th Century, American University of Beirut, Publications of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences. Oriental Series, no. 38.) that Abu Ma'shar frequently cites Hermes Ahaydimon (John of Spain's translation) or Hermes post Abidemon (Hermann of Carinthia's translation) as one of his sources.

⁵ The famous Persian astrologer Abu Ma'shar (full name: Abu Ma'shar Ja'far ibn Muhammad ibn 'Umar al-Balkhi) (b. 787. d.886 CE) is an example of Hermetic influence on Arabic astrology. His works (written in Arabic) represent a curious fusion of Sabian Hermeticism, Persian chronology, Islam, Greek Science and Mesopotamian astrology. He was instrumental in fostering the identification of the Antediluvian Prophet Idris with Enoch and Hermes. He was an extremely successful practitioner of the Art who travelled throughout the Mid East in service to numerous Indian, Persian, Arab, and Egyptian chiefs of state. His reputation was established in the Christian West by Peter of Abano in the 13th century in his Conciliator Differentiarum Philosophorum et Precipue Medicorum (Diff. 156) where he quotes the Al-Mudsakaret or (Memorabilia) of Abu Sa'id Schadsan, a student of Abu Ma'shar's who recorded his teachers answers and astrological deeds. The Memorabilia - which have come to be known among scholars as "Albumasar in Sadan" due to traditional corruptions of both men's names, is analyzed by Lynne Thorndike in ISIS 1954 pp 22-32.

It will suffice to say here that it is, perhaps the only example of a medieval astrological hagiography. It portrays "the master" as a nearly omniscient wise man learned not only in the techniques of all branches of the Art but also in its traditional history and aware of the contributions of His' predecessors. He is quoted, in Albumasar in Sadan (p. 29 of Isis article), that he follows Messahala's method of projecting rays and in other locations admits to following other methods of Messahala (Masha'allah).

⁶ Masha'allah (c 740-c 815) was the foremost of the early Arabic astrologers. He worked in Basra and, together with the Persian astrologer al-Naubakht, was selected to astrologically elect the time for the founding of the new city of Baghdad in 762 by the Caliph Al-Mansur.

⁷ Almetus = Akhmet = Achmet = Ahmed. He may be the early 10th century astrologer Ahmet abu Ja'far who Richard Lemay believes wrote The Liber Fructus also known as Book of Fruit also known as Centiloquium or he could be Ahmed ibn Yusuf. S.J. Tester, in A History of Western Astrology, Woodbridge, Suffolk, The Boydell Press, p. 184, tells us that Moritz Steinschneider thought that the 13th century Commentary on the Centiloquium attributed to Haly, was actually written by Ahmed ibn Yusuf. For a list of the many works by Steinschneider, see Thorndike's History of Magic and Experimental Science, New York: Columbia University Press, 1923, Vol.1, pp. xxxvi, xxxvii. See also Thorndike, Vol. II, op. cit. pp. 291-293 regarding Achmet's possible identity.

Thebit¹, Dorotheus², Alkindi³, Almansor⁴, Hali⁵, Alboali⁶) relied

⁸ Alfraganus, aka Al-Farghani, 9th cent. Turkish Christian astronomer. Full name: abu-al-'Abbas Ahmad al-Farghani. Summarized Ptolemy's Almagest.

¹ Thabit ben Qurra, or Thebit ibn Korra, or Thibet Ben Qurrah (836-901), a 10th century exponent of the Hermetic Tradition and perhaps the most advanced mathematician and astronomer of his day, his people, the Harranian Sabians, were "the inheritors of Classical Heathenism," that is, who continued the classical philosophical polytheistic religion. He was author of numerous books on astronomy and at least one on meteorological astrology. He is known best for his mistaken Theory of the Trepidation of the Equinoxes.

² Though he wrote in Arabic, Dorotheus of Sidon was not an Arab. He was a Hellenized Phoenician writing in the 1st century C.E. His Pentateuch is an important text in fixing later Islamic astrological practice.

³ Al-Kindi = full name: abu-Yusuf Ya'qub ibn-Ishaq al-Kindi (9th cent). "The philosopher of the Arabs." Teacher of abu Ma'shar. The following comes from: Handbuch der Orientalistik, Herausgegeben von B. Spuler unter Mitarbeit von H. Franke, J. Gonda, Hammitisch, W. Helik, B. Hrouda, H. Kähler, J.E. van Lohuizen-De Leeuw und F. Vos. Erste Abteilung: Der Nahe und der Mitlere Osten Herausgegeben von B. Spuler. Ergänzungsband VI, Zweiter Abschnitt: Die Natur und Geheimwissenschaften im Islam, Leiden/Köln, E.J. Brill 1972. Handbuch Der Orientalistik von M. Ullmann: Astrologie, pp. 371-358. Al-Kindi's tractate, fi Mulk al-Iarab wa-kammiyatihi, was translated by Joannis Hispalensis carrying the title Liber individuorum superiorum in summa de significationibus super accidentia que efficiuntur in mundo. and it was printed under the false title Albumasar De magnis coniunctionibus: annorum revolutionibus: ac eorum projectionibus: octo continens tractatus, Augsburg 1489 Steinschneider Europ Ubs A p. 47. Carmody Translation p. 91 f, Thorndike Notes p. 150 number 46, Lemay, Abu Ma'shar, p. XXXI.

Al-Kindi's K. al-Mudhal al-kabir ila 'ilm ahkam an-nuqum mss: Paris 5902 (131 foll., written 325/937); Leiden 1051 (= Cod.49 Gol.) Bodl. 565; nr. 294 (+Hydii 3); Chester Beatty 4075; 5281; Esc. 938,7 Renaud; Hamidiye 829; Krause mathem. p. 450.

Also wrote de radiis stellacis. De Radiis has been published in the Archives d'histoire doctrinale du Moyen Age, vol. 41, 1974 and edited by M. T. D'Alverny and F. Hudry.

Alkindi was very active in Baghdad translating Greek mathematical and philosophical works into Arabic. See also footnote 2 above.

heavily on Hermetic astrological works extant in their day.

We see from A.J. Festugière¹ that the work of establishing this tradition among the Arabs had as much to do with editing as it did with translating and transmitting the astrological teachings.

"That Mashala had at his disposal a great number of Hermetic or pseudo-Hermetic works is ascertained by a short greek extract contained in the Vatican. gr. 1052, fol. 242 (CCAG.I. pp.81-82): In the text, entitled: The treatise of the very wise Mashalla concerning the number of the books published by each of the ancient sages as well as the contents of these books. Mashalla says, 'I have

⁴ Almansor = al-Mansur (712?-775) second Abbasid Caliph. Full name: abu Ja'far 'Abdullah al- Mansur. Patron of science, encouraged translation of Greek and latin classics into Arabic. Moved capital to Baghdad.

See Steinschneider Europ. Uebs. Ap 63f.; Millas Traducciones p. 155 on Almansoris iudicia seu propositiones trans. Plato Tiburtinus in the first half of the 12th cent. trans. of Yahya ibn abi Mansur. (Almansor).

⁵ Hali Rodan, aka Abu Ali 'al-Hasan ibn al-Hasan ibn al-Haitham, otherwise known as Alhazan (987-1138). Famous scientist, mathematician and astrologer-astronomer. Wrote on Optics, Mathematics, Physics, Philosophy and Medicine. He was familiar with Euclid and Ptolemy on Optics. His work on the subject, Optici thesaurus Alhazani, translated by Gerard of Cremona, became very influential in European Middle Ages. Influenced Roger Bacon. First to calculate height of atmosphere. Wrote on atmospheric distortion of Sun and Moon near the horizon. Wrote a Commentary on the Tetrabiblos of Ptolemy and the Centiloquium.

⁶ Masha'allah's student, Abu 'Ali Al-Khayyat (c 770- 835 CE.) was known to those intimate with him as Abu 'Ali Yahya ibn Ghalib and as Isma'il ibn Muhammad. He was one of the leading astrologers of his day. He wrote an Introduction to Astrology; works on horary astrology ,political works on forms of Governments, On The Revolution of Years of Nativities (we would call these figures Solar Returns), a scientific work on the prism, and a work called The Rod of Gold. According to Holden, only his horary work, On Questions, and The Judgements of Nativities survive in arabic. The latter was translated into Latin by Plato of Tivoli in 1136; and by John of Seville in 1153. Holden has used the latter.

¹ L'Astrologie et La Science Occulte, Le R. P. Festugiere, O. P. Paris, Librairie LeCoffre, J. Garabalda et Cie., Editeurs, Troisieme Edition, 1950. pp. 161, 162.

determined that the ancient sages present ambiguities as to certain fundamental doctrines of astronomy and that these wisemen wrote a considerable number of books. From this it follows that the mind of him who reads them is quite confused. Therefore I have published this book in which I have brought forward the uncontested points and the best doctrines of these treatises, with the help of the books of Ptolemy and Hermes, those great sages of an infinite science, and was also assisted by books which my predecessors left as a heritage to their sons.

Those who published these books are the following: Hermes published 24 books: of these 16 are about genethliology; 5 on consultations (peri erōtēseōn); 2 on the degrees (moirai); 1 on the art of calculation (peri logismou). Then follows Plato, Dorotheus, Democritus, Aristotle, Antiochus (of Athens), (Vettius) Valens, Eratosthenes, Stochos (?), the Persians.

"Mashalla concludes thus (82.33), 'Such are the books which find themselves in our hands today, and on the subject of which, as I have said, I have brought forward (certain ones), in order that you may know that I have taken great care in publishing this book, which you see here as I have made it in four treatises, the synthesis of the aforementioned books¹.'"

The value of the Liber Hermetis is that it represents a pagan astrological text which managed somehow to slip through the censorship of the early church and the suppression of Islamic editors. It affords us a view, at least in Chapter I and possibly in some of the other chapters as well, of the kind of astrology practiced in the hellenistic egyptian temples prior to the rise of Christianity.

In my opinion, the text contains material which documents the invention of astrology as we know it by Hellenistic philosophers. The Pythagoreanizing numerology of Chapter XV is evidence of this invention. The delineations therein are based primarily on numerology and geometry. The references to planets turn out to be a cipher for numerical values.

Wilhelm Gundel published a critical edition of the Liber Hermetis in the journal of the Bayerische Akademie der Wissenschaften in 1936. The text comes from Harleiano Nr. 3731 British Museum. Gundel believed that there had been a Greek original the date of which he found difficult to ascertain. It only survives in a Latin translation. According to Gundel, the date of the Latin translation also cannot be fixed with certainty. He speculates that it is "like 4th cent. and 5th cent. Latin." Some features are Byzantine. The terminus a quo is the end of the fifth century. Festugière accepts Gundel's dating of the text but suggests that it is a florilège. He, too, thinks there was a Greek original, though itself compiled from a number of sources. Pingree, who also thinks there was a Greek original¹, wants to date the Greek after Rhetorius (whom he reckons as 7th century) because he finds sections of the Liber Hermetis to be translations of Rhetorius' work. He hypothesizes that the Latin text dates from the twelfth century and thinks that it shows evidence that the author knew the astrological works of the Arabs. None of these scholars doubts that some very old, even pre-Christian material is contained in the Liber Hermetis, certainly the first and third chapters.

¹ Many thanks to Michele McKee for this quote.

Though I have only Gundel's published work to go by, my own feeling is that there may not have been a single Greek original, though the text is certainly a translation from Greek, it is a translation/compilation from numerous sources by one Latin translator working in the 6th century or, if Pingree is right about Rhetorius' date, in the 7th². My reasons for this position are as follows:

1. Though there are stylistic and vocabulary differences throughout the work, they are not localized to particular chapters nor are they consistent. For instance, both 'horoscopus' and 'ascendens' are used but in the later chapters, interchangeably. The same constructions are used throughout. Thus, I think one hand wrote the Latin.

2. There is little doubt that it is, as Festugière and Pingree point out, a compilation. Dorotheus is cited in Chapter XXI. References are made to Ptolemy, Critodemus and Valens in Chapter XVI and to Ptolemy again in Chapter XXV. Pingree sees translations of Rhetorius in

¹ Cf. The Yavanajataka of Sphuydhuya, ed. & trans. & commentary by David Pingree, Cambridge: Harvard U. Press, 1978, Vol.11, p. 431.

² Pingree's attribution of Rhetorius to the 7th century rests upon the presence of one horoscope, dated 601 C.E. in his work. The usual date given for Rhetorius is c 500 C.E. p. 439, op. cit.

Chapters XVI & XIX, of Paulus Alexandrinus in XXIV, XXVI¹, and Valens in IV-X , X Π, XXII, XXIII, XXVHJ. By the way, Pingree remarks², "One of the great values of the Liber Hermetis is that, especially for Valens, it frequently preserves longer passages of these authors than do the often faulty Byzantine manuscript traditions³."

3. It is not Late Medieval Latin, though there are some Byzantine (Sicilian) forms and words, e.g., credenzeri and stolii navalis, but these are 4th century or, perhaps as late as the 7th century. Though there are a number of words also found in Ecclesiastical Latin, it is not clear to me that they are not also part of the contemporary learned or semi-learned vocabulary, e.g., cismaticos, and stolii navalis.

4. There is no mention of Arabic authors. If the Liber Hermetis were a 12th century product Abu Ma'shar, Messahalla and others would surely show up. The author knows only Hellenistic authors.

5. The author is certainly not Christian, still less Jewish or Moslem. Polytheism and magic abound in this text. While there is a morality evinced and there is judgment of the perversity of the age, there is nothing to suggest that the author is not a Pagan Neoplatonist or a Pessimistic Heathen Gnostic. Indeed, some of the sexual practices referred to sound remarkably like those reportedly engaged in by certain left-hand Tantric Sects of India.

¹ Comparison of the Paulus material with the Liber Hermetis suggests a common source rather than a translation.

² Pingree, op. cit. p.433.

³ Pingree asserts that the Liber Hermetis is a compilation of the translations of the works of Rhetorius, Valens, Paulus Alexandrinus, Dorotheus, and, possibly, Firmicus. He admits that it is equally possible that the Firmicus sections come from a text that both the author of the Liber Hermetis and Firmicus used. Gundel and Festugière had a different opinion. They saw it the other way around. The text was of one piece and the source of the writings of the above mentioned authors. The issue is not yet settled, in my opinion, in spite of Pingree's immense erudition and daunting experience, especially as he points out on page 444 of the work cited that the Valens we have is in "mutilated state."

6. The astrological techniques evidenced are Hellenistic, not Medieval Arabic. There is plenty of Greek used but no Arabic. Pingree's remark that the Latin text was produced by someone who knew the Arabic astrological methods makes sense only if, by this, he refers to the authors on which the Arabic astrology was based, namely Dorotheus, Valens, Ptolemy and Hermes. All these authors are cited in the Liber Hermetis. The Liber Hermetis, moreover, teaches the use of multiple house systems (cast from the Horoscope, Sun, Moon, or Part of Fortune). Apart from Manilius and Valens, who Gundel claims also relied on Hermetic material common to the Liber Hermetis, I know of no other ancient western source for this teaching. Yet it seems to have been exported to India at the latest by about 500 C.E., for it shows up in Indian Astrology, i.e., in Varahamihira¹ and in Sphuydhuya². In the mean time, however, the practice is apparently forgotten in the West by the time of Messahallah and Abu Ma'shar (8th and 9th centuries). It was re-introduced into Western Astrology in the 20th century, possibly from Indian influences, in the astrology of the German School.

7. The dating of the Liber Hermetis as a very old text rests on the analysis of the age of the Star Catalogues in Chapters III & XXV. Pingree cannot ascribe authorship of these chapters to any known source³. Pingree accepts Gundel's dating of Chapter III (130-60 B.C.E.)⁴ but not the dating of Chapter XXV which he prefers to date at 480 C.E. The star positions in Chapter XXV are confused and may deserve yet another look. My suggested date for the Liber Hermetis is not affected by Pingree's objections to Gundel's handling of this chapter.

Who was the Latin translator/compiler? We do not know. Pingree probably places this text as late as he does, in part, because he knows that from the 7th century on there were few in Western Europe who could translate Greek or calculate well enough to practice astrology,

¹ Varahamihira's Brihat Jataka by Pandita Bhushana V. Subrahmanaya Shastri, Gandhingar, Bangalore: Sadhana Press, 1971. passim.

² Pingree, op. cit., p. 65.

³ He is silent on chapters 2, 3, 21, 25, 29, 30, 35.

⁴ Pingree, op. cit., p. 432.

while in the Greek speaking Eastern Roman Empire there would have been no need to translate the various Greek texts of which it is composed. I suggest that the Latin translator was one of the last generation of Latin philosophers in the West (possibly in Africa where both Greek and Latin continued until the arrival of Islam and where translation of Greek texts flourished) during the century that saw Boethius (?480-524?) executed. The public who read and preserved the book were the same people who read and preserved Firmicus Maternus and Martianus Capella, i.e., the very restricted clerical esoterici who perpetuated the Hermetic Tradition in the West until it was renewed in the 11th century in Sicily and France.

What is Hermetic about the Liber Hermetis? All scholars agree that Hermetic astrology, emanating from Hellenistic Egypt, was characterized by the iatromathematical (i.e., astrological medical) use of the decans. The first chapter of this work contains such material. Pingree, Festugière and Gundel point to the similarity of the first chapter with the so-called Sacred Book of Asclepius, an Hermetic text which also deals with the same subject. But in addition to this, the historical reality of an Hermetic astrological Corpus is doubted by few modern scholars. Such an Urquelle may even be close to the source of the astrological tradition itself as we know it. Apart from the first chapter of the main body of the Liber Hermetis deals with three out of the five categories of things mentioned by Iamblichus as characteristic of Hermetic Astrology. Only Calendrics and the Phases and Occultations of the Stars are left out. Again, the chapters identified by Pingree as similar to Firmicus' Mathesis must be regarded as Hermetic as Firmicus himself says in Book IV of his work that he got his material from "Most Powerful Mercury," i.e., Hermes Trismegistus.

The text presents some difficulties which it is best to alert the reader of in advance. There is a decidedly Gnostic influence in this text evidenced, to my mind, by at least two features: first, the presence in the first chapter's decan list of names of obviously Semitic derivation, Hebrew, or Syriac. This feature is not unique to the Liber Hermetis, Gundel has indicated much of the history, evolution and provenance of the decans and decan names in his *Dekane und Dekansterbilder*¹. They are similar to names met with in specifically Gnostic literature². Secondly, the author seems either to have had a particularly base clientele or a rather harsh view of life or both. The sexual practices described in this text as well as the perfidy and level of violence which he depicts are a possible reason why the Liber Hermetis has remained a text known only to specialist scholars until now.

Some of the descriptions of the 36 decans in the first chapter are obscure. It appears that the latin translator did not understand what the original depicted.

The astrology described herein is natal astrology. If Gundel and Festugière are right about the date of the overall text, this is an earlier example of natal astrology than usually reckoned to be the case. Moreover, it is an astrology for a middle class of well-to-do clientele, not for chiefs of state.

Features of this astrology are not commonly found in "scientific" astrology such as Ptolemy's Tetrabiblos. For example there is numerology in Chapter XV. The Moon's Nodes and the Moon itself play a bigger role in the Liber Hermetis than in modern astrology. The Moon's nodes are said to be important for longevity, for instance. The ¹ Cf. Wilhelm Gundel, Dekane und Dekansterbilder, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1969, pp. 49-81. Gundel's work is comprehensive and authoritative. He shows the magical origin of Decani and their images and symbols (p. 67, Agrippa mentioned). Also note pp. 68-69. He shows the development of the names of the decans from names indicating divisions of the sky to God—and Daemon—names (pp. 71-76). Their relation to Jewish-gnostic texts like the Testamentum Solomonis is discussed (p. 60). He connects them to the Ophite tradition through Origen's statements (p. 62).

² See Fragments of a Faith Forgotten, G.R.S. Mead, University Books, New Hyde, NY, [n.d.] p. 539 says decans are subordinate powers under a Ieou (there's one of these for each of 13 aeons. In Pistis Sophia, by Mead, University Books, Secaucus N.J. 1974. p. 265-267, list of "Rulers of Twelve Dungeons". In same book, p. 296-302 twelve aeons, some having the same names as in the Liber Hermetis. Cf. The Nag Hammadi Library in English, ed. Robinson, NY: Harper and Row, 1977. On pp. 104-106, The Apocryphon of John, mentions the 7 bodies of the archons and the faces of Yaltabaoth contain some of the same names. In eo. loco, pp. 201-203, of The Gospel of the Egyptians, gives some similar names. p. 381, Zostrianos (III.1), also has some similar names.

Moon's transits are used for indicating the nature of an illness. This astrology emphasizes the ascendant, even to the point of delineating things for which the modern astrologer would use other houses and house cusps. For instance, in chapter XXX, "On Brothers," the author delineates the number of brothers by the number of signs or stars between the ascendant and the lord of the triplicity of the ascendant.

Regarding the evolution of the theory of the houses¹, the Liber Hermetis has some interesting things to say. This text seems to show a transitional phase where the word "house" is used as well as "place." Gundel, who believes the text to contain ancient Egyptian Temple astrology, has much to say in his apparatus regarding the evolution of the houses. While he is by no means sympathetic toward astrology, he makes some interesting observations on the basis of the Liber Hermetis and other early astrological texts. The teaching of the Liber Hermetis shows evidence of some very old usages concerning the subject of houses. He suggests that the doctrine of the houses evolved from a very old emphasis on the quadrants defined by the cardinal points. At this initial stage, the position of the planets in the quadrants somehow barely enabled the astrologers to arrive at delineations, he says, only after difficult calculations. He seems to think that the diurnal (or clock-wise) motion of the sky, suggested itself as the proper order of life, symbolically represented by the Sun's passage above the earth. It was eventually realized that this approach was inefficient. The next stage was that which combined the quadrants and the cardines. But this stage necessitated the intermediary stage of dividing the quadrants in two by means of 45 degree sections. This gave rise to the clock-wise "Octatropus." He sees survivals of this in Serapion who assigns the horoscope itself the middle of the first part of life. But Serapion is already using a Dodekatropos or Twelve House System which is counted anti-clockwise. Presumably, his peculiar allotment of the horoscope to the middle of the first part of life is a survival of the clock-wise "Octatropus" in which the condition of the native just before birth was represented by the point 45 degrees below the horoscope in the northeast of the chart while the end of the first period of life would be 45 degrees above the horoscope in the southeast. In Serapion, he says, the horoscope itself, as already mentioned, represents the middle of the first part of life. The 12th house, which holds the planets and stars which were below the horizon just before birth, shows the fate of the child just prior to birth. The 2nd house, its fate during the last years of the first period of life. The M.C. represents, for Serapion, the middle period of life, while the 9th and the 11th show the periods immediately before and after this respectively. The western horizon shows the old age and the 8th the end of old age. The 6th house the beginning of old age. The I.C. shows the death. The 5th house the fate after death.

¹ Thanks to Hal von Hofe for providing me with a translation of Gundel's Chapter 14 on which what follows on Gundel's theory of the evolution of the houses comes.

Gundel attributes the clockwise Dodekatropos, which he speculates antedated our present usage, to Hermes. He sees evidence of it in the Liber Hermetis, chapter XXX "On Brothers," where planets above the horizon are used for determining the number of surviving brothers and those below the horizon for those who have died. His argument is creative and seems novel to me, but it must be said that Gundel recognized that the text presents the reader with new material which must be as rationally as possibly explained and assimilated.

The modern counter-clockwise Dodekatropos (Chapters XV and XXVI) as well as the even twelvefold division of the ecliptic he attributes to "the textbook bearing the name Hermes Trismegistus" which he believes Nechepso-Petosiris and others used after it had already gone through certain revisions. After these, it was used by Serapion, Kritodemus, Antiochus and Manilius. Despite Ptolemy's opposition (he would not admit that planets below the horizon have any influence), it survives to this day. I have already mentioned above, that we also find houses cast in the Liber Hermetis from the Sun, Moon and Part of Fortune.

In chapter 14 of the apparatus, Gundel points to the Egyptian contribution to the formation of the Hermetic Astrology by saying,

"From the many layers and superimpositions of the Hermetic doctrine on the centers¹ and the twelve stations of the invisible ninth heaven² the following belief forms of the old star-religion can be deduced: 1. The division of the body of the goddess of the heavens into different abodes or of heavenly space into certain temenoi, also called athla or templa. To this belong the divisions of the visible heavens into variously great and variously many regions'. We find such regional divisions already in the grave of Senmut from the time of Queen Hatshepsut (15th century B.C.E.), and we then have them in the division of the heaven into 36 districts and meet them in the various regional divisions of oriental and Etruscan skywatchers and augurs.

¹ The Eastern and Western Horizons and the M.C./I.C. Axis.

² The ideal twelve-fold house division.

"2. The second constituent is the firm attribution of the visible segments of heaven to certain divinities, for example to Hapi, Horus, Isis, Osiris, Duamutef, Setech or in the later hellenistic coordination to the great Olympian gods, who give over their ruling rights as divinities to the planets and occasionally to other star-gods, the so-called titelae, in hellenistic astrology. Next to the conventional texts of oracular astrology Egyptian texts of the stellar religion have preserved these compromise forms up into the second half of the time of the Roman Caesars. In a demotic astrological textbook we find a completely different set of names for the houses, namely the house of Wly, the house of Death, the house of Sait, and then a house of Ser, a house of Si, and of Spsit are mentioned. Hippolytus and the Pistis Sophia name yet other Toparchoi and *Prosteioi*z.

"3. The particular stellar deity who inhabits these districts exerts special influence. If a friendly or an inimical stellar deity stands in relationship to him the particular rays emanating from this district are modified for good or ill. These explications become more colorful the more combinations are formed by the proximity of other stellar deities and by the aspects."

Certain practices common to Medieval Astrology and Ancient but poorly elucidated in texts of those eras are more fully set forth in the Liber Hermetis, e.g., in Chapter XIX we see how the terms were used in delineating the kind of parents the native had. In Chapter XX we see how the Parts of the Father and Mother were used and the author takes the concept of derived houses further than in modern astrology. In Chapter XXI we learn how to tell to which parent the fourth house relates. In Chapter XXV we learn what the names of the Hellenistic constellations were. It should also be pointed out that this astrology relies more heavily on sect (called "condicio" in the Latin) than in any other ancient or medieval text I am familiar with. The reader will be happy to see the subject dealt with more than in Ptolemy.

¹ liturgi, decani, novenaria, duodecimae, termini, monomoiria, etc.

² Edition of the Papyri of the kingly Museums Berlin, Demot. Pap. 9345 A. The guardians, their symbols and their secrets, so often mentioned by the Pistis Sophia, certainly contain astromythic and astromagical doctrines. Cf. Pistis Sophia, ed. Schmidt 2.A. 1925 in the index s.v. guardians and φυλακεσ.

A distinction is occasionally made in the Liber Hermetis between astrologers and astronomers (e.g., chapter XXVI). It is generally asserted that such a distinction is fairly modern. Whatever the date of the Liber Hermetis this distinction seems to be older than previously thought.

The Liber Hermetis, especially in Chapters I, III, XXV, raises an important side issue relating to the history of ideas which may shed light on some scholars' displeasure at Gundel's dating and handling of this text. It may also suggest an answer why this text has remained relatively unknown until now. While Chapter XXV is a bit confused at times (the same constellations show up in several places), it can still be seen that, apart from judicial astrology, there is a system of stellar-religion or astrotheology set forth in the mythological symbolism employed¹.

This issue of astrotheology and its effect on the academic establishment must be understood. Gundel repeatedly asserts that the Liber Hermetis is the long sought occult astrological Corpus of the Egyptian priest Hermes Trismegistus from which so many ancient authors borrowed; that the text represents the astrological practices of the Egyptian temples as early as the beginning of the 2nd century B.C.E. and that the ultimate origin of Hellenistic Egyptian astrology was Babylonian astrotheology². He often cites Cumont³, Boll⁴ and others

¹ That the mythological symbols of the ancients embodied allegories which were made to serve religious purposes by the priests of the ancient heathen religions cannot be doubted.

² He was so cited above, in the rather long quote from his chapter on the astrological houses.

³ e.g. p. 319 of his apparatus, in discussing the nutations of the Moon, Cumont is cited as "assuming a Chaldaean origin for this entire teaching."

to support this interpretation. Yet he is convinced that the inspiration for the Liber Hermetis is Egyptian¹. In his comments on the star names listed in the text, Gundel notes the presence of Greek constellation and Zodiac sign names (e.g., Hercules, Pegasus, Perseus, Aries, Libra, etc.) and representations of Egyptian extra-zodiacal constellations and images for particular individual stars considered notable by the Egyptians (e.g., Typhon, Osiris, the Ship, Anubis, etc.). In addition to these he points to a number of constellation and star names which are neither taken from traditional Greek mythology nor from Egyptian religious iconography. These (e.g., the Slave, Death, the Earth, the Marriage of the Gods, Necessity, the Daemon, the Constellation, Measure, Diligence, etc.) he identifies as new star names invented by Hermes which were somehow associated with magical practices. We will return to this issue of an Hermetic reform of the constellations below.

First it is necessary to point out that according to the view Gundel is working with, the sky was certainly seen as the seat of divinity and as the first and ultimate dwelling place of the "risen" souls. To bedeck the heavens with symbolic representations of divine and semi-divine personages was a statement of an essentially astrological theology.

This theme has a continuous history in the western esoteric tradition, which, until the Renaissance was essentially the Hermetic Tradition. It found its way into early Kabbalistic works², the writings of the Abbot Trithemius, Agrippa's De Occulta Philosophia (1532), Jacques Gaffarel's Abdita Divinae Kabbalae Mysteria and Unheard-of Curiosities Concerning Talismanic Magic (1650)³ Kircher's QZdipus Aegyptiacus (1652-4), Dupuis' Religion Universelle (1795), Court de Gebelin's Le Monde Primitif (1773-84), Duncan's The Religions of Profane Antiquity (1820?). The symbolism of Freemasonry continues

⁴ p. 35 of the critical apparatus. while noting the opposition to this position by Kugler et al., he side steps their attack by pointing out that, while much needs to be done to clarify the issue the names of the constellations in the Liber Hermetis come from Egypt, not Babylon.

¹ p. 281 of the critical apparatus. Yet it seems that Gundel is trying to assert an ancient astrotheology be it Babylonian or Egyptian in origin.

² such as the Sepher Yetzirah.

³ to whom is also attributed a Codicum cabalisticorum manuscriptorum.

this tradition from the 17th century to the present day¹. The same concept also underlies much of the teaching of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky² and also lies behind Burgoyne's The Light of Egypt (San Francisco: 1889)³. As late as the 1940's we find W. B. Crow teaching this same idea⁴.

The concept of an ancient (possibly universal) astral religion, hearkens back to the Ancient Theology tradition from the Florentine Platonists of the Renaissance, who found it in the Hermetic Tradition⁵. It spread through Europe during the 15th to 17th centuries and lay behind the Pan-Egyptian theme of 16th through 19th century proto-archeology. It was this quest for lost Egyptian wisdom that led the French savants to accompany Napoleon's military expedition to Egypt. The expedition led to the discovery and eventual decipherment of the Rosetta Stone. This scholarly feat paradoxically resulted in the discrediting of the original occultist presuppositions which had been based largely on Kircher's misconceptions of the nature and purpose of the Egyptian hieroglyphs. In the 19th century the same concept (which, like a recalcitrant ghost, refused to be banished) manifested as Pan-Babylonianism, a movement, primarily in German archeology led by one Dr. Hugo Winkler (1863-1913).

In *A History of Astronomy*⁶, A. Pannekoek tells us the following:

"For many years Hugo Winckler's theory—so called 'Pan-Babylonianism'—had a great reputation; it proclaimed that in the earliest times, between 3000 and 2000 B.C.E., a highly developed

¹ See the writings of Albert G. Mackey and Albert Pike.

² Cf. Isis Unveiled, (orig. NY: 1877), 2 Vols. Pasadena: Theosophical University Press, 1976. I. 529 ff; passim; II, 450; passim. The Secret Doctrine, (orig. 2 Vols. London: 1888), 2 Vols. in one, Los Angeles: 1964, I. 105, passim; II. pp. 647-668; passim.

³ Burgoyne's Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor was the ancestor of the present Church of Light.

⁴ In his "Mysteries of the Ancients" series, pamphlet # 6. Astronomical Religion, by W.B. Crow, London: Michael Houghton, 1942.

⁵ Cf. The Ancient Theology, D.P. Walker, Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1972.

⁶ A History of Astronomy, by A. Pannekoek, Dover 1989, pp. 29-30.

astronomical science already existed there, based on a thorough knowledge of the celestial periods and of the shifting aspect of the constellations through the precession of the equinoxes. It set forth how this primeval world concept, bearing the character of an 'astral mythology', by asserting close connection between earthly and celestial phenomena, was the origin of all later Oriental and Greek systems of thought and determined legends, lore and customs even until modern times and in distant parts of Europe. This alluring but highly fantastic theory proved untenable when the texts were later subjected to careful study. Our present real knowledge of Babylonian astronomical science is based chiefly on the work of three Jesuit scholars, the Assyriologist J.N. Strassmaier, and the astronomers J. Epping and F.X. Kugler."

What is hot about the Liber Hermetis in the context of the history of ideas, is that the chapters cited above (I, III, and XXV) do embody an astral theology. It is not Babylonian, as Winkler had suggested, but rather Hellenistic Egyptian, as Kircher and earlier Hermetic esoterici had averred to be the case.

Gundel's suggestion that there might have been an Hermetic re-naming of parts or all of the heavens is of even more moment to astrologers and esotericists than his suggestion of an Egyptian astrotheology. Although he does not go this far, what he does say amounts to an implication of an Hellenistic Hermetic religious reform. This, too, is not without precedence in the western esoteric tradition. Witness Revelation, 21:1, "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven had passed away . . ."

But the idea is articulated in more detail in Giordano Bruno's *Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast*¹. Bruno, let us remember, was an exponent of a return to an Hermetic Egyptian polytheism. In his "Explanatory Epistle" at the very beginning of the work, he details the process of the Hermetic Rebirth² in terms of the substitution by Jove

¹ The Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast, by Giordano Bruno, trans. by Arthur D. Imerti, New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1964, pp. 79-88. This work was originally entitled: Lo Spaccio de la bestia trionfante and was written in 1584.

² Cf. Hermetica, trans. Walter Scott, London: Dawsons of Pall Mall, 1968, Vol. I, Libellus, I & XIII.

(whom he identifies as the Intellectual Light in each of us) systematically replacing the existing constellations (the familiar list of Greek named astronomical constellations) of the inner heaven of man with new philosophical hermetic constellations which often have names remarkably reminiscent of those in the Liber Hermetis which Gundel suggests were of Hermetic origin.

It would seem, therefore, that the Liber Hermetis as edited by Gundel, exhibited attitudes too similar to those of Winkler on the one hand and to those of the pesky Hermetic Ancient Theologers on the other to be allowed to stand unchallenged. The latter, no less than the former challenged both the Judeo-Christian and the Secular Humanist bias of the age and was accordingly buried in the nearest library.

I. On the 36 decans of the 12 signs and Their Forms and on the Climates¹ and Faces² Which Each of the Planets have in the Same Signs.

The 36 decans of the 12 signs, which are noted in the table³ are these. For in this way the planets will have divided the 12 signs and the climates and the 36 decans and likewise the decans the climates, cities and members of men. Just as the signs are of diverse forms and multiformed, so are the 36 decans. The faces, which are in the signs from the decanic transformation of the seven planets, in which these rejoice just as in their own mansions⁴ or houses, it will be fitting to make⁵ according to the order⁶ of the seven planets, by which the lord

¹ The climates were an early effort by the Greeks to contrive a way of locating places on the globe north of the equator. The inhabitable world north of the equator was divided into bands, usually seven, (as we see in Al-Biruni ca 1029 C.E. See sections 236-241.), which the astrologers often allotted to the planets. In Al-Biruni the northern hemisphere from 12°N 39' to 66°N 00' is so divided. Hipparchus (c 160 B.C.E.) is often credited with inventing this scheme. Eventually, the temperature and weather characteristic of each climate was associated with the term whence climate for us means weather not latitude. As used in this text, the word means region, however, as the author of this text had an imperfect understanding of the exact locations of the regions equated to the climates and in linking these regions to the decans, names as different "climates" a number of regions on more or less the same parallel.

² The word facies (face) is used as a technical term in Medieval Astrology as synonymous with decanus. Here a subtle difference seems implied by referring to the division of each sign into 3 decani and to the facies (face, or appearance) of a planet in each decanus. The "face" thus may be conceived of as the special "manifestation" of the planet in the decanus.

³ Not given in text.

⁴ A reference to a planetary rulership of lunar mansions or merely a synonym for "house" (i.e., a 12 fold division of the ecliptic)?

⁵ negotiarum (ex negotiorum), This verb usually means to engage in mercantile trade (ruled by Mercury).

⁶ The Chaldaean order, i.e., of relative speed, beginning from Mars.

of the hour is known¹ beginning from Aries and counting 10 degrees per each decan for the sought for planet [ruler]². I say, moreover, that the first face of Aries is [that] of Mars³, the second is the Sun's, the third is Venus', the fourth, which is the first of Taurus, is Mercury's, the second [of Taurus] is the Moon's, the third is Saturn's and the rest are successive just as it is in the disposition of the lords of the hours.

*On the first face of Aries*⁴ — The first decan of Aries has the face of Mars. Its name is Aulathamas. It is an armed sign, upright, walking, having the likeness of a man⁵, standing on feet like claws⁶, holding above his head a double sided battle axe with both hands. This rules the climate of Ocean⁷.

On the second face of Aries — The second decan has the face of the Sun. Its name is Sabaoth. It has a two headed face and a lotus of the kings⁸ open on its head. In the compass of the lotus there are stars of the splendor of gold. He has also in his right hand a water jug which is called life, in his left a scepter the extremity of which is bifurcated⁹. This decan is clothed in linen and he treads under both his feet a

¹ The same order is used for the planetary hours as is used for the decans.

² The author has in mind an astrological problem: Given a planet in a certain degree of a certain sign, whose decan is it in? Beginning the division from Aries, giving 10 degrees to each decan, and attributing planetary rulership according to a known planetary series, i.e., the Chaldaean Order, beginning with Mars, you may discover know whose decan the planet is in.

³ The language used reminds one of an exercise in geometry.

⁴ Compare the language of this section with that used by Ibn Ezra in describing the rising of the "faces" in The Beginning of Wisdom: An Astrological Treatise by Abraham Ibn Ezra, by Raphael Levy, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1939.

⁵ ad similitudinem hominis transiens.

⁶ pedibus stans super unguibus.

⁷ This refers to the Atlantic, which the ancients thought encircled the world. Yet they knew there were islands in it.

⁸ lothum regium.

⁹ The language (not so much the imagery) reminds one of Ezekiel's and Daniel's visions or of the images still commonly in use in Hindu iconography.

tortoise entirely covered with a net. This rules the climate of the Bactrians¹.

On the third face of Aries — The third decan of Aries has the face of Venus. Its name is Disornafais. It is like a woman, erect, adorned with linen tied with gold strings tinted a dark rose color. She has a royal gold [crown] on her head. In the middle of her belly there are belly emeralds. She is holding a four headed serpent on the top of a staff. The two heads in the middle are to one side and the [other] two are to the opposite side. This rules the climate of the Lydians².

On the first face of Taurus — The first decan of Taurus has the face of Mercury. Its name is Jaus. It has the whole body of the buried Osiris³, adorned with gold and dark tie-strings⁴. It has the head of a bull and a queen's crown and two elephants' trunks. In the middle of the horns stands the goddess herself. This rules the climate of the Medes⁵.

On the second face of Taurus — The second decan of Taurus has the face of the Moon. Its name is Sarnatois. Its image⁶ is a man, erect, having tightly curled hair on both sides of his head⁷. On his chin there

¹ Bactria was in the eastern parts of Alexander's Empire, south of the Oxus River, east of Aria, north of Arachosia and west of the Hindu Kush. Vide The Geography by Claudius Ptolemy, ed. E.L. Stevenson, New York: Dover Pub. 1991, p. 167. It now falls in N. Afghanistan and E. Iran. Its capital, Bactra (modern Balkh) at 36°N 46', 66°E 54' fell on Ptolemy's 11th parallel (through Rhodes). See Almagest, Book II.

² South-west Anatolia. Capital was Sardis, roughly 38 degrees north lat. on Ptolemy's 12th parallel. Vide, The Geography by Claudius Ptolemy, ed. E.L. Stevenson, New York: Dover Pub. 1991, p. 113. First map of Asia. See Almagest, Book II.

³ Like a mummy.

⁴ ornatus aureis corrigiis et fuscis.

⁵ Roughly modern Kurdistan, Gilan and Azerbaijan. The capital of Media was Ecbatana, mod. Hamadan (34°N 48', 48°E 30') which also fell on Ptolemy's 12th parallel in Almagest Book II.

⁶ statua.

⁷ habens ex utraque obliquitate capitis capillos convertibiles.

is a growing of fine hairs [and] on his face there is a beard hanging down on his neck from both parts of his chin. This rules the climate of the Amazons¹.

On the third face of Taurus — The third decan of Taurus has the face of Saturn. Its name is Erchmubris. It is standing like Saturn with his feet together adorned with rose colored armor. All of its body is human but its head is that of a pig. This rules the climate of the Semiramides².

On the first face of Gemini — The first decan of Gemini has the face of Jupiter. Its name is Manuchos. It is an armed man having an ass's face, holding a sword in his right hand. This rules the climate of the Trojans³.

On the second face of Gemini — The second decan of Gemini has the face of Mars. Its name is Samurois. It has a double face. It is walking. It is armed. In its left hand it is holding a bow and arrows and with both its feet it treads upon hares⁴. This rules the climate of the Persians⁵.

On the third face of Gemini — The third decan of Gemini has the face of the Sun. Its name is Azuel. It has the beautiful face of Isis, having ¹ According to Ptolemy (Tetrabiblos, trans. F.E. Robbins, Cambridge: 1964, Harvard University Press, Book II, 3), the Amazons lived in the region of Bythinia, Phrygia and Colchis. This would place them in east Anatolia between Byzantium and the Halys River on the 13th parallel according to Ptolemy's Almagest (roughly 40°N).

² Nineveh. Semiramis (along with Ninus) was one of the mythical founders of Nineveh on the Tigris opposite mod. Mosul, Iraq (36°N 20', 43°E 08') on Ptolemy's 14th parallel.

³ Troy was near the Hellespont in mod. Turkey at approx. 40°N, 26°W. This was on Ptolemy's 13th parallel 9 (through the Hellespont).

⁴ cum utrisque pedibus calcat lepores.

⁵ Modern Iran. The ancient capital of Persia was Ctesiphon, near Baghdad, Iraq (33°N 21', 44°E 25'). This was on Ptolemy's 10th parallel. However, Persepolis, N.E. of present Shiraz, Iran (29°N 37', 52°E 33') was the ceremonial capital.

hair moves every which way. It induces illnesses of the nerves. This rules the climate of Parthia¹.

On the first face of Cancer — The first decan of Cancer has the face of Venus. Its name is Senepiois. It has the form of a serpent joined with the face of a dog. In the tail however a heart like a pine [cone][?]. It has half of its tail turned down and from either part of the side of the heart slender serpents above the dog's head. This image has much analogy² which we will attempt to solve. It causes affliction of the arteries and rules the climate of Syria³.

On the second face of Cancer — The second decan of Cancer has the face of Mercury. Its name is Somachalmis. It has the body of a vulture, but the face of Isis. It is bearing the winged queen's crown. It is erect on two feet [with] greaves having wings. It has dominion over the lungs and rules the climate of the Assyrians⁴.

On the third face of Cancer — The third decan of Cancer has the face of the Moon. Its name is Charmine. It causes affliction of the heart. In its representation it has two round heads the right. . . and the left one of Anubis, . . . namely with the waxen images of the Moon and Juno. In the middle between the two goddesses is a dragon having four heads. Two of its heads are held aloft and two are bent this way and that

¹ The Parthians were a people of Scythian origin living north of Persia, east of Aria, and west of Media; thus in the region S.E. of the Caspian Sea. The heart of the region was in mod. Khurasan roughly 35°N, 55°W. This fell on Ptolemy's 11th parallel.

² multam proportionem. [Additional by RH] This seems to be saying that this image has analogy with many things.

³ In Alexander's Empire, Syria was the coast of Phoenicia, mod. Lebanon, and Judaea as far south as Gaza and inland to a varying degree forming a triangle. In the south, by Gaza, was the tip, Syria widened as the latitude increased to the north so that it reached almost to Nineveh and had its northern border on Armenia the Greater. Damascus, a major city of Syria and occasionally its capital, is at 33°N 30', 36°E 18' on Ptolemy's 10th parallel.

⁴ Roughly equivalent, in modern terms, to N. Syria and W. Iraq. The capital of ancient Assyria was Nineveh. See above footnote to Semiramis.

⁵ Gundel complains that the text is doubtful here.

towards a pine [tree?]. They are rather bigger indeed than she [is]. This rules the climate of Ethiopia'.

On the first face of Leo — The first decan of Leo has the face of Saturn. Its name is Zaloias. It is the lord of the stomach. It is a great serpent with the form of a lion having solar rays encircling its head. It rules the climate of India².

On the second face of Leo — The second decan of Leo has the face of Jupiter. Its name is Zachor. It causes obstructions and abscesses for men. It rules the unknown land³.

On the third face of Leo — The third decan of Leo has the face of Mars. Its name is *Frith*⁴. It causes diafrixin of the belly. It is a man with the likeness of a crocodile. It rules the unknown land.

On the first face of Virgo — The first decan of Virgo has the face of the Sun. Its name is Zamendres. It causes affliction of the belly: It is a serpent put together awry⁵. Its head is the likeness of the Moon. It rules the climate of Arabia⁶.

On the second face of Virgo — The second decan of Virgo has the face of Venus. Its name is Magois. It rules the liver. It is a man standing, ¹ Ethiopia is ancient Cush, the region due south of Egypt. Its borders were the Red Sea on the east, Syené and the smaller cataract. Its southern border was unknown as was its western border. Its capital was Meroë on Ptolemy's 5th parallel.

² India shows up in Ptolemy's Geography in the 10th and 11th maps of Asia. He gives India the latitude from the equator to about 37°N. Actually, including Ceylon, it is closer to from 6°N to 37°N.

³ I do not know which unknown land this refers to. Gundel thought it mean the lands on the other side of the Nile.

⁴ or Frith, from phrix, a shivering fit. The intensive prefix dia + phrix makes Diafrixin an intense shivering fit.

⁵ Is this a caduceus?

⁶ Corresponding to the modern Arabian peninsula and the regions south of the Euphrates and west of Syria and Judaea. It also included Sinai.

girded below from the waist all the way to the hollows of his feet, having four wings—two turned back and two on his breast. It has four Ibis heads¹ having an iron beak. It rules the climate of Armenia².

On the third face of Virgo — The third decan of Virgo has the face of Mercury. Its name is Michulais. It has dominion over the spleen. It is like a mummy, its whole body is like one who has been buried. It rules the climate of Meroë and Elephantine³.

On the first face of Libra — The first decan of Libra has the face of the Moon. Its name is Psineus. It causes pain in the reins. There are two images, erect, having scorpions under their feet. Their hands are hanging down to their thighs. In their right hands they are holding two water jugs, in the middle of which there are two fine pipes through which water is poured out. There are regal things on their heads. It rules the climate of Egypt⁴.

Of the second face of Libra — The second decan of Libra has the face

¹ Cf. Harper's Dictionary of Classical Literature and Antiquities, N.Y.: American Book Co. 1923. pp. 862-863, "The Ibis was a bird worshipped by the Egyptians. The color of its feathers was supposed to symbolize the light and shade of the Moon. The Ibis was thought to be an avatar of Thoth (Hermes). It appeared at the time of the inundation of the Nile and was supposed to deliver Egypt from the serpents which came from Arabia. Its purity was celebrated, and its flesh regarded as incorruptible. Ibises were kept in the temples, and mummified after death after the fashion of human mummies, wrapped in linen." See Herodotus ii. 65, 67, 75, 76.

² The early kingdom of Armenia roughly includes E. Turkey and Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic. It was said to have been founded by Haik, a descendent of Noah in area of Lake Van. Armenia Magna spread a little south of Lake Van where it bordered the Parthian Empire, the Assyrian Empire and Mesopotamia. It spread west to Cappadocia, east to the Caspian Sea and north to the Cyrus River. It became a Persian satrapy in 6th cent B.C.E. Armenia the Greater is listed in Ptolemy's Geography. Vide, The Geography by Claudius Ptolemy, ed. E.L. Stevenson, New York: Dover Pub. 1991.

³ See above footnote on Ethiopia.

⁴ Vide, The Geography by Claudius Ptolemy, ed. E.L. Stevenson, New York: Dover Pub. 1991, third map of Asia. Ptolemy's 7th, 8th & 9th parallels.

, of Saturn. Its name is Chusthis. It causes affliction, adhesion¹ and strangury². In the figure, however, it is a certain man, standing over a marsh, leaving off into one with feet joined³, completely girded from the breasts all the way to the hollows of the feet in variegated linen, having his head shaven leaving one spot where there is hair. This rules the climate of Trachonitrus⁴.

On the third face of Libra — The third decan of Libra has the face of Jupiter. Its name is Psamiatos. It causes nervous afflictions. It is in the appearance of a serpent. It rules the climate of Libya⁵.

On the first face of Scorpio — The first decan of Scorpio has the face of Mars. Its name is Necbeus. It causes painful carbuncles. It is of the form of a crab having wings. It is girt in linen from the breast all the way to the hollows of the feet⁶. It rules the climate of Syria, Palestine and Phoenicia.

On the second face of Scorpio •— The second decan of Scorpio has the ¹ glutinium.

² A painful discharge of urine. [RH]

³ According to the editor's note, Kroll has done some significant tinkering with this line. The end result is unclear.

⁴ The northern district of Palestine beyond the Jordan, lying between Anti-Libanus and the mountains of Arabia, and bounded on the north by the territory of Damascus, on the east by the Auranitis, on the south by Itauraea, and on the west by Gaulanitis. In Ptolemy's Geography, it is shown on the 4th map of Asia due west of Joppa on the border of Arabia in the third clima.

⁵ Libya in Alexander's Empire is shown in Ptolemy's Geography on the 3rd & 4th maps of Africa. however, Ptolemy also uses the name Libya for all of Africa and therefore all four of his maps of Africa are in this sense of Libya. Strictly speaking, Libya was the region of the North African coast along the Mediterranean between Egypt and Cyrenaica. Its southern border was not known.

⁶ It must have a human body surmounted (in place of the head) by a winged crab.

face of the Sun. Its name is Turmantis. It causes the affliction of buboes¹. It is a man standing with his feet joined on the back of a scorpion, holding a great serpent with both feet on either side of his breast. This rules the climate of Cilicia².

On the third face of Scorpio — The third decan of Scorpio has the face of Venus. Its name is Psermes. It makes afflictions of the bones like fractures. It has a human body and the form of a he-goat, holding eggs hanging from a thread in both hands. It rules the climate of Cappadocia, Galatia, and Phrygia³.

On the first face of Sagittarius — The first decan of Sagittarius has the face of Mercury. Its name is Clinothois. It causes festering. It is a man having the head of a dog, extending his one left hand to the lower part, he holds something sharp⁴. It is however a small weapon with points⁵. He is girt with a variegated net all the way to his thighs. It rules the

¹ A bubo (pl. buboes) is a painful swelling in the groin and arm pits. Bubonic Plague is characterized by these symptoms.

² The region of S.E. Asia Minor between the Mediterranean and the Taurus Mountains. Shown in Ptolemy's Geography. Vide, The Geography by Claudius Ptolemy, ed. E.L. Stevenson, New York: Dover Pub. 1991, first map of Asia. It ran along the southern coast of Anatolia from Lycia and Pamphylia in the west to Syria in the east. Its capital was Tarsus (36°N 55', 34°E 53') and lay between Ptolemy's 11th & 12th parallels.

³ Three regions of central Anatolia. In Alexander's Empire, Cappadocia was the westerly most of the three. It bordered Pontus in the north, Armenia in the west, Cilicia in the south and Phrygia in the west. The Cappadoces were a people of Syrian race called White Syrians (Leucosyri) from their complexion. Phrygia was in central Anatolia, south of Bithynia, west of Cappadocia, north of Lycia and Pisidia and east of Mysia, Lydia and Caria. The Phrygians were Thracians. The Galatians were Gauls who invaded Asia Minor and settled there in the 3rd cent BC. Attalus I. conquered them in 230 BCE and forced them to settle in a territory henceforth named for them. It was created from parts of Phrygia and Capadocia). They mixed with the Greek population and culture quickly but preserved their own language.

⁴ acida.

⁵ Assuming an ablative acis of the noun acus.

climate of Asia, Achaia, and Pamphylia¹.

On the second face of Sagittarius — The second decan of Sagittarius has the face of the Moon. Its name is Thursois. It causes afflictions in the knees. This [image] stands on a place which is slippery and sloping downward. He has the face of a weasel², but the body of a man. It rules the *ponto Nichere*³.

On the third face of Sagittarius — The third decan of Sagittarius has the face of Saturn. Its name is Renethis. It causes sciatica and pains in the knees. It has a human likeness. It rules Africa.

On the first face of Capricorn — The first decan of Capricorn has the face of Jupiter. Its name is Renpsois. This sends stiffness to men. It is a certain man without a head. He holds his own head with his right hand, in his left a sword. It causes pains in the knees and loins. It rules Mauritania⁴.

On the second face of Capricorn — The second decan of Capricorn has the face of Mars. Its name is Manethois. It has the face of a bull on the body of a man dressed with the skin of a scarab. This rules Pannonia⁵.

¹ Asia was western Anatolia from the Aegean to Phrygia. It contained Mysia, Lydia, Caria, and Lycia. Achaia was Greece, and Pamphylia, the Mediterranean coast of Anatolia west from Lycia along the coast of what is now called the Gulf of Antalya.

² habens faciem investigatoris. See comment in my introduction. [RH]

³ This may be a reference to the Neckar River in Germany.

⁴ The western most province of the North African coast bordered on the west by the Atlantic Ocean and by Numidia on the east.

⁵ Roughly modern Yugoslavia. The region between the Alps and the Danube. Separated on the west by Noricum by the Mons Cetus and from Upper Italy by the Alps Iuliae, on the south from Illyrium by the Savus, on the east from Dacia by the Danube, and on the north from Germany by the same river. It spans Ptolemy's 13th almost to his 16th parallels. Both Festugiére and Gundel point out that Dacia was associated with Trajan's reign (98-117). Trajan conquered Dacia and made it a Roman Province in 106 C.E.

On the third face of Capricorn — The third decan of Capricorn has the face of the Sun. Its name is Marxois. It induces pain in the shins. It is of human likeness. It rules the climate of Galatia¹.

On the first face of Aquarius — The first decan of Aquarius has the face of Venus. Its name is Ularis. It causes gout. It is of human appearance having the face of a dog, girt from the breasts all the way to the hollows of the foot. It rules Syria².

On the second face of Aquarius — The second decan of Aquarius has the face of Mercury. Its name is Luxois. It causes gout. It has a human likeness. It rules the climate of Germany.

On the third face of Aquarius — The third decan of Aquarius has the face of the Moon. Its name is Crauxes. It causes gout. It has a human form. It rules Sarmatia³.

On the first face of Pisces — The first decan of Pisces has the face of Saturn. Its name is Fambrais. All these three [of the Piscean] faces cause gout. It is a man dressed in dark clothes having his own face⁴.

¹ Presumably European Gaul is intended. Vide The Geography by Claudius Ptolemy, ed. E.L. Stevenson, New York: Dover Pub. 1991. Ptolemy shows Gaul in the third map of Europe. It was bounded on the west by the Atlantic, on the north by the Insula Batavorum and part of the Rhenus (Rhine), on the east by the Rhenus and Alps, and on the south by the Pyrenees and Mediterranean. Gaul comprised all of mod. France and Belgium with parts of Germany and Holland. All this the Greeks called Galatia. Cisalpine Gaul was the North of Italy.

² Along with the first face of Cancer and the first face of Scorpio.

³ The eastern part of Poland and southern part of Russia in Europe extending from the Vistula River and Sarmatici Mountains on the west, which divided it from Germany, to the Volga on the east, which divided it from Scythia. It was bounded on the south and southwest by the Danube, Theiss and Dniester which divided it from Pannonia and Dacia, and by the Euxine and Mount Caucasus which divided it from Colchis and ancient Albania. It extended north to the Baltic and the unknown reaches of Northern Europe. Ptolemy shows it in his Geography in the 8th map of Europe.

⁴ For a change, and not the face of some beast.

He is girt with a belt simply. This rules Britain.

On the second face of Pisces — The second decan of Pisces has the face of Jupiter. Its name is Flugmois. Mars is standing armed. This rules Dacia¹.

On the third face of Pisces — The third decan of Pisces has the face of Mars. its name is Piatris. This rules Chautilcaonia, Tuscany, Italy and Campania².

II. On the Masculine and Feminine Degrees of the Signs.

The first two degrees of the masculine signs are masculine and the following two degrees are feminine³. Understand likewise regarding the pairs of masculine and feminine [degrees]. It is the same in the feminine signs. The first two degrees are feminine and the next two are masculine. The masculine signs are:

Aries, Gemini, Leo, Libra, Sagittarius, Aquarius

The feminine signs are:

Taurus, Cancer, Virgo, Scorpio, Capricorn, Pisces

¹ Dacia is shown in Ptolemy's Geography in the 9th map of Europe. It lay between the Carpathian Mountains and the Danube comprehending Transylvania, Wallachia, Moldavia and part of Hungary.

² See Ptolemy's Geography, the 6th map of Europe. Chautilcaonia, I cannot identify these people but I assume they dwelt on the Italian peninsula. Tuscany is the home of the Etruscans, modern Tuscany. Campania is in south Italy on the west coast.

³ This is a much simpler system than the ones found in later works of the Arabs and the Renaissance. [RH]

III. On the Bright Stars In Each Sign¹.

There are certain nativities which are extolled for their nobility and wealth not because they are worthy due to a commixture of the planets, but rather because the Moon co-rises with brilliant stars. Consequently I thought it advisable to enumerate the bright stars which are in each sign².

In Cancer³ towards the East there are two which are called the Asini, the northerly of the two is in the 8th degree and the southerly of them in the ninth⁴.

Of those of Leo, which are in the head, the northern one⁵ is in the 21st degree, the southern⁶ in the second⁷. Before its mane and the breast there are four, the northern one of which is in the 27th degree⁸; the second of these, which follows this, is in the 28th degree⁹; the third

¹ Pingree, op. cit. p. 432, points out that Neugebauer, (The Exact Sciences in Antiquity, 2nd ed., Providence R.I. 1957, pp. 68-69) showed that the longitudes in the oldest part of this chapter are probably from Hipparchus (circa 130-60 B.C.E.). This is consistent with Gundel's dating of this part of the work.

² We have attempted to identify as many stars as possible in the notes. Where we cannot identify the star, we usually have said nothing. Our identifications cannot be regarded as anything but tentative. There are many inconsistencies in this star catalog and some of the longitudes seem way out of line with the descriptions. In general these positions are about 4° less than the corresponding positions in Ptolemy's Star Catalog. [RH]

³ Following the Egyptian usage, the author begins the Zodiac in Cancer. Yet above he began in Aries.

⁴ We know these two stars as the Asselli; and as the North Assellus and the South Assellus. [Additional by RH] Gamma and Delta Cancrī, respectively. See the star map on p. 40 of our edition of the Anonymous of 379, Treatise on the Bright Fixed Stars.

⁵ Mu Leonis. [RH]

⁶ Epsilon Leonis or Ras Elased Australis. [RH]

⁷ i.e., twenty second. [RH]

⁸ Zeta Leonis or Adhafera. [RH]

⁹ Gamma Leonis or Algieba. [RH]

in the 29th¹; the fourth, which is more brilliant than these, standing in the heart of the lion² is in the 28th degree. again, that which precedes in the head of the lion is in the 4th degree. That which is in the eye-brow, in the 11th degree; the one which is in the back thigh is in the 13th degree³, and the one which is in the back lower leg is in the 17th degree⁴.

Those of Virgo: that one which is in the left wing is in 28th degree⁵. The other, which is in its right part and is called by some Vindemiator⁶, is in the 14th degree. Likewise, the other, which is brighter than the others which are in it [Virgo], placed in the left hand, is called Spica and is in the 22nd degree⁷.

Of the Scales⁸, that one which is in the Southern Scale⁹ is in the 14th degree. But the one which is due south¹⁰ is in the 15th. But the other, which is in the neighborhood of Boötes, is in the 20th degree".

Of Scorpio, the one which leads the three which are in the breast, is in the 8th degree¹². The middle one is in the 10th¹³. The one which follows it is in the 11th degree¹⁴. The one which is in the right foot of

¹ Eta Leonis.

² Alpha Leonis, Cor Leonis, Regulus.

³ Sigma Leonis? [RH]

⁴ Tau Leonis? [RH]

⁵ Beta Virginis or Zavijava. [RH]

⁶ Usually, Vindemiatrix or Epsilon Virginis.

⁷ Anonymous of 379 places Spica in 29 Virgo. It is also Alpha Virginis.

⁸ Note that our writer uses the term "scales" throughout this section. Many of the Greek writings referred to the "scales" as the "claws" of the Scorpion. [RH]

⁹ Probably Mu Librae. [RH]

¹⁰ Ea vero quae in meridionali consistit, in quinto decimo gradu.
[Additional by RH] Alpha Librae or the South Scale.

¹¹ Beta Librae or the North Scale. [RH]

¹² Sigma Scorp. [RH]

¹³ Alpha Scorp. or Antares. [RH]

¹⁴ Tau Scorp. [RH]

Ophiuchus is in the 20th¹. The one which is in the left knee of Ophiuchus is in the 9th degree².

Of Sagittarius, of the two stars in the quadrilateral, the first one is in the 12th degree³, the one which follows is in the 13th degree⁴.

Of those in Capricorn, of the ones which are in his horns, the northern and brilliant one is in the 14th degree⁵; so is the southern one⁶. But of those which are in the tail, the-first one is in the 22 degree⁷; the one that follows is in the 23rd⁸.

Of Aquarius, the one that is in his left shoulder is in the 24th degree of Capricorn⁹; the one which is in his right foot is in the 25th degree of Aquarius¹⁰. The one which is in the middle of the body of Perseus is in the 27th degree¹¹. The one in the left part of Cepheus is in the 29th degree.

Of those in Pisces, the one which is in the end of the tail of the southern fish is in the third degree¹². The northern one which is in the end of the tail of Cetus is in the second degree¹³, but the southern one is in the third degree¹⁴. Likewise, of those which are in the tail of Cetus, the one which leads is a double star and is in the 12th degree,

¹ Xi, 36(A), or Theta Ophiuchi, most likely Xi. [RH]

² Zeta Ophiuchi. [RH]

³ Possibly Sigma Sagittarii or Nunki. [RH]

⁴ Possibly Zeta Sagittarii or Ascella. [RH]

⁵ Alpha Capricorni or Schedir. [RH]

⁶ Beta Capricorni or Caph. [RH]

⁷ Possibly gamma Capricorni or Nashira. [RH]

⁸ Possibly Delta Capricorni or Deneb Algiedi. [RH]

⁹ There is considerable overlap of the two constellations Capricorn and Aquarius. [Additional by RH] Probably this star is Beta Aquarii or Sadalsuud.

¹⁰ Probably Delta Aquarii or Scheat. [RH]

¹¹ Our Perseus is nowhere near this area. [RH]

¹² Omega Piscium. [RH]

¹³ Iota Ceti. [RH]

¹⁴ Beta Ceti or Deneb Kaitos. [RH]

but the one that follows is in the 17th degree¹. The brilliant star in the middle of Andromeda is in the 22nd degree. But the one in the Great Bird² is in the 28th degree. The one which is in the end of the tail of Ursa Minor is in the 18th³

Of Aries, the one which is in the head of the three stars placed first is in the 4th degree⁴. The middle one is in the 5th⁵. But, of Andromeda, the one which is in the girdle is in the 11th degree⁶, the one which is in the right foot of the same is in the 15th degree⁷. The one which is in Perseus' Gorgon is in the 17th⁸.

Of Taurus, the one which is the brilliant Hyade is in the 9th degree⁹, but the one which is common to the right foot of Heniochus, (i.e., Auriga)¹⁰ and the horn of the Bull is in the 23rd". But the other, which is southern, is in the end of the right (southern) horn, is in the 25th degree¹².

Of Perseus, indeed, the leading star in the right foot, is in the first degree, but the one which follows is in the 10th.

Of Heniochus, however, the one which is in the left shoulder is in the 22nd degree¹³.

¹ The best candidates for these are Eta and Theta Ceti respectively, but the double is Theta not Eta. [RH]

² Cygnus?

³ This would have to be Alpha Ursae Minoris, or Polaris. [Additional by RH] Polaris has such high latitude that its longitude would have been difficult to compute. But the description fits.

⁴ Gamma Arietis or Mesarthim. [RH]

⁵ Beta Arietis or Sheratan. [RH]

⁶ Beta Andromedae or Mirach. [RH]

⁷ Probably Phi Andromedae. [RH]

⁸ Probably Beta Persei or Algol, but the longitude seems a bit off. [RH]

⁹ Alpha Tauri or Aldebaran. [RH]

¹⁰ Heniochus is literally, "The-one-who-holds-the-reins."

¹¹ Beta Tauri or El Nath. [RH]

¹² Zeta Tauri or Bull's South Horn. [RH]

¹³ Alpha Aurigae or Capella. [RH]

But of Orion, the one in the left foot¹ is in the 27th degree in which [degree] is also the left foot of Heniochus².

But of those which are in the Belt of Orion, the one which leads is in the 22nd degree³. The one which follows is in the 24th⁴. The one in his right shoulder is in the 29th degree⁵.

Of those in Gemini, the brilliant one which is in the knees, which leads, is in the 10th degree⁶; the other in the 15th⁷. The other which follows this, which some desire to be in the hand of the following Twin, is in the 12th degree. Likewise, that one which is in the head of the preceding Twin, is the 20th degree⁸. The one which is in the head of the following Twin is in the 24th degree⁹. Likewise the one which is in the right hand of Heniochus stands 30 minutes farther away.

The one which is in the head of the Dog is in the 14th¹⁰. The one which is in his back thigh is in the 21st degree". The other, which is in his loins, is in the 23rd¹². And the other, which is in the end of his tail, is in the 24th¹³. But that one which is in the Antecanacula¹⁴ is in the 28th.

¹ Beta Orionis or Rigel. [RH]

² Iota Aurigae. [RH]

³ Delta Orionis or Mintaka. [RH]

⁴ Zeta, Alnilam, or Eta Orionis, Al Nitak, there being three stars in the belt. [RH]

⁵ Alpha Orionis or Betelgeuse. [RH]

⁶ Epsilon Geminorum or Mebsuta. [RH]

⁷ Zeta Geminorum or Mekbuda. [RH]

⁸ Alpha Geminorum or Castor. [RH]

⁹ Beta Geminorum or Pollux. [RH]

¹⁰ Alpha Canis Majoris or Sirius. [RH]

¹¹ Epsilon Canis Majoris or Adhara. [RH]

¹² Delta Canis Majoris or Wasat. [RH]

¹³ Eta Canis Majoris or Aludra. [RH]

¹⁴ e.g. Canis minor qui est antecedens Cani Majori. The little dog which precedes the Big Dog. It is Procyon, or pro-canis, i.e., he who is before the dog. Alpha Canis Minoris.

Therefore in all the aforesaid places, if in nativities there are benevolent planets, especially in their own places and sects', namely in masculine signs and in masculine quarters and diurnal planets above the earth in diurnal figures and by night, under the earth and e converse feminine [planets] in feminine signs and quarters and nocturnal planets above the earth in nocturnal figures but by day under the earth according to the aforesaid ages² they show good things; malevolent planets, however, the contrary and the greater intemperateness of good and evil the greater the impression made³. The planets rejoice, however, when they are in the places of the benevolent [planets] and of those having propriety in sect⁴, just as also for instance, if in their own places⁵, the malevolent planets hold the place of the benevolent planets; just as if the benevolent planets were in the places of the malevolent [planets] and not of proper sect, as has been said⁶, they are contrary. Likewise in masculine nativities⁷, when the planets are in masculine signs they especially rejoice. In feminine nativities⁸, it is better for many of planets to be in feminine signs. Likewise when the planets and

¹ In other words, for this author, a planet dignified by being in its proper sect or in proprio conditione and not only when in house, exaltation, triplicity, term or face. It is then in its proper Haym, to use the Medieval Arabicism. A planet is in its proper sect when it is a masculine planet in masculine signs and in masculine quarters and diurnal planets above the earth in diurnal figures and by night, under the earth and e converse feminine [planets] in feminine signs and quarters and nocturnal planets above the earth in nocturnal figures but by day under the earth.

² There have been no "aforesaid ages" of course. This statement shows that the text is a compilation, as Festugière claimed.

³ boni quidem et mali intemperiem ad relationem magis prementium.

⁴ i.e., habendum proprietatum in conditionibus = habendum propriam condicionem or, having their own proper sect.

⁵ by sect? The sense here is not clear in the Latin. [RH]

⁶ In its own Haym defined above. See page 18, note 1.

⁷ That is nativities of men.

⁸ nativities of women.

especially the luminaries are increasing in number¹ rejoice extremely. As the light of one of them having been increased is made clearer, so too [it is] in the life of men. Moreover, were each of the planets in the opposition of their own houses², they show adversities. Obsessions³ of the malevolent planets against the Sun, Moon, Mercury and the Horoscope⁴ ought to be observed more than in any of the other angles. For then the malefics⁵ are inducers of evil and the bēnefics exhibitors of good things.

¹ Cf. The Book of Instruction in the Elements of the Art of Astrology, trans. R. Ramsay Wright, London: Luzac & Co, 1934. p. 111. Increase in number: The equations of the planets are set down in tables opposite numbers in two vertical rows, one of which continues to increase up to six signs and the other decreases from the twelfth sign. When you wish to introduce an argument number of a planet into these two rows with the object of ascertaining the equation, if it falls in the first row it is called, "increasing," and if it falls in the second, it is called, "decreasing." There is also increase and decrease of luminosity or magnitude due to nearness or distance from the earth. There is also increase or decrease in reference to the horizon. The quadrant from the ascendant to the M.C. and the one opposite it are deemed increasing; the other two decreasing.

² i.e., in detriment.

³ obsessiones. [RH]

⁴ The author uses both "horoscope" and "ascendant" for the eastern angle. See below, "Ascendant."

⁵ Generally the author uses the term malevolus for malefic, and benevolus for benefic, planet. Here he has used mali and boni. This general use of benevolus and malevolus seems significant. Literally they mean. "willing good" and "willing evil." This attribution of conscious volition to the planets is quite different than the more common and possibly later concept of malefic and benefic which simply mean, "causing, making or doing good or evil." In this latter case one can conceive of the planets as having an effect without implying a will. The idea certainly moves in the direction of mechanistic causality and away from the deification of the planets. It is interesting that in this text, so clearly a product of pagan polytheism we find an implied volition attributed to the planets through the choice of words used to signify them.

With these things being so I will show more fully the necessary place which I have proven by experience is the cause of the occasion² of fears, clangers and imprisonment. This is one of the places taken thus: By day from Saturn to Mars, but by night from Mars to Saturn, and it is projected from the ascendant and wherever the last number falls, there will be the fearful place of downfall³. It will be fitting to consider this, lest by chance it be the sign of a malevolent planet or if the malevolent planets are in it or aspect it. Thus they make nativities fallible, dangerous or degraded⁴. The nature of each planet and the sign show the species of the downfall⁵; the benevolent planets, when they are with [the place] or aspect it, make the evil or depredation of downfalls less.

¹ It will shortly be clear that this "place" is an "Arabic Part." Its presence in this work, which surely contains Hellenistic Egyptian astrological lore, shows that the so-called Arabic Parts ought to be re-dubbed "Egyptian Parts." In Chapter XVI the same part is called "the Part of the Downfall." Cf. the surviving fragment of the Hermetic Panaretus in Introductory Matters, by Paulus Alexandrinus translated by Robert Schmidt, with Introduction and notes by Robert Hand, The Golden Hind Press, Berkeley Springs: 1993, p.46. This fragment contains attested Hermetic teaching on the "lots," or "parts." A "Lot of Necessity" is mentioned therein but it is not this "Necessary Place." Aside from the general subject of "Lots," this chapter and the following discussions of hours, days, and months have no connection with the Panaretus. [Additional by RH] Gundel has a note which pertains to the tide in Latin "De Necessario Loco" or "On the Necessary Place." The Latin appears to be a literal translation from the Greek of the title "peri Aitiatikou Topou," which means "on the noxious place." This term occurs in Vettius Valens much of whose material is drawn from the same sources as the Liber Hermetis. 'Aitiatikos' also means 'causal' which could be the source of this rather strange translation from Greek into Latin.

² occasio. This word must be taken in three senses: an evil event, the time or season in which such an event takes place and the cause of the event.

³ . . . ibi erit occasionalis locus timorum particeps.

⁴ depositivae. The assumption is that, since the nativity is fallible, etc so is the life.

⁵ species occasionis.

I have seen that this place has a further use. If Saturn and Mars are found in the sextile aspect of the Sun or Moon the nativity, itself, ought to be feared for and is prone to downfall¹ and especially when they are in like signs and in [signs] hearing each other. Downfalls² happen at the time when any of them make rays to a configuration³ of this sort, so that if the Sun should aspect Saturn, or Mars [should aspect] the Moon, or again Mars [should aspect] Saturn, and the Sun [should aspect] the Moon, and if neither the Sun nor both are in it⁴, but one of them should aspect with a sextile, but the other by a trine or by a square or by opposition or, perhaps being averse⁵, it makes tradition or assumption⁶ in a configuration of this sort⁷; then the nativity is in great troubles, and the native will have doubts and detentions or be under custody or have causes of suspicion of such things, and he will be wracked with an evil conscience. And if some benevolent planet is present to any of them, or shall aspect from its own place, it will cause liberation from the fears or dangers or cause a change for the good, but he will not remain without inquietude.

But if the figure of the nativity is unfortunate without the relief⁸ of the benevolent planets, he will be condemned [and] he will be in prison or in custody. But if the essence⁹ of the nativity should be in any way great, when such a configuration¹⁰ is discovered, he will doubt of his own dignity at that time and will suffer accusations or treacheries or complaints and he will respond to such openly before a

¹ occasionalis

² occasiones.

³ ad huiusmodi figuram. Here, "figure" means configuration.

⁴ i.e., in the necessary place.

⁵ remotus. [RH]

⁶ tradition or assumption is from παραδοσις και παραληψις. These terms also show up in Vettius Valens as relating to a theory of Chronocrators in which a planet transfers rulership to another by aspect or conjunction.

⁷ huiusmodi figura.

⁸ sine remedio.

⁹ substantia. The word translated here may be the same one translated, occasionally in Latin as esse, or in Arabic as Algebutar.

¹⁰ figura

tyrant or king, either himself or through another¹, so that he may be released from fear and that his agony may be completed². In such wise this place is most potent.

When therefore all the times and years run together into one³, that which is from the downfall shall be fulfilled, namely detention or disposition⁴ according to what the division of the years is, it perfects fears or vexations. But if it will be the nativity of an infant, and it will have such a configuration, it is fitting to say that the fear is regarding the father or mother. If a slave, regarding the lord. However, if of an orphan, he falls ill or suffers torments⁵. Some are detained in chains⁶ and in prisons or they make frequent visits in those places. And if somehow at that time a benevolent planet enters that place or aspects it, a liberation or alleviation of the evil happens. But if the benefics and the malefics, both [evils and alleviations]. It is otherwise, if the malevolent [planets] should aspect the Sun or Moon by square or opposition; they induce fears and detentions. If, however, the nativity is assisted by the testimony of the benevolent [planets], or by all of its essence, although the detention may not happen, some other detentions will trouble him at the same time from another cause, such as because of legal trouble, or because of a change in bail, or when condemned, to be bound, or, besides these circumstances, either, as happens often, on account of the law or necessity to defend [oneself]⁷. Some indeed, when they are under another [person's] power, making their decision beyond their will, seem somehow to be detained and tormented in

¹ Egads, an attorney (God help him!).

² lit. "that the place of his agony be accomplished."

³ Your editor believes that this is a reference to a method common in Valens and others of adding up the planetary periods and ascensional times of the ruled signs to get a time span. In other words "when the sum of the relevant periods adds up to a particular total" the event occurs. [RH]

⁴ dispositio. The word disposition is often used in astrological texts written in English to describe the relation a planet in a sign has to the sign's ruler. The Latin term dispositio has a legal connotation signifying something like an authority over something (or someone).

⁵ passiones.

⁶ in vincionibus.

⁷ vel necessitatem assistere.

accordance with [their] conscience. But others travelling or navigating are detained on islands or uninhabitable places, or halt in sacred places, or get into [legal] trouble or on account of the state¹, or in watery places. But again, some are also detained by chronic illnesses or sacred diseases² or divinely inspired manias with dark rigors³ and the like. It is, indeed, fitting to prudently consider in a place of this sort, whether the detention occurs because of glory or necessity or on account of some other malefic cause.

For the sake of an example, let both the malevolent planets aspect the Sun and Moon by a sextile. If it should come to pass that the luminaries should be without the aid of the benevolent [planets], it would be said that a detention happens . . . [There is a lacuna in the text here, Gundel tells us, of one word and twelve lines in length]. . . Now the configuration of the nativity was good. This man, while he was a soldier, in the 35th year of his birth, was put in charge of the custody of prisoners, where he coveted a woman, on account of which he was hastily⁴ accused, and without thinking he fled the danger. At the same time, apprehending a fugitive slave, he bound [him]⁵.

V. Concerning the First Dangerous Year.

The dangerous year will be found from the assumption or tradition⁶ of the malevolent [planets] to the luminaries and to the horoscope and to each other and this happens for the entire year⁷. When the years shall have been distributed from the ascending sign, if the year of profection arrives at the sign of the conjunction or prevention or in those [signs]

¹ propter rem publicam.

² i.e., Epilepsies

³ theolepsiis maniis sciasmis rigoribus. It may be noteworthy that the Latin translator left these words in Greek.

⁴ turbabiliter.

⁵ The sense of this passage would no doubt be clearer had we the section which has been lost.

⁶ See footnote 157 above.

⁷ . . . universalis quidem et iste fit.

square or in opposition to it, that year will be dangerous or confused¹, and especially if, with these things being so², Saturn is thus found by transits in one of the places of the nativity cadent from the angles and, with its underlying nature concurring⁴, death or infirmities of the body follow, or effusion of blood, or false ill⁵s, or hidden illnesses, falls and unexpected dangers. Sometimes the danger happens at the same time as corporal things related to faculties and dignities favored⁶ under the testimony or aspect of the benevolent [planets].

VI. Concerning the Dangerous Year⁷.

Take [the distance] from Saturn according as it is found in the nativity to the lord of the conjunction or prevention and project this from the ascendant and wherever the end of the number falls, when Saturn arrives at that point by transits or to its square or opposition, then death will come or grave danger of the body or of things. Similarly, that year is dangerous when it arrives at the Head or Tail of the Dragon or in their square with a malevolent [planet] aspecting the Sun. If anyone were to grow ill then, the illness will be dangerous or mortal⁹. But the ¹ turbabilis.

² et maxime si his se habentibus.

³ Note! An example of the use of transits in Ancient/ Medieval Astrology.

⁴ substantia concurrente. This may be a reference to its local determination or specific meaning due to the combined influence of its house position, rulership and degree of dignity.

⁵ Misdiagnosed illnesses? Hypochondria?

⁶ adiutis.

⁷ This part corresponds to Bonatti's third part of the eighth house or pars anni in quo timetur nato. Cf. The Lost Key to Prediction: The Arabic Part in Astrology, Robert Zoller, N.Y.: 1980 Inner Traditions International: p 107. The language found here is so similar to that used by Bonatti it makes one wonder if he used this text as a source.

⁸ ingressus.

⁹ mortifera.

significations of the intentions' of the illness happen when the Moon shall transit the same place of the Head or Tail. So, since the aforesaid place, namely that of the Head or Tail, is violent, those who arrive at this [place], may not indeed renounce the fatal decrees by their own judgment². I say this because it is possible, according to speculation of this sort, for those arriving [at this point] to break the evil³.

For God, desiring that man [be] unharmed, gave him intellect, discretion and discipline through which he may know for himself the contingencies, so that he may go forth⁴ more promptly towards the Good and more robustly against evil. There are, therefore, some things which ought to be observed, which are foreknown from the presence or testimony of the benevolent [planets].

Whence if a benevolent [planet] is conjunct with a malevolent [planet] signifying anything sinister or [if the benefic] should aspect him, it breaks his⁵ malice. Similarly if, to some benevolent [planet] having the possibility of doing good, a malevolent [planet] be conjoined, it will prohibit the good. But if malevolent and benevolent signifiers are in a figure having no mutual aspect, the true judgment is made either to the good or to the contrary.

Therefore in this way, those who are erudite with respect to this speculation, desiring to prognosticate either good things or the contraries, will be assisted in this: namely, that they will not be worn down with empty hope and, grieving, endure a tormented vigil⁶; and because they do not long for vain impossibilities, or again, being prepared by the help of time, they will obtain the hoped for things. Unexpected good, just like unexpected evil sometimes bears sorrow and unexpected evil not previously prepared⁷ by fortune makes the greatest sorrow. So that not deviating from these things let us go to other things. It will be fitting for us to consider the Head of the Dragon in a nativity,

¹ intention meaning intensification as opposed to remission.

² put Latin.

³ But not solely by one's own will, as it turns out.

⁴ exsistat = go forth or exist, be.

⁵ the malefic's

⁶ A sleepless night due to mental anguish.

⁷ praexercitum.

in what sign it is, whether, moveable, fixed or of double body, and in which planet's house, or triplicity or exaltation, [for] at that time the virtue of both the planet and of the sign will be debilitated. Indeed, we find very often that planets having the possibility to cause something, either according to the nativity, or according to the transit to that place, do not produce anything. But if they make some appearance in the Head or in the Tail, they are causers of evil things, especially if they are found retrograde or occidental.

II. Concerning the Knowledge of the Danger: In What Time or Year It Happens.

In revolutions it will be fitting to consider the Head of the Dragon of the Year, in what place of the nativity it [the Head of the Dragon] transits¹, namely if it is in a tropical, or fixed, or bicorneporeal sign, and in what planet's house or exaltation, because in a similar way it obliterates to the same extent the power of a planet in [a sign] or transiting in that [sign], as [it does] the lord [of the sign]; even if [the planet] is found to be the lord of the year, it is not able to cause anything until [the Head of the Dragon] has separated from the place. Know this always, that the conjunctions and preventions and their squares and oppositions² signify the death bearing years. When the year [motion by profection?] having been freed from the ascendant arrives in these malevolent places with the malevolent [planets or lunar nodes] retrograding in them, the benevolent [planets] being averted³ from their aspect⁴, in these especially, the cycles⁵ of life of the native is completed.

III. Concerning the Month in Which the Native Will Die.

¹ i.e., look to the Solar Return; find the Head of the Dragon. See where it falls in the Natal.

² tetragona et diametra.

³ remotis. [RH]

⁴ that is, from the aspect to these malefic places (so that they cannot help).

⁵ annus vitae.

Take [the distance] from the Moon of the nativity to the Sun in the Revolution¹ and project it from the ascendant². If the number arrives at the previous conjunction or prevention with the malevolent [planets] present in that place, and the benevolent [planets] averse³, you may understand that the month is death-bearing.

IX. On the Day of Death.

Take [the distance] from the degree of the conjunction of the month to the degree of the revolution of the Moon⁴ and project it from the ascendant of the nativity giving 30 degrees to each sign. Wherever the number ends, in that sign and degree will be the dangerous and death bearing day. Then it is fitting that you consider, lest perhaps, either the day arrives⁵ at the squares or opposition⁶ of the place of the antecedent conjunction or prevention, or to the Head or Tail of the Dragon, or their squares, or to a place in the nativity where any malevolent planet is or in the square or opposition of any malevolent [planet]. Then indeed, you may know the unfortunate, dangerous, death-bearing day, especially if the malefic planets transit⁷ the place by the revolution. Should the day arrive to that place with the benevolent [planets] averse⁸ to these places, the day will be more mortal and especially if the lord of the day shall be aspected⁹ by malevolent [planets]. Confronted with their fate, many men have given themselves to a precipice or evilly committed suicide.

¹ Which will be the same in a Solar Return, unless it is a Lunar Return figure which is meant.

² which one we are not told.

³ remotis. [RH]

⁴ i.e., the return of the Moon to its natal position?

⁵ By profection, probably. Otherwise it would seem to be by transit. If by transit, perhaps by transit of the Sun to this degree. The transit of the malefics, or the transit of the Nodes would not necessarily occur in the allotted time.

⁶ eorum quadratis sive oppositis.

⁷ ingrediuntur.

⁸ remotis. [RH]

⁹ inspicietur.

X. On Finding the Revolution of the Hour.

We must necessarily make a revolution. It produces much in the power of the temporal mutations of years. Sometimes it confirms the virtues of events. Sometimes a revolution prohibits the previously made signification of its own events. Therefore on the day of birth, for a subsequent year, diligently equating the planets, we thus discover the horoscope of the year¹. With the Sun existing in the sign of the nativity we consider the Moon. See what sign it was in at that time and in what hour it comes to the degree of the revolution, which it had in the nativity; we call that the hour. If the nativity is nocturnal and the revolution happens in the day, then we make a combination [or comparison] of the diurnal lords and the lord of the term and of the ascendant to the planets of the birth.

XI. On the Revolution of the Month.

Concerning the month of the revolution, it has been seen thus for the king: Take [the distance] from the Sun of the revolution to the Moon of the nativity and project [it] from the ascendant,, and in whatever sign it arrives at, consider the lord of the sign, if it is in the angles or in the eleventh or in the fifth or in the ninth, [and according to] the planets, which were in that [sign] or aspecting it you will attribute good or evil things. But you will take the days from the Moon in the revolution to the Sun in the nativity and you will project it from the ascendant. But some, adding², call [the distance from] the lord of the other degrees of the conjunction or prevention to that [the degree of the conjunction or prevention] the month. And indeed, some say that this month is operative. Whatever kind of aspect the Sun and Moon are found to have in the nativity, such obtaining³ in the revolution will signify the month. For example, the Sun in 5 degrees of Leo, the Moon in 26 degrees of Virgo. From the Sun to the Moon is 81 degrees. The Moon, being distant by these [degrees] from the Sun in every month and making the same configuration as she had in the nativity, shows the month¹.

¹ This is the Solar Return.

² addiscentes.

³ possidens.

Another Method:

It has been seen by me from experience that the months of the revolution are without fail those, in which the divisions of the years are made by the signs. In these, the Sun applying either into their squares or oppositions, announces the event, which is signified in the year, by months or days. Likewise, Mars, Venus, Mercury or the Moon transiting² into the aforesaid places show [the same things]. But we judge that place to be more operative for the event in which the aforementioned stars, namely Mars, Venus, Mercury or the Moon, transiting, make an appearance. Then, indeed, the operation causes the reformation of things. But if someone will have such a configuration, [and] such a sign will rise³, no mutation or renovation happens nor can the completion of an event be expected. The Sun, indeed, transiting the places⁴, is more active in stirring up the powers of the lords of the years⁵.

¹ The idea seems to be that the manifestations of each month will be shown whenever the Moon holds the same relation to the Sun (whatever it was) as it held in the nativity. This method seems to be used in lieu of monthly profections.

² ingredientes.

³ tale exierit signum. Namely such a sign as was mentioned above—one that rules the year. Such a sign merely indicates a year, it does not cause mutations, etc.

⁴ or, houses.

⁵ The idea seems to be that the transits bring about events and are useful for timing such events as they produce. The mere presence in the natal of a configuration such as that described does not produce an event, a renovation of things or the completion of an event.

XII. On the Useful and Non-useful Days.

You will find the active and inactive or idle day thus: Always multiply the completed years of the nativity by five and a quarter and add to the last year the days which shall have been from the beginning of the birthday¹ all the way to the day which you desire, and subtract by twelves. Whatever remains less than twelve project² from the ascendant giving to each sign one day and wherever the number will be, that sign has the day. Then we consider from the sign, whether it be in a strong place or not. It is proper to attend to the Moon and its aspects and how they are configured with the sign. If indeed regarding the question of the day, the Moon or the sign of the nutation³ show the testimony, the day will be good, outstanding or useful in stronger places, but in the rest, mediocre. But if the day and the nutation are in the same sign, the Moon, indeed, is better. If, however, the Moon aversely⁴ aspects the day, in strong places or in signs, it will be mediocre and not extremely useful. In the rest, however, miserable, damned and dangerous. It is fitting to consider the lord of the day, how it is configured and by what it is aspected and whether it is in its own sign or in an angle or succedent, or whether it is averse, the planets by transit, how they hold themselves to the day and to the lord of the day. Therefore, according to the nature of each sign and star and day, it will be clearly indicated. But if, in a sign, in which someone has a day⁵, the transit of a planet or aspect is on that day, the day becomes the significator of good or evil according to the planets which are in it or aspect it. Likewise regarding those events which the year signifies; regarding those things, it will operate, when the day arrives in places of tradition or assumption and in their squares and oppositions.

¹ ab initio nativitis.

² eiectas ab ascendente.

³ He will discuss the nutations in the next section.

⁴ remote. [RH]

⁵ vel sit remotus.

⁶ that is, the sign of someone's diurnal profection. [RH]

For example¹, the fourth year of Hadrian, [for someone born] on the 13th degree² of February in the first nocturnal hour before the day, it is sought³ on the 12th of October in the 36th year of his nativity. With the years, namely, this same 36, multiplied by $5\frac{1}{4}$ they make 189. But the days which are from the day of birth as far as the 18th are 243 days⁴. There are 432 days in the sum; from which 360 always having been subtracted⁵, 72 remain, which are always projected from the ascendant⁶. Moreover the ascendant was Virgo. Clearly, the divided

¹ In this example the Latin was rather corrupt. We have used the emendations suggested in the notes by Gundel, especially it goes with the Greek in a parallel passage from Vettius Valens. which we give below:

Let it be, for example, the 4th year of Hadrian, 13th of Mecheir, the first nocturnal hour. It is necessary to seek the 20th year of Antoninus, the 10th of Phaophi. [When the 36 years are multiplied into $5\frac{1}{4}$, 189 result, and the days from the birth] are 243. Together 432 result. I subtract 360 days. 72 are left over. I depart with these from the horoskopos, Virgo. It left off in Leo. The day is in the decline [apoklima]. The lord of the birth, the Sun, was opposed to the day (for the Sun was in Aquarius at the birth). And Arcs by ingress and the Moon in Capricorn are in aversion. The day is raised off the ground. And it was in regard to the place concerning slaves. The anger was against a servile person. And the same natural method, if the Sun should come to be in them, predicts the event arising in the month. Book V chapter 7.

Neugebauer cites this passage from Vettius Valens and gives a recomputed natal chart for the date in question. These agree quite closely with those given in Valens: Mo 3°Sc, Me 18°Aq, Ve 25°Cp, Su 18°Aq, Ma 22°Vi, Ju 23°Li, Sa 0°Cn, Asc. 5°Vi Approx. (All we know is that it is the first hour of the night.)

² Clearly the day of February, not the "degree." [RH]

³ Taking petitur for petitus as according to Gundel's notes. [RH]

⁴ Tyis reference to the 18th can only mean that the calculation is being done backwards from the next birthday. 12 [Feb.] + 31 [Jan.] + 31 [Dec.] + 30 [Nov.] + 18 [days before the end of October] = 122. 365 - 122 = 243.

⁵ demptis.

⁶ The entire preceding has simply been a method for computing how old one is on a given day in days, in order to compute the sign of ones diurnal profection. We would perform the procedure as follows:

Compute the age in days, using a day number table. Subtract out 360 from number ended the sign of Leo (cadent from the angles to be sure) having given one day through the sign. The lord of the day was the Sun, which in the nativity¹ was an enemy of the day. Mars and the Moon, who were found by transit², were averse³ to the aspect of the day, because the day was elevated⁴. It was however in the place of slaves⁵ and therefore an indignation against a servile person had been committed. It is fitting, however, to consider the sign, in which the day is and its lord, in what manner they hold themselves, and which planets aspect the place and its lord and what kind of appearance they make, whether the planet may be a morning star⁶ or an evening star⁷, and whether it may be oriental, occidental or acronycal (i.e., appearing in the end of the night) and if it is in the first or second station and if it is increasing in number⁸ and if it is in the first house or in triplicity or the result until the number is below 360. The subtract 12 from the result until it is below 12. The result added to the ascending sign is the sign of the diurnal profection. [RH]

¹ natal Sun in Aquarius. [RH]

² per ingressum.

³ remoti. [RH]

⁴ suspensus. [Additional by RH] The Greek passage makes it clear that this refers to the sign of the daily profection being above the horizon at the time in question.

⁵ His natal Sun was in Aquarius in the sixth house, which is the house of slaves in ancient astrology. [RH]

⁶ eous.

⁷ hesperus.

⁸ Cf. The Book of Instruction in the Elements of the Art of Astrology, trans. R. Ramsay Wright, London: Luzac & Co, 1934. p. 111. He cites six usages: 1. Increase in rate of movement, when a planet moves faster than its mean rate; 2. increase in number. The equations of the planets are set down in tables opposite numbers in two vertical rows, one of which continues to increase up to six signs and the other decreases from the twelfth sign. When you wish to introduce an argument number of a planet into these two rows with the object of ascertaining the equation, if it falls in the first row it is called, "increasing," and if it falls in the second, it is called, "decreasing." 3. Increase in equation. When the equation itself is increased. 4. Increase by calculation. This occurs when the equation of the anomaly has to be added to the true exaltation. And so, the appearance of the planet, [and] the changing of the Moon will signify the event for you.

longitude of the center to obtain the true position of the planet in the ecliptic. 5. There is also increase and decrease of luminosity or magnitude due to nearness or distance from the earth. 6. There is also increase or decrease in reference to the horizon. The quadrant from the ascendant to the M.C. and the one opposite it are deemed increasing; the other two decreasing.

XIII. On the Nutations of the Moon.

It ought to be begun in the first place from Cancer. The Moon conjunct the Sun in Cancer and appearing² in Leo will nod to Taurus. (The ¹ Gundel sees this chapter as a survival of a very ancient stellar religious doctrine of the Moon as Allotter of Fate. He asserts that the author of this section himself no longer understood the idea behind it. He feels that the rulership of the month is determined by the New Moon and the previous New Moon. Thus, the "nodding" and "looking" is the action of the Moon dispensing rulership from different points along the ecliptic. The points at which it does this, primarily, are the New Moon itself and the Moon's first visibility. Secondarily, however, the Moon continues to "nod" to a sign on the other side of the ecliptic as it passes from sign to sign after becoming visible in whatever sign. The entries below set out what signs the Moon "regards" from what signs as it runs around the ecliptic. This technique is not a feature of either Modern or Medieval astrology. It survives in Valens as well, though in an even more cryptic and misleading fashion than here. We see the author of the Liber Hermetis employing it in the previous chapter.

While the technique mentioned by Gundel is not used anymore, the arrangement of signs (see attached diagram) is identical with the "The Degrees of Equal Power" mentioned by Al-Biruni's Tafhim and Guido Bonatti's Liber Astronomiae. Cf. Liber Astronomicus [Guidonis Bonatti Forliviensis Mathematici de Astronomia Tractatus X universum quod iudiciariam rationem nativitatum, aeris tempestatum attinet, comprehendentes], 1550 Basel edition, Tractatus Secundus Pars Secunda, Chapter XXVIII. Also Cf. sec. 377 of R. Ramsay Wright's trans. of Al-Biruni's The Book of Instruction in the Elements of the Art of Astrology. The same relationships are discussed. They are degrees on the zodiac equidistant from the solstices (our Antiscia) and those equidistant from the equinoxes (for which we have no name (actually some modern authors call them contra-antiscia RH)). The author calls them "signs of equal ascension" in the chapter below on Climacteric Years. In chap. XVI Liber Hermetis, these relationships are also mentioned.

² apparens. We are running into language here possibly reflecting and attempting to duplicate an original Greek word for "phase", "appearance" or "aspect", like phainetai. The idea seems to be that a conjunction of the luminaries in a given sign will result in the first appearance of the Moon in the next sign. This seems to assume that the first visibility of the Moon is about a day and a half to two days after the exact conjunction so that the Moon must be about 20-26 degrees away from the Sun at that time. This would frequently put it in the next sign. In fact, the Lunar Crescent immediately following the appearance] having been made in Virgo, it will nod to Aries, in Libra in Pisces, in Scorpio in Aquarius, in Sagittarius in Capricorn. For this reason the first quarter, which is before the prevention, makes a looking¹ toward the east. Afterwards, in the second quarter, the looking is taken towards the west, afterwards it jumps backwards. In Capricorn it looks to Sagittarius, in Aquarius to Scorpio, in Pisces to Libra, in Aries to Virgo, in Taurus to Leo, in Gemini to Cancer.

On the Conjunction made in Leo — If a conjunction is made in Leo and the Moon becomes visible in Virgo, it nods to Gemini, in Libra to Taurus, in Scorpio to Aries, in Sagittarius to Pisces, in Capricorn to Aquarius. In the second quarter jumping backwards it makes a nod to Aquarius to Capricorn, in Pisces to Sagittarius, in Aries to Scorpio, in Taurus to Libra, in Gemini to Virgo, in Cancer to Leo.

On the Conjunction made in Virgo — If a conjunction is made in Virgo and the Moon appeared in Libra, it will nod to Cancer, in Scorpio to Gemini, in Sagittarius to Taurus, in Capricorn to Aries, in Aquarius to Pisces. In the second quarter in Pisces to Aquarius, in Aries to Capricorn, in Taurus to Sagittarius, in Gemini to Scorpio, in Cancer to Libra, in Leo to Virgo.

On the Conjunction made in Libra — If a conjunction is made in Libra and the Moon appeared in Scorpio, it will nod to Leo, in Sagittarius to Cancer, in Capricorn to Gemini, in Aquarius to Taurus, in Pisces to Aries. In the second quarter, jumping backwards, in Aries to Pisces, in Taurus to Aquarius, in Gemini to Capricorn, in Cancer to Sagittarius, in Leo to Scorpio, in Virgo to Libra.

On the Conjunction made in Scorpio — If a conjunction is made in Scorpio and the Moon appeared in Sagittarius, it will nod to Virgo, in Capricorn to Leo, in Aquarius to Cancer, in Pisces to Gemini, in Aries to Taurus. In the second quarter jumping backwards in Taurus to Aries,

New Moon can appear rather sooner than this and the arc of vision can be about 10 degrees.

¹ aspiciens. Literally, "looking." The idea seems to be that the Moon "looks at the east" when at the first quarter and at the west when at the second (or last) quarter.

in Gemini to Pisces, in Cancer to Aquarius, in Leo to Capricorn, in Virgo to Sagittarius, in Libra to Scorpio.

On the Conjunction made in Sagittarius — With a conjunction made in Sagittarius, when the Moon appears in Capricorn, it will nod to Libra, in Aquarius to Virgo, in Pisces to Leo, in Aries to Cancer, in to Taurus Gemini. In the second quarter, jumping backwards in Gemini to Taurus, in Cancer to Aries, in Leo to Pisces, in Virgo to Aquarius, in Libra to Capricorn, in Scorpio to Sagittarius.

On the Conjunction made in Capricorn — With a conjunction made in Capricorn while the Moon appears in Aquarius, it will nod to Scorpio, in Pisces to Libra, in Aries to Virgo, in Taurus to Leo, in Gemini to Cancer. In the second quarter jumping backwards in Cancer to Gemini, in Leo to Taurus, in Virgo to Aries, in Libra to Pisces, in Scorpio to Aquarius, in Sagittarius to Capricorn.

On the Conjunction made in Aquarius — The conjunction happening in Aquarius, when the Moon will appear in Pisces it will nod to Sagittarius, in Aries to Scorpio, in Taurus to Libra, in Gemini to Virgo, in Cancer to Libra. In the second quarter jumping backwards in Leo to Cancer, in Virgo to Gemini, in Libra to Taurus, in Scorpio to Aries, in Sagittarius to Pisces, in Capricorn to Aquarius.

On the Conjunction made in Pisces — The conjunction happening in Pisces, when the Moon will appear in Aries it will nod to Capricorn, in Taurus to Sagittarius, in Gemini to Scorpio, in Cancer to Libra, in Leo to Virgo. In the second quarter jumping backwards, in Virgo to Leo in Libra to Cancer, in Scorpio to Gemini, in Sagittarius to Taurus, in Capricorn to Aries, in Aquarius to Pisces.

On the Conjunction made in Aries — The conjunction occurring in Aries, when the Moon appears in Taurus, it will nod to Aquarius, in Gemini to Capricorn, in Cancer to Sagittarius, in Leo to Scorpio, in Virgo to Libra. In the second quarter, jumping backwards, in Libra to Virgo, in Scorpio to Leo, in Sagittarius to Cancer, in Capricorn to Gemini, in Aquarius to Taurus, in Pisces to Aries.

On the Conjunction made in Taurus — The conjunction made in Taurus, when the Moon appears in Gemini, it will nod to Pisces, in Cancer to Aquarius, in Leo to Capricorn, in Virgo to Sagittarius, in Libra to Scorpio. In the second quarter jumping backwards, in Scorpio to Libra, in Sagittarius to Virgo, in Capricorn to Leo, in Aquarius to Cancer, in Pisces to Gemini, in Aries to Taurus.

On the Conjunction made in Gemini — The conjunction made in Gemini, when the Moon appears in Cancer, it will nod to Aries, in Leo to Pisces, in Virgo to Aquarius, in Libra to Capricorn, in Scorpio to Sagittarius. In the second quarter, jumping backwards, in Sagittarius to Scorpio, in Capricorn to Libra, in Aquarius to Virgo, in Pisces to Leo, in Aries to Cancer, in Taurus to Gemini.

XI . On the 12 Places'.

The first place is called in Greek horoscopus, the second epanafora, the third proanafora, the fourth the center of under the earth², the fifth epanafora of the center under the earth, the sixth apoclima of the west center, the seventh the center of the west, the eighth epicatafora of the west, the ninth proanafora or apoclima of the Mid Heaven, the tenth the center of the Mid Heaven, the eleventh, the twelfth proanafora of the horoscopus.

XV. On the Climacteric Years³.

We make a beginning from the horoscope connecting to each year the places pertaining to it.

¹ These are the twelve houses. Gundel sees the Greek terminology used as part of the specifically Hermetic details of this work.

² hypogaeum.

³ This is the same thing as profection except that instead of counting the ascendant as the birthday and the second house cusp as the birthday when you are one year old (which would result in the birthday when you become 12 years old returning to the ascendant), the author calls the first house the first year the first house. This necessarily results in the 12th year being the 12th house, and so on.

The first year is the horoscope's. The native will grow ill and he will be in fears.

The second year belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope; there will be dangers from catarrhs or cramps.

The third year belongs to the apoclima of the fourth place, full of dangers, fallible. It is the sinister sextile of the horoscope.

The fourth year belongs to the subterranean angle, which is the sinister trimeter¹ of the horoscope.

The fifth year belongs to the epanafora of the subterranean angle, which is the sinister trine of the horoscope, the place of the Good Fortune, the first of Venus², he will grow ill.

The sixth year is belongs to the apoclima of the west, which is the Evil Fortune and is an unconnected place, averse³ to the horoscope, the second of Saturn. To this is connected the sextile number⁴.

¹ Trimetrum. In prosody a trimetrus has three measures. So, in the astrological diagram of the 12 houses, there are three houses between the eastern horizon and the lower meridian. The author uses this term "trimeter" as if it were a familiar term for an astrological aspect.

² For the most part, the numbers mentioned following this formula in the rest of this chapter are the number of the year, or its factors, or add up to the year in question by a kind of Pythagorean numerology. In the Latin they are expressed as fractions: e.g. "four ninths" etc. But since the modern mind finds it easier to deal with them as whole numbers, I have rendered them thus. Those associated with the planets are part of a numerological correspondence in which Saturn = 3, Mercury = 8, Sun = 18, Venus = 5, Mars = 7, Jupiter = 9, Moon = 13. These numbers are called "circles" or "cycles" in the text, but it is not clear to me that they are astronomical cycles. The text is corrupt, however, errors have entered in to it. Some of these will be indicated in the following footnotes. Generally, but not always, the author has avoided attributing factors to the prime numbered years. His reference to "Square numbers" reminds one of Euclid's Elements, Book VII, def. 16. Cf. Heath's edition vol. II, p. 289. Cf. also, Nichomachus of Gerasa's Introduction to Arithmetic, trans. Martin Luther D'ooze, New York: Macmillan, 1926, pp. 242-243.

In addition to this, this author associates the trine with Venus. He seems to cite the square consistently in connection with difficulties or "dark" houses, 4, 8, and 12, but he includes, as well, the M.C.

³ remotus. [RH]

⁴ i.e., 6.

The seventh year belongs to the center of the west. To this is connected the sevenfold number and the first of Mars; dangerous because of fevers, blood and wounds.

The eighth year belongs to the epictaphora of the west, which is the dexter [place], disconnected from the horoscope. The first 'discomposed' of Mercury. To this is connected the tetragon².

The ninth year belongs to of the apoclima of the Midheaven, the dexter sextile³ of the horoscope. The first of Jupiter and the third of Saturn. To this is connected the ninth number and the sextile; dangerous, he will grow ill with hardness and from troubles of the interior [organs] and pains of the belly.

The tenth year belongs to the Midheaven, the dexter square of the horoscope and the second of Venus; he will grow ill from beatings⁴.

The eleventh year belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven, the dexter sextile of the horoscope and calodaemonia, i.e., happiness.

The twelfth year is belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, it is the cacodaemonia, that is, unhappiness, disconnected from the horoscope, the fourth of Saturn, unfortunate. To this is connected the sextile and the square, paradoxical, it inflicts misfortune from dank things.

The thirteenth [year] is the year returned to the horoscope and [is] the first of the Moon causing fevers; moreover it makes dangerous ruins and pain of the interior [organs] and the thorax.

The fourteenth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope and the second of Mars. To this is connected the twice seven number⁵, dangerous, troublesome with fevers, wounds, disasters, ulcers, impelling either wounds by swords or the vomiting of blood and cauterizations, or leading to [a fall] from a height, or danger from four-footed beasts.

The fifteenth [year] is belongs to the apoclima of the center of the earth, the fifth of Saturn and the third of Venus. To this is connected

¹ Or simple, not well arranged. [Additional by RH] This appears to be a direct translation of the Greek, 'asunthetos', 'uncompounded.' Gundel compares the Latin here to the Greek in Valens, "Hermou prolos asunthetos."

² Perhaps the octahedron is meant, or twice the tetragon.

³ Should say the dexter trine of the horoscope.

⁴ plectorica.

⁵ binus septenus.

the sextile and the trine¹, [it is] slack² and troubled, but it is without danger for the most part.

The sixteenth [year] belongs to the [angle] of the earth, Mercury's second, dangerous. To this is connected the composite³ and the square⁴ [number] of one seven and one nine⁵. It induces sufferings from choler and the arteries and from being difficult to restore to health⁶.

The seventeenth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the angle of the earth.

The eighteenth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the west, the second of Jupiter and the sixth of Saturn and the first of the Sun. To this is connected the sextile and ninth⁷, extremely difficult.

The nineteenth [year] belongs to the west.

The twentieth [year] belongs to the fourth of Venus", the epanafora of the west. To this is connected the square and the trine, without danger for the most part, it causes infirmities from beatings and labors.

The twenty-first [year] belongs to the apoclima of the Midheaven. To this is connected the sextile and the seven⁹, the third of Mars and the seventh of Saturn, it is difficult and dangerous.

The twenty-second [year] belongs to the Midheaven. To this is connected the dexter sextile.

The twenty-third belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of two sevens and one nine.

The twenty-fourth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the eighth of Saturn and the third of Mercury. To this is connected the ¹ sextilis et trinus. Trinus also means three times three. Therefore we have $9 + 6 = 15$. Also, the apoclima of the fourth house is the third house which is sextile to the ascendant.

² remissus.

³ compositus.

⁴ quadratus.

⁵ i.e., $4 \text{ squared} = 16$ and $7 + 9 = 16$.

⁶ dysanalempsias.

⁷ Both are factors of 18.

⁸ 4×5 (Venus) = 20.

⁹ 7 is a factor of 21. Why the sextile is mentioned is unclear.

sextile and the square¹, ill-humor² through melancholy or through humidities³.

The twenty-fifth [year] belongs to the horoscope, the fifth of Venus. To this is connected the trine and [the number] composed of two nines and one seven.

The twenty-sixth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope. The second of the Moon, dangerous.

The twenty-seventh [year] belongs to the apoclima of the angle of the earth, the ninth of Saturn and the third of Jupiter, the god, the mean. To this is connected the sextile and the ninth⁴.

The twenty-eighth [year] belongs to the angle of the earth, the fourth of Mars, dangerous. To this is connected the square and the seventh⁵, unreliable.

The twenty-ninth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the angle of the earth.

The thirtieth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the west, the tenth of Saturn and the sixth of Venus. To this is connected the sextile and the trine and the [number] composed of three sevens and one seven⁶. Without danger for the most part, it impels by cold things.

The thirty-first [year] belongs to the west.

The thirty-second [year] belongs to the epanafora of the west, the fourth of Mercury. To this is connected the square and the [number] composed of two sevens⁷; able to be wearied.

The thirty-third [year] belongs to the apoclima of the Midheaven, the eleventh of Saturn. To this is connected the sextile and the left, dangerous.

¹ We would expect the sextile and the octavus too. Perhaps the author understand eight as a form of four as above with the eighth year.

² dyscolus From dyskolia?

³ per humiditates, possibly, "through damp conditions?"

⁴ Three sixes plus nine is 27. The author does not mention the need for three sixes.

⁵ Does this mean that the author recognizes heptiles?

⁶ "The sextile and the trine," i.e., $5 \times 6 = 30$ and $3 \times 10 = 30$. "The composite of three sevens and one seven" = $3 \times 7 = 21 + 7 = 30$.

⁷ "The composite of two sevens" = $28 (?) + 4 = 32$.

[The thirty-fourth [year] is omitted.]

The thirty-fifth [year] belongs to the Midheaven, the fifth of Mars and the seventh of Venus. To this is connected the square and the seventh¹; inducing sicknesses.

The thirty-sixth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the twelfth of Saturn and the fourth of Jupiter. To this is connected the sextile, square², the fourth nine³ and the second [square number]⁴; it is dangerous and difficult.

The thirty-seventh [year] belongs to the third revolution of the horoscope. To this is connected the [number] composed of four sevens and one nine.

The thirty-eighth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the ascendant.

The thirty-ninth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the angle of the earth, the third of the Moon and the thirteenth of Saturn. To this is connected the sextile and the [number] composed of three sevens and two nines, able to err and dangerous.

The fortieth [year] belongs to the angle of the earth, the eighth of Venus and the fifth of Mercury. To this is connected the square and the sextile, not evil but good.

The forty-first [year] belongs to the epanafora of the angle of the earth. To this is connected the [number] composed of three nines and two sevens.

The forty-second [year] belongs to the apoclima of the west, the sixth of Mars and the fourteenth of Saturn. To this is connected the sextile and the sixth seven; the place is sensible, difficult and dangerous.

The forty-third [year] belongs to the west. To this is connected the [number] composed of four nines and one seven.

The forty-fourth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the west. To this is connected the square and the dexter hexagon and the [number]

¹ Four is not a factor of 35. 7 is, of course. Here again, we wonder if the "seventh" is to be understood as an aspect.

² sextilis et quadratus should read sextilis quadratus, i.e., "squared sextile," = 6 x 6, or 36.

³ 4 x 9 = 36.

⁴ This is the second square number recognized as such by the author who, for some reason sees only even numbers as capable of being squares. He is consistent, however in linking the square to the twelfth house.

composed of five sevens and one nine.

The forty-fifth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the Midheaven the fifth of Jupiter, the fifteenth of Saturn, the ninth of Venus. To this is connected the sextile, the trine, and the fifth nine. This is called the dangerous Stilbon¹. It is fitting that one attend, lest by chance, some injury happen to the feet in the same year that Mercury is the significator in the nativity. Indeed it induces the disease of the uncultivated fields² and of harmonic illnesses³ and secular impediments and abominations⁴.

The forty-sixth [year] belongs to the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of four sevens and two nines.

The forty-seventh [year] belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven.

The forty-eighth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the sixteenth of Saturn and the sixth of Mercury. To this is connected the sextile and the square⁵ and the [number] composed of three sevens and three nines; it is difficult, dangerous and extremely troublesome.

The forty-ninth [year] belongs to the horoscope, the seventh of Mars. To this is connected the seven, a dangerous [place] and it induces sudden⁶ death, a filling up of the stomach, cauteries, or a fall⁷ from a height or danger from four-footed beasts or from a sword or violent cuttings or public fears.

The fiftieth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope. To this is connected the trine and the [number] composed of four nines and two sevens. It is, however, mixed in both⁸.

The fifty-first [year] belongs to the apoclima of the angle of the

¹ A name of the planet Mercury usually seen in Alchemical texts.

² artricarum Du Cange has: artriga, artrica: pro artiga- modus agri, ager incultus ad culturam redactus.

³ Those illnesses deriving from “dis-temper”, i.e., improper balance of the humors?

⁴ religious crimes.

⁵ Perhaps the sextile and the double square, i.e., 6 and 8.

⁶ prosubitaneas.

⁷ procasum.

⁸ i.e., produced by addition of 14 and 36.

earth, the seventeenth of Saturn. To this is connected the [number] composed of six sevens and one nine, inducing sicknesses and harms or misfortunes.

The fifty-second [year] belongs to the angle of the earth, the fourth cycle of the Moon. To this is connected the square and the [number] composed of five nines and one seven.

The fifty-third [year] belongs to the epanafora of the angle of the earth. To this is connected the [number] composed of five sevens and two nines.

The fifty-fourth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the west. To this is connected six nines and the sextile, the eighteenth of Saturn and the third of the Sun and the sixth of Jupiter, difficult and dangerous.

The fifty-fifth [year] belongs to the west, the eleventh of Venus. To this is connected the dexter sextile and the trine and the [number] composed of three nines and four sevens, holocacus and thoroughly evil.

The fifty-sixth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the west, the eighth of Mars and the seventh of Mercury. To this is connected the square and the eighth seven, hard and sad.

The fifty-seventh [year] belongs to the apoclima of the Midheaven, the nineteenth of Saturn. To this is connected the hexagon and the [number] composed of four nines and three sevens, difficult.

The fifty-eighth [year] belongs to the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of seven sevens and one nine.

The fifty-ninth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of five nines and two sevens.

The sixtieth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the twentieth of Saturn. To this is connected the sextile and the trine and the square and the [number] composed of six sevens and two nines, dangerous.

The sixty-first [year] is the fifth return of the horoscope. To this is connected the [number] composed of six nines and one seven.

The sixty-second [year] belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope. To this is connected the [number] composed of three nines and five sevens.

The sixty-third [year] belongs to the apoclima of the angle of the earth, the twenty-first of Saturn and the seventh of Jupiter and the ninth cycle of Mars. To this is connected the sextile and the mixed, which is composed of both the nine and the seven¹, which is called the androclastes, i.e., "man breaking". It is difficult, it is called Hercules.

The sixty-fourth [year] belongs to the angle of the earth, the eighth cycle of Mercury. To this is connected the [number] composed of four nines and four sevens, not extremely evil.

The sixty-fifth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the angle of the earth, the fifth cycle of the Moon and the thirteenth of Venus. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight sevens and one nine, promiscuous².

The sixty-sixth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the west, the twenty-second of Saturn. To this is connected the [number] composed of five nines and three sevens.

The sixty-seventh [year] belongs to the west. To this is connected the [number] composed of six nines and two sevens³.

The sixty-eighth is missing⁴.

The sixty-ninth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of three nines and six sevens. The twenty-third of Saturn, difficult.

The seventieth [year] belongs to the Midheaven, the tenth cycle of Mars and the fourteenth of Venus. To this is connected the seventh ten, ill-humor⁵ and difficult.

The seventy-first [year] belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven, [the twenty-fourth of Saturn and the eighth of Jupiter and the ninth of Mercury]⁶. To this is connected the [number] composed of four nines and five sevens.

The seventy-second [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the twenty-fourth of Saturn and the eighth of Jupiter and the ninth of Mercury. To this is connected the eighth nine, perverse and death-bearing. The seventy-first and the seventy-second communicate

¹ Note by Gundel, "The seven and the nine measuring each other."

² !!! However, the word also means 'indiscriminate.' [RH]

³ This belongs with the sixty-eighth year. $6 \times 9 = 54 + (2 \times 7) = 68$.

⁴ Thus the Latin text. Whether this is Gundel's gloss or the Latin translator I cannot tell.

⁵ dyscolus.

⁶ The words in square brackets have clearly been duplicated from the following year. This may be a scribal error.

with each other in turn.

The seventy-third [year] is the [sixth] return of the horoscope. To this is connected the [number] composed of five nines and four sevens, not especially evil.

The seventy-fourth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight sevens and two nines, not especially evil.

The seventy-fifth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the angle of the earth, the twenty-fifth of Saturn and the fifteenth of Venus. To this is connected the [number] composed of six nines and three sevens, common.

The seventy-sixth [year] belongs to the fourth house. To this is connected the [number] composed of seven sevens and three nines.

The seventy-seventh [year] belongs to the epanafora of the angle of the earth, the eleventh of Mars. To this is connected the seven, evil and death-bearing.

The seventy-eighth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the west, the twenty-sixth of Saturn and the sixth of the Moon. To this is connected the [number] composed of six sevens and four nines, difficult.

The seventy-ninth [year] belongs to the west. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight nines and one seven, existing as a mean.

The eightieth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the west, the sixteenth of Venus and the tenth of Mercury. To this is connected the [number] composed of five sevens and five nines, tepid¹.

The eighty-first [year] belongs to the apoclima of the Midheaven, the twenty-seventh of Saturn and the ninth of Jupiter, common.

The eighty-second [year] belongs to the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of six nines and six sevens.

The eighty-third [year] belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight sevens and three nines, not extremely evil.

The eighty-fourth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the twenty-eighth of Saturn and the twelfth of Mars. To this is connected the twelfth seven, ill-humored' and malefic, because that to which it is connected is composed of seven nines and three sevens.

¹ tepatus.

The eighty-fifth [year] is the seventh return of the horoscope, the seventeenth of Venus. To this is connected the [number] composed of seven sevens and four nines, common.

The eighty-sixth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight nines and two sevens, not extremely evil.

The eighty-seventh [year] belongs to the apoclima of the fourth house, the twenty-ninth cycle of Saturn. To this is connected the [number] composed of six sevens and five nines, common.

The eighty-eighth [year] belongs to the fourth house. To this is connected the [number] composed of nine nines and one seven.

The eighty-ninth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the fourth house. To this is connected the [number] composed of five nines and four sevens ², not especially evil. Seventy-four is six nines and five³.

The ninetieth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the seventh house, the thirtieth of Saturn, the eighteenth of Venus, the tenth of Jupiter and the fifth of the Sun. To this is connected the tenth nine and the [number] composed of nine sevens and three nines, dangerous and difficult.

The ninety-first [year] belongs to the west, the thirteenth of Mars and the seventh of the Moon. To this is connected the thirteenth cycle of seven and the [number] composed of seven nines and four sevens, difficult and evil.

The ninety-second [year] belongs to epanafora of the west. To this is connected the [number] composed of four sevens and eight nines.

The ninety-third [year] belongs to apoclima of the Midheaven, the thirty-first of Saturn. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight nines and three sevens, difficult.

The ninety-fourth [year] belongs to the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of five nines and seven sevens.

¹ dyscolus.

² This is wrong, of course, $5 \times 7 = 35$ and $4 \times 7 = 28$. $28 + 35 = 63$. Gundel's note: "leges: compositus ex sex novenis et quinque (novenis)" = 99 is also untrue. The text is confused here too. 89 is a prime number. It has no factors.

³ Falsum est.

The ninety-fifth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven, the nineteenth cycle of Venus. To this is connected the [number] composed of nine nines and two sevens, not extremely evil.

The ninety-sixth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the thirty-second of Saturn and the twelfth of Mercury. To this is connected the [number] composed of six nines and six sevens, dangerous.

The ninety-seventh [year] is the eighth cycle of the horoscope. To this is connected the [number] composed of ten nines and one nine¹.

The ninety-eighth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope, the fourteenth of Mars. To this is connected the fourteenth seven and the [number] composed of seven nines and five sevens, difficult.

The ninety-ninth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the angle of the earth, the thirty-third of Saturn and the eleventh of Jupiter. To this is connected the eleventh nine, a mean.

The hundredth [year] belongs to the angle of the earth, the twentieth of Venus. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight nines and four sevens, not extremely evil.

The hundred and first [year] belongs to the epanafora of the angle of the earth. To this is connected the [number] composed of five nines and eight sevens.

The hundred and second [year] belongs to the apoclima of the west, the thirty-fourth of Saturn. To this is connected the [number] composed of nine nines and three sevens, dangerous and difficult.

The hundred and third [year] belongs to the west. To this is connected the [number] composed of six nines and seven sevens.

The hundred and fourth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the west, the eighth of the Moon and the thirteenth of Mercury. To this is connected the [number] composed of eleven sevens and three nines, not extremely evil.

The hundred and fifth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the Midheaven, the thirty-fifth of Saturn and the twenty-first of Venus and the fifteenth of Mars. To this is connected the [number] composed of fifteen sevens or of seven nines and of six sevens, dangerous and evil.

The hundred and sixth [year] belongs to the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of fourteen nines and one seven.

¹ That is, ten nines and one seven.

The hundred and seventh [year] belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight nines and five sevens; it exists as a mean.

The hundred and eighth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the thirty-sixth of Saturn, the sixth of the Sun and the twelfth of Jupiter. To this is connected the twelfth nine and the [number] composed of five nines and nine sevens, dangerous and death-bearing.

The hundred and ninth [year] belongs to the ninth cycle of the horoscope. To this is connected the [number] composed of nine nines and four sevens, dangerous.

The hundred and tenth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the horoscope, the twenty-second of Venus. To this is connected the [number] composed of eight sevens and six nines, it is not evil.

The hundred and eleventh [year] belongs to the apoclima of the angle of the earth, the thirty-seventh of Saturn. To this is connected the [number] composed of ten nines and three sevens, it is the worst.

The hundred and twelfth [year] belongs to the angle of the earth, the sixteenth of Mars and the fourteenth of Mercury. To this is connected the sixteenth seven and the [number] composed of seven sevens and seven nines, dangerous and evil.

The hundred and thirteenth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the angle of the earth. To this is connected the [number] composed of eleven nines and two sevens, common.

The hundred and fourteenth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the west, the thirty-eighth of Saturn. To this is connected the [number] composed of fifteen sevens and one nine and of eight nines and six sevens, dangerous.

The hundred and fifteenth [year] belongs to the west, the twenty-third of Venus. To this is connected the [number] composed of twelve nines and one seven and of five nines and ten sevens, common.

The hundred and sixteenth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the west. To this is connected the [number] composed of nine nines and five sevens, it is not evil.

The hundred and seventeenth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the Midheaven, the thirty-ninth of Saturn and the ninth of the Moon and the thirteenth of Jupiter's cycle of nine and the [number] composed of six sevens nines and nine sevens', it is dangerous.

The hundred and eighteenth [year] belongs to the Midheaven. To this is connected the [number] composed of three nines and thirteen sevens, common.

The hundred and nineteenth [year] belongs to the epanafora of the Midheaven, the seventeenth of Mars. To this is connected the seventh ten, the unfortunate seven and the [number] composed of eight sevens and seven nines, full of hardship.

The hundred and twentieth [year] belongs to the apoclima of the horoscope, the fortieth of Saturn and the twenty-fourth of Venus and the fifteenth of Mercury. To this is connected the [number] composed of eleven nines and three sevens, death-bearing.

The hundred and twenty-first [year] is the first revolution of the horoscope.

Indeed it has been seen in every nativity that the *hilegia*² (which the Greeks call aphesin), from which the death-bearing, dangerous and final years come³ are made, not only from the Moon, [and] of the

“

¹ There is something wrong here.

² Predictions regarding the length of life. The context seems to make it clear here that the Hyleg is not so much a planet as a prediction the making of which usually involved only the malefic planets. The author wants us to expand the practice to include all the planets. [Additional by RH] The word 'hilegia' which occurs here is extremely important. It appears to be a Latinization of the Arabic which has also given rise to 'hyleg.' This is the first and only instance in the Liber Hermetis of Arabic contact with the material. Neither Gundel nor Pingree has dealt with this, although it would force a dating of the Latin that is much more consistent with Pingree's 12th century. Unfortunately for the Pingree thesis, this is the only evidence of Arabic involvement and could be explained as an addition by a later editor of the text. The fact remains, as Robert Zoller has stated in his introduction, that the Latin does not appear to be that of the High Middle Ages even though it has all manner of irregularities in it. These can be explained our thesis that the translator was more Greek-speaking than Latin-speaking. But the presence of 'hilegia' here still remains an interesting problem.

³ Literally, "Are compelled" (compelluntur).

infortunes¹, but also from all the planets. For it is not right to seek a single place from the Moon alone, as Critodemus advises; and if in any of the years of life the established conditions occur, misfortune inescapably follows. But if the essence of the nativity should have the prorogation of life and a dangerous year occurs, it will signify actions and accidents² of the time, for instance, sicknesses, losses of substance, condemnations, also judgments, shipwrecks, detentions, injuries, sudden dangers, enemies, imprisonment and whatever things exist on account of human life, such as sicknesses and sufferings and mutilation of the extremities, fires, adverse legal decisions, exhaustions, or the lies of enemies. And if the revolutions of the planet or the inducers of the dangers are found to be adverse in the nativity and aspected³ by the malevolent [planets], or occurring outside sect, they foretell a false and turbulent year. But if they have the proper configuration, or are aspected⁴ by the malefics, they foreshadow the introductions of downfalls and prepare a more mild misfortune. The places and exhibition or assumption⁵ are judged from signs of equal ascension, such as from Aries, into Pisces, and from Taurus to Aquarius and from Gemini to Capricorn and from Cancer to Sagittarius and from Leo to Scorpio and from Virgo to Libra. Likewise the reverse, as from Libra to Virgo and from Scorpio to Leo.

¹ In the original Latin infortiuniorum appears to be connected to hilegia, which makes no sense. The English reflects Zoller's efforts to make sense out of this passage. [RH]

² occasiones. This has been consistently used by the original translator to mean misfortunes, but not necessarily 'accidents' in the modern sense. [RH]

³ inspecti. [RH]

⁴ inspecti. [RH]

⁵ i.e., tradition or assumption.

In the consideration of the figure it is fitting before all things to inquire regarding the ease and difficulty of birth, and so the familiar associations of the luminaries, whether they are associated with those which are of the same sect as they are or of another, and if they are in masculine or feminine quarters of the figure, and if the luminaries are connected or unconnected with each other, and in which [sign] the lords of the Ascendant are and if some² are in a masculine, but others in a feminine [quarter]; one can then expect as much as possible of an effect from these. (Next,¹ look for the lords of the triplicity of the light of the sect³, whether it is the Sun or the Moon, or the horoscope, [also seek] the lord of their houses and the lords of the terms and exaltation of the Sun and the Moon and the seven duodenariae of the planets, where or in which [place] they fall.⁴ Find the Part of Fortune and the decans and their lords and the lords of the triplicity and the appearances. With these under the Sun's rays, cadent, and aspected⁵ by the malefics and obsessed⁶ and opposing each other in turn⁶ and evilly cadent, they make those who are born unnourishable, especially with the luminaries aspected⁷ or obsessed⁸ by the malevolent [planets] and a conjunction by the malevolent [planets] being made especially with those who are not of the same sect. These things being so it is fitting to consider nativities of this sort, as it were, unchanging and without years⁹. With

¹ de figurativa consideratione. The word figura is frequently used in this text for configuratio, that is, all of the relationships that exist within the chart.

² taking quidam for text's quidem.

³ The light of time, i.e., the Sun by day and the Moon by night.

⁴ inspecti. [RH]

⁵ obsessi. [RH]

⁶ et sibi adinvicem adversantes.

⁷ inspecti. [RH]

⁸ obsessis. [RH]

⁹ Gundel has placed non in square brackets thus: His enim sic se habentibus [non] oportet considerare huiusmodi nativitates tanquam immutabiles et sine annis. He doesn't recognize that the author is telling us that under the conditions described the native will not survive. This becomes, in the astrology these things so it is fitting to inquire of the lords of the triplicity of the preceding conjunction or prevention and its lord and the lord of the terms.

In the second consideration again it is fitting to inquire of the lords of the triplicity and especially of the light of the sect and the horoscope and the Midheaven, lest by chance, they are in fall or are under the rays of the Sun even for seven days. This configuration is significative of error and contrariety. But if the lords of the triplicities especially of the light of the sect are well situated, but aspected¹ by the malevolent [planets], they cause a calamity and a violent death and the lords of the sect opposing themselves produce the worst and most miserable things with regard to life. Look also to the bright fixed stars and the lucid degrees. When they are in the horoscope or in the Midheaven or in the west or in the angle of the earth² with one of the seven planets in the same degree, they signify great and strange nativities and especially with the Sun and the Moon although they are planets, too. Look to see, indeed, lest by chance the lord of the Moon in the nativity may not aspect³ her and likewise that the lord of the horoscope is not averse⁴ to it. For then it is not a man that is born but a monster or a quadruped⁵.

The third consideration is, that you look to the Moon and its lord and the lord of the term and the lord of the triplicity and the third and seventh and the fortieth day of its⁶ and its conjunctions⁷ and separations of Bonatti's sources, the first differentia of births.

¹ inspecti.

² The fourth house.

³ aspiciat.

⁴ remotus. [RH]

⁵ Cf. Ptolemy, Tetrabiblos, Book III. Chap. 8. Also Bonatti, Liber Astronomiae, dif. 1.

⁶ eius i.e., the Moon's. This injunction, frequently met with in old astrological texts: to inspect the Moon's position and aspects 3, 7 or, in this case 40 days after birth, is not attended to in modern astrology and is considered enigmatical, It needs research.

and appearances and the latitudes of the winds' and its [i.e the Moon's] Nodes and circumferences and the course of the nativity and if it is increased or decreased in course or in light, and its duodenaria² and if it runs not enough or too much³ and if it is in the last degree of a sign. Because the separations of the Moon signify those things which are of the body and the older brothers; but the conjunctions operations and pecuniary circumstances, its latitudes of the winds and greater or lesser motions, increase or decrease, being void of course⁴ and the Nodes

¹ coniunctiones. This of course means 'conjunctions', but the context and parallel sections of Greek texts suggest that the word actually is a translation of 'sunaphē' which we have translated as 'application.' See Paulus Alexandrinus, chapter 17, "Concerning the Separation and Application Which the Moon Makes in Relation to the Wandering Stars." [RH]

¹ The Moon's latitude was connected to the winds and eventually the term "wind" came to be synonymous with celestial latitude. The winds figure as a topic in a number of astrological texts. Almagest VI, 13 discusses winds in connection with directions. Tetrabiblos I.10 relates winds to the cardinal points and to "regions." Robbins, p. 61, cites the Proclus paraphrase as being closer to the Latin of Gogava: totas illas partes occupantes venti, and Melancthon's: vend, qui totas partes occupant. See also p. 199 vetrabiblos, Robbins' trans. which also seems to link winds to climates. Page 209 of Robbins' trans., discussing astro-meteorology, points to the Moon's latitude as connected with the winds produced: ". . . to what wind the latitude of the Moon is inclined through the obliquity of the ecliptic. From all these facts, by means of the principle of prevalence, we may predict the general conditions of weather and the winds of the months." Mathesis Book I, chapter 12 relates signs to winds. Thorndike, History of Magic and Experimental Science, Vol. II, p. 223 tells us that the Hermetic book entitled The Six Principles of Things may have information for us as it discusses, inter alia, the winds. Page 323, says that Michael Scot's Introduction to Astrology deals with winds (Bodleian 266, fol. 29 v.)

² The duodenarium lunae as well as the novenarium lunae are things Bonatti tells us to watch out for as well. See Liber Astronomiae or Anima Astrologiae: The Astrologer's Guide wherein the 146 Considerations of Guido Bonatus may be found translated into 17th century English. The dwadasamsas and navamsas are meant.

³ The mean motion of the Moon is considered best, it seems.

errors and turbulence of life; but the obsessions¹ of the Sun and Moon and the horoscope by the benevolent [planets] signify good things, but by the malevolent [planets] bad things. The same is signified by their duodenaria. The Nodes falling on the ecliptic² cause illnesses for the mother and the child. They signify an ignominious mother, but this is more the case when it is the Tail³. In the last degrees of a sign they signify that the mother is ignoble, with the exception of Libra and Cancer. The last degree of Libra they call "The Increase." The last degree of Cancer, "The Wedding of the Gods."

They look at the lord of the triplicity and the angle of the earth because the first signifies the quality of death, the second sickness. If, therefore, these are unfortunate, they exacerbate⁴ the death and illness, also if they are inimical to the place.

The fourth consideration is that you look at the conjunctions and preventions, in which places of the nativity they happen and to what they are joined immediately after appearances and that they are not unfortunate. For a conjunction signifies those things which concern matrimony, friendship and society, and whatsoever the Moon signifies; the full Moon [signifies] glory, honors and dignities and whatever the Sun signifies. And the lords of the terms of the Sun and the Moon falling evilly under the Sun's rays, signify that the parents and natives are lowborn⁶. Similarly, if the malevolent [planets] aspect or oppose [them], they signify great dangers. Look to the lord of the conjunction or prevention, because if it is in the sixth or eighth or the twelfth or horoscope it signifies a fall⁷.

The fifth consideration is that you look to the Head and Tail [of the Dragon], in what places and in what decans they are. The Head, when

¹ obsessiones. [RH]

² As the Moon's nodes always fall on the ecliptic, the author must mean where they fall on the ecliptic.

³ Cauda [draconis].

⁴ infortunant.

⁵ ab apparitione. Ab here means immediately after—ablative of time from which.

⁶ infimos.

⁷ or accident.

it is with the benevolent [planets] or with the Sun or Moon or with Mercury, causes harm to the nativity and induces disasters. When the Sun is with the Head or the Tail the father is harmed. But when the Moon is, the mother is destroyed and called ignominious, especially when in the angles. But the Head with Saturn and Mars signifies the same, especially in angles, because the Head, when it is with benevolent [planets] produces good, when with malevolent [planets], however, evil. Similarly, the Tail with Saturn and Mars produces good, when with the others, depraved things. It lays aside their virtue..Lacuna in text].

Look to the lord of the sixth and the twelfth place from the ascendant¹. If they are in the ascendant they harm in youth; if in the west², they harm in old age.

The sixth consideration is that you look to the duodenary part of the planets, especially of the Sun and the Moon and the horoscope, in which place from the horoscope they are and by whom aspected. If their duodenaria happen in four-footed signs with the horoscope, you may say that [the native] is a four-footed beast or monster; because it is especially [the case] with the Sun, the Moon and the horoscope in four-footed signs, and more so if the Part of Fortune and its lord are also there. Many times a figure of this sort makes grooms and stable boys or feeders of wild beasts, if the benevolent [planets] aspect. See also the Part of the Downfall [by day] from Saturn to Mars and project it from Mercury but at night the reverse³. This part aspected⁴ by only one malevolent [planet] causes deceitful and dangerous and disastrous nativities. See the configuration of the signs according to the signs of equal ascension and according to the signs of equal virtues. Valens says

¹ i.e., the Lord of the sixth house and the lord of the twelfth house.

² i.e., the seventh house.

³ i.e., at night you take the distance from Mars to Saturn and project it from Mercury.

⁴ inspecta. [RH]

⁵ These are what might be called "antiscia off the Equinoctial point" (also known as contra-antiscia [RH]) instead of off the Solstitial as is generally the case. Cf. sec. 377 of R. Ramsay Wright's trans. of Al-Biruni's The Book of Instruction in the Elements of the Art of Astrology. The same relationships are discussed. They are degrees on the zodiac equidistant from the solstices (our Antiscia) and those equidistant from the equinoxes (for which we have no

in his seventh discourse: It is fitting that Virgo and Aries have commensuration, as do Libra and Pisces and the rest of the signs of equal ascension and of one belt¹. In each nativity it is fitting to look at the significations of the decans with regard to the planets and the fixed stars which rise with them² according to Teucer the Babylonian and their faces and the lucid terms of the signs. Observe the squares of the Head and Tail [of the Dragon] and note the degrees of the angles. Many times the planets in a nativity being evilly cadent, lucid degrees of the fixed stars are found on the angles and they show that the natiivities are great and excellent. Many [astrologers] ignore the virtues and operations of the fixed stars, but even in the commixture of directions they make a great thing, if the planet, which is mixed, has the same latitude as the fixed star. Similarly, the fixed stars work, if they happen to be in one degree with planets according to the same latitude.

The seventh consideration is that you look at the Part of Fortune and the Part of the Daemon and the Basis³ and of the exaltation of the nativity⁴ and their lords and their appearances and their places⁵. If they name). Cf. also G. Bonatti, Liber Astronomiae, Tractatus Secundus, Sectio Secunda, Cap. XXVIII.

¹ unius cinguli, i.e., those signs ruled by the same planets. e.g. Aries and Scorpio (both ruled by Mars), or Taurus and Libra (both ruled by Venus), etc. [Additional by RH] This clearly corresponds to the Greek 'homozonia' which we have translated as 'like-engirding' in Pauls and elsewhere. See Paulus, Chapters 12 and 13.

² He refers to the paranatellontae.

³ According to Neugebauer, the lot of Basis is computed as follows:

Basis = Ascendant + Daemon - Fortune [by day]

Basis = Ascendant + Fortune - Daemon [by night]

Examples of this are given in Neugebauer from Valens, L78 and L188.

See Otto Neugebauer and Van Hoesen, Greek Horoscopes, American Philosophical Society, 1959, p. 9.

⁴ ut aspicias....baseos et exaltationis nativitatis et dominos eorum et loca. [Additional by RH] The "Exaltation of the Nativity" is mentioned by Neugebauer as found in Valens. The formulae, there are two, are as follows:

are *averse*¹ to the ascendant in the angles² while they are with the Part of Fortune and with the benevolent [planets], they signify good fortune, provided that they are not under the [Sun's] rays. The Part of Fortune has the power of the ascendant. But if, with these things posited thus, a single malevolent [planet] should aspect³ the eleventh place from the Part of Fortune or from the Ascendant, which is called the Place of Acquisition and the Calodaemon, i.e., happiness⁴, especially if it is not in sect and is without the aspect of a benevolent [planet], it signifies an adverse accident of fortune. And if, with these things having been posited, the other malevolent [planet] should aspect⁵ the eighth place from the ascendant, or from the Part of Fortune or the lord of the eighth place, it signifies a violent death with defeat⁶. But if the lord of Fortune and of the Part⁷ happen to be well, but the Part of the Daemon and its lord are evil and are aspected⁸ by malevolent [planets], they signify a

Type 1 — Exaltation = Sun - Sun's exaltation (19° Aries) + Ascendant

Type 2 — Exaltation = Moon - Moon's exaltation (3° Taurus) + Ascendant

From one example in Neugebauer, L50, it would appear that type 1 is for day births and type 2 for night births. We expect to have more examples as we translate Vettius Valens in the Greek track of Project Hindsight.

See Otto Neugebauer and Van Hoesen, Greek Horoscopes, American Philosophical Society, 1959, p. 7 and p. 81.

⁵ i.e., houses.

¹ remoti. [RH]

² It is difficult to see how something could be averse to the Ascendant and still be in an angle, but that is what the text says, unless in this case 'remoti' means something other than 'remotc.' [RH]

³ inspexerit. [RH]

⁴ Note that the "places", "loci", or houses are not only from the ascendant as in most Medieval, and all Modern Western astrological practice, but may be counted from the Part of Fortune or Ascendant. Below we will learn that they may be counted from the Sun or Moon as well.

⁵ inspexerit. [RH]

⁶ cum detrimento.

⁷ i.e., if the Lord of the Part of Fortune and the Part itself?

⁸ inspecti. [RH]

fall, especially at night, because according to Ptolemy the Part of Fortune and the Part of the Daemon are the same¹ and are taken both by day and by night from the Sun to the Moon and the proportion and the distance which the Sun has, he said, to the ascendant in the figure, the same has the Moon to the Part of Fortune². The Part of Fortune is a lunar horoscope and so we say that the horoscope of the nativity is solar and the Part of Fortune is lunar. But if the lord of exaltation of the nativity is evil and aspected³ by malevolent [planets], it causes the demolition of dignities and of works and idleness and sloth. But if the Part of Fortune is well located and aspected⁴ by the benevolent [planets], its lord [being] found in the ninth place from the horoscope, or the lord of the Daemon [is found in the ninth place from the horoscope] the native will acquire benefit from sacred things or from religious places, and if the lord of the Part of Fortune is found in the angle of the earth, he becomes the guardian of a treasure. But if the Part of Fortune and its lord happen to be in an aquatic sign, he acquires the same from watery and nautical things and he will give actuality to the nature of the zodiacal sign⁵. It is fitting to look at the nature of the sign and place where the Part of Fortune and its lord fall, and to delineate the good fortunes or mishaps. If the Part of Fortune and its lord is averse⁶ to the Sun, exiles happen, with the exception of those signs which are of one belt⁷ and of equal ascension and of equal possibility⁸. Consider the years of happiness and unhappiness and trouble from the

¹ i.e., both composed of the Sun, the Moon and the Ascendant.

² Ptolemy appears to be the only source of this doctrine, and even that is certain only from some versions of the manuscript. The normal practice is to reverse the positions of the Sun and the Moon in the calculation of both parts between day and night. What is interesting is that this seems to be an early reference to this matter as Ptolemy reports it. And of course, it may be an interpolation from a later time. [RH]

³ inspectus. [RH]

⁴ inspecti. [RH]

⁵ zodii.

⁶ remoti. [RH]

⁷ like-engirding or homozonia. [RH]

⁸ These may be the signs of degrees of equal power mentioned by Al-Biruni and Guido Bonatti. See page 56, note 5 above.

direction and location of all of the planets and angles and the Part of Fortune and of the Daemon, the traditions and assumptions of the lords of the years as well as the ascension of each planet according to the Egyptians and from the period of the cycle of each planet, namely of the perfect means and minors in the third climate¹.

And if, by chance, the planets are evilly configured to the eastern horizon, i.e., the ascendant, but well with the Part of Fortune and its lord, the early things² will be unprofitable, but later things³ will be good. But if the configuration of the horoscope, the Part of Fortune and its lord are the reverse, you may call the contrary and its fall the actuality. The ascendant signifies beginnings and the Part of Fortune, endings; thus the Part of Fortune and especially its eleventh place and its lord signify bodily passions and possessions and substance. Likewise The Part of Fortune and the Part of the Daemon signify the first age, but their lords the later one. The Daemon of the Sun⁴ signifies the passions of the soul and the performance of a thing and glory and the manner [of the performance?]. But the Basis signifies the foundation of the Part of Fortune and of the Daemons; dividing therefore the years of the nativity, not from the horoscope, you may count out the years from the Sun, Moon, or Part of Fortune⁶. But if the native shall have a father or a mother, you may count out the years from the Part of the Father or the Mother⁷, and if you are inquiring concerning the parents,

This apparently has reference to a system of planetary periods keyed into the times of ascensions in different climes.

² priora.

³ posteriora.

⁴ The Part of the Daemon is also called the Part of the Sun. The author here is blending these two names.

⁵ Being composed out of them. [RH]

⁶ The author is talking about profections which are usually made from the ascendant or horoscope. He suggests counting them from the Sun, Moon or Part of Fortune as well.

⁷ According to Paulus the formulae for the Parts of the Father and the Mother are as follows:

Part of the Father =	Asc. + Saturn - Sun [day births]
	Asc. + Sun - Saturn [night births]

you may consider the year of the parents. This ought always to be known, that whoever shall have the two luminaries in the sixth or eighth or twelfth places from the ascendant, [and] the lords of their triplicity, they make exiles and signify the exile of the parents, namely that those who are unfortunate and abject and with the parents being abject, if anywhere the lord of the term of the Part of Fortune is found in an angle, it makes the evil endure and the fall and the humility to persist until it completes the revolution of its minor cycle. Indeed, each has three revolutions: maximum, medium and minor, so that if Saturn is found in an angle as lord of the Part of Fortune, we call the nativity unfortunate, because it will be unfortunate through its minor revolution, which is after 30 years, and you will understand the same regarding the other stars. It is fitting to know, because, if the lord of the term or the lord of the Part of Fortune are in an angle and it is found to be under the Sun's rays, and unfortunate, in the term of an infortune, it does not operate for years but for months¹ of the minor return.

XVH. On Marriage

The reason concerning marriage you find thus: for a man the Moon and Venus, for the woman, the Sun and Mars. And for a legal marriage of a man the Moon, but of a woman the Sun. In sexual intercourse and

If Saturn is under the beams of the Sun then use the following formulae:

Part of the Father =	Asc. + Jupiter - Mars [day births]
	Asc. + Mars - Jupiter [night births]

Part of the Mother =	Asc. + Moon - Venus [day births]
	Asc. + Venus - Moon [night births]

Dorotheus of Sidon gives exactly the same specifications. See Paulus, chapt. 23, p. 49. and Pingree, Dorotheus Sidonius: Carmen Astrologicum, Leipzig: Teubner, 1976, p. 174.

¹ The numbers of years in the planetary periods may also be applied to months or days as well as years. The literature of ancient astrology is replete with examples. [RH]

venereal¹ society for the man, Venus, but for the woman Mars and perhaps because of losses² and indecisions, because it is as if it causes indecisions and losses³. These do not signify matrimony but fornications and adulteries according to some configurations. Why, in masculine nativities⁴ are feminine planets taken; and in feminine, masculine planets? Because women are cold in their physical constitution, accepting the destined virtue of the heat of the stars, namely of the Sun and Mars, they heat up and incite to venereal coitus and they restrain the appetite and thus is made a certain temperance from the planets. Men, however, since they are drier, are made more humid and cotempered by the feminine stars⁵. It is fitting indeed in feminine [nativities]⁶ to look to Venus; these things being so it will be fitting in a masculine nativity, and in a legal marriage to observe the Moon, in what quarters of the twelve signs it is found; and if it is a morning star⁷, that is, in the oriental quadrants, which are two, one from the conjunction all the way to the first quarter and the other, from the Full Moon all the way to the second quarter signifies degree by degree, that in youth the young man takes a wife and marries quickly or that in old age he marries a younger woman. If, however, if Saturn aspects the Moon, he will marry later, but again he will take a younger

¹ venerea. This, of course, literally means 'venereal', or "of pertaining to Venus," and 'venereal' is the best single translation, but the reader must understand that it usually has in Latin as well as in English the connotation of 'lascivious', that is, a relationship of which the more puritanical would disapprove. The context here and elsewhere demonstrates this. [RH]

² or, seductions.

³ It is interesting to note in the symbolism of ancient astrology, that the less legitimate sexual associations for a man are ruled by a benefic, Venus, while for a woman, by a malefic, Mars. [RH]

⁴ i.e., in horoscopes of men.

⁵ We have here a very important doctrine concerning the qualities and the sexes. Masculinity partakes of heat, but the primary quality of the feminine is not cold, but moisture. This tells us that for this author at least, heat = primary masculine quality, cold = secondary feminine quality, wet = primary feminine quality, dry = secondary masculine quality. [RH]

⁶ i.e., the horoscopes of women.

⁷ eos.

wife. But if the Moon is found in the western quarters, that is, from the first quarter all the way to the prevention, or from the second quarter all the way to the conjunction, it signifies that the youth takes an older woman, or marrying late, is joined to an old maid, if Saturn aspects. The oriental quadrants signify youth in every way, the occidental quadrants old age.

In a legal marriage of women¹, see the Sun in oriental quarters, namely the one from the ascendant to the M.C., but the other from the west all the way to the angle of the earth, and so you will determine that that young woman will be joined to a youth or beyond the age, an old maid will take a young man with Saturn aspecting. But if the Sun is found in occidental quadrants, namely from the M.C. to the west or from the fourth house all the way to the ascendant, we say that, being young, she will be married to an older man and if Saturn aspects, that she will tempestuously accept an old man. For oriental quadrants signify a young man, but occidental ones an old man.

But if we do not consider legal marriage, but simply the venereal act, in masculine [nativities] consider Venus, in the case of women, Venus and Mars. However, the malevolent [planets], to wit, Saturn and Mars, are brought together in conjugal unions by certain configurations, because they have a certain relationship and affinity with Venus in Capricorn and Pisces, in Taurus also and in Libra, because of this: that in each others' houses are their exaltations and triplicities, as Libra belongs to Venus, but is the exaltation² and triplicity of Saturn. Capricorn is the house of Saturn, the exaltation of Mars and the triplicity of Venus³. Taurus is the house of Venus, to whom Capricorn is trine as is Libra to Aquarius. Through the configuration, Saturn has affinity to Venus and Mars in conjugal unions. The Moon, increasing

¹ Taking mulierum for mulierem.

² We recognize Libra as the domicile of Venus and the exaltation of Saturn. According to the Medieval triplicity rulerships, Saturn is one of the rulers of the airy triplicity.

³ According to the medieval rulerships, Venus is a ruler of the earthy triplicity.

in light¹ and joined to Saturn is consonant and concordant in legal marriage and signifies a serious man or an honest woman.

Dorotheus, indeed, looked for marriage from the lords of the triplicity of Venus and from the Part of Marriages² and its lords and the lord of the triplicity and from the significator of weddings and from other things.

¹ In various places in Firmicus Maternus the context makes it clear that a waxing Moon has a greater affinity with planets of the diurnal sect and waning, with planets of the nocturnal sect. Saturn is of the diurnal sect. A waning Moon with Saturn would presumably not be as good. [RH]

² Dorotheus gives a point translated by Pingree as the "Lot of Wedding." Its formulae are as follows:

Lot of Wedding = Asc. + Venus - Saturn [day births]
Asc. + Saturn - Venus [night births]

However, in the section that immediately follows he gives the "Lot of Marriage" in women as the same as the Lot of Wedding in a nocturnal chart but here makes no distinction between day and night births. See Pingree, Dorotheus, p. 199.

Then on p. 205 of the above there is another set "Lot of Wedding" formulae:

Lot of Wedding for men =	Venus + Moon - Sun [by day]
	Venus + Sun - Moon [by night]
Lot of Wedding for women =	Mars + Moon - Sun [by day]
	Mars + Sun - Moon [by night]

XVIII. Judgement of Marriage.

Because¹ Venus is in Capricorn, that is, in a shameless and mobile sign; [and] Saturn and the Moon aspect her by opposition and the lord of the house of Venus² is Saturn, and Mars is in the place of Venus, it signifies, to begin with, that very woman sleeps with her own step-child, because Mars was opposed to the place of children³, to which both the Sun and the Moon were averse⁴. [A second cases] This woman, after the death of [her] mother, sleeps with [her] father outside the homeland in a sacred place, because the Moon was located in the place of Mars with Saturn and the Sun was in the place of the gods and of travels⁵ having Saturn as the lord of its own house. Afterwards she has two brothers, because in the place of brothers the Sun is with Mercury and because of the opposition of the Moon [to Venus]. Whenever Venus and the Moon are aspecting each other by opposition, it makes [the native] sleep with fathers, brothers, children, or step-children.

¹ Apparently here we are dealing with actual chart descriptions. The charts are not contained the texts. [RH]

² eius, "of that one". There is a certain ambiguity here. Eius refers to an antecedent. Which one? Venus's or the Moon's? I take it to refer to Venus here as Venus is said to be in Capricorn which Saturn rules.

³ That is, with Venus in Capricorn, opposed to the Moon and Saturn (in Cancer), counting the houses from the position of the Sun (in Sagittarius), if Mars is in Libra ("the place of Venus"), it will oppose Aries, i.e., the fifth house from the Sun (which becomes thereby the house of children). Counting houses from the Moon, Mars in Taurus ("the house of Venus") will be opposed to Scorpio, (the fifth house from Cancer), the house of children.

⁴ remoti.

⁵ Sun and Mercury in the ninth house from the ascendant in Capricorn, Moon conjunct Saturn in Aries or Scorpio.

⁶ i.e., in the ninth house from the ascendant.

XIX. On the Parents.

As often as you consider the matter of parents (that is, those who were before the birth¹), for the father, look at night and by day at the Sun and Saturn, however, [to consider it] more fully, [look to] the lord of the triplicity of the Sun and the Part of the Father and the place opposite to² the Part and to the conjunction or prevention. [See also] the Sun and the angle of the earth and its lord and the lord of its triplicity and the lord of the term. From these headings³, the parents are known, and from Saturn⁴ and from the luminaries and from Venus and from their lords you will know the passions and dangers and want of fame and [their] occupations, wealth⁶, and the like. And the Sun indeed signifies the father's stock⁷, but the lord of the triplicity [signifies his] life. But if the Sun should have a good disposition, [and] the lord of its triplicity [has] a bad [disposition], you will say that the parents are noble, but that [they are] ones who achieve littles with

¹ Is it possible that the term "parent" was unclear when this text was written, necessitating such clarification?

² diametrum partis. Diametrum in classical Latin means "the wantage or loss, that which is wanted or lacking." Here it is used in a medieval astrological usage as "opposition."

³ ab his capitulis.

⁴ It occurs to me that one ought to look to Saturn for the parents not so much because Saturn rules duty and discipline as because he is a god of beginnings and especially associated with cycles and especially agricultural cycles of growth and decay. In much ancient astrological, poetic, and mythological lore he is associated with the Golden Age. Cf. Vergil, Ecloga IV.

⁵ arte probably a translation of techné.

⁶ acquisitione.

⁷ genus patris. Genus here means race, ethnic descent. It is the descent or genetic inheritance. It is more than family and certainly not the modern usage of "race", which means white, black, red, brown or yellow skinned. Genus in this context, as in Vergil, Aeneid 4:12 "Uraniae genus," was often translated in the 19th century poetically as "race"—i.e., "heaven born race". It is close in meaning to stirps. It is what your mother is arguing about when they say you take after your father's side of the family.

⁸ minorificatores.

respect to fortune and base with respect to soul, and if the Sun is in the terms of Saturn or Mars or are unfortunate, you will say that the father is either a slave or base born. But if the malevolent [planets] should aspect¹, suffering and illness happens in the father's house. And if the Sun should happen to be in an evil place, but the lord of its triplicity [should be] in a good place and apparition, you will say that the father achieves an elevation in status in life from base circumstances². Indeed the first lord of the triplicity of the Sun signifies the first part of the father's life, the second [signifies] the second part³. Understand the same configurations when considering the Moon for the Mother. If the Moon is in the terms of a benevolent [planet] and in [houses] cadent from the angles and on the ecliptic with the Nodes⁴ especially with the Tail [of the Dragon] and aspected⁵ by the malevolent [planets]⁶, it indicates that the mother is noble, but doing servile work and having a vile life on account of poverty.

The Moon in the angle of the earth shows⁷ the mother's illness. If it is aspected⁸ by the malevolent [planets], it makes one ignoble and soon orphaned from the mother. If the Moon is in the terms of Saturn or Mars, but the lord of the term⁹ is cadent from the angles, you will say that the mother is a slave. The lord of the sixth or twelfth from the horoscope located in the angle of the earth signifies that the parents are

¹ inspexerint, to look at, observe or view. Here used astrologically as "to aspect".

² ex ignobilibus ad incrementum vitae pervenire.

³ The third triplicity ruler rules the third third of life. This technique was preserved by the Arabs and reached Europe in the 12th century. The 13th century astrological Summa, Guido Bonatti's Liber astronomiae contains the technique, called there "Direction by Triplicity."

⁴ et in eclipticis.

⁵ inspecta. [RH]

⁶ a malevolis inspecta.

⁷ inducit.

⁸ inspecta. [RH]

⁹ dominus eius.

slaves or subjects. The lord of the angle of the earth being in¹ the sixth or ninth place signifies that the parents to have been foreign². The Sun and the lord of its triplicity³ evilly located and in strange signs⁴ signify biothanatus, i.e., they signify that the father is causing violent death⁵, and if an evil [planet] aspects, he destroys the godfather⁶. Understand the same of the Moon for the mother. Likewise, if the Sun and the lord of his triplicity have arrived at⁷ an evil place and should be aspected by a malefic in a diurnal nativity, it makes the natives hated and rejected by their fathers. You may understand that very same thing concerning the Moon among mothers. Consider, indeed, the part of the father and its lord, in what place they are and what appearance they may have and by whom they may be aspected and so you will tell the life of the father even from the opposite [place]. If indeed the part of the father is in the second, sixth, eighth or twelfth place from the horoscope, you will say that the father is vile. Look to the [place] opposite the part of the father, and if you find the lord of the opposite [place] in the part⁸ or with the lord of the part, you will say that he [the native] was adopted. Understand the same regarding the Moon

¹ adveniens literally, "coming to", a sense it may have here. But the same word (advenio) is used for "to be somewhere" as well. There is thus a certain [intentional?] ambiguity here.

² or not of one's blood.

³ When we hear, as we do here, "Lord" in the singular, we must assume that the author means the diurnal Lord in a diurnal figure and the nocturnal Lord in a nocturnal figure.

⁴ i.e., signs in which they have no honor.

⁵ biothanatus usually means that the one referred to dies violently. In this case the "i.e. clause" defines the use in this case such that it is the father that kills. This clause may be an interpolation or the Latin translator himself may not have understood the Greek properly. Elsewhere in the text where the term biothanatus shows up the meaning is clearly that the one referred to dies violently.

⁶ patrino: godfather (Hier. adv. Iovin. 1.41.) iv cent. Alexander Souter, A Glossary of Later Latin to 600 AD, Oxford: 1949.

⁷ contigerit.

⁸ It is pretty clear here that the "part" is not just a degree or point, but the whole sign in which the part or lot falls.

among mothers from the part of the mother [and] from [the place] opposite it. Look to the particular duodenaries¹ of the Sun and the Moon which they fall in and by what [planets] they are aspected. This therefore shows sufficiently the reckoning concerning the parents.

XX. On Foreign-born Parents.

When the Sun and Moon are in mobile signs it signifies that the parents are foreign-born or from a strange nation or from one or another climate; especially if the horoscope should have arrived completely² into a mobile sign, it signifies that the parents are foreign born. If a malevolent [planet] should aspect, or if the luminaries are averse³ to each other, the parents will be foreign born, especially [if they are] unfortunate in the sixth or twelfth place.

In⁴ the tractate on parents⁵ it is in the first place fitting that you inspect the Sun and the Moon to see if they are associated with planets of their own sect, for example in a diurnal and nocturnal nativity, if Saturn and Jupiter should associate familiarly in the same sign or and rise in advance as morning stars before the Sun with Mercury who is common⁶, but Mars and Venus, who are not of the same sect, [rise] after the Sun⁷, we say that the father is kingly because the former [i.e., ¹ We are also advised to pay attention to these duodenaria particularia in the De Revolutionibus Nadvitatum Hermetis.

² intransibiliter.

³ remota. [RH]

⁴ The tone of this section sounds like it comes from a different source. Note the use of "sect" for diurnal and nocturnal planets before and after the Sun respectively. This section looks like part of what Ptolemy was trying to say. Unfortunately he hopelessly confounds oriental/occidental, diurnal/ nocturnal, and masculine/ feminine. One wonders if one of his sources was also the source of this work.

⁵ In what follows we see a concrete application of doryphoria or spear-bearers, even though the term is not used. [RH]

⁶ that is, both diurnal and nocturnal. [RH]

⁷ Cf. Ptolemy, Tetrabiblos, I, chapter 7 on Diurnal and Nocturnal Planets. Also Cf. Book III, chapter 4.

Saturn and Jupiter], who are of the same sect with the Sun are associated with him before¹, but those which are not of the same sect [namely Venus and Mars] follow him. But in the Moon the contrary, that the former, those who are of the same sect, namely Mars and Venus and Mercury² are evening stars and rise after the Moon while simultaneously associating with her. The others, who are not of her sect, namely Jupiter and Saturn, are morning stars, oriental and before the Moon. [When this is so] we say that the mother is a queen. but if it is the other way around, that the former, those who are not of the same sect, should precede [her], but the latter, who are of the same sect, follow and they are interchanged with respect to nature, we say that they are the parents of the most glorious [offspring], of satraps or of tribunes or of those who are [immediately] under the king; and the more planets are thus associated, the more outstanding we say they will be, but the fewer [there are so situated] the less outstanding (they are). Therefore we will distinguish according to the substance of the nativity. Likewise if the associating [planets] are under the sun's rays, the things of the parents will be still less. If the luminaries are unallied, then consider the places in which they are, lest by chance they are in the sixth or twelfth, and if they are in angles or in [places] succedent to angles, and also the lords of their triplicity, furthermore, the part of the father or the mother and Saturn and Venus and their places; and from all these, we will consider, if the parents are noble or glorious and wealthy or the reverse. Consider indeed as has been said, the part of the father and the mother, and the part of the father, indeed, you will make the horoscope of the father, but the part of the mother you will make the horoscope of the mother³. Therefore whenever you want to judge regarding the father or mother from the figure of birth of a son or daughter, take the part as the horoscope and judge it like a figure with that is, rise before the Sun. [RH]

² Mercury is nocturnal when it is an evening star. [RH]

³ This seems to suggest that one can make charts for the parents from the nativity by placing the parts of the respective parents upon the horoscopus doing either equal or sign-as-house houses from them. Ptolemy seems to suggest in the Tetrabiblos that one might do the same thing with the Sun, or Saturn for the father and the Moon and Venus in the case of the mother. See Ptolemy, Tetrabiblos, Book III, chapter 5, "On the Parents." [RH]

the angles [falling out] in order¹ as the figure of the parents. See how the planets are located and whether they are in angles or declining from the angles and so forth. And so you may know about the parents and, if the delineations of events are not concordant to you, from the part of parents. Sometimes indeed, when it is a servile birth you will discover from the part that the mother is free and that [the native's] fortune is transcending the nativity, even if [the native] is a handmaid. We see in the nativity that the configuration, which seems to be signifying the mother, surpasses the birth of the mother of the native, since the mother is a slave; or, on the other hand, with the mother being free, and with the birth being extremely noble from [the testimony of] the part, which you take as the ascendant of the mother, you find her [to be] a handmaid and you say that there is no agreement between the part and the nativity, it is necessary that you use this method so that it agrees [the facts]. Consider who is the lord of the part and in the square or opposition of it you will put the ascendant of the father or the mother and see where it is fitting that the horoscope be placed; in one of these places it will agree with you.

XXI. Likewise Concerning the Parents From the Conjunctions and Preventions and From these Figures.

When the benevolent [planets] aspect before the conjunction has been made, they show good things and nobility for the parents. The malevolent [planets] show the contrary. The Moon having separated from the benevolent [planets] and conjoined with the malevolent [planets] shows that the natives from free men become slaves or subjects; the lord of the Moon a malevolent [planet] aspecting² evilly destroys the mother and things pertaining to the mother. The very same concerning the Sun for the father. Consider the fourth place from the horoscope. If the place is unfortunate and its lord is aspected by an evil

¹ cum angulis subsequentibus "with the angles following". You take the part as the ascendant. The rest of the houses are reckoned as equal houses. The fourth house cusp will be the same degree as the part, in the fourth sign from the part. The seventh house will be opposite the part and the tenth opposite the fourth.

² inspiciens. [RH]

[planet], we say that the fortune of the parents is harmed. It ought to be known that that which the Sun and Moon signify, when they are unfortunate, the lord of the angle of the earth signifies the same thing. And the Sun having reception in the angle of the earth, and in the place [of the father], signifies the property of the father, but the Moon, that of the mother. Reception happens when the angle of the earth is the house of the Sun or the Moon or their exaltation, or triplicity. And in the [case of] the Sun, let it be a masculine sign, in the [case of] the Moon, a feminine. If, as we have already said¹, the lord of the house of the part of the father is in the part itself within half of its perimeter, so that the part [is] in Capricorn in 15 degrees, with the lady of the opposite house, namely the Moon, in Capricorn also in 15 degrees with the part and because the perimeter² of the same Moon is 20 degrees and its distance is five degrees³, we say that the Moon aspects the part. It is contained by half a perimeter⁴, which is according to a conjunction which is 10 degrees. It is fitting however, that a conjunction happens within the thirty degrees of a sign. For if a perimeter exceeds a sign it is very weak, as has been said⁵. Such an aspect signifies that the native is fictitious or adopted so that he who has in his nativity the lord of the sign opposite to the part of the father or conjoined to him is adopted. The mores of the father we consider from the place of the lord of the

¹ See the end of Chapter XIX. He refers to the delineation that the native is adopted.

² We would say it's "orb" is 20 degrees, though this is a wide orb for modern astrologers. [Additional by RH] In fact "orb" is a fairly decent translation of the original Greek word, 'perimetrōs' from which comes our word, 'perimeter.' Also we have to keep in mind that for most modern astrologers an orb is actually one half of what the renaissance and medieval astrologers would have considered an orb. Ours is the radius of the circle or orb surrounding the planet, their's was the diameter.

³ The author posits that the Moon's distance from the Lord of the House of the Part of the Father is 5 degrees.

⁴ or, orb.

⁵ Out-of-sign orbs are permitted but very weak. This whole body of material is extremely important because it is the first instance in our studies of aspect orbs in something like the form we know them. So far we have found no other examples of them in Greek astrology. We do have to ask, is this an interpolation of later material? We have no way of knowing at this time. [RH] house of the part of the father, so that if the lord of the Part of the Father is found to be Venus and she is found to be in the house of Mars, you say that his father is adulterous, but the mother is obedient. However it ought to be known that it is not proper to pass judgement on individual configurations on the basis of weak indications. It is fitting therefore to get a third and a fourth testimony and so to pronounce confidently and without doubt. This is Dorotheus' opinion¹: It is certainly a very true appearance which is built up from many things coming together. It is proper to consider the part of Cupid and see if it is configured with the Sun or Moon especially by trine and sextile and if they are in obedient signs, then indeed we say that they [i.e., the parents] delight each other. But if only to the Sun, we say that the father is delighted by the mother, if to the Moon, the mother by the father. If the luminaries are averse² to each other, the benevolent [planets being] averse³ to the Sun and the Moon and the malevolent [planets] impede them, we say that the parents regard each other with hatred and are separated in life and death. If the Sun and the Moon are in their own descensions⁴ and in the terms of the evil [planets] and aspected by the evil [planets] they are separated by death. But if the benevolent [planets] aspect and they are in the terms of the good [planets], they are separated while living.

¹ This is presumably an interpolation.

² remota. [RH]

³ remoti. [RH]

⁴ debilities—either in fall or in detriment.

XXII. Concerning Which of the Parents Dies First.

Others would expound otherwise but we, testing it, find it thus: The Sun signifies principally the father, but Saturn does secondarily, however more diligently in diurnal and nocturnal figures. Whichever of these two should have proximity with the Moon, to wit, which are aspected¹ by her or conjunct with her and in her house or triplicity, that one takes the place of the father. In exactly the same way, Venus and the Moon of the mother. It is fitting to consider therefore in each nativity, which [planet], be it the Sun, the Moon, Saturn or Venus, is aspected² more by the malevolent [planets] or falls next to them. That one itself will be the destroyer of the father and the mother. If indeed the Sun receives the reckoning of the father and it is aspected by Saturn or Mars from a square or is conjunct with the same, even if it is elevated above them from the tenth, without the aspect of the benevolent (planets) it kills the father first³. Understand the same regarding the Moon and Venus for the mother. But if the Sun and Moon are evilly aspected or if Venus fell evilly or outside of sect, it kills the mother first. And Saturn improperly aspected⁴ by Mars or conjunct with him kills the father.

But some look at the part of the parents and spy out to which part⁵ by opposition, square or conjunction, a malevolent [planet] first sends a ray or where it is present. It is worse however if, retrograding, it aspects⁶ the part or the lord of the part, it kills this [parent] first. Understand likewise of the Sun and the Moon. Mars irradiating the fourth place from the Sun kills the father⁷ first because they take the Sun as the horoscope of the father and the fourth place from the horoscope is taken for the parents. Saturn aspecting the fourth place from the Moon by opposition or square or by conjunction kills the mother first.

¹*inspectus*. [RH]

²*inspicitur*.

³*praeinterfecit*.

⁴*inspectus*. [RH]

⁵ i.e., the part of the father or the part of the mother.

⁶*inspiciat*. [RH]

⁷ taking patrem for partem.

Others look to the lord of the angle of the earth and if they find it in a masculine sign they say the father dies first, but if in a feminine sign, the mother.

XXIII. Exposition of the Five Planets to whom are allotted the Greater Years'.

The Sun, since it is the lord of Leo rules the greater years, to wit, 120, half of which, because of its semi circle are 60 years. From these 60 half of which is 30 he [the Sun] gives to the house of Saturn which is opposite his own, to wit Aquarius, which [years] are called [his] lesser years.

But the Moon, since it is Lady of Cancer, rules the greater years, to wit, 108, of which half are 54 years. From these 54, half, to wit, 27 years, the Moon gives to the house of Saturn which is opposite to hers, namely Capricorn. Therefore of the two signs, i.e., Aquarius and Capricorn, the sum of years is the greater years of Saturn, 57.

But the Star of Jupiter, since it is of the same sect with the Sun and the lord of his triplicity, the Sun, of his 120 years, gives half, to wit, 60, on account of the triplicity of Sagittarius, and his [the Sun's] lesser years, which are 19, and these are the 79 greater years of Jupiter which it receives from the Sun.

Likewise the Moon, on account of the benevolence and reception of triplicity for that one [Jupiter], because Pisces and Cancer are of the same Triplicity, she gives Jupiter half of her 108 years, which is 54 years and her lesser years, which are 25 and there happens again the 79 greater years of Jupiter.

But for Mars, since he is of the same sect with the Moon, she gives half of her 108 years, to wit, 54. The Sun, however, on account of [Mars'] invidious imitation of fire and his corruptible substance does not give his major years to him but on account of the triplicity of Aries he gives to him his 18 years divided in two parts, namely 9 and thus happen the greater years of Mars, namely 63.

Likewise, on account of Venus' reception of triplicity, of [her]

¹ This is an extremely interesting chapter. The origins of the greater planetary periods are shrouded in mystery. This explanations may or may not be post facto rationalizations, but they are interesting and possibly correct. [RH]

exaltation and rulership of house, because the Moon is exalted in Taurus and co-rules in the nocturnal sect, [the Moon] gives half of her 108 years, to wit, 54.

Likewise, Saturn, on account of his triplicity and exaltation in Libra adds 30 years and gives them to Venus all of which together makes Venus' greater years 84.

Mercury however, since Saturn has rule in his houses, to wit, Libra¹ and Gemini, receives from him 57 greater years because of the similar sect and from the Sun [the Sun's] lesser years of 19, from all of which together is Mercury's 76 greater years.

XXIV. On the Four Quarters of the Figure, How You are Able to Know the Four Ages in Nativities through Them.

The beginning of the quarters is the horoscope. Therefore from the beginning of the degree of the ascendant all the way to the degree of the M.C. is called the oriental, masculine quarter². And note that first it is fitting to inspect the years of life and so to determine the quarters. Indeed this quarter signifies the first age of life. The second quarter is the feminine center³, it is called meridional, to wit, from the degree of the M.C. all the way to the degree of the west. This is the bending⁴ of

¹ Saturn is exalted in Libra which Mercury rules by night by triplicity. [RH]

² Statements like this make me think that Ptolemy used this book, or its source, as one of his sources. Cf. Ptolemy, Tetrabiblos, I, chapter 12, p. 71 in Robbins' edition.

³ centrum femineum.

⁴ declinatio. The word does not refer to the celestial coordinate of the same name, which is a latter invention. Here we are discussing the 4 quadrants of heaven, as seen from earth. This is the basic orientation of space from which the 12 houses originated by trisection of the quadrants. The modern term "declination" refers to the distance of a celestial body north or south of the Celestial Equator. The Solstitial points of the Ecliptic, 0 Capricorn and 0 Cancer, are also "bendings" the one south, the other north, but we are not discussing them here.

the south and meridional¹. This signifies the middle age, which is after youth²; from the middle age the native begins to show his works. The third quarter is from the degree of the west all the way to the angle of the earth which is the opposition of the MC. [This quarter is masculine and signifies old age³.] The last quarter is from the angle of the earth all the way to the degree of the ascendant. The feminine quarter is the northern bending. It signifies the last and very old⁴ age of life all the way to the hour of death.

End of Part I of the Liber Hermetis

¹ That is, the M.C, or Meridian points due south. As the angle beginning the quadrant gives its name to the quadrant and rules it, the eastern angle or horoscope governs the eastern or oriental quadrant (which, being between the horoscope and the MC is actually the SW quadrant) while the MC governs the southern quadrant (which is between the MC and the Descendent, or Western angle and thus actually in the SW of the figure), the Descendent governs the western quadrant (actually the NW, being twixt the west and I.C. or northern most point), and the I.C. governs the northern quadrant (which is actually the NE).

² post iuventutem.

³ The sentence in square brackets shows up in Gundel's text following the words "degree of the ascendant." It is obviously out of place. I have corrected it by placing it where it belongs.

⁴ decrepitam aetatem.

HERMES TRISMEGISTUS

Liber Hermetis - Part II

Translated by Robert Zoller
Edited by Robert Hand

Project Hindsight

Latin Track
Volume III

The Golden Hind Press

The following is a translation by Robert Zoiler of Liber Hermetis Trismegisti, from Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, (Neue Folge) 12, 1936. "Neue astrologisches texte des Hermes Trismegistos" von Wilhelm Gundel.

Table of Contents

XXV. Concerning the Fixed Stars: In Which Degrees of the Signs They Rise	1
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Aries	1
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees in Taurus	5
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees in Gemini	9
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Cancer	13
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Leo	18
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Virgo	21
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Libra	24
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees in Scorpio	27
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Sagittarius	30
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Capricorn	32
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees in Aquarius	36
On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Pisces	38
XXVI. On the XII Places and the Signification of the Planets
When They are Found in Them in Nativities	39
XXVII. On the Defluxions of the Moon	55
XX III. On the Conjunctions of the Moon	63
XXIX. On Corporeal Passions	66
XXX. On Brothers	67
XXXXI. On the Mutual Separation and Conjunction of the Five Planets and the Sun	68
XXXII. On the Signs in Which the Planets are Located.	71
XXXIII. On the Separation and Void of Course Moon.	86
XXXIV. On the Planets Placed in the Terms	89
XXXV. On the Virtue of the Triplicities and the Years of Life	95
Aries, Leo, Sagittarius are the first triplicity, by day the Sun; by night Jupiter	97
On Taurus, virgo, and Capricorn; the second triplicity, by day Venus, by night the Moon	102
On the third triplicity of Gemini, Libra, Aquarius, by day Saturn, by nigh! Mercury	104
On the fourth triplicity, namely Cancer, Scorpio, and

Pisces, by Day Venus, and by night Mars. . . .	105
XXXVI. On Biothanati, i.e., On Suffering Violent Death. . .	107
XXXVII. On the Death of the Brothers.	113

XXV. Concerning the Fixed Stars: In Which Degrees of the Signs They Rise.¹

*On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Aries.*²

From the first degree of Aries to the second³ there rises a fisherman sitting on the [river] bank fishing.⁴ This place is called "Diligence."⁵ These degrees are unblemished and southern because those who are fashioned in this place are the first born, or the first sons, or the first nourished, or they kill their older brothers. They are diligent hunters and fowlers and many are geometers and arithmeticians. -

In the third degree there is the bright star of the Gorgon or Cynocephalus,⁶ i.e., having the head of a dog, holding a candelabrum.

In the third degree and a half there rises, according to Ptolemy, a bright fixed star in the end of the Flood of the first magnitude, of the nature of Jupiter and Venus.⁷

The third and fourth degrees are unblemished and southern. They are also called "Diligence."

¹ Note that the following delineations of the overall fate are made on the basis of the ascending degree. The names given to various segments of the ecliptic are reminiscent of the naming of the paths on the Tree of Life in Sepher Yetzirah. The effects of the fixed stars herein listed are catalogued, in part, according to the natures of the planets, much as they are in Ptolemy, Tetrabiblos, I, 9., even to being given two planets as descriptive of their effects, but they do not coincide with his attributions. [Additional by RH] The identifications of the fixed stars given in this list with modern ones is according Gundel in his critical apparatus. We plan to check them carefully at a later time, by they all seem plausible.

² Here Festugière is certainly right. We are in a florilège, i.e., a collection of opinions from disparate sources, some older than others. Note Ptolemy inserted at 3 1/2 degrees of Aries,

³ In all of these constructions, the reader should understand that the last degree is included among the degrees being described. [RH]

⁴ Compare the language of this section with that used by Ibn Ezra in describing the rising of the "faces" in Beginning of Wisdom: An Astrological Treatise by Abraham Ibn Ezra, by Raphael Levy, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1939.

⁵ Throughout this section quotation marks are placed around words and phrases that appear to be titles of degree areas. There were, of course, no quotation marks in the original. It is not completely clear that these were intended to be titles, but most of them do not sound like simple descriptions. [RH]

⁶ Probably Theta Eridani. Acamar. [RH]

⁷ Probably also Theta Eridani, Acamar, as but given by Ptolemy. [RH]

From the third to the fifth degree the Goddess Pallas rises. This place makes wise men, artificers, master builders, mechanics and slaves who take care of silk.¹

[From the first degree to the third, the degrees are pure.]

In the sixth degree according to the *Sphaera Barbarica*² is the knot of Pisces.³ This is called "Remission." It makes those, for whom it may be ascending, diligent and reasonable, unmerciful, lucky, prison guards, also captives, and those causing violent death. They perform as ignoble, sycophantic actors. The sixth degree is of the nature of Mars and Mercury.

From the sixth to the seventh is Cepheus.⁴ It is called "Remission."

The fifth, sixth and seventh degrees make one suffer affliction.

From the first degree to the sixth are the terms of Jupiter.⁵ It is called "the Chariot." When they are rising, they make men mobile and achieving greater things from humble beginnings. Some prosper and are citizens of two cities.⁶

From the eighth degree to the tenth is Perseus flying, having his head below and foot above, showing the head of the Gorgon to the Whale.

From the fifth degree to the ninth is called "Remission"⁷ because they are remiss with respect to life and habits.

¹ sericarios This word comes from Seres, Chinese, known for the silk trade. Lucan (39-65 C.E.) placed them at the source of the Nile and made them neighbors of the Ethiopians. The confusion of Ethiopia and the Far East has a long and interesting history running from Classical times almost up to the Renaissance. For example, the legend of Prester John sometimes located his empire in India, sometimes in Ethiopia.

² The non-Greek, usually Egyptian, Catalogue of constellations. Cf. Testor, A History of Western Astrology, Boydell, 1987, pp. 14, 22, 43, 116, 135, 137, 138-9. Cf. Round Zodiac in ceiling at Denderah. The sphaera barbarica were used for describing the co-risings of the paranattellontae with each other and with the signs.

³ Alpha Piscium, Al Risha, the Cord. 20 degrees south from the Head of the Ram and 2.7 degrees north of the celestial equator. It is the knot of the united cords of the Fishes. Hipparchus and Ptolemy called it tōn linōn. Cicero called Nodus Piscium.

⁴ Cf. Aratus, Stanley Lombardo, Sky Signs: Aratus' Phaenomena, Berkeley: North Atlantic Books, 1983, p. 8.

⁵ So, in Tetrabiblos, Book I chapter 20. ed. cit. The terms listed here, except for some discrepancies in the way the author counted (inclusively or not), are the Egyptian terms, as we would expect.

⁶ bicives.

⁷ This word, remissio, has a variety of translations including "letting go," "remission," "relaxation." This word has occurred in various contexts in the last few lines. [RH]

When the eighth degree is rising it makes magnates and kings, or those set up over prisoners.

• From the fifth degree to the eighth are lucid degrees.

The ninth degree is the mouth of the Ram.¹ When it is on the ascendant, it produces men doing foul things, adulterers and those speaking with their noses² or mute, and overseers set over those who have been incarcerated.

When the tenth degree is on the ascendant, it makes its natives glorious and outstanding, but committing foul acts, and lacking in the necessities of life. But sometimes [it makes] men of middling livelihood.

* The ninth, tenth and eleventh degrees are southern, dark³ and full of hail.

In the eleventh degree and 16 degrees there rises [a star] which is in the head of Cassiopeia⁴.

From the eleventh [degree] to the twelfth is Cassiopeia. It makes lovers of contention who have good spouses, but in the end they are afflicted.

From the seventh degree to the twelfth are the terms of Venus. It is called Cupid. It causes friendships and the caress of eminent women.

From the thirteenth degree to the fifteenth Andromeda rises suspended in chains above the banks of the Red Sea, as if beseeching.

When the thirteenth [degree] is in the ascendant with Saturn or the Moon it causes crucifixions on account of Andromeda, afflictions from neighbors and treacheries. But if a benevolent [planet] should aspect, they [the natives] are freed⁶ from these things by that [benefic], as Andromeda was saved by Perseus, and moreover, they are carried forth from their prisons. But without Saturn and the Moon, when the thirteenth degree rises, it makes shameless men living in prisons. Likewise the fourteenth degree makes men shameless.

When the fifteenth degree is with the horoscope, it makes men famous, glorious and wealthy, those who are incarcerated, exiles, or

¹ Eta and Alpha Arietis. Harnal. [RH]

² This is an idiom of some sort which may mean to sneer, or it may refer to a speech defect.

³ tenebrosus.

⁴ Zeta Cassiopeiae. [RH]

⁵ Cf. Lombardo. Sky Signs: Aratus' Phaenomena, ed. cit. p.9.

⁶ taking salvantur for salvatur.

those who wander from region to region, or businessmen,¹ according to the figure of the nativity.

* From the ninth degree to the sixteenth are shadowy.²

From the tenth degree to the fifteenth is called "Exaltation," because these degrees make [natives who are] excellent, eloquent and money changers.

From the sixteenth to the eighteenth is Cetus the Whale watching³ Andromeda.

The eighteenth degree is the loins of the Ram.⁴ Cetus rises with it. It makes prison guards, dancers, greedy men and forgers of documents.

The eighteenth degree is the girdle of the Ram.⁵ When it is the horoscope it makes sodomites.

From the fourteenth degree and twenty-six minutes to twenty [degrees] and sixteen minutes there rises the triangle Deltoton. It makes farmers living off the land.

From the sixteenth degree to the twentieth, below the girdle, is called "The Ruins" because those born with this section of Aries ascending fall from high places.

From the fifteenth to the twentieth is he who carries a lantern. It makes those who carry lamps in processions and those who sell them.

From the thirteenth to the twentieth are the terms of Mercury. It is good nourishment, love of work, glory and profits.

* From the seventeenth to the twentieth [degree] are lucid degrees.

From the twenty-first to the twentieth-third [degree] Ocean rises.

The twenty-first makes men the basest in all respects.

When the twenty-second degree is the horoscope it makes shameless fornicators living off the land.

The twenty-third degree is the end of the tail. When it is the horoscope, it makes those who tie flowers, prosperous gardeners and household superintendents, or those living off the land.⁶

All of Ocean is from the twenty-first to the twentieth-third [degree]. It signifies a royal power.

From the twenty-fourth to the twenty-fifth [degree] is Deltoton. It

¹ negotiatores.

² umbrosi.

³ irony.

⁴ Nu Arietis. [RH]

⁵ c Arietis. [RH]

⁶ Presumably tenant farmers.

makes builders, carpenters, stone-cutters and all those who build houses honorably, tailors and shoemakers.

The twenty-fourth degree makes sodomites doing foul things, or pimps or shameless men.

When the twenty-fifth degree is the horoscope, it makes shepherds and keepers of cattle.

From the twenty-first degree to the twenty-fifth are the terms of Mars and are called "Distemperance." It causes dissensions, exile, flights, condemnations, adulteries, hatreds, detentions and sicknesses.

From the twenty-first degree to the twenty-fourth the degrees are empty.

From the twenty-sixth degree to the twenty-seventh Aelurus rises. It makes timid insipid detractors.

When the twentieth degree is the horoscope it makes shameless men.

From the twenty-eighth degree to the thirtieth is part of Pegasus.¹ It makes [there is a lacuna in the text] stable boys, cattle thieves and donkey drivers.

The twenty-eighth degree makes shameless men.

From the twenty-fifth degree to the thirtieth is called "Motion," because when these rise it makes mobile men and businessmen.

Whoever is born [with the degrees] from the twenty-sixth to the twenty-ninth [rising] will be great and perpetrators of great things.

From the twenty-sixth to the thirtieth are the terms of Saturn. They are called "Two-Faced." They make superintendents, correction officers, set above the people.

From the twenty-fifth degree to the twenty-ninth the degrees are lucid.

The thirtieth degree is empty.

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees in Taurus.

From the first degree of Taurus to the third are the Pleiades. They are called "Life."² These degrees are shadowy because they live not lacking in any respect and they are of many things.¹ But they signify certain farmers and governors. But [if] Mars and the Moon are in that place, they [the planets] cut off the genitals.

¹ The winged Horse. This was an important religious symbol for the Phoenicians.

² There is an old esoteric doctrine that the source of immortality is to be found in the Pleiades.

In the third degree and six minutes the Gorgon rises, of the nature of Saturn and Jupiter.²

In the fourth degree and six minutes the head of Perseus rises, of the nature of Saturn and Jupiter.³

From the fourth to the seventh is the Hyades. They produce rain, water-carriers and bath keepers.

When the third and fourth degrees are horoscopes, they make the scribes of the [various] countries, and tenant farmers on the villas of kings,⁴ feeders of horses or ploughmen. But they will lament much because of their eyes or they will become one-eyed or lunatics.

The fourth and the fifth are not degrees of many children.

From the fifth degree and thirty-six minutes to the seventh degree and six minutes Pleias⁵ rises, of the nature of Mars and the Moon.

The seventh degree is twisted around the knee of the Bull.⁶ For this reason, from the first degree to the eighth and to the Pleiades, they exist in turbid air. They are makers of thunders and earthquakes, and makers of lightnings and fires. These two degrees, the sixth and the seventh are called "Drying" because when they are horoscopes, they make impetuous men, feeders of pigs and cattle, stupid men who suffer violent death or those who chase wild beasts.

From the first to the eighth [degree] are the terms of Venus and it is called "Cupid" because in an ascendant of this kind they make lovers of purity, [and] cheerful music.

From the eighth to the ninth is called "The Slave," because when they are on the ascendant they make slaves and subjects.

The tenth degree is called "The sufferings of evil things," because they never get good from [an ascendant] of this sort.

From the eighth to the eleventh [degree] there rises Auriga holding back the chariot. It makes outstanding charioteers.

¹ The logic of this passage escapes me. Perhaps, they [the "living" degrees] are characteristic of many things.

² Beta Persei, Algol. [RH]

³ Tau Persi. [RH]

⁴ conductores vicorum regionum.

⁵ One of the Pleiades (to be understood as standing for all of them)?

⁶ Mu Tauri. [RH]

From the twelfth to the fourteenth is Auriga holding the wheel by the middle.

The twelfth degree causes many slaves to change to lords through Fortune, however they are shameless.

When the thirteenth degree is the horoscope it makes [its natives] free, good, faithful, friendly, magnanimous men who acquire riches, relaxed, but shameless.

The fourteenth degree makes shameless perpetrators of foul deeds, sodomites, lovers of music, those who do not take up ancestral things, those who are friendly lovers of the sciences, but others are hunters suffering violent death.

From the fifteenth degree and thirty six minutes to sixteen degrees and six minutes all of Hyas¹ rises.

From the ninth degree to the fourteenth are the terms of Mercury. They are called "Supine," because when they are horoscopes they make presidents², overseers and stewards.

From the twelfth to the fifteenth make shameless men.

From the eleventh to the twelfth the degrees are empty.

From the fifteenth to the seventeenth Orion rises with a sword opposed to Antares.

When the fifteenth degree is the horoscope, in which is the brilliant star of Orion³, opposite to the star in Antares placed in the fifteenth degree of Scorpio, it is called "Death." It makes tribunes, leaders of armies, chiefs of the military great and terrible, but shameless and perpetrators of foul deeds, however powerful travelling through many regions and subjugating barbarous peoples;⁴ but they die a violent death, deceitfully killed or burned to death.

The fifteenth degree and the sixteenth degrees are southern and smokey.

The seventeenth degree makes great tribunes but they die violently.

In the sixteenth degree and six minutes there rises the brilliant star of the Hyades,⁵ of the nature of Mars and Venus. This degree is called "The Earth."

¹ Here again the singular form is used. Are we to understand that all the Hyades are meant?

² 'President' here means "one who sits in front," not the modern office. [RH]

³ Pi Ononis. [RH]

⁴ gentes.

⁵ Alpha Tauri, Aldebaran. [RH]

From the eighteenth degree to the twentieth rises the Ship and in addition the Dead Dragon. It is called "the Earth."

From the seventeenth degree to the twenty-second they are field workers who have their livelihood from the earth working [the land] in peril.

The nineteenth degree makes lords with labor.

From the twenty-first to the twenty-third there rises He-Who-Holds-Back-the-Ship, the God disposing the whole world.

The twenty-first [degree] makes black athletes.¹ But if Mars is in the ascending degree, they kill their parents and they are themselves evilly killed or are fed to dogs.

The twenty-third degree is called "Terminus,"² because, when it is the horoscope, he sails over a very large region and rules very many places.

The twenty-second degree is the beginning of the Flood.³

From the thirteenth degree to the twentieth the degrees are lucid.

In the twenty-third degree and sixteen minutes there rises a brilliant star, which is in the end of the left foot of Orion.⁴

The twenty-fourth degree is called "Terminus." It is of the nature of Saturn and Jupiter, because it sails a very great region and acquires very many places.

From the fourteenth degree to the twenty-second are the terms of Jupiter. It is called "Beauty, Glory, Approach," unexpected benefit and much friendship.

From the twenty-fourth to the twenty-seventh is the God below the Ship. He signifies the retributions of evil men or the obtaining of good things after death.

From the twenty-fifth to the twenty-seventh is called "Water," because these [degrees], when they are the horoscopes, make merchants⁶ making their livelihood on the waters or through some liquid.

When the twenty-sixth [degree] is the horoscope, it makes idle,

¹ The Michael Jordan degree!

² A deity presiding over boundaries.

³ Lambda Eridani. [RH]

⁴ Beta Orionis, Rigel [RH]

⁵ Gamma Aurigae, or Beta Tauri, El Nath. [RH]

⁶ negotiatores.

destructive robbers.

From the twentieth degree to the twenty-fifth the degrees are empty.

The twenty-fifth and the twenty-sixth degrees are southern and turbid and moving the air and lightnings.

From the twenty-third degree to the twenty-seventh are the terms of Saturn. It is called "The Freeing, the Remission of Evils, Continuous Delight and the Loss of Substance."

In the twenty-eighth degree and the twenty-ninth there rises the brilliant star of the She Goat,¹ which is called "Mazonas."² It is of the nature of Saturn and Jupiter.

From the twenty-eighth degree to the thirtieth is the Bear which is above the heaven. It is called "the Violence of Fire," because these, when they are horoscopes, they [the natives born under them] will have life from fire and iron. They are the terms of Mars, but they will suffer a violent death. Some are thieves, some rapacious, some are sentenced to punishments and some mutilated.

The twenty-ninth degree makes those who are suffering evils or who are lame, always destroying everything.

The thirtieth degree makes prudent and erudite men, but some have cuts from iron or fire or become bath house keepers.⁴

From the twenty-sixth to the twenty-eighth [degree] the degrees are lucid.

The twenty-ninth and the thirtieth degrees are shadowy.

From the twenty-eighth degree and thirty-six minutes to the first degree of Gemini and thirty-six minutes the belt of Orion rises.⁵

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees in Gemini.

From the twenty-eighth degree of Taurus and thirty-six minutes to the first degree of Gemini and thirty-six minutes there rises the zone of Orion and Auriga who stands atop the chariot, the two horses and the

¹ Alpha Aurigae, Capella.

² Perhaps. "Amazonas?" Robert Schmidt suggests that mazonas in Greek refers to those who celebrate the festival of Dionysius at Phigalea. Also cf. Hebrew: Matzon, "food." One of the goat's attributes is that it will eat anything.

¹ damnati.

⁴ It appears that to be a bath-keeper was not consistent with being prudent and erudite.

⁵ Delta Orionis, Mintaka. [RH]

wheel.

In the first degree thirty-six minutes there rises the middle star of the three in the belt of Orion,¹ of the nature of Saturn and Jupiter.

From the first degree to the second there rises Cetus's tail and Hercules. It is called "Wind," because by these, when they are horoscopes, they become merchants going to many places, frequently living among strangers. They make lovers of music, the sciences and philosophical doctrines.²

The third degree signifies the same thing. It is likewise called "Wind."

From the third degree to the fifth [is] Hippocentaurus and Apollo.

From the first degree to the sixth the degrees are lucid, because, when they are in the ascendant they make sailors. It is called "Tranquility." But if Saturn is present it makes excellent physicians and notaries and herbalists, augurs, priests, those who are constant,³ assistants and those expert in mathesis.⁴

In the fifth degree and twenty-six minutes there rises a star, which is in the right shoulder of Orion.⁵ It is of the nature of Mars and Mercury.

In the sixth degree and twenty-six minutes there rises a star of Auriga, of the nature of Saturn and Jupiter.⁶ In the head of Auriga there is another brilliant star in the sixth degree and fifty-six minutes.⁷

From the first degree to sixth degree are the degrees⁸ of Mercury. It is called "Tranquility" because by these, when they are horoscopes, are made [natives who are] constant, intelligent, taciturn, and able to navigate.

From the sixth to the seventh degree there are the Dragon, the Bear

¹ Epsilon Ononis, Alnilam. [RH]

² scientiae et disciplinae.

³ assiduus.

⁴ The word mathesis in Greek originally meant any art which could be learned. By the European Middle Ages it had two meanings. If the 'th' was aspirated and the 'e' kept short (as in "the"), it meant mathematics and included all the Quadrivium, including astronomy. If the 'th' were sounded as 't' and the 'e' lengthened (as in "fee"), it meant divination by numbers. This latter included astrology and arithromancy. The former was considered licit by the church, the latter was condemned.

⁵ Alpha Ononis, Betelgeuse. [RH]

⁶ Beta Aurigae, Menkalinan. [RH]

⁷ Delta Aurigae. [RH]

⁸ The words gradus and terminus are here used interchangeably.

and the Hunter. It signifies illness, imprisonment and chains.

From the eighth to the tenth [degree] is Theseus standing on his knees. It makes stone cutters and every labor performed sitting.¹

The eighth, ninth and tenth degrees are shadowy.

From the eleventh to the twelfth [degree] there rises the Ship and the Crown.² It makes actors, mimes and jesters.

From the seventh [degree] to the twelfth are the terms of Jupiter. They are called "Benefits" because those of this sort both do good and they receive benefits and they become beneficial. Whenever the time arrives, the eighth and ninth degrees make winter.³ They are southern and are signifiers of good aspiration.

From the fourth to the twelfth [degree] is called "Temperance," because for those whose horoscopes they are, they give a well tempered mind.

The twelfth degree, when it is the horoscope [and is] with Mars, makes sacrileges and enmities.

From the thirteenth degree to the fifteenth degree Theseus rises, who appears half-complete from part of the Crown. It is called "The Descent," because from middle age they fall away from their own goods. They are brought to pass in strength or prudence or power.

From the thirteenth degree to the eighteenth degree Faon rises, a Satyr with a walking stick and a dog. It makes fighters and all things which participate in rhythm and exercise.

From the thirteenth degree to the seventeenth are the terms of Venus. It is called "The Place, Flower, Beauty, Felicity from Unexpected Things."

From the eleventh to the fifteenth degree are lucid degrees.

From the sixteenth degree to the seventeenth the degrees are empty.

From the nineteenth to the twentieth the Serpent rises. It makes hunters of wild beasts, fowlers, moreover some having a trade next to the waters, or those lurking outside the city, those causing despair, envious persons, and those who polish skins such as snake skin.

In the twenty-first degree and six minutes there rises the bright Dog star, of the nature of Mars and Jupiter.⁴ It makes great gourmands.

¹ or, "every sedentary profession."

² Corona.

³ Or, "the rainy season."

⁴ Alpha Canis Majoris. Sirius. [RH]

From the twenty-first degree to the twenty-second the Hen rises and the Tail of the Whale [Cetus]. It makes [the natives] very changeable, unstable of mind and imagining beyond their limit.

From the twentieth to the twenty-fifth degree *Tripes*¹ and above, Cithera and Crater. It makes soothsayers, hypnocrites,² poets, physicians, herbalists, or grammarians, prudent, temperate men, pious magnates and priests.

From the eighteenth to the twenty-third degree are lucid degrees.

The twenty-fourth degree makes those who linger on fountains, rivers, and swamps or in ditches; many are made soft of body.³

The twenty-fourth degree is southern and signifies benefits and is a causer of earthquakes.

From the eighteenth degree to the twenty-fourth degree are the terms of Mars and it is called "Fortitude, and Presiding Power and Benefits."

When the twenty-fifth degree is the horoscope it makes athletes and these same particularly boxers, champion wrestlers; and soldiers and prison guards [are made]. It also makes musicians or acrobats, but they are harmed in the head, because there rises with it the bright star in the head of the preceding Twin, of the nature of Jupiter and Mercury.⁴

When the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth degree are horoscopes, they harm the head in every way, as we said above.

From the twenty-sixth to the twenty-eighth [degree] is part of Auriga. They are southern degrees and significators of good aspiration and inducers of earthquakes. They make gamesters,⁵ those who play at dice,⁶ wretches, those with gout, rheumatism.⁷

The twenty-second degree to the twenty-seventh degree is called

¹ "Three-footed."

² interpreters of dreams.

³ An aspersion regarding the entertainment of such natives is implied.

⁴ Alpha Geminorum, Castor. [RH]

⁵ aleatores. Those who play at dice.

⁶ taxillatores. Dice players again. This time a small die is referred to. Apparently there were several kinds of dies used to play dice.

⁷ According to Niermeyer, Mediae Latinitatis Lexicon Minus, contractos means those who have rheumatism, which certainly fits in juxtaposition to gout. [RH]

"Gene,"¹ because by these, when they are horoscopes, [the natives] are delayed in humid places, fountains, rivers, or in ruinous places.

From the twenty-ninth to the thirtieth degree arise Delphinus and the Satyr.

The twenty-eighth degree to the thirtieth is called "Conjunction." These degrees cause earthquakes, mariners, swimmers, managers of agreements,² gluttons.³ It is called "The Chain," because many of them are placed in custody or become prison guards or those who swim with implements bound together with others⁴, or they in some way receive the experience of prison.

From the twenty-fourth degree to the thirtieth the degrees are shadowy.

From the twenty-fifth degree to the thirtieth are the terms of Saturn. It is called "Subjection." It causes one to be orphaned, bindings, dishonorable military service, loss of dignity.

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Cancer.

From the first degree to the second of Cancer Argo rises half visible, and the figure of the Shepherd.

In six minutes there rises the brilliant star which is above the head of the following Twin,⁵ of the nature of Mars, it makes seamen, captains of ships, travellers and fishermen, and those who bring up sponges, and merchants and businessmen. Many are harmed in the head.

From the third to the fifth degree there rises He-Who Moves-the-Ship, and the open mouth of the Lion. It makes sailors who climb in the mast of a ship, and who give indications of the land, winds or cities.⁶ or gold workers, which the common people call perenenses,⁷ or guards

¹ This name, Gundel tells us, shows up only in the Liber Hermetis. He considered it one of the new Hermetic star names connected with magical practices. He connects it to the zodiac of Dendera and to the goddess remen-har mentioned by Brugsch (Thesaurus inscr. Æg. I. 137ff.).

² tractatores compositorum.

³ glutones.

⁴ The precise meaning of this is unclear. It may refer to pearl divers or sponge gatherers, who swim tied together, so that they can be pulled out. [RH]

⁵ Beta Geminorum, Pollux. [RH]

⁶ in other words, the lookout of a ship. [RH]

⁷ Unknown word.

of wine barrels,¹ schismatics,² thespians,³ stupefied people,⁴ those who lie down,⁵ those uniting for evil purposes,⁶ quarrelsome people.⁷ However, these people die in public by fire or iron, if Mars is in the ascendant, but by water, if Saturn be there instead.

In the second degree and thirty-six minutes Canis Minor⁸ rises, having been aroused by the rays of The Dog. It is of the nature of Mars and Mercury and it signifies the aforesaid things.

When the fifth degree is the horoscope, it makes fishermen, sailors and navigators.

From the sixth degree to the seventh degree is the Fountain and the two Asses in the mouth of the Lion.⁹ It signifies advantage. They conduct their lives humbly, living a relaxed life without elegance.

From the fourth degree to the seventh according to the Sphaera Barbarica is the Little Cloud.¹⁰ When it is on the horoscope, with Mars and the Moon, it makes blind men or those having cataracts," damaged eyes.

The sixth and seventh degree makes effeminate men who sleep with

¹ thunnorum. Sorry Charley, we're not speaking classical Latin here. If we were, our guards would be keeping watch over tuna fish (thunnus). Our author (or editor) goofed and wrote thunnorum instead of thunnorum, which in any case should have been tunnarum, the plural of Medieval Latin tunna, from which we get English tun, a large barrel or cask for storing wine or ale. The guards were posted to keep away wine-bibbers, not cats.

² cismaticos = schismaticos. [Additional by RH] This peculiar form of the word is either Sicilian or Spanish according to the O.E.D. This is consistent with the other Sicilian words that R. Zoller has noted in his introduction to Part 1 of the L.H. See Liber Hermetis, Part I, p. xxiv.

³ theaticos.

⁴ stupefactos. Also senseless or benumbed persons. [RH]

⁵ desensores. A reference to craven sexual behavior.

⁶ ad mala concurrentes

⁷ rixatores.

⁸ Anticanis, i.e., Procyon, Alpha Canis Minoris. Vide. Star Names: Their Lore and Meaning, by Richard Hinckley Allen, NY: Dover 1963 pp. 131-133.

⁹ Gamma and Delta Cancri. [RH]

¹⁰ See below page 16, note 1. This cloud is also known as the Beehive. It is interesting to note the various positions given in this section of the text for this cloud. The text itself appears to be (accidentally) a record of precession. One wonders if this hermetic text contributed to Thebit ben Qurra's Trepidation Theory which dealt with an incorrect conception of Precession.

" nubecula.

animals.

From the first to the seventh degree are the terms of Mars. It is called "Possession, Confusions, Enmities, Dangers and Exiles."

From the seventh to the eighth degree Praesepe rises, and Lyra playing the lyre. But some say that the Little Cloud is in the eighth and ninth. They make those having an easy life with relaxation and much putting off until tomorrow, living without a thought [for tomorrow] with delight.

The eighth degree makes sober, just men, compassionate, sometimes laborers, or those working in workhouses,¹ suffering evil things.

The ninth degree makes arrogant, cupidinous, luxurious, adulterers or desperate, impious hunters, and those who have their eyes wounded.²

According to Dorotheus,³ the Little Cloud in Cancer rises in the ninth degree.

The tenth degree is called "Solution," because they will travel in many lands and they become rich.

From the eleventh to the twelfth [degree] is the Little Cloud. It signifies the robe of secular things.⁴ They make just men, cheerful and ¹ Hellenistic Egypt must have been full of prisons.

² The ancient Egyptian physicians were renown for their ability to cure diseases of the eyes.

³ Mid 1st cent. C.E.

⁴ The saecularia were games held at intervals to celebrate the salvation of the world from the periodic destructions by fire and water (called, in Greek, Apokatastasis) which marked the transition from one age to another, or in gratitude to the gods for having enabled the people to escape epidemics or other catastrophes. The concept of the Apokatastasis was that of a periodic purging of evil and disharmony from the world. Those who survived into the next age were "just and fortunate." Among the Greeks, there were many myths of certain ages of the world (Golden Age, Silver age, etc) all mixed up with astronomical theories of the whole world order beginning anew when the planets returned to their original positions after what was called the magnus annus or Great Year. The same series of people would appear on earth again and repeat the various exploits of their lives (Cf. Virgil, Eclog. iv, 34ff). Among the Greeks the idea was held that the cycle began anew after four periods of 110 years each (Cf. Augustine, De Civ. Dei. xxii. 28. He quotes Varro from On the Origin of the Roman People, "Certain astrologers," he says, "have written that men are destined to a new birth, which the Greeks call Palingenesis. This will take place after four hundred and forty years have elapsed; and then the same soul and the same body, which were formerly united in the person, shall again be reunited.") The Romans took up this belief and practice and saw such ideas as linked to the Sybeline Books (Horace, Carm. Saec. 5).

fortunate.

From the twelfth degree and twenty-six minutes to the fourteenth degree and forty-nine minutes the Little Cloud rises. According to Ptolemy¹ this is in the thirteenth degree. When it is found in the ascendant [it shows] one having a rich voice.

From the eighth to the thirteenth degree are the terms of Venus. It is called "Concupiscence."

The eighth and ninth degrees are southern, frigid and windy, and the terms of Venus. They make lovers of purity and those who are desirable.

From the eighth to the twelfth the degrees are lucid.

From the thirteenth to the fifteenth degree is the Dog Star.² It makes men terrible in battles and kings. It also causes great sicknesses.

The thirteenth and fourteenth degrees are shadowy.

The fifteenth degree is called "The Constellation," because it signifies regarding appearance and splendor.

From the sixteenth to the seventeenth degree the Satyr rises. It makes those who are naked, brigands, those for whom [the police] are looking.³

At these celebrations, which marked the transition from one age to the next, games were held in honor of the gods and propitiatory offerings were made for all alive at that time. When that whole race had passed away, the gods signified that the cycle was over by sending prodigies, and a new sacrifice had to be ordered (Censorinus, De die natali, 17.5).

¹ In Tetrabiblos, I, 9, a cloud-like cluster in the breast [of Cancer], called the Manger [Praesepe, or Beehive] is mentioned. In the Almagest it is said to be at 10 1/3 degrees. Ptolemy's floruit = 160 C.E. The text claims Ptolemy's position for the Little Cloud is 13 degrees. In this case, the text seems to have been corrected by 2 2/3 degrees. This would be 266 years at the commonly used rate of precession in the early centuries C.E. (1 degree per century). 266 + c 160 (Ptolemy's floruit) = c 426 C.E. Pingree reckons a bit later overall. At a rate of 50.25 seconds /annum, this would be about 190 years, this would come to c 350.

Dorotheus is represented as claiming that the Manger is at 9 degrees. The difference between the Almagest's position (10.5 degrees) and what the text says Dorotheus' position is = 1.5 degrees. At 1 degree/century, this amounts to 150 years. At a rate of 50.25"/year, it would take roughly 107.46 years to travel that distance. Thus Dorotheus would have composed his tables about 53 C.E., which may be roughly correct and would suggest that the star positions might have been arrived at by observation.

² This does not seem to be Sirius. [RH]

³ excogitatos.

From the fifteenth degree to the eighteenth degree the degrees are lucid.

From the eighteenth degree to the twentieth are the Three Graces. They produce strength, prudence, temperance, beauty, wealth and [pleasing] voice.

When the eighteenth and the nineteenth degrees are horoscopes with Jupiter preceding, they make merchants, greedy men, money-lenders, and some famous athletes. This is because the head of the Hydra is there.¹

When the twentieth degree is the horoscope, it makes lame, crook-footed men with useless hands, living from spices and fruits. They make lovers of music. But if Mars is in this degree, it makes eunuchs.

From the fourteenth degree to the nineteenth are the terms of Mercury. It is proper, the friendship of great men. Some however, are lovers of words.

The twenty-first degree and forty-six minutes is the star in the end of the nose of the Lion.²

From the twenty-second degree to the twenty-third is the head of the Hydra.³

The nineteenth to the twentieth degrees are dark.

The twenty-first degree to the twenty-third are the hind parts of the Bear.

The twenty-first degree is southern and cold and windy. It is called by many the Dog Star.⁴ It signifies the final act of doing and glory.

From the twenty-fourth degree to the twenty-sixth are the middle of the Scarabeus. It makes disciples [or apprentices], practitioners and busy men.

The twenty-fifth degree makes happy men, adulterers, doers of foul deeds. This is because this is the place of the Dog.

The twenty-sixth degree is called "Measure," because it is a sign of worthy performance⁵ in life.

From the twentieth degree to the twenty-sixth are the terms of Jupiter. It is called the term of life and the exaltation of Jupiter. They

¹ Epsilon and Eta Hydrae. [RH]

² Kappa Leonis. [RH]

³ Epsilon and Eta Hydrae. [RH]

⁴ Again, not Sinus. [RH]

⁵ invanae operationis in vita.

make benefactors, lovers of food, lovers of things made by artisans; some, however, are those desiring something from the gods.

From the twenty-seventh degree to the thirtieth the tail of the Hydra rises. They are the terms of Saturn. They make fishermen, water carriers, bath-attendants, river pirates,¹ gardeners, drinkers of fountains and whatever things are made in wetness.

From the twenty-eighth degree to the thirtieth are made impious and shameless [natives]. These cohabit with [their] mothers and [their] stepmothers.² But some are hunters, and fighters with wild animals.

The twenty-ninth degree is called "The Wedding of the Gods."

From the twenty-seventh degree to the thirtieth are the terms of Saturn. Many are made unstable, raging insanely with indignities. Men of many counsels and extremely changeable [men] are made.

From the twenty-first degree to the twenty-eighth are lucid degrees.

The twenty-ninth and the thirtieth degrees are empty.

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Leo.

From the first degree to the second degree of Leo there rise the middles of Hydra, Auriga, and Argo. When these are horoscopes, they make farmers, gardeners, fowlers, collectors of seeds, bathers,³ gladiators,⁴ sailors, witnesses⁵ (but evil ones), evil-doers,⁶ eaters of evil things,⁷ those suffering evil things, pimps, those having a stinking mouth or having a disagreeable voice. Many die on the gallows, or they kill their parents.

In the third degree and twenty-six minutes there rises the beginning of Hydra.⁸ It is of the nature of Saturn and Venus.

From the fourth degree to the fifth degree is the Crow near Crater.

¹ captatores fluminum.

² Can this be an example of an alien astrologer condemning Pharaonic Egyptian marriage practices?

³ lotores. Lewis and Short show lotus as from lavo, to wash. I therefore suggest Lotores as a form of lautores, from lautus, "washed." Perhaps the Latin translator means wash-house attendants?

⁴ Paradoxically, because they also stand on sand, teachers of arithmetic are also called arenarius or harenarius.

⁵ superstes. This word in Medieval Latin also means a supervisor. [RH]

⁶ This term was occasionally applied to witches and sorcerers as well as to criminals.

⁷ Another reference to black-magical practices.

⁸ Alpha Hydrae, Alphard. [RH]

He who has these as a horoscope will dominate the people. Being the friends of magnates, they (will themselves be] magnates. They make prognostications and proper harmony.

In the fifth degree and the fiftieth minute there rises the brilliant star in the heart of the Lion.¹

But the sixth degree is summery.²

From the first degree to the sixth degree are the terms of Jupiter. It is called "The Ascension of Success," because they [its natives] are exalted from an inconsiderable fortune.

From the first degree to the sixth the degrees are lucid.

From the eighth degree to the tenth is Draco standing between the two Bears.³ These three degrees are shadowy. They cause protection, caution, separations of parents, brothers, husbands and wives.

The eighth degree is called "The Place," because their place is allotted and he will rule many regions and he will cultivate very much land, but he will be a perjurer, of a malicious nature and he will be a captive.

When the ninth degree is the horoscope, it makes glorious princes, lovers of wrestling. They swear, are adulterers, of evil nature and are imprisoned.

When the tenth degree is the horoscope, whoever the native will be, he will not be nourished by his parents, but he will come to alien hands.

From the eleventh degree to the twelfth degree are the Phrygian Flute Players,⁴ "The Sterility of Great Hope." These die by iron.

When the eleventh degree is the horoscope, it makes audacious⁵ leaders of armies, irascible and venereal. They feed and teach many people and the sons of kings and magnates, and through them they become great. But some become physicians or pharmacists. They die by iron.

¹ Alpha Leonis, Regulus. [RH]

² aestivus.

³ Cf. Phaenomena, Aratus, trans. Stanley Lombardo, pub. as: Sky Signs: Aratus' Phaenomena, Berkeley: North Atlantic Books, 1983, p. 3.

⁴ Frigii Tibicines Frigii from Phrigii, not frigus. The tibia was used very anciently as a musical instrument, especially in connection with magic. Cf. the identical practice among 19th century Tibetan monks in Alexandra David-Neel Mystery and Magic in Tibet. The use of the word here may refer to some Anatolian cult which preserved this neolithic practice.

⁵ temerarius. This word also means thoughtless.

From the seventh degree to the eleventh degree are the terms of Venus. It is called "Happiness of Benefit;" the friendships for those who are greater."

From the thirteenth degree to the fifteenth degree Corona arises.

And the thirteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth degrees are windy.

In the seventeenth degree and thirty-sixth minute there rises a brilliant star which is over the limbs of the Lion,¹ of the nature of Saturn and Venus.

The eighteenth degree is called "The Lion's Mane."² It is vulnerable.

From the twenty-first to the twenty-second degree Hydra rises, which is under the Bear.

From the twenty-third to the twenty-fifth degree is the Wash Basin in the middle of Draco.

From the twenty-sixth degree to the twenty-seventh there rises the Two Headed One³ who is under the Wash Basin.⁴

In the twenty-seventh degree there rises a brilliant star which is in the tail of the Lion,⁵ of the nature of Saturn and Venus.

From the twenty-eighth degree to the thirtieth Typhon rises.

The twenty-eighth degree is windy.

The twenty-ninth and thirtieth are southern. They make rude, foolish men.

When the twenty-eighth and the twenty-ninth degrees are in the horoscope, they make malicious, shameless, foul parasites, but some are lepers or those suffering elephantiasis.

When the thirtieth degree is the horoscope it makes superfluous, shameless, useless, ignoble persons, and the greatest old age.

From the twenty-fifth degree to the thirtieth are the terms of Mars. These degrees are shameless and foul-doing. They make labors and those suffering the misfortunes of evil things. Some are exposed in body to extreme danger, but they become shameless, sordid, and doers of foul deeds.

¹ Delta Leonis, Zosma. [RH]

² Coma Berenices [RH]

³ Ancipiter.

⁴ lavatorium.

⁵ Iota Leonis. (RH)

From the first degree of Virgo to the third Spica rises.

The first and the second degrees are called "The Road," because they [the natives of this ascendant] will travel over a wide area; they will be wealthy stewards and agents.¹ Sometimes, being fighters,² they will be crowned. They become friends of great men and doctors,³ always having plenty.

When the third and fourth degrees are horoscopes, they make gracious, beautiful, overseers of farm estates,⁴ locals,⁵ possessing many things, sodomites.

From the fourth to the sixth degree is "The Sword."⁶

The fourth and fifth degrees are southern.

[The fourth does as said above.]

When the Moon rises in the fifth, sixth and seventh degrees, it makes great men ruling in many places. They will be familiars to the king. Some indeed are made worthy of sacred things.

From the first degree to the seventh are the terms of Mercury. It is called "Diligence, Philosophy, Geometry, Mechanics." Some become rhetoricians⁷, astrologers, astronomers, or those whose livelihood is from philosophical doctrines.⁷

From the seventh degree to the tenth He-who-carries-the-Small-Lyre rises.

The ninth and tenth degrees are southern.

From the sixth to the ninth are degrees directing from mean things to the discipline of the arts.

From the tenth to the eleventh the degrees are empty.

¹ dispensatores et procuratores.

² certantes.

³ i.e., teachers, not physicians. [RH]

⁴ villicos.

⁵ locogenos. [Additional by RH] This word cannot be found in any of the lexicons. It would appear to be a combination of Latin and Greek meaning "born in the place." However, this is a guess.

⁶ From the Greek machaira.

⁷ a disciplina vitam habentes.

From the eleventh to the thirteenth there rises Lucina¹ sitting and bearing² children. It is called "Providence [and] Justice." It makes judges, keepers of court archives and chief magistrates.³

From the fourteenth degree to the fifteenth is called "The Dwelling and Exaltation of Mercury and Fortitude," because it makes strong athletes and rational and diligent scribes. It also causes the prognostication of things.

From the sixteenth degree to the eighteenth *Frix*⁴ directing the plough and holding the ship. It signifies justice and the most excellent management of life.

The sixteenth degree makes sodomites, hairdressers,⁵ but women like sterile sisters, and those who twitter.⁶

From the eighth degree to the seventeenth are the terms of Venus. It is called "Without Sadness, Happiness and Invention."

From the twelfth to the seventeenth are lucid degrees.

From the nineteenth to the twenty-third degree Puella⁷ rises, she who stands above the tail of the Hydra. It signifies the unstable progress of life.

The eighteenth and nineteenth degrees are called "Width," those who are wide of body and fleshy.

When the twentieth degree is rising with the Moon in the ascendant, either northern or southern,⁸ it makes natives possessing and selling great things, and those who do good things for some from whom

¹ The Goddess of childbirth. She is represented as sitting because it was common ancient practice to give birth, not by lying on one's back as is the modern practice, but by sitting in a "birthing-chair" which facilitated birth by exploiting gravity. The modern practice derives from the surgical demands of Caesarian section.

² baiulans puerum, the verb, baiulans from bajulo, is usually used for pack horses carrying burdens. One would expect partio or porro.

³ dictatores

⁴ A God

⁵ ornatores mulierum.

⁶ trissatrices from trisso, -are, to twitter via trissatrix, a woman who twitters. Pl. trissatrices.

⁷ The Girl. A reference to the fact that the constellation Virgo is close by Hydra? Cf Stanley Lombardo, Sky Signs: Aratus' Phaenomena, Berkeley: North Atlantic Books. 1983, p. 25, lines 580-590.

⁸ septemtrionalia vel meridianalia. [Additional by RH] That is, it is either on the I.C. or M.C. or possibly of northern or southern latitude or declination. This is not clear See also page 23, note 7.

they receive ingratitude, [and they make] statutes concerning judgments, and those fearing God.

The twenty-first degree is southern.

From the eighteenth degree to the twenty-first degree are the terms of Jupiter. They are called "Glory, Advancement, Friendship." They make worthy managers of peoples.¹ These degrees are dark.

In some [book?], the eighteenth and nineteenth degrees are the Crow.

From the twenty-fourth to the twenty-sixth Pluto rises, forcing asunder the separation of bodies and souls.

The twenty-fifth degree makes those common to many, lascivious men² loved by women, or procurers of women. But women are [also] made loving men,

The twenty-sixth degree makes [natives] sterile, substituted children,³ they will dominate whosoever. But the women are made sterile and [become] whores.

From the twenty-seventh degree to the thirtieth rises the Bullock's Head.⁴

The twenty-eighth degree, in which is a brilliant star,⁵ is dry,⁶ full of mist, hail, and wind. This place signifies the victor in doing things.

The twenty-seventh degree with the Moon being northern⁷ makes powerful magicians, pious farmers, solitaries having a life [there is a lacuna in the text here of about ten letters] or of silvery things. However they become doctors,⁸ those who implant,⁹ or those who

¹ insignes populorum praepositos. This is an office to which a general might entrust one of his trusted officers in order to ensure that a region would be pacified and well governed in his absence.

² venereos. This word (Venerii.-orum, m.) also signifies a temple slave in the temple of the Erycinian Venus. This famous temple, situated on the summit of the Eryx mountain in northwestern Sicily, overlooked the city of the same name. Virgil tells us Aeneas founded it. Apparently male slaves were kept there having duties analogous to the Greek hetaira and temple prostitutes of Canaan.

³ filios supponentes. This probably means children of someone other than their supposed father, i.e., supposititious. [RH]

⁴ Bukephalus.

⁵ Zeta Virginis? [RH]

⁶ inaquosus. This seems strange in view of the adjectives that follow [RH]

⁷ septemtrionali.

⁸ R. Schmidt suggests doctors. The text has iaz..

⁹ R. Schmidt suggests Greek rizotēr. The text has rizatores.

bend.¹

From the twenty-first degree to the twenty-eighth are the terms of Mars. These degrees are lucid. They are called "The Torch,"² because they become illustrious soldiers or they establish judgments.

The twenty-ninth degree and the thirtieth are the terms of Saturn. It is called "The Exit," because, going out from their own, they do not return, but from the heights they are brought low with respect to dignity and they are put in peril. These degrees are empty.

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Libra.

From the first degree to the third there rises The Bed and a woman lying in it. It signifies a good and relaxed life. These degrees are lucid.

In naught degrees³ and six minutes Spica rises,⁴ a brilliant star of the nature of Mercury and Venus.

In naught degrees and twenty-six minutes Arcturus rises,⁵ a brilliant star. Some call it Boötes. [It is] of the nature of Jupiter and Mars.

From the fourth degree to the sixth rises the two ghosts⁶ of Saturn and Apollo. They make envious men and destroying, jealous men.

From the first degree to the sixth are the terms of Saturn. It is called "The Taking Away, Perdition, Loss of Dignity and Substance."

From the seventh degree to the tenth is Chiron, who is drawn by the hair from the slime by the Hero. He calls to [him], but he does not hear. It signifies strength in counsel and violence.

From the fourth degree to the eighth are shadowy degrees.

The ninth degree is misty, southern and windy.

From the eleventh degree to the twelfth rise Venus and Adonis. They make affectionate [people] and [they make] he who is in power, and lovers and those secretly desiring their loves.

¹ campsores, from campso, -arc to bend (Greek kampto).

² lumen. This word was supplied by the editor on the basis of what Critodemus says. His text has the greek word lampoi.

³ The author did not yet have the zero or cipher as a place holder.

⁴ Alpha Virginis. [RH]

⁵ Alpha Boötes. [RH]

⁶ larvae.

The tenth and the eleventh degrees are called "Necessity"¹ because he who is born according to these places falls into necessities and is imperiled in conflicts.

From the thirteenth degree to the fifteenth degree Auriga rises without his Chariot. It makes entreaties,² unhappy and idle people.

The twelfth degree and the thirteenth and fourteenth are called "Confusion," because they always encounter confusion in combats, or they are endangered by the sword in desolate places.

From the seventh to the fourteenth degree are the terms of Mercury, and of the nocturnal triplicity.³ It makes well-spoken businessmen, [and] lovers of the sciences.

From the ninth degree to the fourteenth degree are lucid degrees.

From the fifteenth degree and six minutes to the twenty-fifth degree and six minutes rises all of Corona.

In the fifteenth degree and six minutes rises the bright star of the Northern Crown,⁴ of the nature of Mercury and Venus.

From the sixteenth degree to the eighteenth degree rise the Three Heroes, who are called "The Baldistae." It signifies exercise, philosophy, clemency.

The sixteenth degree makes lawyers,⁵ apothecaries,⁶ enchanters,⁷ physicians, astrologers sitting and addressing [those present].⁸

From the nineteenth degree to the twenty-second the two Runners running away from each other. One runner, nude, holds up a skull and a crown. They signify those who strive in combat and contest and in the theater and who live from the public wealth.

From the fifteenth degree to the twentieth are shadowy degrees.

From the fifteenth degree to the twenty-first are the terms of Jupiter. They are called "Divisions, Inheritances and Donations of

¹ The use of the word here is probably much the same as in Chapter IV, "On the Necessary Place." [RH]

² or those who make entreaties. [RH]

³ Virgo is of one of the two nocturnal triplicities, the other being that of Cancer, Scorpio and Pisces. Also Virgo is the nocturnal sign of Mercury. [RH]

⁴ Alpha Coronae Borealis, Alphecca. [RH]

⁵ advocatores.

⁶ farmacatores.

⁷ praecantores.

⁸ It would appear from this statement that the astrologer, when requested to prognosticate, would do so while seated. The seated position being a token of honor due him in his role of diviner or interpreter of the will of the gods.

Land."

The twenty-first and twenty-second are lucid, shadowy and windy degrees.

From the twenty-third to the twenty-fourth degree Vulcan rises. It makes those who make things.

When the twenty-second and the twenty-third degrees are on the horoscope, there are made those who hang themselves due to some judgment or conflict.

The twenty-fourth degree makes powerful people or those discovering treasures, unstable, unjust, dying publicly.

From the twenty-second degree and sixteen minutes there rises the head of the Serpent of Ophiuchus.¹

From the twenty-fifth degree and thirty minutes arises the brilliant star which is in the north Claw of the Scorpion.² [It is] of the nature of Jupiter and Mercury. It is called "The Mansion," because those who have it on the horoscope, will never travel, but they are exhausted by their professions.

The twenty-sixth degree and the twenty-seventh degrees have two stars in one of the parts of the lower Scale³. In these two degrees are made unstable, unjust men who die in public.

From the twenty-second degree to the twenty-eighth are the terms of Venus. It is called "Pleasure," because it makes lovers of purity, of benefit, erudite men eating pure foods, and lovers of wrestling.

From the twentieth to the twenty-eighth degree rises The Ship, and he who will lie down to sleep in it, and The Sea Captain on the horse.⁴ It makes experts, those who devise [solutions] in adversities.

From the twentieth to the thirtieth degree there rise the two Crania or Wheels, and the Goat, and the swamp of Acheron,⁵ and the Little

¹ Iota Serpentis. [RH]

² Beta Librae, the North Scale. [RH]

³ Trutinae. These stars are Gamma and Iota Librae. [RH]

⁴ equo. Literally this means 'horse,' but it does sometimes also mean 'ship' which is the probable meaning here. [RH]

⁵ Acherontis Palus. There was a river in Epirus named Acheron which flowed through the lake Acherusia into the Ambracian Gulf (now Suli) in the Ionian Sea. A river of the same name was said to exist in the Lower World (or to surround it) around which the shades of the dead were believed to hover. Into this river flowed two other streams, Cocytus and Pyriphlegethon. In later writers Acheron = the underworld itself. The underworld was occasionally thought of as a bog or swamp. The dead were brought to the banks of the river by Hermes and they had to pay a ferryman to carry them across to the Ship of Acheron. They are indeed the terms of Mars. It is called "Strength." There are glorious leaders in the army, but they are unfortunate in some things, afflicted men always thinking about venereal things; like scorpions they thrust with the sting.

From the twenty-eighth degree to the thirtieth is called "Increase," because they will be increased and perfected. They become great in body.

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees in Scorpio.

From the first degree of Scorpio to the fourth there rises the Hippocentaur who carries the Hare. This place, from the first degree to the fifth, is called "The Meeting," because they meet wild animals of this sort [and] either, meeting, they die, or they become hunters or soldiers.

The fourth degree is southern. It makes experts.

From the fifth to the seventh degree is the Uranoscopus, i.e., the one looking at the sky.

From the fourth degree to the seventh the degrees are southern.

From the first degree to the fifth the degrees are lucid. They make astrologers [and] astronomers, always having hope in God.

When the sixth and seventh degrees are horoscopes they make men great out of infirmity. However these men are destroyed by fire and iron.

The seventh degree makes men famous with respect to fortune, and having military power in the army, or having been entrusted with the management¹ of royal things.²

From the first degree to the seventh degree are the terms of Mars. It is called "The Approach of the Strangers," "Detention," "Rapine," and litigations due to these things. Moreover it makes the sharp things of nature and fortune.

From the eighth to the tenth degree are Ophiuchus and Asclepius

Land of the Dead.

¹*fideicommissam*. A bequest given for the benefit of a third person, given by request, not of command; and held to be equitably due out of respect to the wish of the testator.

² or, of the royal residence.

and Health and Two Dragons Intertwined.¹ They make killers of animals, herbalists, physicians, [and] the best paint dealers.² The eighth degree, in whose opposition Pleias falls, is misty. It makes invidious great men, those who are cruel, mendacious, and lovers of agriculture, according to Dorotheus.

The eighth, ninth and tenth degrees are hurtful.

When the Moon is in these three degrees with Saturn or Mars, it makes lesions on the body, according to Ptolemy.³

From the ninth degree and six minutes to the ninth degree and forty-six minutes is hurtful, because the stars which are on the brow of the Scorpion, of the nature of Saturn and Mars, rise there.⁴

From the sixth degree to the tenth the degrees are shadowy.

In the eleventh degree and forty-six minutes there rises a star which is in the right foot of the Centaur.⁵

The tenth and eleventh degrees are humid and misty.

From the twelfth to the eighteenth degree is the Dog and the Bullock's Head. It makes those susceptible to temptation,⁶ lovers of contention, quarrelsome people, laborers, those who attend to Chiron.⁷

The thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth degrees are called "Abstinence," because they are abstinent in their habits. But when the Moon is void of course, and aspected by the good [planets]⁸ it makes lords having dominion over life and death.

The fifteenth and sixteenth degrees make men powerful magnates, travelling in many regions, and subjecting barbarous peoples. But they are destroyed by a violent death, killed by trickery or burned. These degrees are southern.

From the twelfth degree to the nineteenth are the terms of Mercury. It is called "The Mansion," because it makes agents and ¹ The Caduceus, the symbol of both Mercury and Asklepios, symbolizing Gnosis and the healing energy of the spine, or vis medicatrix naturae. Known to the Indians yogins as Kundalini.

² The makers of pigments were the alchemists who were also the apothecaries. This is the link between the seemingly unconnected things mentioned here.

³ I cannot locate this citation in Ptolemy's Tetrabiblos or Almagest.

⁴ Beta (Graffias), Delta (Dschubba), and Pi Scorpii. [RH]

⁵ Alpha Centauri. [RH]

⁶ temptativos.

⁷ Chiron was renown for his wisdom, knowledge of music and surgery

⁸ There is an seeming contradiction here, for if the Moon is void of course (cursu vacua), it cannot be aspected by any planets unless the aspect is a separating one.

superintendents.

From the eleventh degree to the eighteenth the degrees are lucid.

From the nineteenth degree to the twenty-first the degrees are shadowy.

In the twenty-fourth degree and six minutes there rises a star which is in the head of that one who is on his knees.¹ It makes many [men] one-eyed and suffering a violent death.

From the twentieth degree to the twenty-fourth are the terms of Jupiter. It is called "Intemperance," because they become intemperate and foul. Scribes and grammarians are made, or teachers or directors, rich men, augmenting and succeeding for the most part, having dominions of possessions and benefiting [therefrom].

From the twenty-fourth degree to the twenty-fifth degree Crater rises. It makes modest, stable men.

From the twenty-second degree to the twenty-seventh the degrees are lucid.

From the twenty-sixth degree to the thirtieth there rises the Thurible,² and these are the terms of Saturn. It makes priests, sacrificers, cooks, butchers.³ It is called "Necessity, Detention and *Nutritius*⁴ of the Comissatio."⁵ But some have benefit from cornfields.⁶ They [the natives] become slow and profound, hidden men secretly dissipating, lasting in anger.

From the twenty-sixth degree to the thirtieth the degrees are shadowy.

From the twenty-eighth degree to the thirtieth the degrees are empty. It is called "Taste," because they become approved cup-bearers,⁷ and cooks, or sellers of unguents, those who sell pigments,

¹ The Kneeler, Alpha Herculei, Ergonasi, or Hercules. Vide. Star Names: Their Lore and Meaning, by Richard Hinckley Allen, NY: Dover 1963 pp. 238-246. But see below in Pisces this constellation is identified with Theseus.

² Turibulum. Censer or vessel in which incense is burned.

³ macillarios. A variant spelling of macellarius, a butcher.

⁴ nutritio. In this context it is not clear exactly what this word would mean. It is of course related to 'nutrition' and also 'nourish' and 'nurse.' Clearly it is a title. [RH]

⁵ The Comissatio was a Bacchanalian revel followed by a nocturnal torchlight procession accompanied by music.

⁶ locis seminariis.

⁷ praegustatores. People who tasted the food and drink of a prince before it was served to ensure that it had not been poisoned.

inn-keepers, and whatever pertains to smell and taste.

The twenty-ninth degree is misty and watery.

In the twenty-eighth degree and sixteen minutes there rises the brilliant star of Ophiuchus.¹

The thirtieth degree makes modest men without children. The Altar² is from the twenty-fourth degree and six minutes of Scorpio to the sixth degree of Sagittarius. The distance of it is twelve degrees and twenty minutes.

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Sagittarius.

From the first degree of Sagittarius to the fifth there rises the point of the arrow of Sagittarius. This makes bow men and those causing the loss of money.

From the sixth degree to the tenth Atlas rises, and he having the face of *Anceps*² like a queen. It makes fighters [and] victors.

The ninth degree is watery.

From the first degree to the seventh is called "The Sign of Agitation," because they live and acquire immoderately, but they lead a life of many wanderings, having frequent adversities in life.

According to Ptolemy, the eighth degree is the point of Sagittarius' arrow and is a harmful degree.⁴

From the first degree to the ninth are shadowy degrees.

From the eleventh to the fifteenth is Argo⁵ and The Sea.⁶ It makes sea captains and businessmen.

When the thirteenth and the fourteenth degrees are horoscopes they make those who break wind⁷ and epileptics.

From the thirteenth to the fifteenth the degrees are empty,

¹ Alpha Ophiuchi, Rasalhague. [RH]

² Sacrificatorium.

³ Two-Headed.

⁴ Gamma Sagittarii. Ptolemy, in the Almagest III lists the tip of the arrow in the constellation of Sagittarius as 4 1/2 degrees of the constellation and gives no delineations of the nature of any degrees. Again the text gives star longitudes 3 1/2 degrees greater than Ptolemy's, as Pingree claims. In Tetrabiblos I. 9., Ptolemy identifies the "stars in the point of the arrow" as being of the nature of Mars and the Moon.

⁵ The famous ship of Greek myth in which the Argonauts sailed in quest of the Golden Fleece.

⁶ Pelagus.

⁷ crepatos.

From the first to the twelfth degree are the terms of Jupiter, It is called "Strength," it makes rulers' who are lords of life and death, beautiful, virtuous princes according to the essence of the nativity.

From the tenth to the twelfth the degrees are lucid.

From the sixteenth degree to the twentieth there rises Chiron holding Cepheus' hand and the Bird which is below, and the head of the Bear. It makes prophesy and augury.

From the fifteenth degree to the eighteenth is called "The Daemon." It is a sign that is the cause of many good things.

The seventeenth degree makes crowned disputants.²

The eighteenth and nineteenth degrees are the eye of Sagittarius, which is nebulous and harmful.³ It makes those who train birds and horses.

From the thirteenth to the seventeenth are the terms of Venus. It is called "Flux [and] Felicity." Some become libidinous, [some] good men, [and some] lovers of music.

From the thirteenth to the nineteenth the degrees are empty.

In the twentieth degree and twenty-six minutes there rises a brilliant star which is in the knee of Sagittarius,⁴ of the nature of Saturn and Jupiter.

But in the twentieth degree and the forty-sixth minute there rises the brilliant star of Lyra,⁵ of the nature of Mercury and Venus. It makes lovers of music.

The nineteenth and the twentieth degrees are southern, wintery and misty.

From the twenty-first to the twenty-third degree Delphinus, The Ship and the Southern Crown rise. It makes proven swimmers and, in connection with navigation, explorers of a calm sea.⁶

From the eighteenth degree to the twenty-first are the terms of Mercury. It makes outstanding, practical men, lovers of orations, men of leisure, good, ingenious men.

From the twentieth degree to the twenty-first the degrees are lucid.

¹ praesides.

² It is not clear whether royalty is involved or whether it is a reference to the practice of crowning athletic victors with wreaths or crowns. [RH]

³ Nu Sagittarii, a nebulous star. [RH]

⁴ Alpha Sagittarii, Rukbat. [RH]

⁵ Alpha Lyrae, Vega. [RH]

⁶ Is this to be taken metaphorically?

From the twentieth degree to the twenty-sixth is the Uranoscopus. It makes [natives who] are always praying and worshipping God.

The twenty-fifth degree makes pursuers of horses and those who run of the horses of wealthy men.

From the twenty-second degree to the twenty-sixth are the terms of Saturn. It makes those who are made prosperous through inheritance.

From the twenty-seventh degree to the thirtieth arise the back part of Anceps and the Hunter. It makes fighters, rapacious [persons], highwaymen in every respect, eating strange foods.

From the twenty-sixth degree to the twenty-seventh is called 'Exaltation,' because they are excellent and glorious with respect to souls and body. Many become armed fighters.

From the twenty-fourth degree to the twenty-seventh are dark degrees.

From the twenty-eighth degree to the thirtieth are shadowy degrees. They make libidinous men doing foul deeds, adulterers, mixing themselves with many.

From the twenty-seventh degree to the thirtieth are the terms of Mars. It is called "Peregrination, Fortune, Chance, Exile."

From the nineteenth degree to the twenty-ninth is called "Fortune," because they are happy, spirited and liberal.

From the twentieth degree and forty-six minutes to the twenty-seventh and thirty-sixth minute is all Fortune.

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Capricorn.

From the first degree of Capricorn to the third degree the Altar rises, which is called the "Sacrificatorium." It makes butchers,¹ cooks, and all that relate to sacrifices.

The first degree makes gluttons always having intercourse with sodomites.

The second degree makes dancers and those frequenting people of this sort.

The third degree makes mimes. But if Mars or Venus and the Moon are with the same [degree], it makes good fanners, living their life in deserts, feeding their flocks. Some die a violent death.

The fourth degree makes those who calculate, those who are ¹ macellarios.

unmarried, lovers of frauds, killed by thieves.

The fourth degree makes useless zealots fearing demons.

The sixth degree is part of the Lyre.¹ It is also the mouth of the Goat² and it makes fornicators and fornicatrices, doing foul deeds and the trumpet-players, flutists, or cithera-players³ of wealthy men.

In the seventh degree and sixteen minutes there rises the brilliant star of Aquila,⁴ of the nature of Mars and Jupiter.

From the fourth to the seventh there rises Nereis,⁵ the Crow, and the Satyr, hiding his whole face with his head. It signifies those who accuse [others] for the sake of [their] deeds and those and who have been made fugitives or are making themselves unseen.

The seventh degree makes those who bind⁶ crowns, it shows that many are unmarried.

The seventh and eighth degrees make especially expert [natives], lovers of the arts, scribes of cities or tutors or mathematicians.

From the first degree to the seventh the degrees are shadowy. They are the terms of Mercury. They become those who take medicines for the mouth,⁷ clean, eating little, pragmatic, experienced in law, well learned men or teachers.

From the eighth degree to the tenth will be the Great Serpent, who touches Eridanus' Stream.

There is a dart from the seventh degree to the fourteenth. It signifies the rebellion of peoples and [their] sickness and insatiability.

The eighth degree makes the poet and all that of the seventh degree.⁸

The ninth degree is humid and frigid. It makes the rhetorician [and] the farmer.

The tenth degree is also humid and frigid. It causes the parasite.

From the eleventh degree to the fourteenth rises Ariadne's Crown.

¹ Eta Lyrae. [RH]

² Omicron, Pi or possibly Alpha Capricorni. [RH]

³ The citharoedus played the cithera and sung along with it as well.

⁴ Alpha Aquilae, Altair. [RH]

⁵ A sea nymph.

⁶ annexures.

⁷ stomatici. This is a word that was taken over into 17th century English, believe it or not. It was used in its Latin sense: Souter: It comes from stomatikos = good for the mouth (Cassiodorus. Fel. 35, 4th century; Dioscorides, 1st century).

⁸ Not otherwise specified.

It signifies riots of the people, subversions, instances of idleness on account of an ignoble regime in cities and in the peoples.

When the eleventh and the twelfth degrees are horoscopes, they make shameless men. But if a malevolent [planet] is with the same [ascendant], those suffering a violent death either blinded or mutilated with extreme ignominy.

The eleventh degree is humid and frigid. A malignant [planet] in the thirteenth degree, [indicates] biothanatus,¹ i.e., suffering violent death.

The fourteenth degree makes the seller of meats and of other things of this sort, salted, or doing such like business.

From the eighth to the fourteenth are the terms of Jupiter. It is called "Tenor," because they are made noble conservators of life and are most virtuous.

From the eleventh degree to the fourteenth the degrees are lucid.

From the fifteenth degree to the seventeenth The Field rises. It makes vintners, gardeners, gains, the company of drunkards.

The fifteenth degree makes sodomites or [those] who have been nursed by sodomites.

The fifteenth and the sixteenth degrees make runners, consuming, drunks, injurious people.

When the seventeenth degree is horoscope with Saturn and Mars. it causes violent deaths.

From the eighteenth degree to the nineteenth the Dove without the head rises. It makes the circumstance of a thing untrue, or those who are unmarried.

The eighteenth degree makes fishermen or mariners destroyed by whales.

The nineteenth degree makes fishermen.

From the sixteenth degree to the nineteenth the degrees are lucid.

From the twentieth degree to the twenty-first The Mouse rises. It signifies some enmity of possessions. These die early or become brigands. The degrees are shadowy.

From the twenty-second degree to the twenty-third the degrees are misty and full of snow. It makes disciples and augurs and regal persons or those hanging around kings.¹

¹ See Chapter XXXVI, "On Biothanatus, i.e., On Suffering a Violent Death." Biothanatus is directly from the Greek and the Latin text uses it throughout. We have left the word in place. [RH]

The twenty-third degree makes household slaves² and government officials.³

From the fifteenth degree to the twenty-second are the terms of Venus. It makes lascivious and libidinous [natives].

From the twenty-second degree to the twenty-seventh rises Delphinus.

From the twenty-fourth degree to the twenty-fifth rises the Serpent without a head and the two-sectioned⁴ Lyre. It signifies dangerous misfortune and an unratified will. These become oath-takers.⁵

In the twenty-sixth degree Ursa signifies contest and action. These mix themselves with many and are luxurious.

From the twenty-second to the twenty-fifth the degrees are empty.

From the twenty-third to the twenty-sixth are the terms of Saturn. It is called "The Appeal." They become harsh men constituted under power, having been exposed as damnable, [and ironically] as administering justice.

In the twenty-seventh degree The Swan rises. It makes sweet, eloquent old men, who are harmed.⁶

From the twenty-eighth degree to the twenty-ninth, the tail of the Great Fish rises. It causes discussion of fallible things, and they are harmed.

From the twenty-seventh degree to the twenty-ninth the degrees are harmful.

When the twenty-seventh degree is the horoscope with Saturn and Mars, it makes sacrilegious homicides and oath-takers.

In the twenty-eighth degree, when it is in the ascendant with Mars and Venus, men are made of foul life, but the women become whores.

The twenty-ninth degree makes moderate, erudite men.

From the twenty-sixth degree to the thirtieth are the terms of Mars. It signifies concealments, flights, jail, custodies or exiles.

From the twenty-ninth degree of Capricorn to one and a half

¹ existentes circum reges.

² famulos.

³ ministros.

⁴ binomia.

⁵ deieratores.

⁶ laeduntur. This verb can also mean, "be betrayed."

degrees of Aquarius there rises the complete chariot' of the Horse (which leads the way).

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees in Aquarius.

[From the twenty-ninth degree of Capricorn to one and a half degrees of Aquarius² there rises the complete chariot of the Horse (which leads the way)].

From the first degree to the third the River of Eridanus rises.

The second degree and the third are humid and frigid. They make fishermen, torturers, babblers,³ and those living in these same places [i.e., humid and frigid] and things.

The second and third degrees make [their natives] violent, powerful and cruel.

From the first degree to the fourth the degrees are obscure.

From the fourth degree to the seventh arise the flying Ibis and the two Dragons.⁴

The seventh degree is watery. It makes augurs, prophets of the complete thing⁵ and those who play in cups⁶ and the praise of the two things.⁷

When the seventh degree is the horoscope [and is] with Mercury, it makes moneychangers.⁸

¹ cisio. A light, two wheeled vehicle.

² Alpha Equulei. [RH]

³ The oft noted characteristic of Aquarius.

⁴ The Ibis was sacred to Hermes whose worship was by no means restricted to Greece just as the worship of Thoth was not restricted to Egypt. Philo (41a) tells us that, "Tauthos (Thoth) regarded the natures of the dragon and serpents as divine . . . For which reason this animal has been adopted in temples and in mystic rites. . . It is immortal and is self consumed . . . for this animal does not die by a natural death, but only if it is struck by a violent blow. The Phoenicians call it, 'The Good Daemon.'" This latter name (Agathos Daimon) occurs frequently in both the philosophical and practical Hermetic writings. These two animals, both sacred to Hermes-Thoth, being mentioned together in connection with these degrees links them clearly with the Hermetic cult.

⁵ perfectae rei. Meaning unclear.

⁶ A reference to dicing. The dice were shaken in a cup before being cast forth. This was originally a divinatory method

⁷ Spiritual things and material?

⁸ This is an important early symbolic statement of a link between Hermes and money changing (or banking) which shows up later in the Late Middle Ages is the Magician (or Juggler) card of the Tarot.

From the first degree to the seventh are the terms of Mercury. They become judges and philosophers with respect to manners.

From the eighth degree to the tenth the wolf rises. [This is] he who ate the hand of Hippocrates, i.e., He-Who-Holds the-Horse.¹

The tenth degree is watery.

When the eighth degree is the horoscope and Mercury is in it, it makes physicians, teachers, astronomers or astrologers.²

In the tenth degree and twenty-six minutes the Southern Fish³ rises which freed Venus in the vile sea.⁴ [It is] of the nature of Mercury and Venus.

From the fifth degree to the ninth are lucid degrees.

From the eleventh degree to the thirteenth there rises the Hippocrator.⁵

In the twelfth degree and sixteen minutes there rises the brilliant star of The Hen,⁶ of the nature of Mercury and Venus.

From the fifth degree to the ninth the degrees are lucid. For the most part it makes stable boys, horse feeders and cattle thieves.

From the eighth to the twelfth is called "Food," because this one always offers food to others.

From the eighth to the thirteenth are the terms of Venus. It makes fornicators [and] procurers of great women.⁷

From the tenth degree to the thirteenth the degrees are shadowy.

From the eleventh degree to the fifteenth degree Lyre rises.

The fifteenth degree and the sixteenth degrees are southern, wintry, and windy. The rest of the degrees are varied. It signifies the display of antiques and musical things.

From the sixteenth degree to the eighteenth degree rises the Hen.

In the eighteenth degree and sixteen minutes there rises the star which is above the Stream of Water,⁸ of the nature of Saturn and Jupiter.

¹ In other words not the famous physician is meant, but a celestial and mythological figure.

² Note distinction.

³ Alpha Piscis Australis, Fomalhaut. [RH]

⁴ in pelago vili.

⁵ mentioned above, as "He-who-holds-the-Horse."

⁶ Alpha Cygni, Deneb. [RH]

⁷ Sounds like an endorsement.

⁸ Lambda Aquarii. [RH]

From the eighteenth degree and sixteen minutes it is hurtful.¹

From the sixteenth degree to the nineteenth degree the middle parts of the Horse rise.

From the twentieth degree to the twenty-first degree the middle parts of the Ibises² rise.

From the twenty-second degree to the twenty-sixth degree the Two Dragons rise.

From the twenty-fifth degree and twenty-six minutes the Swine³ rises.⁴

From the twenty-fourth degree to the twenty-sixth the Swan rises over the Dragons.

From the twenty-seventh degree to the thirtieth there rises the Swine eating the hand of the Hippocratorm, and the hind parts of the Ibises.

When the twenty-ninth degree is on the ascendant with Venus it makes this kind (of native) kill their own wives by the sword.

On the Fixed Stars and Degrees of Pisces.

From the first degree of Pisces to the third, the latter parts of Pegasus rise.

From the fourth degree to the sixth the Tail of the Crocodile rises.

In the fifth degree and thirty-six minutes there rises the shoulders of the Horse,⁵ of the nature of Mercury and Mars.

From the seventh degree to the ninth there rises the head of the Stag eating the Two-Headed Dragon.

From the tenth degree to the twelfth the middle parts of Pegasus rise.

From the thirteenth degree to the fifteenth the head of Pegasus rises.

In the fourteenth degree and twenty-six minutes there rises the first bright star,⁶ which is in the Thread,⁷ of the nature of Saturn and

¹ It looks like something is missing here.

² ibeos.

³ sus. Possibly a fish instead of a swine. [RH]

⁴ Beta Piscium. [RH]

⁵ Beta Pegasi, Scheat. [RH]

⁶ d Piscium. [RH]

⁷ lōn linōn. Cicero called Nodus Piscium. See above Knot of Pisces, p. 2.

Venus.

From the sixteenth degree to the eighteenth there rises the Dog or Wolf. It makes contentions, brawls, robberies, custodies, and people who eat much.

When the sixteenth degree is the ascendant, it is called "The Seed." It is a sign that lovers, farmers are made and those who have many children. They send away from themselves many children and they have conversations¹ in sacred places. Moreover these become the friends of a magnate.

The seventeenth and eighteenth degrees make fornicators and fornicatrices, and soft [people].

From the sixteenth degree to the eighteenth degree the middle parts of the Crocodile rise.

From the nineteenth degree to the twenty-first the middle parts of the Stag rise.

From the twenty-second to the twenty-fourth *Ceamum*² rises.

From the twenty-fifth to the twenty-seventh there rises He-who-stands-on-his-knees,³ [i.e.,] Perseus, armed, killing Pegasus.

From the twenty-eighth to the thirtieth the head of the Crocodile rises and the hind quarters of the Stag.

XXVI. On the XII Places and the Signification of the Planets When They are Found in Them in Nativities.

The first place is the horoscope, the sign ascending, when any man is born, the beginning and first state. Through this place all things which happen to men are known. The horoscope is the giver of life, both of the body and of the spirit, which is called the tongue of life,¹ and [the giver of] body, spiritus,² soul, and light, whence it is called the foundation place, because it is the measure of life and foundation of the whole. This place signifies the [first] age of life, which is childhood. Therefore it shows the first operation of good things. In this place Mercury has its Joy before all the other planets.

¹ The word conversatio can mean either a conversation or [sexual] intercourse. In the latter sense, the implication here is that the natives of this degree make frequent sexual use of male temple slaves.

² Gundel identifies this (p. 267-268) as "Reeds."

³ The Kneeler, Ergonasi, or Hercules. Vide. Star Names: Their Lore and Meaning, by Richard Hinckley Allen, NY: Dover, 1963, pp. 238-246. But here this constellation is identified with Theseus.

When some one of the planets is in the ascendant or should aspect it, the Sun or the Moon [being] free from the aspect of the malevolent [planets], the natives will be vital, nourishable,³ and they will complete life in prosperity. But if a malevolent [planet] is in the ascendant and should aspect the Sun and Moon, [they will be] unnourishable and damaged, or defective, or short-lived or they will be born orphans, having been orphaned from the father [indicated] by the Sun or from the mother [indicated] by the Moon. The Sun is considered to be the place of the father, but the Moon of the mother. Likewise if the lord of the triplicity of the ascendant is in the ascendant, he [the native] is the

¹ tenia vitae. Temo is a beam, pole or tongue. [Additional by RH] There is a passage in Paulus Alexandrinus, chapter 24, p. 50 There the corresponding word translates as 'helm.' Given that ancient ships were steered with steering oars at the ends of long poles, it may be that temo here actually refers to a helm as well. It makes more sense and is in accordance with the practice of literal translations from the Greek which generally characterizes this work.

² The vital life force knitting soul and body together. Cf. Costa ben Luca (d. 912 C.E.) another important link to the Harranian Sabians. In his: De differentia spiritus et animae discrimine, a major text by which the spiritus doctrine was transmitted to the West in the Middle Ages he defines spiritus as, "a certain subtle body which arises in the heart and is distributed throughout the body by the veins in order to nourish it. It causes life, breath and pulse. Likewise it arises in the cerebrum and nerves and causes sense and motion." The original source of this spiritus was thought to be the sun and it was taken into the human body by inspiration whence, according to Medieval Physiology, it found its way into the heart. By means of this theory, mental processes such as sleep, dreams, memory and imagination were accounted for by reference to changes in the quality of the spiritus in the brain.

An entire system of pneumatic physiology existed in the Greek Physiological theory, put forth by Epistratus of Chios (c 304 B.C.E. - c 250 B.C.E.) that explained the presence of vitality in the human body as well as psychological phenomena by reference to spiritus. The horoscope was held to show, by the sign thereon and the aspects of the planets it received, the nature of the spiritus in the natives body.

³ Some infants do not survive because they cannot take nourishment or because they are exposed at birth. Such cases were called "Children who are not reared" in ancient and medieval astrology. In the case mentioned in the text, the child will be nourished and are therefore deemed, "nourishable."

first-born; if in the M.C., the fourth; or the setting [house], the first or the seventh; if in the angle of the earth, the fourth.

The Sun in the ascendant, not made unfortunate, in a diurnal nativity,¹ especially in its own house or triplicity or exaltation, shows the native born of a noble father and the native in his own country, glorified with riches and possessions. Many kings have been made cosmocrators, i.e., those holding the world, or regents, but some are made dukes or presidents.² But if Mars shall be present, or attain the M.C., or be in the opposition of it, or in the west³, and aspect [the ascendant], they will hold [their] kingdoms or [their] populations with treacheries and conflicts and dangers. But if the Sun is in Libra in the ascendant, or in some other sign alien to him, in no way does it signify the noble birth of the father, nor does his fortune have beauty of this kind; but minor good things do happen.

But at night, the Sun being in the ascendant⁴ shows that the native is of a poor father, either ignoble or one expelled [from his homeland], or a slave, or that he destroys⁵ his paternal house;⁶ but sometimes [it shows] the orphanhood of the father, and it makes the life of the native laborious and without glory. Especially if an evil [planet] should aspect from an angle, it makes the evil double. and the father dies before the native, and, regarding his offspring, it makes a signification of sorrows and deaths.

The Sun in the ascendant with the Moon and Saturn setting aspected⁷ by Mars kills the father early in the native's life, and they remain in the homes of their fathers. As many degrees as Saturn is distant from Mars, so many years they live with each other or with the ¹ This can only happen if we take the whole sign as the ascendant. Thus, if the Sun were in Aries at 4 degrees and the Ascendant were in 12 degrees, we would find the Sun above the horizon and therefore in a diurnal figure. Yet the Sun would still be in the Ascendant! This means that, for the author of the Liber Hermetis, the Ascendant is the entire rising sign while the horoscope, like the Indian Lagna, is a cusp within the Ascendant.

² See page 7, note 2. [RH]

³ in occidente. The reader can safely assume that this phrase, which is translated "in the west," wherever it occurs, indicates a planet in the seventh house.

⁴ i.e., below the horizon.

⁵ In this chapter it is not always clear that whether the native, or the configuration described is responsible for the death of the parent[s] or their estate.

* domum paternam destruet.

⁷ inspectus.

mother.¹

With the Sun and the Moon in the ascendant, and if Saturn and Mars should aspect, the benevolents being averse², it shows that the native is from parents [who are] slaves, captives or exiles, and he becomes orphaned, and when he is about to die, he is thrown with naked bodies among the unburied, or in a river, or in the earth, or in a bath. The Sun and the Moon in the ascendant or in the M.C. signifies fortunate, famous parents. The Sun in the ascendant in any degree and the Moon in the M.C, free from the evil [planets], shows that the native is from great and free parents. The native himself [will be] glorious and blameless, and honored by great men, and his parents will be long-lived. The Sun in the ascendant, the Moon in the M.C, Saturn in the succedent³ [place], Mars in the eleventh place shows that the native is from humble parents or soon becomes an orphan, and they say that he is [born] for labor and they⁴ harm both lights.⁵ The Sun in the ascendant, Saturn and Mars in the succeeding [place] quickly damage the right eye, and the natives are made of middling livelihood, and they⁶ kill the father early on. The Sun in the ascendant and the Moon in the west, or the Moon in the ascendant and the Sun in the west, and Mars in the succeeding [house] or in the eighth, is harmful for both the eyes. The Sun in the ascendant, the Moon in the M.C, Saturn in the ascendant and Mars in the twelfth place makes men blind.

The Sun and Mars in the ascendant shows that the native is very little like the father, and it kills the mother early, and harms his sight, and induces sorrow.

The Sun and Mercury in a feminine sign, and the Moon configured from a feminine sign indicates the natures⁷ of the pudendum and womb. With the Sun and Venus in the ascendant, in feminine signs, and the Moon in the west in a feminine sign, making

¹ Sounds like secondary progressions or solar arc

² remotis. [RH]

³ succedente. Note that when Saturn is so placed, namely in the succeeding house (the second or the fifth) it is out of sect. [Additional by RH] This is because Saturn, which is a diurnal planet, is below the horizon in the daytime.

⁴ the planets, not the natives. [RH]

⁵ lumina. Literally the lights, that is, the Sun and Moon, and metaphorically, the eyes. See the next sentences. [RH]

⁶ Again, probably the planets. [RH]

⁷ naturas. Probably a translation of the Greek, physis.

conjunction with the Sun, they become soft,¹ permitting unmanly things. With the Sun and Venus in the ascendant, and Saturn in the west or in the angle of the earth, it makes divines and epileptics, or those who are called "stellatici."² The Sun in the ascendant in a bicorporeal sign, with the Moon in Pisces, Saturn in Sagittarius, Mars in Virgo or Gemini makes falling epileptics. With the Sun in the ascendant, and Jupiter on the M.C. the native is shown to be of a famous father; and he is a seller of words or he will be an *exactor*³ or mercenary or medicosophist⁴ or medicogeometer,⁵ entering in royal courts.

The Sun, Saturn, Mars and Venus in Aries in the ascendant give dishonest female slaves, little old women, wives and whores; especially if Mercury is with the same [i.e., the Sun, Saturn, Mars and Venus in Aries in the ascendant], selling their bodies publicly. But if the Moon is in the M.C. or in the west, they sleep with their sons or stepchildren, or their mothers or stepmothers, or the children of their brothers, or their sisters, and women with their own children or uncles, father, stepfathers and the like; they become whores mixing themselves with many, foul with respect to coitus.

The Sun in the ascendant and Saturn not existing in its own sect, shows that the natives [are born] of a poor father or of a slave or captive, and they [the said planets] indicate that the fathers will die early in the native's life and that they [the said planets] destroy the patrimony.⁶ The patrimony is squandered, not received, or destroyed;

¹ Sole et Venere in ascendente in signis feminis et Luna in occidente in signo feminino coniunctionem cum Sole faciente molles fiunt muliebra patientes. The above translation is the correct literal translation of this sentence. However, it does not make sense as presented. There are two possible explanations. Either the phrase "in occidente" does not mean "in the west" which it does elsewhere in the text, but "occidental," or "coniunctionem" does not mean "conjunction" but "application." Elsewhere in this text the original translator has used coniunctio as an equivalent to sunaphē, which actually means application. At this time we cannot tell which of these is the correct solution. See page 55, note 3 for a more complete explanation of this issue. [RH]

² stellatici. A certain kind of epilepsy.

³ A debt collector. Sounds like the ancient equivalent of a Mafia enforcer.

⁴ sic. looks like one who teaches or theorizes about medicine.

⁵ sic Looks like iatromedicine to me. in this case the healing is brought about by geometrical "sigils"?

⁶ patrina. This word appears to be derived from patrinus which means 'godfather.' However, it appears to be a neuter plural. This would suggest that the word means the estate of the godfather, rather than that of the father. However, we have no direct reference to this word in this form, so that this is somewhat conjectural. Also there are or, having been received, it is evilly wasted or stolen. It incites enmities of relatives and those close to the native, and it hurts the understanding, and leads to foolish acts, and the acts will be persisted in. Very often these [natives] grow ill or fall into sufferings and, if they are found among strangers, they will suffer terribly. If, however, Saturn should aspect by degree, he kills the father by dropsy or a humid illness; and by these means it makes those who have a decline of life, and losses of money, and spasms, or short life, those pursuing life with infirmity, those having suffering in the inner parts, those destroying their patrimony, and those declining from wealth.¹

The Sun and Saturn in the ascendant and Jupiter in the M.C. and the Moon and Mars in succeeding [places], or in the west, not being with the Sun in signs in which it rejoices, they are rejected by their own parents, and disowned by them to strangers; they [the planets] kill the father before the mother. But if the Moon is in the west with Mars, it signifies that the mother will die by a relative. The Sun in the ascendant, or with the Moon in any sign, especially in a masculine [sign], and Jupiter and Venus in the succedent place, Saturn and Mars being averse,² they show that the native is of a glorious father, that the native is famous, noble, worthy, fortunate, wealthy, and in the course of time it gets better for him. The Sun in the ascendant, and the Moon in a masculine sign, and Jupiter in a succedent [place], and Mars co-signifying, shows that the native is of a glorious father. Indeed the native will be a king, worthy and having power, a ruler of life and death, and races of people³ and regions will be subjected by him. But if Venus should happen to be with them, he will indeed be a very fortunate king, but venereal and lascivious, and a libidinous catamite.⁴ But if Mercury is with them, he will be a wiseman, a rhetorician, reasonable, intellectual, creative, punctilious, participating in good parallel constructions throughout this text which use patrimonia in exactly the way that patrima is used here. This might be a scribal error. [RH]

¹ a rebus descendentes. Res in the plural can indicate wealth or social status. While the translation is somewhat conjectural, this phrase clearly indicates a decline in status of some kind. [RH]

² remotis.

³ gentes populi. Gentes is the plural of gens, a race or clan, embracing several families united together by a common name and by certain religious rites. The word "race" here is used as "gentile" is in the Old Testament.

⁴ pathicus. (Greek pathikos), a man or boy who submits to unnatural lust.

counsel, listened to, and his command [will be] unconquerable. But if Saturn, agreeing on the left hand, should appear with them, he takes hold of a paternity of this sort, and proceeds into his paternal home, and will become very rich, happy [and] acquiring much. It will be greater for him front his own kind. He will have certain delights and, on account of these, slanders will be spoken against him. It behooves you to look forward to the sign succeeding [the ones] in which they are located, and which of the aforementioned planets it falls to. Likewise judge¹ the ascendant and the planets which belong to it.

The Sun and the Moon in the ascendant, and in the M.C. or its opposition, or in the west, in masculine signs, and* Saturn, Jupiter, Venus, Mercury and Mars associating familiarly with the Sun in the same sign, appearing in the east, and agreeing, Saturn aspecting them with a dexter trine, square, sextile or conjunction, being increasing,² with each in its own sect, although the Moon associated from another angle would not be, signifies that the father is glorious, and that the native himself will be the greatest king, an autocrat, outstanding, the most powerful man of cities, lands, climes, a builder, and races³ will subject themselves to him; on the other hand he will destroy whatever cities or land he desires; always the memorable one, containing power, the strong preceptor, the agitated, sharp, terrible, daring, victorious, leader of the army, having powerful hands,⁴ two-named,⁵ participating⁶ and is regarded as unconquerable, and held in reverence by those familiar with him. But he leads an army, not only on foot and riding on horses, but also a naval fleet,⁷ and he will travel over many cities and regions and lands, and he will navigate, and he will have the peoples under him through land and sea, some voluntarily, some taken by him through overthrow; he will have some adversities; he will be in [a state of] unease, slander, and detestations.

The Sun and the Moon in the ascendant, or only the Sun, or in ¹ coniudica(tur). Gundel has placed the third person singular ending on the verb.

² aucti. This is probably a reference to the state of being "increasing in number." i.e., direct.

³ gentes.

⁴ manus. Can also refer to "bands of troops" as well as "hands." [RH]

⁵ binomius. The meaning of this is not entirely clear. [RH]

⁶ participiens. This makes little sense in this context. [RH]

⁷ stolii navalis. Souter: Sicilian. Greek stolis. Fleet. (Hegesippus saec iv. Corp. Scr. Eccl. Lat. 66. Cf. W. F. Dwyer, Voc. of H., Washington 1931)

some one of the four the angles, or the Sun with the Moon, likewise Saturn and Mars in [a place] succeeding that angle without the aspect of Jupiter and Venus, he who is born will make a life in accidents, and condemnations, flights, losses, poverty and incarcerations, and of many unexpected evils; he will even have the experience of violent death and damage to his sight. And if the luminaries are in the ascendant or M.C., but the malevolent [planets], Saturn and Mars, are in the succedent [places], they will have the experience of the aforesaid evils in their own homeland. But if in the western angle the malevolent [planet] succeeds¹ in strange [places],² not only do the aforesaid things happen to them, but even those blundering [into him] will have experience of indescribable evils. If Mars is in the eighth, but the Sun and the Moon in the west, he sustains the aforesaid by blood or fire. But if Saturn, through the noose or water.

The Sun in the ascendant in a masculine sign, and the Moon in the M.C. by degree,³ in a nocturnal nativity, in places in which it rejoices, without the aspect of Saturn or Mars, shows that the native was born from famous parents, and that he is a king, a god, existing as a man, a participant of humanity. With the lord of the triplicity of the ascendant being in the ascendant, they are made first-born, so long as it may be below the degree of the horoscope;⁴ if in the M.C., either he will be the fourth or the fifth, if in the west, either the first or the seventh, if in the angle of the earth, count from the ascendant to the lord of the triplicity of the same, and say likewise.

The Moon in the ascendant in sect,⁵ in her own house, exaltation or triplicity, free from the evil [planets], especially full [of light] and

¹ succedet. This word does not make sense here, unless it means that the planet is in the seventh house, or perhaps, is moving into the eighth. [RH]

² in alienis. It is not clear whether this is a reference to peregrine status or some other lack of relationship between the planet and the sign. [RH]

³ gradatim.

⁴ Here is confirmation of what was said in page 41, note 1, above that a planet may be in the ascendant and yet above the horoscope, for though this rule states the condition that the lord of the triplicity of the ascendant must be below the horoscope, it would not be necessary to make such a clarification if "being in the ascendant" could not mean "being above or below the horoscope."

⁵ condicionalis.

increasing in number¹, shows that the native is of a noble and wealthy mother and that he [will be] famous, wealthy, always prospering in choices on account of [his] seriousness, and marrying noble women. He has many children.² They have many blood relatives.³ But if outside [the Moon's] sect, especially evilly aspected⁴ or waning,⁵ it shows sometimes that the native is born of a mother [who is] a hand-maid, or of ignoble poverty and is orphaned of the mother; and he wastes the maternal belongings; it makes those having few children, governors,⁶ and pirates, and leaders of uncrossable places. The Moon and Mars in the ascendant, especially at the same time, not in their own sect, and the Moon [being] full, the native is shown to be of a mother [who is] a hand-maid [who has been] either driven out or injured. But sometimes, indeed, it establishes that the mother is an orphan, and that the natives are divine epileptics⁷ or those who are called stellatici, and it harms the left eye and the sight, or the stomach, and kills the mother first. The birth of these natives will be with rapidity, heat and flux of blood.

The Moon in the ascendant, Venus in the west, Mars in the M.C, or in its opposite,⁸ shows that the native is of a mother [who is] a hand-maid, or of a woman of little worth,⁹ or has been injured, or the mother dies first; and they lose the mother's things; and the native is himself indigent, always a fugitive and wandering about. These, lacking food, frequently will go to a strange sacrifice.¹⁰

The Moon and Saturn and Venus in the ascendant at the same time, in the house of Venus show that the mother is poor. They marry their ¹ aucta numero. See Liber Hermetis, Part I, p. 19, note 1, where Al-Biruni is cited. In addition the Moon is said to increase in light and in latitude. The word "increasing" is used in all these ways in this book, especially in Chapter XXXV.

² Conjungit filiorum etiam semen.

³ consanguineas eorum.

⁴ inspecta. [RH]

⁵ deficiens. This can also mean "being eclipsed." The word "waning" will be used throughout this section for deficiens.

⁶ gubernatores. This also means 'helmsmen,' which accords a bit better with the rest of this passage. [RH]

⁷ Epilepsy was regarded as the divine disease. Those afflicted with it were thought to be touched by the gods. This may have been due to the fact that occasionally one in an epileptic fit will utter oracular sounding statements.

⁸ i.e., the fourth house.

⁹ minimae, from minimus, a, urn, of the worth of a mina.

¹⁰ They go to a sacrifice of a cult to which they do not belong seeking food.

own mothers, or stepmothers, or sisters, or the daughters of brothers; and, if it is the nativity of a woman, they marry with their own fathers, or stepfathers, or uncles, or stepsons.

The Moon with Saturn and Venus simultaneously in the ascendant, in any sign, they marry stepmothers and not mothers.

The Moon and Saturn in the ascendant, or in the M.C. shows that the native is from a mother [who is] a hand-maid, or a lowly woman, or a woman who has been injured, or [it shows] the orphanhood of the mother; and they destroy the belongings of the parents. The native himself is the first-born, or the first nourished, and is shown to be their first son. It signifies humiliations and vexations for the mother, and detentions in sacred places; especially with the Moon waning worse evils happen. But if Mercury is in the west, or in the angle of the earth, [or] in its opposite,¹ it makes maniacs, epileptics, demoniacs or those mentally damaged. However, if Mars is in the west with Mercury, or in the M.C, or in the angle of the earth, it makes worse evils and biothanati happen. If however, Jupiter aspects, it makes indeed stupefied [natives], but those having their intellect, at some times [doing] mindless things² but at another time effeminacies in baths.

With the Moon in the ascendant, Venus in the West, if Mercury should aspect the Moon, it shows that the native is of a noble mother, and he will have a profession and work through gold and silver. They will be workers and decorators of ivory, [and] mechanics, or fabricators of statues, and those who know all of music.

With the Moon in the ascendant, and Jupiter and Mars in the eleventh, it shows that the native is wealthy from the mother, and that he will be fortunate.

The Moon in the ascendant with Saturn and Mars, with Venus and Mercury in the angle of the earth, especially in a mobile sign, the native is shown to be of a poor mother, becomes orphaned of the mother, and wastes the mother's things. These are dangerous nativities; moreover many show eunuchs.

The Moon in the ascendant, with Saturn in the M.C, or in the opposite [place], and Mars in the west, make the native to be of an ignoble mother, or a hand-maid, or a captive, and that it kills the mother before the father, and wastes the mother's things; or it damages the left eye of the native. But in feminine nativities, these [natives] giving birth bring forth an abortion.

¹ i.e.. in the M.C.

² stupefactiones.

The Moon in the ascendant, with Mars in a succedent [place], and Saturn in the twelfth, the native will be of an ignoble mother, or one who has been driven out. But if the nativity is feminine, the native herself, in giving birth, causes the embryo to be cut, and both are unfortunately destroyed, unless the star of Jupiter or Venus should aspect.¹

The Moon in the ascendant, and Saturn in the west equal with her in degrees, and especially with the Moon waning, shows the natives to be of a mother of little worth,² and that they kill the mother before the father, and waste the mother's goods; and the native himself, the first born, dies. These are thrown in the earth.

The Moon in the ascendant, and Saturn in the west equal with her in degrees, and Mars in a succedent [place], without the aspect of Jupiter and Venus, especially with the Moon being full, or, if Mars should aspect the Moon, they show that the natives are worth little, [and are] of a hand maid mother, and they kill the mother before the father, and the natives themselves, [being] first born, die; and they harm the left eye. But if Jupiter or Venus should aspect, in no way is the mother killed first, but the native will be vital; but having been exposed,³ someone finding him thrown on the earth will guard him as their child, and feed him well, and he will be fortunate. But if Saturn or Mars should aspect, it kills the mother first, and he, having been exposed⁴ on the earth, is fed like a slave.

The Moon in the ascendant, the Sun in the west, and Saturn succedent, the natives come from ignoble parents and are separated from them; they kill the mother first, and they themselves [the natives] are made blind.

The Moon in the ascendant, Saturn and Mars in the west, the native is of a poor mother, and it [the configuration] kills the mother first, and it wastes the mother's goods, and it signifies injury to the mother; and he himself becomes a falling maniac,⁵ a demoniac, biothanatus; and

¹ inspexerit.

² matris minimae.

³ proiectus.

⁴ proiectus.

⁵ maniacus caducus. Another expression for an epileptic.

[his] left eye is harmed. Many are made stupid and lacking memory, especially if Mercury is configured with Saturn or Mars. These become people of friends [who are] of modest means.

The Moon in the ascendant, and Saturn and Mars in a succedent [place], the native is of an ignoble mother, and it kills the mother first; and the left eye is harmed and he is made poor in life.

The Moon in the ascendant, with Mars and Saturn in the west by degree, without the aspect of Jupiter or Venus shows that the native is of a hand-maid mother, or a woman who has been driven out, and that the mother dies before the father, and it wastes the goods of the mother and [shows that] the native is lacking in memory or is stupid; however often it shows that they have been exposed. If however Mercury is in the M.C, or in its opposite, it shows the death of the children as infants.

The Moon in the ascendant and the Sun in a succedent [place]. aspected¹ by the malefics, and they [the Moon and the Sun] being averse from² Jupiter and Venus, signify that the natives are of poor parents, and that they³ kill the mother. The Moon in the ascendant, separated from Jupiter, with Saturn in the west, but Mars declining,⁴ shows that the native is of a mother of little worth,⁵ and it shows the early death of the mother,⁶ and that the maternal goods are wasted. The natives themselves, on account of [their] temperament, [will be] outside their own country, and for as many degrees as the Moon flees from Mars, for so many years they will wander.

The Moon in the ascendant with Saturn or Mars in the west shows that the native is of an ignoble mother, and kills the mother before her time,⁷ and wastes the mother's goods, and does unexpected evils to her. These [natives] are thrown from a height, or are eaten by wild beasts, or die evilly in collapsing ruins of buildings, or they are hanged. But some become falling epileptics.

The Moon in the ascendant with Jupiter or in the M.C, likewise,

¹ inspecti.

² remoti. [RH]

³ probably the planets, not the natives. Throughout the Liber Hermetis we are confronted with this ambiguity. [RH]

⁴ i.e., declining from the angles = cadent.

⁵ matris minimae natum ostendit.

⁶ praeobitum.

⁷ praeinterficit.

especially [when] full, free from the evil [planets], signifies a noble and rich mother, and those divining or' fabricating, foreseeings of future things however, famous, and noble, and those inheriting the wealth of the parents; and they preserve it, and acquire [more], and they produce good offspring, or they adopt children. They do the same in succedent [places]. The Moon in the ascendant, or in the succedent [place], and Venus in the angle of the earth, both being in sect² and free from the evil [planets], shows that the mother is noble, and that they marry [be they men or women]³ their noble blood relations.⁴

The Moon in the ascendant with Venus in the M.C, or in the west the native is of a noble mother, and he is a noted man, illustrious and fortunate.⁵

The Moon in the ascendant with Mercury or in the west, or in the M.C, or in the angle of the earth shows natives of a rational⁶ mother, especially if Jupiter should aspect, or the Full Moon be joined with Mercury and Jupiter, [signifies] the wealth of the mother, and that they themselves are mechanics, or makers of instruments.⁷ fashioners of statues, having friendships with men who have magisterial powers.

The Full Moon in the ascendant and Mercury falling in an angle, and Saturn prohibiting the testimony from Mercury,⁸ they make sophists, augurs, astronomers, astrologers, seers, diviners, those who set

¹ There is a word missing here. [RH]

² condicionales.

³ hos vel eas.

⁴ Egyptian and Magusaeen marriage practice apparently permitted unions we deem incestuous.

⁵ Note that this delineation of the native becoming "a noted and illustrious man" is made without mention of the Sun!

⁶ rationabilis. It is not entirely clear whether this refers to her temperament or is a reference to something else. This is true here and other places where this word occurs. [RH]

⁷ Literally, annexores instrumentorum, binders of instruments. The term refers to ancient methods of tool manufacture (probably farm tools and mechanical tools) which were still primitive by our standards. That metallurgy had developed, at least by the 1st century to a high degree of competence is proven by the Antikythera device described in the Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, Philadelphia: 1960. This device, which turns out to be a complex brass gear assembly for computing the position of the celestial bodies for years in advance of its setting, exemplifies a level of instrument manufacture as far beyond the "binding of tools" level as fiber optics are from drums.

⁸ Here we have the earliest example I know of Prohibition.

loose birds,' palm readers,² interpreters of signs,³ those who read lots⁴ or enchanters.

The Moon and Mars in the ascendant, or in the M.C, or in the west, or in the angle of the earth, especially of its [the Moon's] sect, and the Moon full, shows the native to be of a foreign born mother, or one who has been injured, and that it kills the mother before the father, and wastes the mother's goods, and that the natives are injured regarding the sight, or face, or stomach, or they injure some part of the body, or they become divines or epileptics, which are called stellatici. But if Saturn is in the west, it shows that he has been thrown out or separated from his parents.

The Moon in the ascendant in the Pleiades of Taurus, or in the little nebula of the Crab,⁵ or in the tip of the arrow of Sagittarius, aspected⁶ from Saturn and Mercury, [natives] of this kind are evilly killed by bodyguards,⁷ or they are slain by magicians,⁸ but in other cases they become blind. The Moon always, when it is in the ascendant in the Pleiades, makes [one] to be killed by bandits; many however indeed are made blind.

The Moon in the ascendant, and the Sun and Mercury in the M.C. show that the native is of rational parents; when it is in a diurnal nativity, he is [the son] of a king, unless an evil [planet] should aspect⁹ by square, opposition or conjunction.

¹ avium vindicatores. A Vindicator is an avenger, but in this context something else seems implied. All the other professions involve divination. It seems reasonable that this one should as well. In legal language a vindicatio is a setting free. Perhaps the author intended something similar.

² palmarum excrutatores.

³ dissolutores signorum. Literally, "destroyers of signs." Once again, I think a specialist use of language is intended. Solutio means an explanation. Interpreters of signs seems reasonable.

⁴ supinorum indicadores. Supinus, a, um, means that which is turned up or backwards. It is related to the first conjugation verb supo, -are, to throw about or scatter. Clearly we are dealing with a reference to casting lots and the "reading" of them.

⁵ The Beehive also known as the Nepheleon or Little Cloud of Hipparchus, cluster ε in Cancer. Mentioned above page 16. footnote 1.

⁶ inspecta. [RH]

⁷ a latronibus. Or. "by bandits."

⁸ Or, by criminals. The word maleficus, i, m. used substantively has two meanings: criminal or magician. Maleficium is a charm or means of enchantment.

⁹ inspexerit. [RH]

The Moon in the ascendant with Mercury, and if Jupiter and Saturn aspect¹ by trine² or by square or yet by conjunction, they show that the native is of wealthy parents. But the native will be fortunate, noble and wealthy, acquiring the friendships of great men.

The Moon in the ascendant in Cancer, Scorpio or Pisces shows a second mother. But if it is in Scorpio, it makes sons; however, they bury them.

The Moon in Sagittarius in the ascendant or in Leo makes fewness of brothers.

Saturn in the ascendant in sect, free from the evil [planets], without the testimony of Mars, especially in his own house, or in triplicity, or exaltation, oriental and direct, perfects noble men and those always rejoicing with riches, and honors from great men, or from kings, profound judges, those prospering, rich men, ancient men having the last good things of a good old age, always leaving an inheritance. It shows that many are first born, or first sons, or the first nourished, or killing brothers born before them, whence they have few brothers; born unequally, always dominating, however, solitary.

He does the same in the house of Jupiter, or the Sun, or in the terms of Mercury. But in the night,³ Saturn in the ascendant, the worst happens; and, especially in signs in which he does not rejoice, or impeded by Mars, or retrograde, it shows that the native is the first born, or the first son, or the first nourished, or killing⁴ their brothers before them;⁵ he [Saturn] becomes a destroyer of children, and causes a noxious life. They are ignoble paupers, possessing nothing; they are made brief of life, laboring in vain, putting up with many sorrows in children and in brothers, having cold professions performed in humid places, always laboring on the quality of life, having nothing from their own labors, unless by chance some benevolent [planet] should aspect. Well located and having dominion in the place of brothers, it causes the depravities to be moderated. It does similarly possessing the place of children, lest all of the children be destroyed.

Saturn and Mars in the ascendant, and Jupiter in the west aspecting

¹ inspexerint. [RH]

² per triplicitatem.

³ i.e., in a nocturnal nativity.

⁴ Again it is not completely clear whether the native kills the elder brothers or the planet does. [RH]

⁵ i.e., their older brothers

them by degree, cause miserable paupers in youth, acquiring much with difficulty, bearing adversities; but in old age they become wealthy and prosperous. But if on the other hand, Saturn and Mars should aspect Jupiter by degree, from youth to old age, they go through life in adversity, and they have an infirm body all the way to death, and having a life with labors, exhaustions and afflictions. They show that many are lunatics, maniacs, or demoniacs, and especially if the Moon is configured with the same.¹

Saturn and Mars in the ascendant, and if the Moon is in the same degree² in conjunction, destroy the house of their parents and kill the father before the mother through illness. But the natives have an unmixed fortune, having a life in disorder, an infirm or dissolved³ body, unless a benefic should aspect the figure.

With Saturn and Mars in the ascendant, and with the Sun and Mercury in the west, they show that the native is of a poor father, or a slave or ignoble man, or of a destined death, and they destroy the father's goods; but the feet and hands of the natives are mutilated, and afterwards they die violently.

With Saturn and Mars being in the ascendant in the two winter signs, and with the Moon being visible in a succedent [place], having been injured, the natives die violently [after] suffering many evils in life.

Saturn and Mars in the ascendant, and the Sun and Venus possessing the place of sickness, which is the sixth from the horoscope, show that the native is of a poor father, or a slave, and they kill the father before the mother, or they signify the violent death of the father, and destroy the things of the father; and the native will have a bad marriage, and he will be a perverse man of evil counsel, a poisoner, evoking the dead,⁴ one who shows the signs of idols,⁵ or an astrologer; and many of them die from demons, (unless one of the benevolent [planets] should aspect the malevolent [planets], so that it makes a loosening of the evils) because many are dead having been affixed to

¹ i.e., Saturn and Mars and, perhaps Jupiter as well.

² aequali gradu.

³ tabefactum corpus. This was a medical expression meaning "dissolved in one's own blood." [Additional by RH] This expression could also mean more simply, "or one wasted away."

⁴ necromantes.

⁵ significator idolorum.

the cross, and they have been decapitated, or their members have been mutilated, or they have been burned alive.¹

XXVII. On the Defluxions² of the Moon.

The Moon having separated from the Sun, and making a conjunction³ to Mars, especially in a diurnal nativity, signifies the orphanhood of the parents and is the significator⁴ of the parents' humility of substance, and [their] injury or suffering, or their violent death. But it signifies injury to the native's sight, and the mutilation of his members, or [it signifies his] falls,⁵ and his scarcity of life, and violent death. But the Moon in the west, even if the nativity is nocturnal, and being in good places,⁶ they become violent, perverse, audacious, cruel men rushing into to dangers, or [those] surrounded with sufferings, or diseases; but they [these things] are done in public professions, and in admirable honors, or wars, or contests, or political offices. But if Mars or the Moon should fall evilly, it shows the destruction of substance, and of the parents, and orphanhood, and infirmity of life, and a profession from fire or iron with skill, and that they will have a living from some other laborious professions. These, indeed, become biothanati.

The Moon passing away from the Sun and making a conjunction ¹ It seems that the Inquisition and Medieval Christianity did not invent the penalty of immolation for the practice of magic.

² From defluo to flow or glide down, descend, or pass away from. This word is translated in later works as the "separations" of the Moon.

³ The word used throughout this section and in all other sections regarding the motions of the Moon is coniunctio. This word means literally "conjunction." However, in this context it does not merely mean a conjunction in the modern sense. The Latin word used is a translation of the Greek synaphē, which means "connection." However, as used by the Greek writers it really means exactly the same thing as our word 'application.' We have left the word as 'conjunction' in our text because in the Latin tradition of astrological writing, coniunctio has this double meaning of "conjunction" or "application." The reader should understand that in many contexts "conjunction" means something like "making an application to a conjunction or aspect." A forthcoming work from Robert Zoller and your editor on Medieval astrology will make this point clearly.

[RH]

⁴ manifestator.

⁵ descensiones.

⁶ Here, locus does not mean "house" as the example posits the Moon in the west (= 7th house).

to Venus, increasing in light, especially in a diurnal nativity, they are badly married, sterile without seed. But in women, [they become] sterile, either hand maids or whores, either widows or old women, or those making noxious connections,¹ because of which they do not make many children; they even become those who sleep with boys, foul libidinous, wild boars,² esteeming servile, grasping behavior; then happy, they become happier than in the preceding years. But with the Moon waning, indeed being in a nocturnal nativity, and in feminine signs, it signifies a rich mother, and it preserves the goods of the parents. But the natives become cupidinous, obliging, venereal fellow-traders, of many weddings, libidinous wild boars, mixing themselves with many; but living life well, and doers of good things, nobles, able to acquire things, possessing many things, having good skills, if it is without the testimony of Saturn.

The Moon passing away from the Sun making a conjunction to Mercury, increasing [in light], in the night, shows that the native is of a rational and prudent mother, and [it shows] those who are active men, public functionaries, wise men, intellectuals, rhetoricians, assistants, grammarians or those having profit from letters, inventors of discourse and philosophy,³ or composers of rhythms, critics or those having a living from them. Whence they have the first seat and the front position in processions⁴ in cities; and they become those able to understand obscure⁵ letters. But waning and in a diurnal nativity, they become those who fail in life and in the professions; they do not have good manners but are impious; they are destroyers, always blaspheming God, and those committed to the jailers with perjuries; they always become perverse.

The Full Moon passing away from Venus and conjunct Saturn in a diurnal nativity makes good men and of good disposition, but bad in marriages, wives, children and in passions; they are always copulating with the maids, sterile women, whores, widows and old women, and those who have been hurt, or with public women, or with their blood

¹ This is possibly a reference to anal sex.

² This term, used frequently by the author, who seems to have expected his readers to be familiar with it, denotes a man who is sexually aggressive, entirely indiscriminate and uncontrollable.

³ sapientiae.

⁴ praeambulationes.

⁵ i.e., badly written or scrawled. [RH]

relatives; for which reason they do not have children, but they are fortunate in presidencies, glorious deeds, happinesses and advancements. But at night,¹ [the Moon being] full, they are vicious, vituperative, cupidinous, and libidinous. Many become those who use² whores and pimps, pimping out foreign women. In wife and marriage and children they become evil, and they do many common, foul and base things. But if the nativity is feminine,³ she is made incestuous and common, and a public whore, she does profitless things in life, having coitus like a man with other women or with concubines.

The waning Moon being in a nocturnal nativity, passing away from Venus, and making a conjunction to Saturn, and the planet [i.e., Saturn] being a morning star, makes eunuchs, sterile men without semen, castrated men, either hermaphrodites, or [those] doing the work of women, easily injured, suffering, but in employment⁴ water drawers, water carriers, farmers or fishermen or sailors, simply having jobs in watery places, laboring in the processes of life and acquiring nothing; it causes some having a middling livelihood, or biothanatus. But in the day,⁵ and the Moon waning,⁶ it shows those easily injured, vicious men vexed by humid things, but having employment in watery places, as was said above, leading a laborious life, either those who draw water or water carriers, sailors, gardeners, or chariot drivers, or stable boys, or hunters of fishes, or shepherds, or grave keepers, or stone cutters, or builders, or grave diggers.

The waxing Moon passing away from Venus and making conjunction to Jupiter, in the night, shows that the native is of a noble mother; that he is good and well disposed, in every way temperate. It makes magnates, powerful men, outstanding, those set up as leaders of cities, but some are taken care of by women and promoted by them, obliging, lovers of women; in whatever they do they are powerful and venereal, fortunate in women and children; but it causes injury in connection with the sight.

The Moon, being very young,⁷ passing away from Venus and

¹ In a nocturnal nativity.

² conductores. Literally, those who rent or lease something.

³ i.e., the nativity of a woman.

⁴ in actibus.

⁵ In a diurnal nativity

⁶ minuente.

⁷ minima.

making a conjunction with Jupiter makes those having gain from feminine species¹ or feminine persons, and from parents having steadfast conditions, and glories from youth. They are constant; however some are made worthy of inheritances and inventions, or existing orders in sacred things are committed to them.

The waxing Moon passing away from Venus and making a conjunction with Mars, when she [the Moon] is of her own sect, makes terrible men, powerful in regions, or dominating climes, but they produce sorrow in women and children. Moreover, it causes this, if the Moon or Mars is in the sign of the Part of Fortune or the ascendant. But in the remaining places they are made participants of the arts, or of contests, or of wars, or of dangers; and wandering in travels, they will have the experience of flight; and they will produce servile works. But some are made of middling livelihood; some even will be put in danger on account of female persons, and are treated like enemies for the sake of cupidinous men, and become condemned. A very few of the same condition it makes terrible, glorious men, powerful in cities, dominating regions and possessions, but sorrowing in women and children. By day indeed, [are made] those having experience of the arts, or of struggle, or of war, from which they are made participants of dangers; and they do similar trouble in flights and wanderings, and they are imperiled by women.

With the Moon, having separated from Venus, going to the conjunction of the Sun, signifies the separation of the parents, or orphanhood, or diminution of substance, or vices, lusts and shamelessness, and plots, and those living life in slandering in youth; but afterwards they become acquirers of property and those who arranges things.²

¹ The actual word in Latin here is species. This can mean species in modern sense, a kind of, a form of etc. The exact meaning is hot clear. [RH]

² Compare this paragraph with the similar paragraph on page 78 [p. 76 in the original edition—RH] of A.J. Pearce's (1840-1923) Text-Book of Astrology, reprinted by the American Federation of Astrologers, Washington D.C. 1970. Pearce condensed the aphorisms of J. Angelus and Regiomontanus in the 15th century at Venice. It seems very likely that Angelus and Regiomontanus knew the Liber Hermetis or Firmicus' Mathesis, Book IV, chapter XIII, which contains a paragraph even more closely resembling Pearce's. Pearce's paragraph has been cleaned up for his Victorian public. The same seems to be the case with several of the other paragraphs in this section. Noting the presence of these paragraphs, their simplification and watering down, we witness, microcosmically, the transmission of the Hermetic Astrology down to our day. [Additional by RH] If we were

The Moon, having been separated from Venus, and proceeding to the conjunction of Mercury, being oriental, and indeed, if the nativity is diurnal, it makes favorites of women and those promoted by them, libidinous, cupidinous, blameworthy, those who submit to unnatural lust, those who nod their heads,¹ wealthy people, possessions of substances, having glories and honors and prosperities; and in marriage and children they are made good and pleasant; they have, however, arts of making necklaces, or colors, or fragrances, or [of things] of gold or silver, or of binding the head,² or of music or rhythm, or of contests. But [the Moon] being very young,³ when they [i.e., the planets] are occidental, they make dominators of women and children, having many possessions, perverse men in various occupations, or in artifices, [there is another lacuna here] or workers of colors, or of food and drink, or they become workers of things pertaining to pleasures, or pimps; they become the causes of disease, sufferings and consumption.⁴

The waxing Moon, passing away from Mercury and making a conjunction to Saturn, in a diurnal nativity, makes [natives who are] unemployed, and those who require religious ceremonies,⁵ or medicines,⁶ those stuttering or speaking with hindrance, either deaf or mute, [those who are] participants of calculations, or of journeys, or of interpretations, or of the celestial knowledge and polymaths of the occult.⁷ Some [of these], having works near the water, or in travels apprehend the work of hindering or damning, and from this they make a living, and have knowledge of hidden or future things.

The Moon, being very young,⁸ having separated from Mercury and to assume that the Latin here is medieval rather than late Classical, then this last section in Latin "postea vero propriorum acquisitores et ordinatores fiunt," could be translated as "afterward, indeed, they become acquirers of estates and bailiffs." In a more nearly classical Latin, the meaning is not so clear, but all of these words do have meaning late classical Latin as well.

¹ nutatores. It is not at all clear what this refers to, but the word can also mean those who sway, maybe those unsteady on their feet? [RH]

² Middle-eastern head ware.

³ minima.

⁴ phthiseon.

⁵ To heal their souls.

⁶ To heal their bodies.

⁷ Multiscios apocryphorum. The last word is from the Greek Apokruphos. The phrase translates literally as, "Knowers of many hidden things."

* minima.

making conjunction with Saturn, in a diurnal nativity, causes poor ceticulosos,¹ detained in sacred places. But some have epilepsies or sacred diseases, or afflictions through stupefaction or ecstatic afflictions, or they are connected to auguries.² But the Moon, waning³ in a nocturnal nativity,⁴ is the cause of servitude, condemnation, shortness of life or violent death.

The Moon, having separated from Mercury, and going to the conjunction of Jupiter, shows that the native is of a noble mother, and that he preserves the maternal goods; and those are made having the care of temples, learning the science of their parents: magnates, grammarians, rhetoricians, sophists, acquirers of the properties of kings, or tyrants, or administrators of cities, or co-workers,⁵ or public accountants, or [public] heralds;⁶ many, however, become pontiffs⁷ or prophets, from which circumstances they become powerful around kings. They are increased and become extremely successful. But [the Moon] being very young,⁸ they are placed over surveys, or the management of country estates, or accounting or weights, or they become scribes, or merchants, or they are placed where there are measures, and rules, and numbers, or money changers' tables, or gold making, or credit, or judgments, from which they have possessions and prosperity. Many become honored because of inventions, inheritance, or deposits of unsought for things, or from these they obtain gifts, or powers of rule. Whence they will have honors, possessions and riches.

¹ I do not know this word. It's not in Souter, Latham or Du Cange.

² In both this paragraph and in the preceding one black magical practices are referred to. In this paragraph reference is made to the self destructive effects of certain noxious substances used in such practices for trance induction

³ deficiens.

⁴ in nocte.

⁵ cooperatores. This word could mean a roofer in late medieval Latin, e.g. Latham: roofer 1198, 1335. Souter gives: Work together at something. cooperor. This would also be a classical reading. Neither is satisfactory as the cooperatores are mentioned in the context of civil administration.

⁶ annunciatores.

⁷ This was a position in the Roman religion; specifically a member of the highest priestly College of in Rome to which belonged the superintendence of all sacred observations, whether performed by the State or by private individuals. Pontifex is here used to translate some Greek word for a priestly function seen by the Latin translator as equivalent to the Roman pontifex.

* Minima.

The Moon being very young,¹ having separated from Mercury, and transiting to the conjunction of Mars, in a diurnal nativity, they become forgers of letters, and those knowledgeable of poisons and magic, either makers [thereof], or those knowing these things, or thieves or accomplices of thieves, from which they will have decline of life, and weak financial condition, and disease and suffering, or meanness of life, or violent death. Some, however, will have slavery, or flights into foreign lands. But others are set above those who are in prisons and under guard, and some are bed chamber servants, on account of certain perverse things, sustain dangers and violent deaths. *

The Moon being very young,² separated from Mercury and joined to Mars in a nocturnal nativity,³ especially occidental, makes obliging,⁴ ridiculous, itinerant artificers, lovers of the good; in fact, some become leaders of an army, or leaders of a contest, or of political power, or placed over armed men, or mobs, or businesses, fearsome men, outstanding negotiators, or those set over armies; but they cause violent deaths. Indeed they lie easily, and on account of this they flee their native land, because Mars arrives in the aforesaid place of the nativity, or the Part of Fortune, or in the ascendant, or the Moon, or if Mars should happen to be in the M.C. But in other places they become the cause of disease, or affliction, or injury, or dangers, or of laborious works.

The Moon, passing away from Mercury, making conjunction to the Sun, they become injured in their speech, hearing or reason, in all things even in youth; but in life they are paupers, miserable, dangerous vagabonds, acquiring [subsistence] with difficulty, wandering to and fro; but in their professions they are cooks, shoemakers, smiths,⁵ armorers, fashioners of statues, having their trade from fire or iron or from harsh operations; but thereafter they become artificers acquiring their livelihood moderately by their skills.

The Full Moon, passing away from Mercury going to the conjunction of Venus, by day, makes mixers of unguents and fragrances

¹ minima.

² minima.

³ nocturna.

⁴ There is a word here, munes, which defines all lookup attempts. 'Obliging' is an attempt at reconstruction. [RH]

⁵ The word used is fabri, from faber, a maker. smith. carpenter, forger, joiner, artificer, etc.

and colors; and [it makes] those who find stones and sculptors of precious stones, but some, makers of necklaces and honorable vestments, or of organ music, or choral music performed by voice, flatterers, doers of clean works, works of histories, or pictures, but of middling livelihood without indigence in the process acquiring more; however vicious, condemnable, libidinous, cupidinous, wild boars with regard to venereal acts.

The Full Moon, passing away from Mercury going to the conjunction of Venus, in a nocturnal nativity, when they are oriental, especially in the house of Venus, shows that the native is of a noble mother, or one who is a musician, or that they are natural spendthrifts, nevertheless, excessively associated with familiars,¹ and manifestations of felicity, preferment and glory, and they become presidents², and those prospering from the word, the muse, the comings forth of some gods, those promoted by royal orders, or by dispensations, or by the office of the Praesul. They have many benefits from female persons, as well as coitus and works of a feminine kind.

The very young³ Moon, passing away from Mercury and making a conjunction of Venus, in a diurnal nativity, in the M.C, the eleventh, the fifth, or the ascendant makes winners of sacred things, or workers of sacred things, or those set over sacred contests, or managers,⁴ or sacrists,⁵ or pontiffs, or superintendents having great rank, but heedless men, going to extremes in all things. But in the remaining places, men of moderate life, or managers of arts, which are of sacred things, of great works, or [makers] of necklaces, or of ivory [things], or of fragrances; some however, are stone cutters or tingers,⁶ [there is a lacuna here] or chanters of sacred things, or hissers of sacred [sounds],⁷

¹ familiaribus. Household slaves, personal attendants or minions.

² See page 7, note 2. [RH]

³ minima.

⁴ tractatores.

⁵ An official charged with the care of the sacred vessels, vestments, etc of a temple.

⁶ Regarding the alchemical manufacture in Hellenistic Egypt of artificial gems by "tingeing" quartz and other stones, Cf. The Story of Early Chemistry, by John Maxson Stillman, New York, 1924, D. Appleton and Co. Chapter II; esp. pp. 89, 91, 92-98.

⁷ sibilatores sacrorum. The reference is to the pagan temple practice, remarked by numerous classic authors and contemporary scholars, of hissing enchantments and theurgic invocations. Cf. the Hebrew word Nachash, Genesis 3 and elsewhere, translated as "Serpent" depending upon the pointing the word also means, "enchanter," "to enchant," and "to hiss."

or those learning celestial things, or knowing those things which are in hidden,¹ and from which they will have a livelihood and possessions.

The very young² Moon, passing away from Mercury going to the conjunction of Venus, if it is in sect, in a nocturnal nativity, shows that the natives are of a noble mother, or one who is a musician, and that they are rich, powerful, chiefs and magnates, dominators of cities, regions or climes, especially if they are outside the solar rays, and in the ascendant, or in the M.C, or in [the house of] the good daemon,³ or in the fifth, and, if the Part of Fortune shall have a figure⁴ like that of Venus and the Moon.⁵ But in the rest of the places they will be fortunate, glorious and noble; it helps equally regarding the fortune.

XX III. On the Conjunctions of the Moon.

The Moon conjunct Saturn and Jupiter makes men of many friends, men famous for their buildings, lords of foundations, big spenders,⁶ voluptuaries, damned men negligent of their own things, timid men, terse men, obtruding themselves [on others], wandering, having adversities and infirmities.

The Moon making a conjunction with Saturn and Mars causes good things; indeed it quickly relaxes passions and makes active, private or solitary men; indeed they grow ill in youth and pursue a difficult livelihood during the course of their life, unless some benevolent [planet], having been configured [with them], resolves their malice, especially with the Moon being in [a place] succedent to the horoscope.

The Moon, making a conjunction with Saturn and the Sun, makes sorrows, injuries, wanderings, journeys by sea and alienations.

From the Moon conjoined with Saturn and Venus good things

¹ in absconsis.

² minima.

³ the eleventh house. [Additional by RH] There is a problem here with the text. It actually refers to the house of the good fortune, bona fortuna. But that is the fifth house, which is referred to explicitly in the next clause. Therefore, it is reasonable to assume that the house of the good daemon is the one actually being referred to.

⁴ The meaning of this is unclear. [RH]

⁵ i.e., if the distance between Venus and the Moon is like that of the Moon and the Sun?

⁶ impensatores

happen, except that in women, it indeed brings sorrows of children. They are made without semen and sterile, water carriers, but they are cut short¹ evilly for the sake of strange women.

The Moon conjoined with Saturn and Mercury shows depraved natives of an ignoble mother, and [those] destroying the maternal goods, and they² become destroyers of the mother, or the cause of injury or suffering or danger to the mother, or of her violent death; but it makes the natives mendacious, impious, counterfeiterers, those who counterfeit sigilla,³ evil men of bad counsel, poisoners, enchanters⁴, magicians, and those always endangered by these; they become investigators of this kind of perverse learning,⁵ or those who know such things, deceivers of men.⁶ These indeed always endure dangers and are punished by the hand of princes, always blaspheming God on account of contrary events, which happen to them. It increases evil fame in them, and they are made hateful to all men on account of their malice, they have the behaviors of asps and vipers, never showing men what kind of things they have in their hearts. These men will have a violent death, because they are killed or are burned [to death], they are thrown from a precipice; indeed they will have an evil end.

The Moon conjoined with Jupiter and Venus perfects great and wonderful things; it shows that the native is of wealthy and noble parents, and that they preserve the parents' goods; they will be wealthy, blessed, long living men, acquiring very many things, lovers of music, well married, well constituted in children, giving food to many people, and familiarly associated by many, always executing things well.

The Moon joined with Jupiter and Mars makes leaders of armies,

¹ taking inciduntur for incidunt.

² Again we do not know whether these are planets or natives. [RH]

³ falsos sigillatores. Signatures were not used in the period when the Liber Hermetis was written. Instead, impressions were made in wax from seals or signet rings called sigilla. The counterfeiting of these sigilla was the ancient equivalent of the counterfeiting of signatures on legal documents.

⁴ The actual word here is *carmatore*s. This is almost certainly a corrupt form of carminatores which means enchanters. [RH]

⁵ Littera is literally, "a letter," litterarum, "of letters," but in the plural the word stands for "Learning." Still, both senses ought to be understood as a littera is any written sign or mark standing for a sound. Practical magic employs such marks, signs or sigils as the tools of its trade.

⁶ ". . . vel virorum, qui talia sciunt, circumventores. The sense must be translated. The deceivers know such things, not the men.

those exercised in combats, lords of ships¹ and navies, overthrowing cities and regions, both raising up and subjugating peoples and dominating [their] life and death.

If the Moon is joined with Jupiter and the Sun, it shows that in every way the native is from wealthy and noble parents, and it shows that they are kings [and] cosmocrators.²

The Moon joined with Jupiter and Mercury shows that the native is from rational and noble parents; and that he becomes wise in speech and wisdom, and wonderful with respect to glory; indeed he becomes a friend of kings and he will be glorified in speeches. -

The Moon joined with Mars, the Sun and Mercury in fiery and tropical signs, with the star of Mars found in conjunctions or square or opposition aspects, or by the configurations of the Sun and Mars, being in evil signs, or outside of sect, makes shoemakers, cooks, fitters of colored skins, workers of arms, performers,³ shapers of statues, having their profession by fire or iron or harsh work. But if the same configuration is found in the signs of Venus, linen workers are made, and tailors,⁴ having their profession either of clothes decorated by colors, or dyes, or by the delight of drink, or of foods. But if the same configuration is in the signs of Mars and Mercury, they become daring men, disputants, lovers of contest, or they have some public office; indeed it makes strong men. But if the same configuration is in the signs of Saturn, they become tormentors and traitors, or hunters or leaders of four-footed animals, or governors,⁵ or cutters of stones, or those doing similar things, and fishermen and fowlers, lovers of food, drinkers, field workers, builders of ships, grave diggers, having their profession in many places. But if in the signs of Jupiter, powerful tribunes, magnates of cities and those set above regions.

¹ gressibilium, gressus. In a poetical sense means the course of a ship.

² Literally, "rulers of the Cosmos." The term, from the Greek kosmos + krateō (to rule), signifies universal rulers. The term cosmocrator is common to both astrological and gnostic literature.

³ sonator. In Italian this means a player or performer.

⁴ vestium connexores = tailors.

⁵ gubernatores. This word also means 'helmsmen,' which makes sense in the context of the other significations. [RH]

The Moon in Aries, Taurus, Scorpio, Capricorn or Pisces, with Saturn and Mars being in equal degrees with her, makes lepers suffering elephantiasis, or it kills with poison, or it makes white spots on the skin¹ or scabs. Not only the Moon does this, but the Part of Fortune and the Part of the Daemon,² when they are in those signs and aspected³ by malevolents [planets], they make indeed [hiatus in text], who are so born.

The Moon with Saturn and Mars in the last degrees of signs makes lame men and those who have been tortured. The lord of the prevention of the Moon in the twelfth makes outcasts.

When the Moon shall be in Pisces, it always kills the father before the mother. The Moon, made unfortunate by the malefics in Sagittarius, Scorpio and in Pisces, causes epilepsies.

The Moon opposite the lord of her own house or [opposite the lord of her] term⁴ or triplicity makes fugitives. They become wandering men without honor travelling from place to place.

The Moon conjunctional or at first or second quarter,⁵ first or second crescent⁶ or Full Moon, making a conjunction, and irradiated⁷ by a malevolent [planet], causes the suffering of an injury for oneself and for the mother. The configurations happen at an expressly stated time in the signs, which are of one zone.⁸ Hermes Trismegistus said, "This operation, however, is especially most certain, which is collected truly from many things coming together into one."

The Moon averse⁹ in the ascendant: such men always perceive things contrary to them.

¹ alphos, from the Greek.

² Part of Spirit. [RH]

³ inspecti.

⁴ i.e., the lord of the term the Moon is in as the luminaries are not themselves allotted terms.

⁵ dichotomos.

⁶ amphicyrtos from the Greek amphikurtos, i.e., bent at both ends.

⁷ Probably a reference to aktineboleō. [RH]

⁸ unius cinguli. This is undoubtedly the same as like-engirding signs or homozonia, which are signs ruled by the same ruler. [RH]

⁹ remota. This seems to mean that the Moon is unaspected and has no other familiarity with any planet and is in the first house. [RH]

If the lord of the triplicity of the ascendant is in the upper hemisphere, although in succedent or cadent [places],¹ count from it to the ascendant and as many signs as there are, he will as many brothers.² But if there is a sign of two bodies, count those double. But if the lord of the triplicity of the horoscope is in the lower hemisphere, count from the horoscope to the lord of the triplicity and as many signs or stars as there are, say so many brothers. Remember to double the bicorporeal signs, however, and if benevolent [planets] should aspect, the brothers will be vital; but if malevolent [planets], they signify the destruction of the brothers. But if from the M.C. to the horoscope there are no planets, there will not be another brother. But if, with such a configuration, it should happen that someone has an older brother, he will certainly see the brother's death. And if there is³ a malevolent [planet] from the M.C. to the horoscope, it signifies the death of the brothers born before the native. But if there are none from the horoscope to the angle of the earth, he will not have any brothers born after him. And if there are, he will certainly see their death. But if Saturn or Mars are present from the ascendant to the angle of the earth, he will himself see the death of those younger than he. If the lord of the Part of Brothers⁴ is in the horoscope, you may say that such a one is an only child. If the lord of the Part of brothers is in a bicorporeal sign, say that such a one has brothers from another father or another mother, and if the part and its lord are in a masculine sign, he has brothers from another father, and if in a feminine sign, from another mother. If the lord of the triplicity of the horoscope is in the horoscope, they are made the first born, if in the M.C., the first or the fourth, if in the west, the first or the seventh, if in the angle of the earth, certainly he is the fourth. Malevolent planets aspecting the third place from the horoscope show the death of the brothers. They cause the same even though they fall in the ninth place

¹ There is at this point a missing word followed by terram. The word cannot be reconstructed, but the sense seems clear enough given the passages that follow [RH]

² or, "count from it to the ascendant and he will he have as many brothers as there are signs, . . ."

³ The editor of the Latin text has supplied the syllable 'de' to 'fuert' which would make the sense from what the context clearly calls for. [RH]

⁴ According to Paulus, the Part or Lot of Brothers is as follows:

Part = Asc. + Jupiter - Saturn. [RH]

from the horoscope; they cause the destruction of the brothers. The same happens although malevolent [planets] are found in the Part of Brothers' or in the [places] opposite them; likewise they will see the deaths of brothers.

XXXXI. On the Mutual Separation and Conjunction of the Five Planets and the Sun.

On the separation and conjunction of the Moon we have written above, but on the Sun and the remaining five planets, what they will have, whether good or adverse, we reckon it necessary to expound the configurations of them next.

The Sun conjunct Saturn of the same sect," he becomes a waster of the father's things and it induces injuries and wanderings, but at night, it makes the evils worse and kills the father before the mother and destroys the patrimony.

The Sun conjunct Jupiter of the same sect,³ if they are free from the evil [planets], they show that the native is from a noble and good father, and they preserve the patrimony, and signify good things for the native, and the native becomes useful, and especially if they are located in a sign or in terms of a benevolent [planet].

The Sun conjunct Mars at night, in its own signs or in a violent [sign], shows that the native and those born are violent, thoughtless, daring, hot, dangerous, of short life, and of violent death. But in the day the evils are made worse.

The Sun conjunct Venus in the night, free from the evil [planets], causes the same things which [it does] when with Jupiter.

The Sun conjunct Mercury shows that the native is of a rational, prudent father, but that the natives are timid, just, honest, pedantic, poorly made,⁴ infirm in body. These indeed have few children or none.

The Sun joined with the Moon in the day in fixed signs makes

¹ The term 'part' refers not to its longitude but to its locus or place. [RH]

² i.e., diurnally placed in this case, as the next clause makes clear.

³ See previous note.

⁴ inconstructos. From in (not) + constructus, made or arranged, therefore, unconstructed or not put together.? Not in souter, Du Cange or Latham. (Additional by RH) Or any other reference!

⁵ in signis dissolubilibus = fixed signs?

instabilities and induces sorrows; but in the night it makes venereal and fortunate men.

Saturn joined with Jupiter in the day, he becomes a good man; but at night it induces sadnesses and contrarieties.

Saturn joined with Venus; he is made frigid with regard to the venereal act and unstable concerning life. Moreover this man is made without children.

Saturn joined with Mercury makes prudent, informed magicians knowing celestial things, magicians knowledgeable of bad or of hidden things.

Saturn joined with the Sun destroys the father's house and kills the father before the mother. But for many they cause the fathers an evil death.

Saturn conjoined with the Moon, especially [when she is] very young,¹ shows that the native is of a mother who has been previously injured, and that the mother dies before the father. But when the planet is increasing² it is made worse.

Jupiter joined with Saturn in the day, he becomes a good man, but at night less good.

Jupiter joined with Mars makes spendthrifts and violent men. Indeed, with these occidental, they are quickly freed from evils, but oriental, long lasting evil things are caused.

Jupiter conjoined to the Sun shows that the native is of a noble father, and that he is from a prospering father; but in the night it offers things less good.

Jupiter joined to Venus [is] useless, but in the night less.

Jupiter conjunct Mercury shows skill³ and benefits, and money.

Jupiter conjunct the increasing Moon,⁴ shows that the native is of a noble mother, and that he preserves the maternal things, and it gives glory and happiness to the native. But if it [i.e., the Moon] is very young⁵ with the planet, it will be the contrary.

Mars conjunct Saturn in night and in the day, especially oriental, he becomes a good man; temperance is made of goods and evils.

¹ maxime minimae.

² aucta.

³ actus. Also trade, profession, etc

⁴ lunae auctae.

⁵ minima.

Mars conjunct Jupiter good; indeed all things are significant of benefit; but in the day difficult and sad.¹

Mars conjunct the Sun, he becomes a waster of the patrimonial goods, but for certain [natives] it signifies an evil death.

Mars conjunct Venus oriental [and] diurnal, he becomes a destroyer, but nocturnal and occidental he becomes somewhat evil.

Mars conjunct Mercury, becomes difficult, indeed applying detentions, condemnations and punishments, contradictions and litigations.

Venus conjunct Saturn is made difficult regarding unions and the venereal act.

Venus conjunct Jupiter in oriental appearances good in all things, especially in the marriage of men. But in feminine nativities, [when] occidental, good things happen; it gives good men married to them; but oriental, it causes violent abortions to women.

Venus conjunct Mars, oriental and of diurnal placement, good things; occidental and in the night, the contrary. But in the day, occidental, it becomes vicious and contrary.

Venus conjunct the Sun kills the mother before the father; it signifies injurious things, and they even become grateful for the venereal act and [become] wild boars.

Venus conjunct Mercury, occidental, good things are caused; it makes venereal, and active men and musicians.

Venus conjunct the very young Moon in a nocturnal nativity shows that the native is of a noble and wealthy mother; but it causes jealousies in marriages. These will have two or three sisters, or they will commit adultery with the mother and her daughter, or the wives of the father, uncle or brother. But if the Moon is increasing,² or not in sect, they will have judgments because of these things.

Mercury conjunct Saturn makes malicious, stupid men, however, able to understand, lazy, upset by humiliations, having decisions in the disciplines³ and in businesses.

Mercury conjunct Jupiter becomes profitable for everything. It makes men prudent in all things. But in the west, and in the angle of the earth, it induces sorrows. They know more concerning all men.

¹ Mars is a nocturnal planet and works better at night. Jupiter is diurnal but has less difficulty at night than Mars does by day. [RH]

² aucta.

³ There is an omitted word here which makes the sense unclear. [RH]

Mercury conjunct Mars, occidental, makes daring evil doers and rash thieves, those who lie in wait; but oriental, it makes those agreeing for evil purposes, indeed attorneys.¹

Mercury conjunct the Sun, oriental, in a diurnal nativity, shows that the native is of a rational and outstanding father, and it signifies happiness for the native; but in the night less.

Mercury conjunct Venus [is] good in all things; it even causes marrying well and good and happy men.

Mercury conjunct the Full Moon shows that the native is of a prudent and rational mother; and the natives become rational and knowledgeable of celestial things, and of secret books, and wise inventors of speeches, co-workers and counsellors of princes. But the waning² Moon lessens the beauty, and makes those knowledgeable of predictions,³ however, the parents are unknown; on behalf of speeches and this kind of ineffable scriptures.⁴

XXXII. On the Signs in Which the Planets are Located.

When Saturn in sects should be located in his own house or face or degree, or in its own triplicity or exaltation, free from the evil [planets], without the testimony of Mars, oriental, it makes noble men and the friends of great men, but some procuring royal things, acquirers of their own estates, and lords of buildings, collectors,⁶ but those having poor friends, and those obtruding themselves on wise men, filthy souls, living like paupers, or they become procurators of sacred things. Moreover, many become the fathers of strange children, or adopting strange children, they raise them as their own. But in the night it destroys all the patrimony, or from their own homeland they are caused to go into

¹ Yikes! Them again!!

² deficiens.

³ It is a notable feature of Latin that the word for "predictions" and the word for "preachings" is the same word: prædicta or prædictio.

⁴ This passage is not entirely clear in Latin. [RH]

⁵ There is a missing word at this point. [RH]

⁶ congregatores. Souter: an assembler of people. collector of things. (From the 4th century on).

a strange land, always travelling, and superintending or stealing royal business,¹ or priests, however, great in [his] affairs² and of practiced counsel; but some are taken in adoption by others and become heirs, and end up in public employments, or in accounting, or in the office of overseers of sacred things. But some are made ship masters or pilots, or they participate as the officials of businesses, or [officials] of magnates, or [officials] of kings, or they become tax collectors, or fathers of strange children. But if Saturn is evilly configured, it makes those rejoicing in evil, suffering evils, having humid professions,³ dangers on the waters, wasting diseases,⁴ those experienced in wanderings and many evils.

When Saturn should be in the house, face or degree⁵ of Jupiter, of oriental condition, increasing,⁶ free from the evil [planets], it makes noble men, and friends of the persons of kings, and tax collectors, and those having been entrusted with the management of the royal businesses;⁷ but some become fathers of strange men, or they show that the sons have been exposed; but those who have been born from them, having been nourished by others, are recognized, and suddenly their return is asked for; they wander or become masters of ships, or businessmen great in transactions, and men of good counsel and creative; some however are adopted by others, and they inherit, and end up in public employments, or in the office of prelates of sacred things, or collectors of royal tributes, or of the treasury of the sacred monies,⁸ or [that] of tyrants. But a nocturnal [Saturn] causes harms and contrarieties and sadnesses in children, especially if it [i.e., Saturn] is the lord of the signifying of children, and it is located in the same place. But if Saturn is the lord of the Part⁹ of Fortune or the lord of the

¹ The irony is intentional. The author is aware of bureaucratic corruption.

² actibus.

³ actus humidus.

⁴ aegrotos phthisicas. The second word means wasting. It is from the Greek phthisis, a wasting disease of the lungs, consumption or tuberculosis

⁵ This is an example of a monomoirion, an individual degree ruled by a planet. See Chapter XXXV. [RH]

⁶ addens.

⁷ fideicommissarios.

⁸ aerarium sacrorum. The aerarium was the treasury in the Temple of Saturn in Rome where the public wealth was kept.

⁹ The text has patris where it should clearly be partis. Your translator, R.Z., has translated it accordingly. [RH] ascendant, it is the worst, it causes injuries, law-suits, useless wanderings, and destruction of substance, and betrayal by one's own, and the insults of enemies.

When Saturn is in sect, in the house of Mars, or [his] face, or degree, it makes the completing of a task difficult, those who have made enemies evilly, evilly incriminated, traitors, subjected men, and universally indifferent; the impulse¹ of Mars makes an ignoble youth, [and it makes] slothful men, and [those] evilly occupied in their affairs, and not profiting in treacheries. But at night idle, infirm men, those who can't be perfected, ignoble, acquiring wealth with difficulty, troublesome proxies; but some have both injuries and sufferings in the secrets; moreover they become timid and lazy and negligent in affairs, and fearing all things, and making themselves miserable,² always looking down, and not applying themselves to [their] works; they are thoughtless in youth and are often injured; therefore it makes those who are negligent and unsuccessful.

Saturn in the house of the Sun, or the face or degree, in sect, when he is oriental and direct, without the aspect of Mars, shows that the native is of a noble father, but [it also shows] the separation of the parents, and it leads the natives themselves into glories and great good fortunes; it also signifies the increase of benefits, life and substance for the native, and it makes [him] the lord of buildings, estates and villas; but it indicates the evil of the father, or his violent death, or it kills him in the waters, or with an evil death, or with humid molestations. It signifies diverse sufferings for the parents, and the injury to the mother, or corporeal passions, or humid molestations, or that the parents flee among the gods in sacred [places] on account of the passions polluting them.³ Moreover many little ones are orphaned, and they destroy the patrimony. But a nocturnal [Saturn] is worse, and he destroys the patrimony, and becomes a destroyer of his parents; it especially shows the violent death of the father, or dangers on water, and it destroys the paternity, or he is orphaned as a young boy, and they are endangered in wanderings either on the water, or they have litigations with important people, and are spun around in the sufferings of the mind.

Saturn in the house of Venus, or the face or the degree, in sect,

¹ motus.

² se attristantes.

³ or it could be read, "sufferings touching them." [RH]

diurnal, when it is in feminine nativities, makes handmaidens, or whores, or sterile women, or widows, or those who have been harmed, or ignoble women performing shameful coitus; and on account of this they become sterile and badly married; many however become evil in [their] children.

Saturn, nocturnal, in the house of Venus, or face or degree, being in sect, in a masculine nativity likewise makes sterile slaves without seed, fornicators marrying badly. Moreover many cohabit with the father's concubines or [their] stepmothers, or the wives of [their] brothers, or of [their] uncles, whence they meet with anxieties and adversities on account of women. Some, however, whip their wives with their own hand because of their injuries, and jealousies, and their shameless passions. But some are punished; others indeed have acquisitions and benefits from women and are advanced by women. But illicit and sordid in venereal acts, and eager, libidinous pathics, wild boars, thoughtless men being faithless with their eyes. Always indeed, Saturn happening in the house of Venus makes flatterers. But if Venus is opposed to him, or should reach [him] by square or by conjunction, it makes sterile men, having few children. He does not indeed rejoice in marriage or in children; indeed women like this become whores.

Saturn being in sect in the house of Mercury, or the face or the degree, signifies those conscious of hidden secrets, but in manners active publicans, acquisitive of their own interests, great men self-motivated, and happily having a constant life, and those always increased to greater things, conscious of secret books and celestial things, but idle with respect to behavior, and constant towards superiors. But if he is not in sect, it denotes stutterers, deaf people, those who are mute, malevolent men. Many, indeed, when the planet is evilly configured, are deprived of their voice; [and it denotes] those always thinking about the perverse things which are in their souls, not showing, but having, the behaviors of wild beasts, always bearing ill will, and being fraudulent against all men, or they become conscious of bad things, either highwaymen or homicides, or those conscious of magic, knowing divine secrets, and the things which are in mystic books. However, it is not expedient for them to treat of those things, because they always fall into great dangers, many times indeed they receive evil for good; they become malevolent in their behavior; [and it denotes] those who endure both chains and detentions, or are held in sacred places, and they recite or expound fables, or by the vexations of daemons they perform operations; they are also in adversities and in labors. But if Saturn or Mars are configured with Mercury, it causes worse evils and they become fixed, of bad life and of violent death.

When Saturn is in sect in the house of the Moon, or face or degree, he becomes depraved, unless the Full Moon is configured with him; it induces cold diseases of the mother. But it makes the natives neither daring nor rash, travelling with difficulty, being harmed¹ often, rheumatics; it signifies destruction of the patrimony, and separation from the parents, and diseases of the secret places for them, and the injury of the mother, and bodily suffering, either humidities or vexations, and mothers fleeing to the gods on account of the torments made in them.

When Jupiter is in his own house or face or triplicity or exaltation, being in sect, especially oriental, and swift of course, without the contrariety of Saturn or Mars in an angle, it makes nobles, acquirers, having conversation with kings, tyrants and magnates, and managing the business of these same kings or tyrants, and always prospering. But if he is out of sect, it makes those of moderate life, unable to decide, however having orders in sacred things, and giving responses regarding future things, worshippers of God, or those making conversations on sacred subjects.

When Jupiter is in sect in the house of Saturn, or face or degree, it makes adoptive [children], wealthy acquirers of good things, greedy inheritors, lords of estates or buildings, not rejoicing from friends nor from their own money, but also inappreciable in deeds, and they become depraved in speech and tormenters. But they are infirm with regard to their own intelligence, thinking that their miserable soul has to be given to knowing, and whatever thing they give themselves to, is done without glory. However, many, finding foreign children on the ground, nourish them as their own children; for the greater part, they push though [their plans] in businesses, and in adversities being faint-hearted, timid and unknown, dealing with difficult things, being obtrusive. But outside sect, it makes [them] always suffering unjustly and frequently failing in business dealings, inappreciable, always remaining in adversities, faint-hearted, full of dangers, doing unfavorable things, they will have corruptions of substance and ruin of life, succeeding in business with difficulty, obtruding themselves on others, afraid to know, and unaudacious, especially against a young person. Many become fathers or tutors of strange children.

¹ nocentes. The verb is active, but the context goes better with the passive. [RH]

When Jupiter is in sect in the house of Mars, or face or degree, oriental, or swift of course, it makes the most powerful tyrants, presidents¹ and leaders of armies, honored by magnates and kings, and ruling cities and regions, kings' managers, and honored by peoples and cities, body guards, frightening soldiers or tribunes, or leaders of armies, and they become victors of battles. Many become kings and the familiar or trusted counsellors² of kings, or worthy of believable things. But if he is outside sect, he (Jupiter) makes those living³ over public works, or fallible with regard to politics, and those attaining to destruction, involved with superfluities of blood or diseases of the anus, suffering vertigo or falls,⁴ or blood disease.

Jupiter in sect falling in the house of the Sun, or the face or degree, shows that the native is of a noble father, famous, glorious, outstanding and rich, and regarding glories and presidencies, it indicates that the native is outstanding, glorified, conducting the public deeds of honored men, of the entrusted management of the businesses of kings, tyrants, or cities. But if it is outside sect, it shows the destruction of patrimonies, and diminutions and losses of substances, and [it shows] long journeys for the native, and dangers on waters, but the entrusted management of the affairs of great men, those placed above trusted men, captains and officials; but for some he becomes the causer of injuries or illnesses, and his actions happen with moderate glory.

Jupiter in sect falling in the house of Venus, or face or degree, makes great riches and happiness and glory, and [it makes one] a lord of everyone's possessions. He becomes a ruler of villas and fields and estates and buildings, and an adviser of kings and princes, or an assessor perpetually honored by the mob, and by cities; many become priests of the gods, especially if [the planets] happen in the third or ninth from the horoscope, or they build temples receiving gifts, and presidents⁵ of the people, hearing from many, and always being

¹ See page 7, note 2. [RH]

² credenz.eri. Du Cange: a trusted counsellor, member of a secret council. Sicilian, i.e. Byzantine Latin.

³ commorantes. Souter: To inhabit, with dative of person = to dwell. (SS los. 7.9., Cass. Hist. 5.36).

⁴ casuras. Souter. a fail (?) C Julius Solinus, 20.7 ed. Mommsen Berlin, 1895. 3rd century.

⁵ See page 7, note 2. [RH]

enriched by his acts, and they will have the wives of great men; many times indeed these men are glorified by women and, having benefit from women, they rule the republic and are public figures, famous spendthrifts and they enter into royal courts on behalf of female persons, or on behalf of famous public persons. But if Saturn or Mars should aspect, the goods are made less, and it makes servants of the female person. However, if it is outside sect, it makes those who have been decorated, of good life, of beautiful life, fortunate men, those who are constant, high-priests overseeing women protecting them, from which occasions they have their living; many indeed are made worthy of discoveries¹ or inheritances.

Jupiter in sect in the house or face of Mercury, or the degree, without the testimony of Mars makes the richest men, frequently however, conducting royal affairs, they are set over cities, overseers of estates or superintendents, those who make out the censors lists, having public employment, superintendents of businesses, or those set over the public weal, or they procure public employment of civil supplies, and proclaimers of the laws, and they become worthy of honors and presidencies, collecting the royal monies on account of their faith and prudence; by their wits, these persons, stealing from them², will have riches in their own houses; those always having glory and happiness, managing [affairs] for foreigners, and foreign procurators of regions, indeed good men, and those decorated and active, powerful men and gracious paterfamilias, skilled of indirect and laborious things, having a livelihood from reckoning, or from tables, or from negotiations or collections or from buying gold, or from weights, or they become officers charged with distributing money among the people.³ But if it is outside sect, they become scribes or apothecaries, scribes of the curia, those to whom the scriptures have been entrusted; however some have their livelihood from words, or numbers, or sorceries, or they become astronomers or discoverers of celestial things, and prophets of future things.

Jupiter in sect falling as a morning star in the house of the Moon, or the face or the degree, or swift of course, or where it exalts or

¹ sc. of wealth

² i.e., the royal monies. [RH]

³ magistri. This can mean a number of other things as well, such as 'master', 'director' or other types of officials. [RH] rejoices, indicates that the native is of a noble and rich mother, and that he preserves the parents goods, but it makes natives who have great glory, wealth and happiness, public honor, most fortunate men, acquiring great souls according to the times, increasing, outstanding men, foreseeing future things. But if it is outside sect, outstanding fortunate acquirers, full of business. However many have work and conversations in sacred things, managers or priests, especially if it should fall in the third or the ninth from the ascendant. But in youth they have adversities, wanderings or litigations or accusations.

Mars in sect falling in the house of Saturn, or face or degree, is inclined more easily toward doing evil, moreover it corrupts the patrimony, and it always buries the older brothers before [their time]. It heats the cold of Saturn, and makes [its native] rash and daring in deeds, not deciding according to intellect, quickly advancing all operations keenly and without tiring,¹ speedily active, outstanding men, harsh men who are conquered with difficulty; it will turn out better when it [Mars] is in its exaltation without the aspect of Saturn. But if it is outside sect, it destroys the patrimony, and induces injuries and incurable diseases, and accidents from four footed beasts, or from fire or iron, or from the insults of mercenaries; [it makes] those of weak imagination; it causes dark deeds [and] jealousy from phlegmatic² or abject men; indeed [they are] thoughtless, rash in actions, not deciding with the mind; but they are active, public and restless men soon injured. Many however have their livelihood from the gathering of humid things, likewise they bury their older brothers [killed] either by a building falling on them, or by falling from a height.

Mars in sect falling in the house of Jupiter, or the face or the degree, makes famous magnates, outstanding nobles, prospering tyrants raising up and conquering cities, and they raise them up reforming them, likewise having victories and great glories, princes of navies, infantry and cavalry and armies, ruling fierce and aroused men, and [men] of other climes. It does this especially [when] familiarly associated with Jupiter, and when [Mars] itself is in an angle, especially if the luminaries are configured with him in the angles, in masculine signs; then he makes kings, indeed those having power in these things, and unbearable happiness; they become prelates of cities, acquirers or managers of properties, presidents¹ or comrades-in-arms of kings, and those powerful in wars, possessors of horses and cattle, subjecting cities and peoples, or they are made princes of the captains of the military by kings. But if it is outside sect, evilly configured to the nativity, they become greater co-workers of those [men], subordinated to great men, serving magnates as [if] it doing the work of slaves, and they become greater by working, [but] excessive, vicious and violent, throwing themselves at dangers, deceitful in life, thoughtless, easily decreasing in strength in whatever they do, they become fallible; but for some, injuries, and it becomes the cause of sufferings, consumption, disease and ecstasy.²

¹ fessitudine.

² humidis. The use of the English 'phlegmatic' is technically quite correct and the use of the word 'humid' would seem strange to us. However, what the Latin actually indicates is men who are excessively moist in temperament. [RH]

Mars falling in his own house, sign, face or degree, or in triplicity or exaltation, in sect, from youth it makes one glorious, outstanding, acquirers, locators of the work,³ intelligent mechanics, and without dangers, public men both having acquisitions from the beginning and, what ever they get into, they complete it smartly. They will be proven, skillful, keen, and daring. But if it is outside sect, it causes dangers, exiles, calumnies, those always expecting destruction, epilepsies, the insults of enemies, and accusations from his own people, and treacheries and dangers from a height, or from fire, or from four-footed animals, or a sword wound; and it becomes the causer of the pain of the secrets, or of robberies, or of evil death. It becomes the worst especially in Aries, but in Scorpio it is more tolerable and useful.

Mars in sect falling in the house of the Sun, or the face or the degree, indicates the evil death of the father, and it destroys the patrimony, and they become wanderers [and] moderate of life. However, for some it causes injuries of the eyes, and frequently eye complaints, sick men, and those failing more easily in words and businesses, and those having professions from fire, iron, rude arts, or of contests or exercise; they live an unquiet life. But if it is outside sect, [it will be] worse: indeed it destroys every patrimony, and shows the injury of the

¹ See page 7, note 2. [RH]

² exstasis. This word means terror or amazement in Latin. In Greek it has, among other meanings, the sense of mental distraction, trance or ecstasy. It is interesting to see it listed as an illness. Ecstasy is here listed as an illness.

³ Du Cange: adventor, Greek Latin = locator opens.

father or [his] evil or painful death; indeed it makes the natives die painfully, and evilly, but [it causes] ignoble employments, it makes skin dealers,¹ or cuirassiers;² indeed it becomes the causer of injuries, and sufferings and dangers. and diseases and pleurisy, or cuts from iron, or expulsion of blood, or cautery, or it causes danger from heights, or from four-footed beasts. But if, with Mars being in the house of the Sun, Saturn gets into Cancer, in the house of the Moon, especially when the luminaries are in the angles, undeviatingly, they are made blind, of brief life, and of violent death, or they signify many evils, contentions, loathings, losses. or separation for the parents. Mars in the M.C. in the house of the Sun without the aspect of Jupiter or Venus kills the native and the father violently.

Mars in sect falling in the house of Venus, or in the face or in the degree, makes male or female adulterers, always subverting strange women, deceiving the wives of their friends, associates and brothers with gifts, accomplishing foul deeds through words and lies, often going evilly into strange beds, performing lawless coitus, or often on account of these [women], the evils are unchecked, or they kill their wives on account of guilt, violently; but they entice from others their proper wives, or they make them sleep with them. Many receive gifts and thanks from powerful women; they become cupidinous, flattering, libidinous weaklings. and they profit from friends, and from the aforesaid things, or from perverse women; they cause women to grow ill, and they injure them. Always Mars in the house of Venus, without doubt, simply ruins wives, and they become non-monogamous and secretly cupidinous. Universally indeed, Mars in the house or terms of Venus, or in his own [house or terms] shows that the wives are answerable by reason of adultery and guilt, or that indeed they cohabit thus with men. But if Mercury is present, they are extremely common and, guilty of these things; they delight in hedonism and in drugs; and they kill the wives by drugs, and the wives [kill] their own husbands. But in the day the planet is made worse: it shows that, regarding the venereal act, they are adulterers, inconstant, cupidinous men, corrupters of strange women; they even become procurers, unchangeably, they see the death of the women, and they do not become monogamous. Indeed some persons kill them on behalf of women, or they kill the women, or the women kill them. But in feminine nativities. . . [lacuna in text]. . . they make, and those who have been elevated to a difficult friendship and enduring many vexations; indeed frequently, conceiving in the womb, they give birth to unmatured fetuses, or kill the embryos. But if Mercury is present, they kill their own men with poisons.

¹ pelliparios.

² clibanarios. Armorers who make cuirasses These were originally of leather, later of chain mail. still later of plate steel.

Mars in sect falling in the house of Mercury, or the face or the degree, [makes] public disputants, or those dealing in arms, haters, moreover, and evil men of evil manner, and running to evil purposes, impostors¹ or traitors, malicious men of evil behaviors, investigators and punishers of such men, even if it should not aspect Mercury. But in the day it is made worse, it makes those always in anxiety, and thinking that there are many evils against them, always apprehending evil and always speaking with double meaning, and odious men always making contentions in the streets, criminals of bad reputation, frequently the *pedagogues*² of small boys or of other children, or thieves of four-footed animals, robbers, liars, impious forgers, perjurers, homicides, false sculptors, false signers, perverse men worthy of being destroyed, counsellors of evil things, of evil quality without mercy, malicious, harsh poisoners, always blaspheming God, not having the care of their own homes, or of children, or of wives, or of parents, those who make off with deposits of valuables. Moreover many become poisoners,³ magicians, or counsellors conscious of such things; many indeed are punished by judges, they become biothanati, or of robbers, or of poisoners, or of homicides. . . [lacuna]. . . adulterers, and those carefully sought out. If Mars is in an angle, namely in the ascendant, M.C, angle of the earth, or the west, it causes all these things or in a succedent [place], not aspected by Jupiter and Venus; especially if Mercury is configured therewith, it makes the evils worse; these indeed, become either homicides or fugitives of their own cities.

When Mars is in sect in the house of the Moon, or the face or the degree, and the waning⁴ Moon is configured with him, it makes outstanding, terrible, soldiers, leaders of armies, the friends of kings, or it makes those placed in public employments by tyrants, from which

¹ Taking impostores for impositores.

² A slave who took the children to school and who had charge of them at home.

³ venefici.

⁴ deficiens.

they will have honor and gain, glorious tyrants or champions in combats, but having secret illnesses or internal pains. But in the day, especially if the Full Moon is configured with him, it indicates the injury of the mother and her evil death or dangers, and they flee to the gods in the temples on account of the adversities done them. But it makes the natives thoughtless, daring, strong, perverse, arrogant, rash, desperate robbers, active, infallible, cruel, wandering, dangerous, having a care neither of dangers nor of fears, of threats of princes, or of peoples. But these become those who die an evil death,¹ and indeed they are always punished by princes and are endangered by judges, or on the waters, or by the sword, or they are consumed by fire, or they ascend to public places or honors. Many continually fall prey to diseases, or sufferings, or dangers or sicknesses, or infirmities, or hidden torments, or corporal [torments], and they flee to the gods in the temples; they will have stomach pain, and dangers from a height, or from fire, or from iron, or from four-footed beasts. Indeed, Mars falling in the house of the Sun, or the Moon, without the aspect of Jupiter and Venus, always makes biothanatos and indicates the violent death of the parents. But if Jupiter and Venus should aspect, they become dissolvers of the evils.

The Sun in its own house or face or degree or triplicity or exaltation, free from the evil [planets], shows that the native is from a noble, rich, outstanding father, but the natives themselves are rich, powerful, good, generous, honored by all men, and by princes and kings and the people; frequently they become tyrants, and winners of battles, however, irascible, princes of armies, wealthy, acquirers of their own things, set above the public weal and dignitaries, or terrible judges, having power over cities, or climates, or peoples. The Sun does all these things if, in a nativity, it is in the ascendant, M.C, or the eleventh place, otherwise, it makes those who possess their own things, [and] glorious acquirers. But if Mercury falls with the Sun in Leo, [it makes] excessively mutable natives, defective in dignities, or those in charge of temples, and participants of ineffable secrets. But at night it causes ignorance of the father, separation of the parents, orphanhood, but [it makes] some wandering and substitute workers, and those failing easily, and having an ignoble and unsettled life; and they always become the cause of injuries, sufferings, or dangers or diseases.

¹ cacothanati.

The Sun falling in the house of Saturn, or the face, or the degree, in the day, shows that the native is of a noble father and one possessing [wealth]; but for the native, it diminishes substance and he is alienated from the parents, or becomes an orphan; and moreover many are sick. But at night it shows that the native is of a poor father, either a slave or an exile, or a subject, and it destroys the paternity, and it kills the father before the mother. But many natives run into judgments and detentions, and estranged from their parents, they become orphans, but some see the injury of the father or his violent death, and they become sick.

The Sun falling in the house, face or degree of Jupiter, by day, shows that the native is of a noble and outstanding and famous father, and that he preserves the patrimony. It makes natives having glory and presidency, prospering in acquisition and felicity and power. But by night it [the Sun in the house, face or degree of Jupiter] especially becomes a diminisher of substances with regard to both the father and the native, and induces humbleness of life, and they [the natives] are made capable of failure with respect to actions, unprepared and dangerous; but some reach foreign places, especially if the Sun is in Pisces, in a feminine sign [even] worse evils occur.

The Sun being in sect,¹ and oriental, in the house, face or degree of Mars, shows the injury [and] violent death of the father, and that the father dies before the mother, and it destroys the patrimony. But it causes injuries, sufferings, dangers and diseases to the natives in [their] skin, or it causes infirmities of the nerves, or arthritis, or sciatica, or ecstasy, or it becomes the causer of other sicknesses. But if in Aries free from the evil [planets], glorious possessors [of wealth], tax collectors of the state; men firm in their works; strong, exalted and spirited men because the Sun is exalted here. But at night when the Sun is in Scorpio, it makes public acquirers; but some will have sicknesses in the head, or they will have the experience of the neurospastic condition;² and if in Aries, it will be worse.

The Sun in the house, face or degree of Venus by day excessively

¹ i.e., in a masculine sign in a diurnal chart. Note that in the second part of this paragraph the author portrays the Sun in a feminine sign first (the Sun being contrary to sect in a feminine sign in a nocturnal nativity) and then, even worse, in a masculine sign in a nocturnal chart.

² neurospasticae conditionis. This is a nervous condition in which the patient suffers erratic (spastic) movements similar to that made by a marionette, venereal, polygamous¹ courtiers, or those promoted by women, but [they are] exiles, wandering, making frequent peregrinations. But by night exceedingly common, polygamous libidinous blameworthy wild boars, suffering treacheries from parents or female persons, and they sustain many hostilities, lawsuits and accusations from female persons, and through female slaves. They become pathics in venereal matters, or they will have treacheries from their blood kin on behalf of female persons or works, and for the sake of unguents or perfumes; indeed some become very active.²

The Sun occurring in sect in the house, face or degree of Mercury, free from the evil [planets], makes [those] exceedingly practiced and expert, teaching many things, giving too many orders, exceedingly learned men. those who are able to debate academics³ excessively, and in public performances, truly delighting in nothing, many [are] aware of celestial matters; however they are unemployed, having from their depraved manners and from letters a laborious livelihood. But some become expert in harmonies,⁴ numbers, magicks, or poisons,⁵ astronomy, astrology, from the observation of palms or divination. But by night those too much practiced in watery professions, being considered lovers of work, experienced mechanics, having a livelihood from skills of this sort, however many become asthmatics,⁶ or suffer disease of the liver or spleen or groin,⁷ or spastic attacks, or the kidneys or dysuria,⁸ or nerve complaints, truly always harmed in unspeakable ways, having vicious desires in life, and [they are] in every way unpraised.

The Sun in the house, face, or degree of the Moon, by day, makes [natives] moderate with respect to their faculties and works and [those who] fail easily. Moreover many become subject to stomach and spleen complaints, and have illnesses in hidden places. But by night many, suffering and fallible, suffer illnesses from weak kidneys in youth, but over the course of time they perfect themselves acquiring [wealth].

¹ multigamos.

² i.e., sexually? [RH]

³ aggregatores. An academic title.

⁴ rhythmorum. Also rythms or symmetries.

⁵ venenorum. Veneficio is a term frequently used for witchcraft.

⁶ dyspnoici. Literally, those who labor under difficulty of breathing.

⁷ ilium.

⁸ urine complaints

Venus, in sect in her own house, face, degree, triplicity, exaltation, and free from the evil [planets], they become protectors of women or those who profit from them or, promoted by women, they have a livelihood, gracious, acquirers of their own riches, spendthrifts without want, sleeping with¹ with honorable [women] and profiting by them, but [they are] inconstant in women [and] venereal; some become inventors. But by day, and especially [when] aspected² by the malevolent [planets], it causes treacheries, aversions and judgments. Indeed these see the death of women, indeed it makes those of moderate life, but hardworking and without want, moreover libidinous, catamites and wild boars, faltering regarding venereal things, adulterers, but unreliable in the venereal act in women for the sake of which they sustain law suits and adversities.

Venus in the house, face or degree of Saturn by night, [the natives] sleep with handmaids, whores, sterile women, widows, or those who have been injured, or are corrupted with masculine admixtions for the sake of which they are made without offspring, and [caused to be] in cupidinous adversities and situations. But if Saturn is opposed, [they are] frigid regarding venereal acts and without seed. Their children are fathered by other men, and because of adultery they are exposed, and are raised by the real fathers as their own children. But by day it shows that [they are] without seed, without children, frigid regarding venereal matters, and they receive expressions of ingratitude from women and children, and [they are] fornicators and practitioners of sordid relations³ with respect to every commixture, having respect for neither the wives nor concubines of their brothers, stepfathers, uncles, lords or patrons, but sleeping with [them] as their own wives in illicit coitus. They deceive them with money and lies. Moreover many take their stepmothers and the wives of brothers and uncles, so that father and son and uncle and brother have one wife or mother or daughter of that one and two or three sisters, and many, suffering evil crimes by women on account of women and whores; they sleep unworthily with handmaids or they cohabit with whores or sterile, old or injured women on account of which they are without offspring; or they are involved with lawsuits, adversities and legal custody.¹ But if it is the nativity of a woman, she becomes sterile, or is injured, or has the seed of a man exhausted. But if Saturn should aspect,² Venus being nocturnal, it will be worse regarding the reckoning of women and of the children on account of the concupiscent appetite. It is fitting moreover that they first fulfill the desire of passion by the necessity of fate. But if Mars should be configured with them, they go into women of their own kind;³ some chose such wives, others persist in using women as men, [be they] mother or daughter. But if Mercury should aspect them, they do the same openly on account of his famous complexion to be outstanding⁴ in lewdness. But if Venus happens to be oriental, as a morning star,⁵ she causes the same vices: masculine lewdness because of the virile annoyance of Venus.⁶ If however the nativity is a woman's, she becomes a *crissatrix*⁷ or *fricatrix*⁸ and she is delighted by women fricatrices. They become incontinent in vices on account of Venus which perfects every sort of coitus, marriage and getting together of men and women. The star of Venus causes, when she is in one of the angles, in libidinous signs,⁹ aspected¹⁰ by Saturn or Mars, those women born at these times to be blameworthy; it places libidinous men. . . [Gundel indicates that the text has a lacuna here].

¹ coeuntes from coire from which we get coitus.

² inspecta.

³ sordidogamos.

XXXIII. On the Separation and Void of Course Moon.

The Moon having separated from Saturn, when she is void of course, full, causes the alienation of the parents, or indicates orphanhood, and destroys the patrimony and substance, and causes unemployment and ¹ dispositionibus.

² inspecta.

³ that is, with similar sexual proclivities. [RH]

⁴ A missing word here. [RH]

⁵ Venus as a morning star is much more masculine according to both Babylonian and Greek tradition. [RH]

⁶ Such a Venus is masculine in nature. [RH]

⁷ "One who moves the haunches." A lewd grinding motion is referred to.

⁸ One who rubs herself for autoerotic stimulation.

⁹ Gundel's text has in leprosis sigis but in his note he suggests that this ought to be in libidinosis signis. This makes more sense actually, as leprosy is not otherwise discussed.

¹⁰ inspecta.

wanderings. [The Moon] waning likewise indicates the alienations of the parents, or orphanhood, and those having corrupt bellies. It causes cold, phlegmatic, rheumatic dysenteries and sicknesses which are by the spleen, kidneys or lungs, or it induces dropsy or suppression of urine.

The Moon having separated from Jupiter, when she is void of course, full, makes exiles pursuing a fortune abroad, and if they [i.e., the Moon and Jupiter] are fortunate, following the course of years they [i.e., the natives] will be estranged from happiness. But if waning, expelled captives, having a livelihood in subjection and servitude; however, for some it becomes the cause of injuries and sufferings and of little life.

The Moon having separated from Mars, when she is void of course, full, signifies the alienation of the parents, or orphanhood, and it destroys the substance, and becomes the cause of injuries and sufferings, and of the paucity of life. These [planets] cause an evil death either by a fall from a height, or from a building falling on them. But [the Moon] waning, they are exiled from their blood kin and parents and substance, and they show laborious trades, namely from iron or fire. Moreover it shows many [to be] infirm soldiers.

The Moon having separated from the Sun, void of course, separates the mother from the father, and kills the mother before the father, and makes them [the natives] unemployed paupers wandering [and] travelling, or leading a servile life. Some indeed have a meager livelihood in youth from skills at the beginning, but later they are increased in goods.

The Moon having separated from Venus, void of course, full, makes extremely dangerous, extremely common, lewd, polygamous men who marry illicitly,² vicious, impoverished, effeminate wild boars, and those of dishonored life. These indeed put away from themselves their own wives and take others. But [the Moon] waning, makes [natives] dishonored in vices, exiles always undertaking either unsuitable arts or professions, and failing in these.

The Moon having separated from Mercury, void of course, and full, makes grammarians, rhetoricians, physicians, arithmeticians discoursing on rhythms or the Muse and discoverers of celestial things. Some have dignities from calculations, or tables, or the care of villas, or embassies, or councils, or they become buyers of precious things of kings or princes, guards of the treasury, from which they acquire glory and happiness. But waning, it causes lesser goods. Moreover many fall from felicity, and mixing business with pleasures, they become aware of unnoticed things, or [become] traitors, and attempt rebellions, ingratitude, or incursions, and they are punished, or condemned, and insulted, and suffer as fugitives. Those become the workers of these things: thieves, scoffers, but they are able to suffer in their bodies, having been vexed by humid diseases. Meeting someone of such a disposition is not pleasing to men; he becomes the cause of vices, injuries and weaknesses.

¹ Perhaps, "Unless she were luckily placed. - ."

² illicitogamos.

The Moon in the Head or Tail of the Dragon, making conjunction with the Sun, in the sixth or twelfth place from the horoscope, shows indeed that the parents are slaves. But if in the eighth, it indicates the immediate death of the parents, especially if a malefic should aspect.¹ But if in the third or the ninth, you may say that the parents are foreign, and if it is well aspected,² that the native is from free parents. But if evilly [aspected], from slaves, exiles or captives. Each place has some proper event. Whence it is fitting that you consider the separations and conjunctions of the Moon and thus define the matter. Both in nativities and in elections it is fitting that you investigate according to the matter [at hand].

The Moon, making a conjunction with no planet shows that the native is from parents who are slaves or exiles, and that they become poor, humble, less than parents in their abilities, moreover they [the natives?] lack more than others, or they become mendicants, or grow ill and, moreover, able to be injured, and suffering separation, or catarrh, or abscesses. Many go blind or fall into coughing sicknesses, especially if the Moon is coming into such a configuration in empty signs, and is aspected by the malevolent [planets]. But if on the third day in any nativity, the Moon is aspected by Mars, it shows an empty birth and youth. But if the Moon is conjoined to any of the benevolent [planets], in no wise does the evil happen, but it rather dissolves the evil. The third day from the birth signifies nutrition.¹ Therefore, if the Moon is conjoined to the benevolent [planets], you may say that the nutrition of the natives is good. But if to the evil [planets] on the contrary, it shows the worst nutrition and the natives falling from their substance.

¹ inspexerit

² bene inspecta. Here inspecta, being joined to bene cannot have an hostile sense. This is why I think the terms inspecta, aspecta, etc. are all used interchangeably by this author.

XXXIV. On the Planets Placed in the Terms.

Saturn in his own terms will be of such a kind as the elder of the brothers, either the first born or, having few brothers, he will be the head of his father's house, and will be glorified among his own kind.²

When Saturn is in the terms of Jupiter, again [the native will be] the first born, or first son, or first nourished, or the brothers before him will die, and he becomes the captain of his father's house and he will be violent, and whatever his parents do not acquire, he will acquire by art or violence, and he will spend it again. And he will cause destruction of life, and will see the destruction of his sons or daughters; he will be difficult to capture³ in his own house, and likewise he will be freed from his enemies, and he will have many sons, and he will be glorified in his blood relations.

When Saturn is in the terms of Mars the native will see the death of his brother and his wife, and he will have a cut from a sword; he will be killed violently and among a great many dangers he will die; he will be for certain a depraved man. But if Saturn and Mars should exchange terms, they make the houses of the dead, making little wooden lodges;⁴ but if Mercury should aspect, thieves, homicides, perjurers, liars and those who die evilly.

When Saturn is in the terms of Venus, the mother digs [the native]

¹ It is an interesting question why this is so. I rather think that the answer will be found to rest partially on physiology and partially on numerology. It will probably also shed light on why the 7th and the 40th day after birth are often said to be important to look at.

² in propria genera.

³ probably means "arrest." [RH]

⁴ The preceding is an accurate literal translation. However, there is a possible interpretation. It may refer to the practice of placing little wooden houses on graves. This custom is still practiced in Mexico and may stem from ancient times. Otherwise, we have no idea what it could mean. [RH]

from her belly,¹ or the mother dies before the father, and he will see the death of his wife or daughter, and he will become the lord of his paternal house, and will acquire much, and he will be a great man regarding goods, and, having acquired much, he will throw it away, and he will hold on to nothing of his women's goods, but he will send forth all, and will behave in a difficult manner in his home. But some will have commixed children² who are not born from them, but since they are substituted, they nourish them as their own; especially if it is a double bodied sign.

When Saturn is in the terms of Mercury, likewise they become the first born, or first nourished, or first sons, or the elder of the brothers, or the brothers born before them die, or they will be made the older, promoted to the paternal house because of their prudence; but in time they will sorrow on behalf of their wife and children.

When Jupiter is in his own terms, the native will be exalted and glorified, and he will possess many good things.

When Jupiter is in the terms of Saturn, whatever the native acquires he loses, and he saves nothing, and he will be detained by the idleness of the people³ in his own homeland, or outside his own [country] he will be in evils all the way to 42 years, and after this he returns to his country and flees [again].

When Jupiter is in the terms of Mars, he acquires many goods, and loses them, and acquires much again, and he will see many good things, and again he will lose them, and he is afflicted in the reason. He will feel the cut of a sword and will have scars on his body and he will be freed from all things.

When Jupiter is in the terms of Venus, he will obtain an honest wife, and will have children quickly, and will acquire money in his wife's name, and he will have a sacred rank; he will become the secret father of many children, and his parents are also secret, and of many children, especially when in signs of many children.

When Jupiter is in the terms of Mercury, he acquires many goods in the name of business, and in his old age he will be the possessor of many things, and will have the ultimate good.

When Mars is in its own terms, the native will be exalted and

¹ Caesarian section.

² that is. adopted children and his own together.

³ detinebitur publicis vacationibus. The meaning of this is not entirely clear. [RH] glorified by the sword, namely that which pertains to fighting; he will be a violent man, one who bears off,¹ a dissipator of houses, and he will have adversities, and ascension,² and he will be killed.

When Mars is in the terms of Saturn, the native will have the honor of binding and losing prisoners, and he will fight with some, and his children will be captured, and he will have evil children, and his children will be held as hostages.

When Mars is in the terms of Jupiter, the native will have an office in the government or the great name of the king, and he will announce the people to the kings;³ things get better for him the older he gets, but it goes evilly with him regarding children.

When Mars is in the terms of Venus, the native will see the death of his wife, moreover he will be a one who acts on evil counsel because he is depraved but clever, and he will be loved by women, and beautiful daughters will be born to him. Moreover, he will gain, but lose everything with women; but some [are] wasters and many riches evaporate from their hands. It makes adulterators and adulteresses, and never monogamous people.

When Mars is in the terms of Mercury, it clouds his faculties and children adorn [him] who later flee.

When the Sun is in the terms of Saturn, it kills the father first, and it makes [the natives] the first born, or the first sons, or the first nourished, or brothers die before him, or they are made the elder of the brothers, and the place where the native may be is destroyed; and they marry a woman older than themselves. He will be alone in his house, and he will be lord of a great house and it will be destroyed. He will have wants and wounds and sicknesses while he is small, but he will acquire riches, and he will obtain many things.

The Sun in the terms⁴ of Jupiter, likewise the first begotten, or the first born, or the first nourished, or his brothers die before him,⁵ and he becomes the elder of the brothers, and he acquires many other things which the parents did not have, and he saves a treasure which he loses, and he will see sons from a wife, and sons of sons, and he will see the ¹ ablator.

² ascensionem. It is not clear what this means here. [RH]

³ Alternatively, "give rules to the people for the kings." [RH]

⁴ The Latin actually has domo, 'house' here, but this is clearly an error since all of the other, parallel sections are about terms. [RH]

⁵ taking perimunt for the text's perimit.

death of these. However frequently he behaves difficultly in his own home, and he will lose [his wealth], and he will suffer evil, or will be in captivity all the way to 30 years, or he will be condemned, and after this it will be well with him. Indeed always the Sun or the Moon in the terms of Jupiter or Mercury, in signs of many seeds, or of many children, generate numerous children.

The Sun in the terms of Mars, kills the father before the mother. But the native will be violent, and have many illnesses, and he will have injuries to his eyes in the early years, and go through many things, and the greater [part] of these will be advantageous [to him], and he will go through a difficult period, and will lose much in his house because of women, or he will experience a sword wound before thirty years of age.

The Sun in the terms of Venus, he will be vexed with a wife, after she bears children he will have vituperation in his own house because of a woman, and he will pierce the woman through the belly.

The Sun in the terms of Mercury, the native will be exalted and will have daring power. He will acquire goods which his parents shall not have had; he will have commixed children. He will be the older brother and many people will know his name; he will be strong and he will have high esteem,¹ and he will acquire goods and, being extrinsecus, he will marry his own sister² and he will obtain sons from her. But if Mercury should be with him [the Sun], he makes those who wander aimlessly in all the earth, vainly debating with disputants or working in a marvelous manner and suffering scorn. Indeed when the Sun and the Moon are in the terms of Mercury or Jupiter, in signs of many seeds, or of many children, they make many children even if the Sun is alone or the Moon is alone.

When Venus is in her own terms, the native will be the first born, or first nourished, or first son, or the brothers born before them die, and he will be made the elder of the paternal house, and he will have rank in kingdoms and cities, and he will speak and be heard, or he will be a priest, or will have conversation with kings and tyrants or superior

¹ altitudinem.

² We are dealing here with some kind of a pagan marriage practice in which relations we consider taboo were acceptable. This practice of marrying one's sister (occasionally one's mother or aunt) is attested, not only among the Egyptians but among the Zoroastrian Magusæans as well. The term extrinsecus may also mean exoteric or uninitiated, referring to "sacred" or non-sacred marriages or it may simply mean "moreover."

men, and will obtain many good things by his wife's name.

When Venus is in the terms of Saturn, it kills the mother before the father, and the woman digs her own son from her belly, and he will have life from the death of the woman, and he will be unstable with women, and he will have lawsuits against many people, and victory on account of the birth of children.

When Venus is in the terms of Jupiter, the native marries a wife of his own blood relation, and he will have children from her, and will obtain possessions.

Venus in the terms of Mars kills the mother before the father, and the native will be fortified; he copulates with a foreign woman, and with a strange woman, and again, he will have rotten vituperations with another woman, and he will go into a woman and he becomes her enemy. It makes adulterers and adulteresses, and the women see the death of the men.

When Venus is in the terms of Mercury, the native will have a sacerdotal order or [a rank] in the kingdom or with tyrants, and he gets a name for himself, and he will have a good ending. But if they [Venus and Mercury] exchange terms or houses, or are conjunct, it makes geometers, astronomers, tragedians, or cithera players knowing the musical art; but if Saturn should aspect, seers, interpreters of dreams [and] augurs.

Mercury in its own terms [makes] the native exalted. He will have power, and he will be above the crowds, or will share in secrets. But if it is in its own sign, he will be abundantly honest and sober, and he will be praised for his prudence. Some moreover become scribes of sacred things, or sculptors of sacred [images], or judges, and they persevere in that, or are scribes of the king, or those knowing secrets; however, they will grieve on account of the death of their children.

Mercury in the terms of Saturn will have work from letters, or speeches, and he will be praised for his prudence. He will sorrow because of the death of his children,¹ and persevere in that when men are judged. Many become judges of the people, or benevolent scribes, or notaries for this reason: that they are abundant in prudence. But if Saturn should aspect him [Mercury], it makes farmers and managers of the land. But if Jupiter should aspect, cultivators of the land, or whole districts.

¹ There is a word missing here which makes the following phrase unclear. [RH]

When Mercury is in the terms of Jupiter, the native becomes great in rank of business on account his mode of life, and he will have many goods by the king's name or of tyrants. He will be praised for great letters, and will worship his god in a temple, or he will have a livelihood in his own temple, and he will have reverence, the office of kings and of lords. But if they [Jupiter and Mercury], exchange terms, or houses, or oppose each other, they make sophists, grammarians or teachers of boys.

When Mercury is in the terms of Mars, the native will be strengthened¹ by a woman, and his name will reach the king or tyrant, and he will have evil in his heart, but he [the native] will escape.² But if Mars should aspect the Moon or an angle, he will be vulnerable in his brothers.

When Mercury is in the terms of Venus, the native will be in a temple, or his voice will reach to God, or be connected to the superiors;³ especially in life and means⁴ and he marries a woman of his own blood relation or his own sister.

When the Moon is in the terms of Saturn in whatever sign, it kills the mother before the father, and the native will become a judge of the people, and, when he is small, he will suffer evil in many places, and will grieve in his first children, but afterwards he will have vital children. But if Saturn should be with the Moon in the same sign, the native will be violent, and he will suffer evil in the final days,⁵ namely one day, and in the right side; he will die poor.

When the Moon is in the terms of Jupiter [and] in the same sign, the native will have power in the command of the people, and he will exact violently by extortion, and on account of this, his name will be spoken in every law and he will die painfully.

When the Moon is in the house of Mercury, and the Sun is with any of the planets in the terms of Jupiter, and Mercury is in a bicorporeal sign in [any of the] the angles, he will be a bigamist. The Luminaries in the terms of Jupiter, or Mercury in signs of many seeds,

¹ taking instabilitur from instabilio instead of the text's instalabitur.

² Cf. Genesis 12:10-20.

³ "to the superiors," = superioribus connectetur. The term superiors is a frequently used word signifying the planets and stars. We have here a reference to the Hellenistic worship of the stars in the manner of the astrolatry of the Harranian Sabians.

⁴ There is a word missing here. [RH]

⁵ A word is missing here. [RH]

and in bicornporeal signs. in the angles, always generate many [children]. And if Jupiter, Saturn and Mercury are occidental in angles in bicornporeal signs, there will be three: two female and one male; but if oriental, two male and one female. When the Moon, the Sun and Mercury are in signs of many seeds, with Jupiter being averse,' they make three monsters.²

The Moon in the terms of Mars kills the mother before the father, and the native remains poor. But if Mars is in the same sign, such a one advances in many things, and he will be a thief and a prince of thieves, a brigand, and he will go to foreign places, and having experienced cuts from swords, he will have wounds, and will die evilly.

When the Moon is in the terms of Venus, and Venus is in the same sign, the native will be swift and outstanding, and his name will reach the king or tyrant, and he will marry an appropriate woman. Some however, copulate with their own children or stepchildren. But if Venus is not [there], he will suffer evil, and will have foul words for women.

When the Moon is in the terms of Mercury, and Mercury is in the same sign, the native will have daring. He will have great honor on account of his prudence, and the ability to reason as a result of his own effort in all arts; and he becomes a captain, or head manager, or minister of kings or tyrants, or he becomes a scribe of sacred things. But if Mercury is not in the same sign, he will be a prudent, literate man, investigating many things, and having many benefits on account of his discretion; some indeed are placed over the soothsayers;³ he will grieve over his son having been injured. But if the lord of the terms, or the lord of the hour, are in the twelfth, he will be eaten by wild beasts.

XXXV. On the Virtue of the Triplicities and the Years of Life.

[Introduction by the Editor — The material contained in this section is quite unique and also presents several problems.

First of all it presents a system of monomoiria, that is, individual

¹ remoto. [RH]

² Cf. Tetrabiblos, Book III. 8 Robbins' trans. Loeb Classical Library, pp. 261 ff. Cf. Bonatti's Liber Astronomiae, Tractatus Decimus. De Nativitibus where monstrous births are dealt with as the first differentia.

³ verociniis.

degree rulerships, in this case based on triplicity rulerships. It is similar to the second of the two degree-rulership systems presented in Paulus Alexandrinus (see Paulus Alexandrinus, Chapter 32), but it is different in one respect. In the Paulus system the degree rulerships alternate according to whether the chart is day or night. In the system here the rulerships are the same both day and night and depend instead upon the sect of the triplicities. The first degree of any sign is ruled by the triplicity ruler that is of the same sect as the triplicity, followed by the ruler from the other sect. The third degree is ruled by the ruler of the next triplicity according to that triplicity's sect. The fourth is ruled by the other sect ruler of that triplicity, and so forth. No ruler is used twice, like the Paulus system. If the earth triplicity rulers come up first, then Venus is used with earth. If water comes up first, then Venus is used as a water ruler. For example in Leo, the first degree would be of the Sun, then Jupiter, these being the diurnal and nocturnal rulers, respectively of that triplicity. The next two degrees would be ruled by the Moon and Venus, the next two by Saturn and Mercury, and then a degree of Mars. The sequence then repeats to the end of Leo. The text shows the sequence clearly enough.

However, the real importance of this section is not that presents us with yet another system of monomoiria, but rather that the system is used to compute life expectancies based on the position and the periods of the rulers of the degrees. Here is where the problem arises. This is one section where it is clear that the translator from Greek to Latin, or some scribe or editor afterwards, did not understand the material. The evidence of this is that the parallel constructions in the various paragraphs are not very parallel. The differences appear to be due either to omissions in some of the paragraphs, or to a misunderstanding of the original Greek, or the translator's use of the Latin to translate Greek literally. Verbs in Latin such as invenire and pervenire, which in normal Latin have to do with being in a place or degree, appear to be derived from Greek verbs that could indicate possession or rulership.

In any case the preponderance of the passages indicate that we are seeing a system based on the rulership by monomoiria of the degree of the Part of Fortune. The ruler of that degree gives its planetary period to the life of the native according to wherever that ruler is, and its cosmic state in that position. However, the text is so fouled up that in many cases the Part of Fortune is not even referred to. Also there are many lacunae in the text, so that it is not going to be easy to figure the system by which the planetary periods of the planets are assigned, increased or diminished.

In any case, this passage should serve to show clearly how important the Part of Fortune was in ancient astrology. It was not the minor, misunderstood point that survives in modern astrology.]

*Aries, Leo, Sagittarius are the first triplicity, by day the Sun;
by night Jupiter.'*

If the Part of Fortune is found in the degree of the Sun,,which is in this triplicity, the first, eighth, fifteenth, twenty-second, twenty-ninth, and if he is found in the ascendant, or in the M.C, or in the eleventh from the ascendant, he will give one hundred and twenty years. In [the place of the] God, that is, in the ninth place, ninety-nine. In the twelfth, eighty. In the [place of the Goddess], i.e., the third, and in the fifth, and in the eighth, he will give fifty. In the second, or in the west, or in the sixth, nineteen. In the angle of the earth, likewise, nineteen. But if Mars should aspect the Sun by square or opposition, he takes away fifteen years. Always he is first observed who has sect, and afterwards, who is outside sect.²

When Jupiter is in this triplicity in the degree of the lord of the Part of Fortune, which [degrees] are the second, ninth, sixteenth, twenty-third, thirtieth, and [Jupiter] happens to be in the ascendant, as a morning star, oriental,³ and in [its] station in the ascendant, and in the eleventh, or in the [place of the] God as a morning star, oriental, he will give in the ascendant 79 years, in the west 52 [years and] 8 months. In

¹ It is interesting that only two rulers of the triplicity are given: one for the day and one for the night. No participating ruler is mentioned. This parallels Ptolemy's practice, not the Arabs'. [Additional by RH] However, unlike Ptolemy, the so-called water triplicity is ruled by Venus and Mars, not primarily Mars alone.

² This probably refers to the sequencing of the rulers of the degree according to the sects of the triplicities. [RH]

³ We have both polarities of morning versus evening star and oriental versus occidental in this chapter. Often in ancient astrology, these terms are used interchangeably. However, here the morning-evening star polarity is clearly solar phase, so that the oriental-occidental polarity usually relates to the quadrant in the houses. Houses 12, 11, and 10, and the opposite houses 6, 5, and 4 are oriental, and the rest, occidental. However, sometimes the author clearly uses oriental and occidental to refer to solar phase. However, in some cases when the house position is explicitly referred to, oriental and occidental indicate solar phase. Only the context allows us to distinguish. [RH]

the west, occidental 39 [years] 6 months. In the eleventh, oriental 79 years. In the west,¹ oriental 52 [years] 8 months. In the M.C, oriental 70 [years]. In the [place of the] God, oriental 79 [years]. In the west, as an evening star, [he gives] 52 [years and] 8 months.² In the eighth, oriental 70 [years] 6 months. In the eighth, occidental 12. In the west,³ or in the sixth 12. In the fifth, oriental 79, as an evening star 52 [and] 8 months. In the angle of the earth 39, and as an evening star, occidental 12. In the [place of the Goddess] 52 [years and] 8 months, occidental 39[2].⁴ In the [house] succedent to the horoscope, oriental 39[3], occidental, as an evening star 12. But if Mars should aspect by square or opposition he takes away 15 years.

When the Moon in this triplicity has the degree of the years of life⁵, which are the third, the tenth degree, the seventeenth, and the twenty-fourth, in the ascendant, increasing, by day [she gives] 58 years; by night 52, but very young,⁶ by day 25 years; by night 54. In the twelfth by day, full, 35 years; by night nothing, conjunct 29 days; by night nothing. In conjunction, by day 25 years, by night 24, very young 25 years, in conjunction 25 days, but at night, increasing 72 years, waning 54 years,

In conjunction 25 days, by night, increasing 72, waning 54. In conjunction 25. In the ninth, increasing by day 54, waning 29, in conjunction, by day 25, on the ecliptic, increasing 25, waning, by day 26 hours, increasing, by night 72⁷, waning 54, but on the ecliptic, increasing 29, waning, by day 35 months. For example, first, see in any triplicity wherever the Moon is located, its configurations according to latitude of exaltation;⁸ the lowest [place] indeed shows half of [its] years.

¹ In Hesperio.

² This information is duplicated from above.

³ taking the text's occidente as occidente.

⁴ The numbers in [] are in the text. We assume that these are variant readings. [RH]

⁵ This is probably a reference to the degree of Part of Fortune being the determinant of the years of life. [RH]

⁶ minima.

⁷ hours? The text is not clear. [RH]

⁸ This does not refer to exaltations in the technical sense, but to the elevation of the Moon above the ecliptic. Literally, latitude means breadth or quantity of width as opposed to longitude which originally meant length. Exaltation simply meant elevation. The phrase therefore means simply that one should look at how northerly the latitude of the Moon may be. [RH]

Let the year be in Aries' in the eighth place: by day indeed, [with the Moon] increasing she gives 25 years, waning 25 months, increasing, on the ecliptic, by day indeed 25 hours, but by night 54, waning 25 days. With these things being thus, if Saturn should aspect² by a square or opposition, he makes the natives without years. In the west, by day increasing 25 years, waning 25 months, on the ecliptic, increasing, by day 25 months, waning 25 days. But by night, increasing 54 years, waning 25. In the sixth, by day, increasing 25, waning 25 days, on the ecliptic she [gives] 25 days. In the fifth, by day, increasing 25 years, waning 25 days. In the angle of the earth, increasing, by day 30 years, waning 20, on the ecliptic, increasing 25 months, waning 25 days. The same again by night, on the ecliptic. In the third, by day, increasing 72 years, waning 54, by night and on the ecliptic, the same. In [the house] following the horoscope, by day, increasing 25 months, waning, in the same place 25 days, on the ecliptic, by day and night 25 hours. Saturn squaring [or] opposing takes away 30 years; but if they are fewer, he takes away all of them.

Venus located³ in the triplicity of the Sun or Jupiter, namely in the fourth degree, the eleventh, the eighteenth, [or] the twenty-fifth, if she is in the ascendant, by day, oriental, will give 54 years, as an evening star⁴ occidental or retrograde 41, as a morning star.⁵ occidental 8 years. In the eleventh, by day, as a morning star, oriental 54 years, as an evening star, occidental 41 years, as a morning star, occidental, by day 8 days or months. In the M.C. as a morning star, oriental 54, as an evening star, occidental 41, as a morning star, occidental 8. In the ninth as a morning star, oriental, by day 54 years, as an evening star, occidental 41, as a morning star, occidental 8. In the eighth as a morning star, oriental [Gundel indicates that the numbers have been cut out], as an evening star, occidental 2, as a morning star, occidental 8 months. In the seventh, oriental 41, occidental 8. In the sixth as a

¹ by profection. [RH]

² irradiaverit. This verb is clearly equivalent to the Greek aktineboleō, which means "to cast rays." This refers to an aspect which is cast against the order of the signs. [RH]

³ This suggests that Venus' location is the subject being discussed, not the degree of the Part of Fortune. This is an example of the ambiguity in the Latin, mentioned above. [RH]

⁴ hesperia. Note the attention paid to Venus' phase to the Sun. The same holds true of the author's handling of Mercury, morning star 8, as an evening star, occidental 2, as a morning star, occidental 8 months. In the fifth as a morning star, oriental 54, as an evening star, occidental 41, as a morning star, occidental 8. In the angle of the earth, as a morning star, oriental 8, as an evening star, occidental 8 months. as a morning star, occidental 8 days. In the third as a morning star, oriental 41, as an evening star, occidental 8 months. In the west as a morning star 8 months. In the second as a morning star, oriental 48 years, as an evening star, occidental 8 months, as a morning star, occidental [something is missing from original]; Saturn however, square or opposing takes away 30 years from the total or all if the total is less than 30.

⁵ eoā.

Saturn in the same triplicity of the Sun or Jupiter, [and] in the sign (or terms, as has been written above,)¹ of the Part of Fortune, whose degrees are these: of Aries, Leo and Sagittarius, the fifth, twelfth, nineteenth, twenty-sixth, in the ascendant will give 57 years, in the opposition of the Sun 38 years, in the west 30 years, in the [place] succedent to the horoscope 19 years, occidental 19 months. In the [place of the] Goddess, opposed, oriental 38 years, in opposition of the Sun 30, occidental 19 months, in the angle of the earth, oriental 30, in opposition of the Sun 19, occidental, 19 months. In the fifth 57 years, in opposition of the Sun 38, occidental 30. In the sixth 19, in opposition of the Sun 19 months, occidental 19 days. In the west 30, in the opposition of the Sun 19, occidental 19 months. In the eighth 30, in the opposition of the Sun 19, occidental 19 months. In the ninth, oriental 38, in the opposition of the Sun 30, occidental 19. In the M.C. and in the eleventh, just as the ascendant. In the twelfth 38. In the opposition of the Sun 30, occidental 19. But if Mars should appear from the square or opposition, he takes away 19 years from the total, less [than 19, he takes away] the whole, because they become without years.

Mercury in the triplicity of the Sun, and Jupiter receiving the power of the degree of the Part—it holds the degree of the sixth, the thirteenth, twentieth, twenty-seventh—in the horoscope, oriental as a morning star or occidental, will give 76 years, occidental, as an evening star 8 months, occidental, as a morning star 38. In the twelfth, oriental, as a morning star, or as an evening star, oriental, 5 years 8 months, as an evening star occidental, 38, as a morning star, occidental 30. In the eleventh, 76, likewise in the same 50 [years and] 8 months, in the west 34, in the M.C. 76, in the same 50, occidental 38.¹ In the ninth as a morning star or as an evening star, oriental 50 [years] 8 months, occidental, as an evening star 20, as a morning star, occidental 8 months. In the west as a morning star or an evening star, oriental 38, as a morning or as an evening star, occidental 8 months. In the sixth as a morning star or as an evening star, oriental 38, as an evening star, occidental 20, as a morning star, oriental 20 months. In the fifth as a morning star or as an evening star, oriental 76, as an evening star, occidental 50 [and] 8 months, as a morning star, occidental 30. In the angle of the earth as a morning star or as an evening star, oriental 58, as an evening star, occidental 20, as a morning star, oriental 20 months. In the third as a morning star or as an evening star, oriental 50 [years and] 8 months, as an evening star, occidental 38, as a morning star, occidental 20. In the second as a morning star or as an evening star, oriental 20, as an evening star 20 months, as a morning star, occidental 20 days. But if Mars should aspect by trine or square or by opposition, he takes away 15 years from the total.

¹ I think the words inside the parentheses are interpolated. The words, "in the degree of are missing. These missing words should precede "of the Part of Fortune" in the text.

When Mars is found in the triplicity of the Sun and Jupiter, and is located in the degree of the Part of Fortune: it has in Aries, Leo and Sagittarius, the seventh degree, the fourteenth, the twenty-first, the twenty-eighth, [there is a lacuna in the text here] and is in the ascendant as an evening star, oriental, he will give 54, as a morning star 22, occidental 15. In the twelfth, oriental, as an evening star 22, as a morning star 15, occidental 15. In the eleventh as an evening star, oriental 44, as a morning star 20, occidental 22. In the M.C. as an evening star, oriental 44, as a morning star 20, oriental 15. In the ninth oriental, as an evening star 44, as a morning star 22, occidental 15. In the eighth, as an evening star 22, as a morning star 15, occidental 15 months. In the eighth, as an evening star 22, as a morning star 15, occidental 15 months.² In the seventh, as an evening star, oriental [there is a lacuna in the text]. In the sixth, just as in the [place] following the horoscope, in the fifth, just as in the M.C., and in the fourth, just as in the sixth. In the third, as an evening star, oriental 44, as a morning star 15, occidental 15. In the second, as an evening star, oriental 15, as a morning star 15 months, occidental 15 hours or days.

¹ This sentence is rather garbled in the original. [RH]

² This sentence is duplicated in the original.

Saturn aspecting¹ by square or opposition takes away 30 years.

On Taurus, virgo, and Capricorn; the second triplicity, by day Venus, by night the Moon.

When the Moon arrives² in this triplicity in the degree of the Part of Fortune, which are the first, the eighth, the fifteenth, the twenty-second and the twenty-ninth, and if it is in the ascendant, full, [she] gives 108 years, on the ecliptic 72, very young³ in light and increasing in latitude 54, waning in light and latitude 25 years. In the second, increasing 54 years, waning on the ecliptic and increasing in latitude 25. In the third, just as in the ascendant. Full, in the angle of the earth 54, waning, on the ecliptic and increasing⁴ in latitude 25, waning in latitude and light 25. In the fifth, just as in the ascendant; in the sixth, just as in the second, and likewise in the seventh. In the eighth, increasing in light, and in latitude 72, on the ecliptic 54. In the ninth, just as in the second. In the tenth and in the eleventh, just as in the ascendant. In the twelfth, increasing in light and latitude 72, in the ecliptic, with fading light 25.

Venus allotted the degree of the Part of Fortune in the same triplicity of Taurus, Virgo and Capricorn which degrees are: the second, ninth, sixteenth, twenty-third and thirtieth, when she is in the ascendant, oriental or occidental, [she] will give 82 years, as an evening star 54, as an evening star, occidental 44. She does the same in the eleventh, in the fifth and in the M.C. But in the twelfth, and in the second, or in the angle of the earth, as a morning star, oriental 54, as an evening star, oriental 20, as a morning star, occidental 8. In the west, in the eighth and in the sixth you may understand similarly. In the third, and in the ninth, just as in the ascendant. Saturn [aspecting] from the opposition or the square takes away from the major years 30 [There is a lacuna here].

Saturn in this triplicity has the [following] degrees: the third, tenth, seventeenth, and twenty-fourth. When he is in the ascendant, or in the

¹ aspiciens.

² pervenit. 'Arrives' is the correct translation of the word in conventional Latin. However, we suspect that the pervenio is being used to translate a Greek verb that denotes possession or rulership rather than location. [RH]

³ minima.

⁴ agens.

M.C, or in the eleventh, or in the fifth, or ninth, or in the third, oriental, he gives 38 years, as a morning star 30, occidental 19; but in the twelfth, second, in the angle of the earth, in the west and in the eighth, as a morning star, oriental 30, as an evening star 19, as a morning star, occidental 19 months. In the sixth, however, oriental 19, as a morning star 19 months, as an evening star 19 days. Mars by square or opposition takes away 15 years.

Mercury in this triplicity has the fourth degree, the eleventh, the eighteenth, and the twenty-fifth. When he is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, third, in the angle of the earth, or in the west, he will give, as a morning star, indeed 50 years 8 months, as an evening star 30, as a morning star, occidental 20. In the fifth, as a morning star 76, as an evening star 50 years 8 months, as a morning star, occidental 38. In the second, as a morning star 20, as an evening star 20 months, as a morning star, occidental 20 days. In the sixth or twelfth, as a morning star 38 years, as an evening star 20 months, as a morning star, occidental 20 days. In the eighth, as a morning star 28, as an evening star 20 months, as a morning star, occidental 20 days. Mars by square or opposition takes away from the major [years], 15 years.

Mars in this triplicity has the fifth degree, the twelfth, the nineteenth, and the twenty-sixth. When he is in the ascendant, M.C, the eleventh, the fifth, or the ninth as a morning star, he will give 66 years, as an evening star 41, occidental, 22. In the twelfth or the sixth, seventh, eighth, third or second, oriental. 44, as an evening star, 22, occidental, 15. In the angle of the earth, as a morning star 11; as an evening star, 4 months, occidental 4 [months and] 15 days. Saturn from the square or opposition takes away from the sum 30.

When the Sun is found¹ in the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the sixth, thirteenth, twentieth, twenty-seventh, and is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth or eighth, he will give 60 years, in the eleventh 40, but in the remaining places 19. Mars, by opposition or square takes away 15 years.

If Jupiter shall have the dominion of the Part in this triplicity, it has the seventh degree, the fourteenth, the twenty-first, and the twenty-eighth, and if he is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, third, ninth or fifth, as a morning star he will give 52 years 8 months, as an evening star 39,

¹ Not literally in the degree of the Part of Fortune. but ruling the degree of the Part of Fortune [RH]

occidental 12 years. In the west, or in the eighth, or in the angle of the earth, as a morning star indeed 39, as an evening star 12. In the second or sixth, as a morning star 12 years, as an evening star 12, occidental 12 days [or] 12 hours. In the twelfth, as a morning star 29, as an evening star 12 months. occidental 12 days. Mars, by opposition or square takes away 15 years.

On the. third triplicity of Gemini, Libra, Aquarius, by day Saturn, by night Mercury.

When Saturn is in the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which¹ are the eighth, fifteenth, twenty-second, twenty-ninth, and is found in the ascendant, M.C, ninth, eleventh, or fifth, as a morning star indeed he will give 57 years, as an evening star 38, occidental 30. In the twelfth indeed, as a morning star 36, as an evening star 30, occidental 19. In the seventh, the angle of the earth, the eighth, the sixth or the second, as a morning star 38, as an evening star 30, occidental 19. Mars squaring or opposing takes away 15 years.

When Mercury is in this triplicity in the degrees² of the Part of Fortune which are the second, ninth, sixteenth, twenty-third, and thirtieth, and he is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, third, or in the fifth as a morning star, oriental 76, as an evening star 50 [and] 8 months, as a morning star, occidental 38. But in the remaining places as a morning star 50, as an evening star, occidental 38, as a morning star, oriental 20. Mars, by opposition or square takes away 15 years.

When Mars is in this triplicity in the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the third, tenth, seventeenth, and twenty-fourth, and when he is found in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, third, or in the fifth, as a morning star, oriental 44, as an evening star 22, occidental 15. But in the remaining places as a morning star 22, as an evening star 15, occidental 15 [years] 8 months.³ Saturn, by opposition or square, or when he is in the second, takes away 15 years, as an evening star 15 months and 15 days.

¹ Saturn's degrees, that is. [RH]

² From here on, wherever the text refers to planets "being" in the degree of or anything similar, it should be taken as referring to rulership, not occupancy. Otherwise none of this makes any sense. [RH]

³ The Latin text is bit ambiguous about what time unit the numbers refer to. [RH]

When Venus is in the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the fourth, eleventh, eighteenth, and twenty-fifth, and she is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, third, or in the fifth as a morning star, oriental, she will give 14 years. Similarly as a morning star, occidental, or as an evening star, occidental 41 [and] 8 days. But in the remaining places as a morning star indeed 41 years, as an evening star, oriental 8, as an evening star, occidental 8 months. But in the second, as a morning star 8 [years], as an evening star, occidental 8 months 8 days. Saturn, by opposition or square, takes away 30 years.

When the Sun is in this triplicity allotted the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the fifth, twelfth, nineteenth and twenty-sixth, [and] when it is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, twelfth, fifth, eighth and third will give 80 years, in the sixth, fourth, or seventh, 40, in the second 15. Mars, by opposition or square takes away 15 years.

Jupiter in this triplicity allotted the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the sixth, thirteenth, twentieth, twenty-seventh, [and] when he is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, as a morning star, oriental, he will give 79 years, as an evening star 53 [and] 30 months, occidental 39. But in the west, the eighth or the twelfth, as a morning star 52, as an evening star 39, occidental 12. In the third or fifth, as a morning star 54, as an evening star 25, occidental 25. In the second, fourth or sixth, as a morning star 25, as an evening star 25 months, occidental 25 days. Saturn, by opposition or square, takes away 30 years.

On the fourth triplicity, namely Cancer, Scorpio, and Pisces, by Day Venus, and by night Mars.

Mars in this triplicity allotted the degree of the Part of Fortune, which [degrees] are the first, eighth, fifteenth, twenty-second, and twenty-ninth, [and] when he is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, third, or in the fourth, oriental or retrograde, he will give 66 years, as an evening star 44, as an evening star oriental 22. But in the remaining places as a morning star indeed 44 years, as an evening star, oriental 15. Saturn, by opposition or square, takes away 30 years.

When Venus in this triplicity is in the degree of the Part of Fortune,¹ which [degrees] are the second, ninth, sixteenth, twenty-third, and thirtieth, [and] when it is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, third, or in the fifth, oriental or retrograde, she will give 82 years, occidental 54 [years] 8 months, as a morning star, occidental 41. But in the remaining places oriental or retrograde 54 [years] 8 months, as an evening star 41, as a morning star, occidental 8. Saturn, by opposition or square, takes away 30 years.

¹ Here again despite what the text seems to say, this is clearly Venus having rulership in the degree of the part, not being in the degree of the part. [RH]

When the Sun is in this triplicity and is in the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the thirteenth, seventeenth, and twenty-fourth, [and] when it is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, or the ninth, he will give 60 years. In the twelfth or the eighth, 40. But in the remaining places 19. Mars, by opposition or square takes away 15 years.

Jupiter in this triplicity, when he is in the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the fourth, eleventh, eighteenth, twenty-fifth, [and] when he is in the ascendant. M.C, eleventh, ninth, third or fifth oriental, he will give 52 [years] 8 months, occidental 39, as an evening star 12. In the west or in the angle of the earth, the eighth or the twelfth, oriental 39, occidental 12, as an evening star 12 months or days. In the second or sixth, oriental 12, occidental 12 months, as an evening star 12 days. Mars, by opposition or square takes away [15] years.

When the Moon in this triplicity, is in the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the fifth, twelfth, nineteenth, or twenty-sixth, and she is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, fifth, ninth, or third, increasing in light and latitude, she will give one hundred eight¹ completed years, but waning and increasing in latitude 72 years, very young in light and increasing in light 54, very young both in light and in latitude 25. But in the west, and in an angle, or in the sixth or second, increasing in light and latitude 54, but very young in light and latitude, increasing 25, very young however in light and latitude 25 months. Saturn, by opposition or square, takes away 30 years.

Saturn in this triplicity, when he is in the degrees of the Part of Fortune, which are the sixth, thirteenth, twentieth, twenty-seventh, [and] when he is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, third or fifth, he will give as a morning star 38 years, as an evening star, occidental 30, as an evening star 19. But in the remaining places, as a morning star 38, as an evening star, occidental 19, as an evening star 19. Mars, by opposition or square takes away 15 years.

¹ The number is written out here. [RH]

Mercury allotted the degree of the Part of Fortune in this triplicity, which are the [following] degrees: seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, or twenty-eighth, and when he is in the ascendant, M.C, eleventh, ninth, third or fifth, he will give as a morning star, oriental, 46 completed years, as an evening star, oriental 40 [years and] 8 months, as an evening star, occidental 38, as a morning star, occidental, 20. But in the west, or the eighth, or the sixth, or in the angle of the earth, or the twelfth, as a morning star 40 [years] 8 months, as an evening star 38, occidental 20, as a morning star, occidental 20 months. But in the second as a morning star 20, as an evening star 20 months, as an evening star, occidental 20 days, as a morning star, occidental 20 hours. Mars, by opposition or square, takes away 15 years and if there are fewer he takes all.

XXXVI. On Biothanati, i.e., On Suffering Violent Death.

When the Moon is in one of the angles or [a place] succeeding an angle, with Saturn in the same sign, [or] occupying a succeeding sign, or aspecting the Sun, it causes biothanatos. More certainly indeed, if likewise it should aspect the Moon with configuration of whatever kind, with Mars in one of the angles, and the Moon following the same angle, especially with Jupiter alienated¹ from them, or happening to be under the rays, or with Saturn holding the angles, or the succedent places, or aspecting the Sun with any aspect whatever, it causes biothanatos. Mars in an angle, or a succedent [place] elevated above the Moon by square or opposition, with none of the benevolent [planets] supporting² [causes] biothanatos; the deaths happen according to the natures of the signs; in signs of human likeness they die by robbers and fights, in earthy signs in desert places, or they are involved in various adversities, in watery [signs] from humid troubles, in fixed signs from falls from heights, in fiery signs from iron or from cautery, in humid signs from rottenness, or corruption, or consumption, or dropsy, or elephantiasis,

¹ alienate. It is not completely clear what kind of relationship this is. Is it aversion, or something else? [RH]

² suscipiente. This word also has the sense or "receiving" at times. I am taking its primary meaning here, as "supporting," since it is not clear that reception as opposed to any kind of support, e.g., aspect, reception, antiscia. etc. is meant.

or by black bile, or by loss of blood, or by the lungs, or from diseases.

Mars in one of the angles, or in the succedent [places], or setting, and Saturn occupying a contrary place, even if it is in the west, shows dangers and they cause biothanatos, especially if Mars is elevated or co-existing;¹ but the death will be according to the nature of the sign. But if Mercury should be connected with either of them, and should aspect the Moon by a square or opposition, wherever it is, whether in the second or the eighth, they make them counterfeiterers, or poisoners, or false managers of the king's monies, for which reason they are violently killed. Saturn in the eleventh or in the fifth, aspected² by Mercury by opposition, square or conjunction, or, if Mars is opposed, or should aspect by a square in Saturnian signs, the Moon being in an angle or succedent [place], they cause biothanatos. But if Jupiter should aspect³ or be conjunct them, these, having been accused on account of this sort of thing, will be freed. The Moon aspected⁴ by square or opposition from Saturn and Mars, in an angle, or conjunct them, with one of the two malevolent [planets] having been elevated above Mercury by square or opposition in one of the angles or succedent places, they become biothanati. But if the Sun should aspect, they are made worse. With the Sun aspected⁵ as was said above, from Saturn and Mars with the same aspects, the biothanati are made worse, especially if he should aspect⁶ the Moon or Mercury. The Moon in the west, and Saturn or Mars in the ascendant, either of the malevolent [planets] being under the earth, they become biothanati. The Moon in the west, and Saturn or Mars in the ascendant, either of the malevolent [planets] happening to be in the angle of the earth, they become biothanati, especially if they should aspect⁷ the Moon or Mercury.

With the Sun being in an aquatic sign, with Mars being with the Moon in the same place, or in fortunate angles with Saturn aspecting⁸ the horoscope by square or opposition, they become biothanati. These indeed are killed in a watery manner, having been suffocated. With

¹ I take this to mean "conjunct."

² spectatus

³ aspexerit.

⁴ inspecta.

⁵ Sole inspecta.

⁶ aspexerit

⁷ aspexerint.

⁸ inspiciente.

Saturn and the Moon in the west at the same time, and with no benevolent happening to be in the angles, the death happens on account of the flux of blood. But if a benevolent [planet] should happen to be in some angle, these, having experienced medicinal exercise, are healed. Mars and the Moon at the same time in the west show deaths by hemorrhage;¹ universally however when a malevolent [planet] is in the west, outside sect, hemorrhages and hemorrhoids; for some they cause lesions caused by the cut of iron. If any of them are lord of the ascendant or with a benevolent [planet] aspecting the Part,² having been cut they are healed.

Saturn and Mars at the same time in the west with either light prohibiting the testimony, having been cut they die. With Mars, [being] with Mercury in the angle of the earth, in the west, they become biothanati, accused of homicide; however some become killers of their parents or fratricides.

The Moon and Saturn in the ninth, and the Sun and Mercury in the third become sacrileges and biothanati.

With Saturn, Mars, the Sun and Mercury in the third without Jupiter they become biothanati.

Saturn and Mars in the twelfth, and the Moon in the sixth and the Sun in the ascendant, they make weak slaves and biothanatos. If any of them are lord of the Part of Fortune or the ascendant, with Mars in the ascendant, the Moon in the M.C. and Saturn occupying a succedent³ [place], they make biothanatos.

With Mars in an angle, and aspected⁴ by Saturn by a square, whosoever of them is with the Moon, or should aspect⁵ her with an opposition or a square, it makes biothanatos.

Saturn and Mars in the eleventh or in the fifth, and the Moon with Mercury in the eighth, and the Sun in the west make biothanatos.

Mars in an angle and aspected⁶ by Saturn by a trine, while each of ¹ taking hæmorrhagias mortes for the text's hæmorrhoides mortes. The latter would mean death by hemorrhoids. Perhaps this is Hermetic humor.

² Presumably the Part of Fortune. [RH]

³ or, "the following [place]."

⁴ inspecto.

⁵ aspekerit. Again, the Greek author (or the Latin translator), after using inspicio several times to indicate hostile aspects, switches to aspecto for no apparent purpose.

⁶ inspectus. Here again, inspectus is used in connection with a favorable aspect.

them is with the Moon, or shall aspect' her by square or opposition, it makes biothanatos.

Saturn in the M.C., and the Sun in the west, and the Moon with Mars in the eighth, they make biothanatos, even if Saturn may be in some other angle. Always if one of the malevolent [planets] is in the eleventh but the other in the fifth, or one of them should aspect the Moon by opposition or square or be with her, moreover, especially with Mercury having been aspected by either of them, they make furious epileptics and biothanatos. Saturn in the Part of Fortune,² and Mars in the Part of the Daemon make the figure worse, indeed they become epileptics and biothanatos.

But if Saturn is in the place of the Daemon, but Mars [is] in the place of the Part of Fortune, they make a more human figure.

Mars with the Sun in the superior part of the heavens³ (which indeed)⁴ is the summer [portion],⁵ and the Moon in the M.C. makes maniacs and biothanatos, especially if one of them is the lord of the Part of Fortune or the ascendant.

Saturn and Mars being above the Part of Cupid,⁶ and if they should aspect Venus in an angle, they cause death by gonorrhea.⁷

But if they should aspect the Moon, the natives die as lunatics. But if Jupiter should aspect, the aforesaid patients are freed from death.

With Saturn and Mars in the ascendant, and the Moon in a succedent [place], suffering an injury to their sight, they die violently.

The Sun and the Moon in the ascendant and Saturn and Mars, or Saturn or Mars in the second, losing light, they die violently.

¹ aspexerit.

² This means in the house or sign of, as well as the degree of, the Part of Fortune. [RH]

³ in supenore portione poll. It is interesting that, by a certain astronomical synecdoche, the "pole" should be used to refer to the heavens. This shows not only a geometrical consciousness on the part of the author but even a familiarity with poetic and rhetorical tropes.

⁴ The parentheses are in the edited Latin text. [RH]

⁵ So-called because in the Northern Hemisphere the diurnal semi-circle traced by the Sun is higher in the southern sky in the summer than in the winter.

⁶ According to Paulus, the Part of Cupid, or Lot or Eros is as follows:

Part = Asc. + Venus - Part of Spirit [Daemon] — by day.

Part = Asc. + Part of Spirit [Daemon] - Venus — by night.

There are other variants. [RH]

⁷ Did gonorrhea kill people back then?

The Moon and Mars in the ascendant, and the Sun with Saturn in the angle of the earth, falling down with spasms and manias, they die violently.

The Sun and the Moon in angles, and if Saturn and Mars aspect¹ the angles by opposition, they make biothanatos.

Mars in the ascendant, with the Moon being Full, and Saturn in the angle of the earth, they make those who rave and die violently.

Mars and the Moon in the twelfth, although the Sun is succedent with Saturn, make biothanatos; but some not yet exiting from their mother's womb are killed as embryotomies or by a like death, especially when they [i.e., Mars and Moon] are located in the same sign.

The Moon above the earth in an angle with Saturn, and Mars being adverse, indeed one of them being in the ascendant, makes biothanatos; or indeed they are born from a height (or they) commit suicide; but the death happens according to the nature of the ones being adverse, and the mutation of the sign.

Mars in the ascendant, and the Moon in the part of the superior heaven,² which is the summer [part], but Mars, if it falls in its own sign with Venus and Mercury also with Saturn or Mars having a hostile encounter³ or aspect of the Moon, makes biothanatos. These, indeed, are eaten by wild beasts or are connected to various [kinds of] violent deaths.

The Moon in the M.C. in the aspect of Saturn from an angle, being outside of sect, and she increasing, makes biothanatos; especially it causes death in humid [places], or on account of humid things, or by suffocations.

The Moon in the west with Saturn arriving in the west before her, when either of them are the lord of the Part [of Fortune], or of the ascendant, they become dysenteric, and in this way they are killed,

The Moon in the ascendant, and Saturn and Mercury in the west [makes] those who are stupid and insipid; but if Mars is in any of the angles, it makes fallen men [and] biothanatos.

The Sun opposite Saturn, either in the ninth or the third, makes those set above great things, or offices or businesses; but having ¹ aspiciunt.

² in portione superioris poll.

³ obviationem. [RH]

acquired it themselves, they lose everything, and have the experience of the condemned and of suffering, wrongly deviating in their travel; but it shows the violent death of some of them, and that the parents or brothers are vulnerable.

Saturn or Mars associated with Mercury, and the Moon aspecting¹ by opposition or square or by conjunction, shows sacrilegious men, homicides, liars, forgers, violently killed.

Saturn and Mercury in the angle of the earth, and the Sun conjunct with them, they are killed by dangers and accusations due to things which cannot be spoken of, or [because of] state matters, or by false letters, or false use of the king's monies. But if Mars is present or aspects by opposition,² it makes condemned robbers, fugitives and homicides. If however Jupiter should aspect them above the angles, by suffering for some time, they cause the solution of evils, and achieve at last great powers and glories. But if the Moon should happen to be in one of the angles, or in a succedent [place], they die evilly or violently.

Saturn and Mercury in the twelfth at the same time, or in the sixth, they are set over useless calculations and they will be vile in the things which they do

Saturn and Mercury in the twelfth, or in the sixth, and Mars opposed or squaring make malignant perjurers, thieves, forgers, trained traitors and those of (his ilk. Some moreover become such on account of convicts and slaves in accusations or imprisonments, and they are changed by serving time, especially if the Moon should aspect.

Saturn in the second or in the eighth, and the Moon in any of the succedent [places], and Venus happening to be in the west, or in the twelfth, and Mars in the west, makes biothanatos, [and those who are] lame and injured in every way. Mars with the Sun, or as a morning star, oriental, or morning star, occidental, and Saturn opposed or square to these above the angles, and the Moon meeting³ Mars, increasing in number, [makes] those detained by manias or epilepsies; they die violently. And the same even if Saturn should happen to be in succedent [places]. But if Mercury is conjunct without the aspect of a benevolent [planet], either he will drown in the waters, or he is killed by being thrown from a height

¹ aspiciens per oppositum vel quadratum.

² aspiciat per oppositum.

³ obvians.

The Moon and Mercury likewise in the ninth, or in the third, or mutually opposed with the horoscope in Aries or Scorpio, Mars in the twelfth or the sixth, and Saturn in the west, causes biothanatos. These indeed, having been offered in sacred rites, die by a fall, or from being thrown from a height.¹

Mars, the Sun and Mercury in the third or the ninth, any of them ruling the Part of Fortune or the Dæmon, or being in the ascendant, makes epileptics.

But if there is one of them which rules the hour, these things are not done manifestly, but they are secretly killed; they are made impious and without God. But if it is conjunct the Moon, [or] in opposition to or square her, they are sacrilegious and die violently. But if Jupiter and Venus are present with them, they make priests, or prophets, or sacrists,² who die violently.

The Moon and Mars, at the same time in the west, if Mars precedes the Moon, and Saturn [is] with Mercury in the angle of the earth, they cause biothanatos according to the nature of the signs. In the tropics and in the humid signs, [they die] from water, or dropsy, or humid substances, but in bicorporeal signs and fixed signs they produce epilepsies and they die violently. But if Jupiter or Venus is present, they cease from the epilepsy.

The Moon and the Sun in the sixth or the twelfth from the horoscope, and Saturn, Mars, and Mercury in angles, men become dogs or are eaten by dogs.³

XXXVII. On the Death of the Brothers.⁴

... in the M.C, the fourth, or the first, or the seventh. It is necessary and infallible to respond to those asking concerning the quantity of the brothers or sons or wives, and to tell the number of the brothers or sons or wives, or to tell some number of the brothers such as thirteen or sixteen, or the wives e.g. ten or nine or more, and it is fitting that you

¹ The ancients were fond of sacrificing by throwing the victim, occasionally human, from a height, from the roofs of temples, into volcanoes, off cliffs and into sink holes.

² An official charge with the custody and care of sacred vessels, vestments, etc.

³ This same curious combination occurs in Antiochus, Part II, chapter 5. [RH]

⁴ This chapter is incomplete. It is made up from some notes Gundel found appended at the end of the work.

see [this].

If the lord of the Part of the Father¹ is found opposed to its own place, namely, where the Part of the Father falls, you may say that the native is substituted² or a bastard.

If Saturn first casts rays on the Part of the Father, both by aspect and by transit and by conjunction, the father dies first, but if the Part of the Mother,³ the mother. whichever of the parents a malevolent [planet] should aspect, you may say that one dies first.

¹ See Part I of the Liber Hermetis, p. 60, note 7. [RH]

² i.e., supposititious.

³ See previous note. [RH]

The Arbatel de Magia Veterum first appeared in Latin in 1575. It is mentioned by John Dee in his Mysteriorum Libri. A.E. Waite classified it as a 'ritual of transcendental magic' i.e. free from 'dangerous instruction which makes for open Black Magic.' (BCM p. 28.) In 1655 it was translated into English by Robert Turner. Diagram on title page did not appear in Turner's edition, but is here supplied from edition of Andreas Luppius, Wesel, 1686. - JHP

אֲרַבַּתֵּל

Of the Magic of the Ancients,

The greatest Studie of Wisdom.

*In all things, ask counsel of the Lord;
and do not thou think, speak, or do any thing, wherein God is not thy counsellor.*

Proverbs 11.

He that walketh fraudulently, revealeth secrets: but he that is of a faithful spirit, concealeth the matter.

ARBATEL of MAGICK:

or,

The spiritual Wisdom of the Ancients, as well Wise-men of the people of God, as MAGI of the Gentiles: for the illustration of the glory of God, and his love to Mankinde.

Now first of all produced out of darkness into the light, against all caco-Magicians, and contemners of the gifts of God; for the profit and delectation of all those, who do truely and piously love the creatures of God, and do use them with thanksgiving, to the honour of God, and profit of themselves and their neighbours.

Arbatel of Magic

Translated into English by Robert Turner,

London 1655.

The PREFACE

To the unprejudiced Reader

As the fall of man made himself and all other creatures subject to vanity; so, by reason thereof, the most noble and excellent Arts wherewith the Rational soul was indued, are by the rusty canker of Time brought unto Corruption. For Magick itself, which the ancients did so divinely contemplate, is scandalized with bearing the badge of all diabolical sorceries: which Art (saith Mirandula) Pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt, & sicut canes ignotos semper allatrant: Few understood, many reprehend, and as dogges barke at those they know not: so doe many condemn and hate the things they understand not. Many men there are, that abhor the very name and word Magus, because of Simon Magus, who being not Magus, but Goes, that is, familiar with evil Spirits, usurped that Title. But Magicke and Witchcraft are far differing Sciences; whereof *Pliny being ignorant, scoffeth thereat: for Nero (saith Pliny) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent to him by Tyridates king of Armenia, who held that kingdom by him, found the Art after long study and labour altogether ridiculous. Now Witchcraft and Sorcery, are works done merely by the devil, which with respect unto some covenant made with man, he acteth by men his instruments, to accomplish his evil ends: of these, the histories of all ages, people and countries, as also the holy Scriptures, afford us sundry examples.

[* Plin. lib. 30. Nat. Hist.]

But Magus is a Persian word primitively, whereby is expressed such a one as is altogether conversant in things divine; as Plato affirmeth, the Art of Magick is the art of worshipping God: and the Persians call their gods Maj, hence Apollonius saith, that Magus is either Magus or Magus, that is, that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a god by nature, & sometimes of him that is in the service of God: in which latter sense it is taken in Matt., 2.1,2. when the wise men came to worship Jesus, and this is the first and highest kind, which is called divine Magick; and these the Latins did entitle sapientes, or wise men: for the feare and worship of God, is the beginning of knowledge. These wise men the Greeks call Philosophers; and amongst the Egyptians they were termed Priests; the Hebrews termed them Cabalistos, Prophets, Scribes and Pharisees; and amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Caldeans; & by the Persians they were called Magicians: and one speaking of Sosthenes, one of the ancient Magicians, useth these words: Et verum Deum merita maiestate prosequitur, & angelos ministros Dei, sed veri ejus venerationi novit assistere; idem dæmonas prodit terrenos, Vagos, humanitatis inimicos; Sosthenes ascribeth the due Majesty to the true God, & acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God; he also hath delivered, that there are devils earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankind.

So that the word Magus of itself imports a Contemplator of divine & heavenly Sciences; but under the name Magick, are all unlawful Arts comprehended; as Necromancy and Witchcraft, and such Arts which are effected by combination with the devil, and whereof he is a party.

These Witches and Necromancers are also called Malefici or venefici; sorcerers or poisoners; of which names witches are rightly called, who without the Art of Magick do indeed use the help of the devil himself to do mischief; practising to mix the powder of dead bodies with other things by the help of the devil prepared; and at other times to make pictures of wax, clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things which the devil by other means bringeth to pass. Such were, and to this day partly, if not altogether, are the corruptions which have made odious the very name of Magick, having chiefly sought, as the manner of all impostures is, to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it.

A second kind of Magick is Astrologie, which judgeth of the events of things to come, natural and humane, by the motions and influences of the stars upon the lower elements, by them observed and understood.

Philo Judaeus affirmeth, that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Stars and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God while he lived in Caldea, Qui Contemplatione Creaturarum, cognovit Creatorem (saith Damascen) who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetic and Astronomy; who before Abraham's coming unto them, knew none of these Sciences.

Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus, primum Caldæos, deinde Phoenices, demum Egyptios Sacerdotes, Astrologia & Divina docuerit. Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Caldeans, then the Phoenicians, lastly the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and Divine knowledge.

Without doubt, Hermes Trismegistus, that divine Magician and Philosopher, who (as some say) lived long before Noah, attained to much Divine knowledge of the Creator through the study of Magick and Astrologie; as his writings testifie.

The third kind of Magick containeth the whole Philosophy of Nature; which bringeth to light the innermost virtues, and extracteth them out of Nature's hidden bosome to humane use: Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Virtues hidden in the centre of the Centre, according to the Chymists: of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa nova, Raymond. Bacon and others, &c.

The Magick these men profess'd, is thus defined. Magia est connexio a viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi, congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant, non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant. Magick is the connexion of natural agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man, to the bringing forth of such effects as are wonderful to those that know not their causes.

In all these, Zoroaster was well learned, especially in the first and highest: for in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the first and the highest; he believeth of the Trinity, which he would not investigate by any natural knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise; approveth the immortality of the soul; teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the abstinence and charity of the Magi.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theology of the Phoenicians, using Zoroaster's own words: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus, incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium sibi ipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, sine doctrina justitiam per doctus, natur perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ unicus inventor, &c. Thus saith Zoroaster, word for word: God the first, incorruptable, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himself, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching, perfect, wise by nature, the onely inventor thereof.

So that a Magician is no other but divinorum cultor & interpres, a studious observer and expounder of divine things; and the Art itself is none other quam Naturalis Philosophiæ absoluta consummatio, then the absolute perfection of Natural Philosophy. Nevertheless there is a mixture in all things, good with evil, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with purity. The good, the truth, the purity, in every kinde, may well be embraced: As in the ancient worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that did not forbear to worship the God of all power, or condemn that kinde of Worship, because the devil was so adored in the image of Baal, Dagon, Astaroth, Chemosh, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like.

Neither did the abuse of Astrology terrify Abraham, (if we believe the most ancient and religious writers) from observing the motions and natures of the heavenly bodies. Neither can it dehorte wise and learned men in these days from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations, to the Stars and other Lights of heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious creatures.

I must expect some calumnies and obtrections against this, from the malicious prejudiced men, and the lazie affecters of Ignorance, of whom this age swarms: but the voice and sound of the Snake and Goose is all one. But our stomachs are not now so queazie and tender, after so long time feeding upon solid Divinity, nor we so umbragious and startling, having been so long enlightened in God's path, that we should relapse into that childish Age, in which Aristotle's Metaphysicks, in a Council in France, was forbid to be read.

But I incite the Reader to a charitable opinion hereof, with a Christian Protestation of an innocent purpose therein; and intreat the Reader to follow this advice of Tabæus, Qui litigant, sint ambo in conspectis tuo mali & rei. And if there be any scandal in this enterprise of mine, it is taken, not given. And this comfort I have in that Axiome of Trismegistus, Qui pius est, summe philosopatur. And therefore I present it without disguise, and object it to all of candor and indifferencie: and of Readers, of whom there be four sorts, as one observes: Sponges, which attract all without distinguishing; Hour-glasses, which receive, and pour out as fast; Bags, which retain onely the dregs of Spices, and let the Wine escape; and Sieves, which retain the best onely. Some there are of the last sort, and to them I present this Occult Philosophy, knowing that they may reap good thereby. And they who are severe against it, they all pardon this my opinion, that such their severity proceeds from Self-guiltiness; and give me leave to apply that of Ennodius that it is the nature of Self-wickedness, to think that of others, which themselves deserve. And it is all the comfort which guilty have, not to find any innocent. But that amongst others this may find some acceptance, is the desire of London, ult. Aug. 1654.

R. Turner

ARBATEL OF MAGICK

Containing nine Tomes, and seven Septenaries of APHORISMS.

The first is called Isagoge, or, A Book of the Institutions of Magick: or ~~the first~~ which in fourty and nine Aphorisms comprehendeth, the most general Precepts of the whole Art. The second is Microcosmical Magick, what Microcosmus hath effected Magically, by his Spirit and Genius addicted to him from his Nativity, that is, spiritual wisdom: and how the same is effected.

The third is Olympick Magick, in what maner a man may do and suffer by the spirits of Olympus.

The fourth is Hesiodiacal, and Homerial Magick, which teacheth the operations by the Spirits called Cacodæmones, as it were not adversaries to mankinde.

The fifth is Romane or Sibylline Magick, which acteth and operates with Tutelar Spirits and Lords, to whom the whole Orb of the earth is distributed. This is valde insignis Magia. To this also is the doctrine of the Druids referred.

The sixth is Pythagorical Magick, which onely acteth with Spirits to whom is given the doctrine of Arts, as Physick, Medicine, Mathematics, Alchymie, and such kinde of Arts.

The seventh is the Magick of Apollonius, and the like, and agreeth with the Romane and Microcosmical Magick: onely it hath this peculiar, that it hath power over the hostile spirits of mankinde.

The eighth is Hermetical, that is, Ægyptiacal Magick; and differeth not much from Divine Magick.

The ninth is that wisdom which dependeth solely upon the Word of God; and this is called Prophetical Magick.

The first Tome of the Book of Arbatel of Magick

CALLED

ISAGOGE

In the Name of the Creator of all things both visible and invisible, who revealeth his Mysteries out of his Treasures to them that call upon him; and fatherly and mercifully bestoweth those his Secrets upon us without measure. May he grant unto us, through his onely-begotten Son Jesus Christ our Lord, his ministring spirits, the revealers of his secrets, that we may write this Book of Arbatel, concerning the greatest Secrets which are lawful for man to know, and to use them without offence unto God. Amen.

The first Septenary of Aphorisms.

The first Aphorism.

Whosoever would know Secrets, let him know how to keep secret things secretly; and to reveal those things that are to be revealed, and to seal those things which are to be sealed: and not to give holy things to dogs, nor cast pearls before swine. Observe this Law, and the eyes of thy understanding shall be opened, to understand secret things; and thou shalt have whatsoever thy minde desireth to be divinely revealed unto thee. Thou shalt have also the Angels and Spirits of God prompt and ready in their nature to minister unto thee, as much as any humane minde can desire.

Aphor. 2.

In all things call upon the Name of the Lord: and without prayer unto God through his onely-begotten son, do not thou undertake to do or think any thing. And use the Spirits given and attributed unto thee, as Ministers, without rashness and presumption, as the messengers of God; having a due reverence towards the Lord of Spirits. And the remainder of thy life do thou accomplish, demeaning thy self peaceably, to the honour of God, and the profit of thy self and thy neighbour.

Aphor. 3.

Live to thy self, and the Muses: avoid the friendship of the Multitude: be thou covetous of time, beneficial to all men. Use thy Gifts, be vigilant in thy Calling; and let the Word of God never depart from thy mouth.

Aphor. 4.

Be obedient to good Admonitions: avoid all procrastination: accustom thy self to Contancie and Gravity, both in thy words and deeds. Resist temptations of the Tempter, by the Word of God. Flee from earthly things; seek after heavenly things. Put no confidence in thy own wisdom; but look unto God in all things, according to that sentence of the Scripture: When we know not what we shall do, unto thee, O God, do we lift up our eyes, and from thee we expect our help. For where all humane refuges do forsake us, there will the help of God shine forth, according to the saying of Philo.

Aphor. 5.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy strength, and thy neighbour as thy self: And the Lord will keep thee as the apple of his eye, and will deliver thee from all evil, and will replenish thee with all good; and nothing shall thy soul desire, but thou shalt be fully endued therewith, so that it be contingent to the salvation of thy soul and body.

Aphor. 6.

Whatsoever thou hast learned, frequently repeat, and fix the same in thy minde: and learn much, but not many things, because a humane understanding cannot be alike capable in all things, unless it be such a one that is divinely regenerated; unto him nothing is so difficult or manifold, which he may not be able equally to attain to.

Aphor. 7.

Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will hear thee, and thou shalt glorifie me, saith the Lord. For all Ignorance is tribulation of the minde; therefore call upon the Lord in thy ignorance, and he will hear thee. And remember that thou give honour unto God, and say with the Psalmist, Not unto us, Lord, but unto thy Name give the glory.

The second Septenary.

Aphor. 8.

Even as the Scripture testifies, that God appointeth names to things or persons, and also with them hath distributed certain powers and offices out of his treasures: so the Characters and Names of Stars have not any power by reason of their figure or pronounciation, but by reason of the vertue or office which God hath ordained by nature either to such a Name or Character. For there is no power either in heaven or in earth, or hell, which doth not descend from God; and without his permission, they can neither give or draw forth into any action, any thing they have.

Aphor. 9.

That is the chiefest wisdom, which is from God; and next, that which is in spiritual creatures; afterwards. in corporal creatures; fourthly, in Nature, and natural things. The Spirits that are apostate, and reserved to the last judgement, do follow these, after a long interval. Sixthly, the ministers of punishments in hell, and the obedient unto God. Seventhly, the Pigmies do not possess the lowest place, and they who inhibit in elements, and elementary things. It is convenient therefore to know and discern all differences of the wisdom of the Creator and the Creatures, that it may be certainly manifest unto us, what we ought to assume to our use of every thing, and that we may know in truth how and in what manner that may be done. For truly every creature is ordained for some profitable end to humane nature, and for the service thereof; as the holy Scriptures, Reason, and Experience, do testify.

Aphor. 10.

God the Father Almighty, Creator of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible, in the holy Scriptures proposeth himself to have an eye over us; and as a tender father which loveth his children, he teacheth us what is profitable, and what not; what we are to avoid, and what we are to embrace: then he allureth us to obedience with great promises of corporal and eternal benefits, and deterreth us (with threatening of punishments) from those things which are not profitable for us. Turn over therefore with thy hand, both night and day, those holy Writings, that thou mayest be happy in things present, and blessed in all eternity. Do this, and thou shalt live, which the holy Books have taught thee.

Aphor. 11.

A number of Four is Pythagorical, and the first Quadrate; therefore here let us place the foundation of all wisdom, after the wisdom of God revealed in the holy Scriptures, and to the considerations proposed in Nature.

Appoint therefore to him who solely dependeth upon God, the wisdom of every creature to serve and obey him, nolens volens, willing or unwilling. And in this, the omnipotency of God shineth forth. It consisteth therefore in this, that we will discern the creatures which serve us, from those that are unwilling; and that we may learn how to accommodate the wisdom and offices of every creature unto our selves. This Art is not delivered, but divinely. Unto whom God will, he revealeth his secrets; but to whom he will not bestow any thing out of his treasures, that person shall attain to nothing without the will of God.

Therefore we ought to desire ~~the wisdom of God~~ from God alone, which will mercifully impart these things unto us. For he who hath given us his Son, and commanded us to pray for his holy Spirit, How much more will he subject unto us the whole creature, and things visible and invisible? Whatsoever ye ask, ye shall receive. Beware that ye do not abuse the gifts of God, and all things shall work together unto you for your salvation. And before all things, be watchful in this, That your names be written in heaven: this is more light, That the spirits be obedient unto you, as Christ admonisheth.

Aphor. 12.

In the Acts of the Apostles, the Spirit saith unto Peter after the Vision, Go down, and doubt not but I have sent thee, when he was sent for from Cornelius the Centurion. After this manner, in vocal words, are all disciplines delivered, by the holy Angels of God, as it appeareth out of the Monuments of the Ægyptians. And these things afterwards were vitiated and corrupted with humane opinions; and by the instigation of evil spirits, who sow tares amongst the children of disobedience, as it is manifest out of St. Paul, and Hermes Trismegistus. There is no other manner of restoring these Arts. then by the doctrine of the holy Spirits of God; because true faith cometh by hearing. But because thou mayest be certain of the truth. and mayest not doubt whether the spirits that speak with thee, do declare things true or false, let it onely depend upon thy faith in God; that thou mayst say with Paul, I know on whom I trust. If no sparrow can fall to the ground without the will of the Father which is in heaven, How much more will not God suffer thee to be deceived, O thou of little faith, if thou dependest wholly upon God, and adherest onely to him?

Aphor. 13.

The Lord liveth; and all things which live, do live in him. And he is truely יהוה, who hath given unto all things, that they be that which they are: and by his word alone, through his Son, hath produced all things out of nothing, which are in being. He calleth all the stars. and all the host of heaven by their names. He therefore knoweth the true strength and nature of things, the order and policie of every creature visible and invisible. to whom God hath revealed the names of his creatures. It remaineth also, that he receive power from God, to extract the vertues in nature, and hidden secrets of the creature; and to produce their power into action, out of darkness into light. Thy scope therefore ought to be, that thou have the names of the Spirits, that is, their powers and offices, and how they are subjected and appointed by God to minister unto thee; even as Raphael was sent to Tobias, that he should heal his father, and deliver his son from dangers, and bring him to a wife. So Michael, the fortitude of God governeth the people of God: Gabriel, the messenger of God, was sent to Daniel, Mary, and Zachary the father of John Baptist. And he shall be given to thee that desirest him, who will teach thee whatsoever thy soul shall desire, in the nature of things. His ministry thou shalt use with trembling and fear of thy Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier, that is to say, the Father, Son, and holy Ghost: and do not thou let slip any occasion of learning and be vigilant in thy calling, and thou shalt want nothing that is necessary for thee.

Aphor. 14.

Thy soul liveth for ever, through him that hath created thee: call therefore upon the Lord thy God, and him onely shalt thou serve. This thou shalt do, if thou wilt perform that end for which thou art ordained of God, and what thou owest to God and to thy neighbour. God requireth of thee a minde, that thou shouldest honour his Son, and keep the words of his Son in thy heart: if thou honour him, thou hast done the will of thy Father which is in heaven. To thy neighbour thou owest offices of humanity, and that thou draw all men that come to thee, to honour the Son. This is the Law and the Prophets. In temporal things, thou oughtest to call upon God as a father, that he would give unto thee all necessities of this life: and thou oughtest to help thy neighbour with the gifts which God bestoweth upon thee, whether they be spiritual or corporal.

Therefore thou shalt pray thus:

O Lord of heaven and earth, Creator and Maker of all things visible and invisible; I, though unworthy, by thy assistance call upon thee, through thy onely begotten Son Jesus Christ our Lord, that thou wilt give unto me thy holy Spirit, to direct me in thy truth unto all good. Amen.

Because I earnestly desire perfectly to know the Arts of this life and such things as are necessary for us, which are so overwhelmed in darkness, and polluted with infinite humane opinions, that I of my own power can attain to no knowledge in them, unless thou teach it me: Grant me therefore one of thy spirits, who may teach me those things which thou wouldest have me to know and learn, to thy praise and glory, and the profit of our neighbour. Give me a/so an apt and teachable heart, that I may easily understand those things which thou shalt teach me, and may hide them in my understanding, that I may *bring them forth as out of thy inexhaustible treasures, to all necessary uses.

And give me grace, that I may use such thy gifts humbly, with fear and trembling, through our Lord Jesus Christ, with thy holy Spirit. Amen*

The Third Septenary.

Aphor. 15.

They are called Olympick spirits, which do inhabit in the firmament, and in the stars of the firmament: and the office of these spirits is to declare Destinies, and to administer fatal Charms, so far forth as God pleaseth to permit them: for nothing, neither evil spirit nor evil Destiny, shall be able to hurt him who hath the most High for his refuge. If therefore any of the Olympick spirits shall teach or declare that which his star to which he is appointed portendeth, nevertheless he can bring forth nothing into action, unless he be permitted by the Divine power. It is God alone who giveth them power to effect it. Unto God the maker of all things, are obedient all things celestial, sublunary, and infernal. Therefore rest in this: Let God be thy guide in all things which thou undertakest, and all things shall attain to a happie and desired end; even as the history of the whole world testifieth and daily experience sheweth. There is peace to the godly: there is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord.

Aphor. 16.

There are seven different governments of the Spirits of Olympus, by whom God hath appointed the whole frame and universe of this world to be governed: and their visible stars are ARATRON, BETHOR, PHALEG, OCH, HAGITH, OPHIEL, PHUL, after the Olympick speech. Every one of these hath under him a mighty Militia in the firmament.

- ARATHON ruleth visible Provinces XLIX.
- BETHOR, XLII.
- PHALEG, XXXV.
- OCH, XXVIII.
- HAGITH, XXI.
- OPHIEL, XIII.
- PHUL, VII.

So that there are 186 Olympick Provinces in the whole Universe. wherein the seven Governours do exercise their power: all which are elegantly set forth in Astronomy. But in this place it is to be explained, in what maner these Princes and Powers may be drawn into communication. Aratron appeareth in the first hour of Saturday, and very truly giveth answers concerning his Provinces and Provincials. So likewise do the rest appear in order in their days and hours. Also every one of them ruleth 490 years. The beginning of their simple Anomaly, in the 60 year before the Nativity of Christ, was the beginning of the administration of Bethor, and it lasted until the year of our Lord Christ 430. To whom succeeded Phaleg, until the 920 year. Then began Och, and continued until the year 1410, and thenceforth Hagith ruleth untill the year 1900.

Aphor. 17.

Magically the Princes of the seven Governments are called simply, in that time, day and hour wherein they rule visibly or invisibly, by their Names and Offices which God hath given unto them; and by proposing their Character which they have given or confirmed.

The governor Aratron hath in his power those things which he doth naturally, that is, after the same manner and subject as those things which in Astronomy are ascribed to the power of Saturn.

Those things which he doth of his own free will, are,

1. That he can convert any thing into a stone in a moment, either animal or plant, retaining the same object to the sight.
2. He converteth treasures into coles, and coles into treasure.
3. He giveth familiars with a definite power.
4. He teacheth Alchymy, Magick, and Physick.
5. He reconcileth the subterranean spirits to men; maketh hairy men.
6. He causeth one to bee invisible.
7. The barren he maketh fruitful, and giveth long life.

His character.

He hath under him 49 Kings, 42 Princes, 35 Presidents, 28 Dukes, 21 Ministers, standing before him; 14 familiars, seven messengers: he commandeth 36000 legions of spirits; the number of a legion is 490.

Bether [sic] governeth those things which are ascribed to Jupiter: he soon cometh being called. He that is dignified with his character, he raiseth to very great dignities, to cast open treasures: he reconcileth the spirits of the aire, that they give true answers: they transport precious stones from place to place, and they make medicines to work miraculously in their effects: he giveth also familiars of the firmament, and prolongeth life to 700 years if God will.

His character.

He hath under him 42 Kings, 35 Princes, 28 Dukes, 21 Counsellors, 14 Ministers, 7 Messengers, 29000 legions of Spirits.

Phalec [sic] ruleth those things which are attributed to Mars, the Prince of peace. He that hath his character he raiseth to great honours in warlike affaires.

His character.

Och governeth solar things; he giveth 600 yeares, with perfect health; he bestoweth great wisdom, giveth the most excellent Spirits, teacheth perfect Medicines: he converteth all things into most pure gold and precious stones: he giveth gold, and a purse springing with gold. He that is dignified with his Character, he maketh him to be worshipped as a Deity, by the Kings of the whole world.

The Character.

He hath under him 36536 Legions: he administreth all things alone: and all his spirits serve him by centuries.

Hagith governeth Venereous things. He that is dignified with his Character, he maketh very fair, and to be adorned with all beauty. He converteth copper into gold, in a moment, and gold into copper: he giveth Spirits which do faithfully serve those to whom they are addicted.

His character.

He hath 4000 Legions of Spirits and over every thousand he ordaineth Kings for their appointed seasons.

Ophiel is the governour of such things as are attributed to Mercury: his Character is this.

His Spirits are 100000 Legions: he easily giveth Familiar Spirits: he teacheth all Arts: and he that is dignified with his Character, he maketh him to be able in a moment to convert Quicksilver into the Philosophers stone.

Phul hath this Character.

He changeth all metals into silver, in word and deed; governeth Lunary things; healeth the dropsie: he giveth spirits of the water, who do serve men in a corporeal and visible form; and maketh men to live 300 years.

The most general Precepts of this Secret.

1. Every Governour acteth with all his Spirits, either naturally, to wit, always after the same maner; or otherwise of their own free-will, if God hinder them not.
2. Every Governour is able to do all things which are done naturally in a long time, out of matter before prepared; and also to do them suddenly, out of matter not before prepared. As Och, the Prince of Solar things, prepareth gold in the mountains in a long time; in a less time, by the Chymical Art; and Magically, in a moment.
3. The true and divine Magician may use all the creatures of God, and offices of the Governours of the world, at his own will, for that the Governours of the world are obedient unto them, and come when they are called, and do execute their commands: but God is the Author thereof: as Joshua caused the Sun to stand still in heaven.

They send some of their Spirits to the Mean Magicians, which do obey them onely in some determinate business: but they hear not the false Magicians, but expose them to the deceits of the devils, and cast them into divers dangers, by the Command of God; as the Prophet Jeremiah testifieth, in his eighth Chapter, concerning the Jews.

4. In all the elements there are the seven Governours with their hosts, who do move with the equal motion of the firmament; and the inferiours do always depend upon the superiours, as it is taught in Philosophy.

5. A man that is a true Magician, is brought forth a Magician from his mothers womb: others, who do give themselves to this office, are unhappie. This is that which John the Baptist speaketh of: No man can do any thing of himself, except it be given him from above.

Every Character given from a Spirit, for what cause soever, hath his efficacie in this business, for which it is given, in the time prefixed: But it is to be used the same day and Planetary hour wherein it is given.

7. God liveth, and thy soul liveth: keep thy Covenant, and thou hast whatsoever the spirit shall reveal unto thee in God, because all things shall be done which the Spirit promiseth unto thee.

Aphor. 18.

There are other names of the Olymick spirits delivered by others; but they onely are effectual, which are delivered to any one, by the Spirit the revealer, visible or invisible: and they are delivered to every one as they are predestinated: therefore they are called Constellations; and they seldome have any efficacie above 40 years. Therefore it is most safe for the young practisers of Art, that they work by the offices of the Spirits alone, without their names; and if they are pre-ordained to attain the Art of Magick, the other parts of the Art will offer themselves unto them of their own accord. Pray therefore for a constant faith, and God will bring to pass all things in due season.

Aphor. 19.

Olympus and the inhabitants thereof, do of their own accord offer themselves to men in the forms of Spirits, and are ready to perform their Offices for them, whether they will or not: by how much the rather will they attend you, if they are desired? But there do appear also evil Spirits, and destroyers, which is caused by the envy and malice of the devil; and because men do allure and draw them unto themselves with their sin, as a punishment due to sinners. Whosoever therefore desireth familiarly to have a conversation with Spirits, let him keep himself from enormous [sic] sins, and diligently pray to the most High to be his keeper; and he shall break through all the snares and impediments of the devil: and let him apply himself to the service of God, and he will give him an increase in wisdom.

Aphor. 20.

All things are possible to them that believe them, and are willing to receive them; but to the incredulous and unwilling, all things are impossible [sic]: there is no greater hinderance then a wavering minde, levity, unconstancy, foolish babbling, drunkenness, lusts, and disobedience to the word of God. A Magician therefore ought to be a man that is godly, honest, constant in his words and deeds, having a firm faith toward God, prudent, and covetous of nothing but of wisdom about divine things.

Aphor. 21.

When you would call any of the Olympick Spirits, observe the rising of the Sun that day, and of what nature the Spirit is which you desire; and saying the prayer following, your desires shall be perfected.

Omnipotent and eternal God, who hast ordained the whole creation for thy praise and glory, and for the salvation of man, I beseech thee that thou wouldst send thy Spirit N.N. of the solar order, who shall inform and teach me those things which I shall ask of him; or, that he may bring me medicine against the dropsie, &c. Nevertheless not my will be done, but thine, through Jesus Christ thy onely begotten Son, our Lord. Amen.

But thou shalt not detain the Spirit above a full hour, unless he be familiarly addicted unto thee.

Forasmuch as thou camest in peace, and quietly, and hast answered unto my petitions; I give thanks unto God, in whole Name thou camest: and now thou mayest depart in peace unto thy orders; and return to me again when I shall call thee by thy name, or by thy order, or by thy office, which is granted from the Creator. Amen.

Ecclesiast. Chap. 5. Be not rash with thy mouth, neither let thy heart be hasty to utter any thing before God; for God is in Heaven, and thou in earth: Therefore let thy words be few; for a dream cometh through the multitude of business.

The third Septenary.

Aphor. 22.

We call that a secret, which no man can attain unto by humane industry without revelation; which Science lieth obscured, hidden by God in the creature; which nevertheless he doth permit to be revealed by Spirits, to a due use of the thing it self. And these secrets are either concerning things divine, natural or humane. But thou mayst examine a few, and the most select, which thou wilt commend with many more.

Aphor. 23.

Make a beginning of the nature of the secret, either by a Spirit in the form of a person, or by vertues separate, either in humane Organs, or by what manner soever the same may be effected; and this being known, require of a Spirit which knoweth that art, that he would briefly declare unto thee whatsoever that secret is: and pray unto God, that he would inspire thee with his grace, whereby thou maist bring the secret to the end thou desireth, for the praise and glory of God, and the profit of thy neighbour.

Aphor. 24.

The greatest secrets are number seven.

1. The first is the curing of all diseases in the space of seven dayes, either by character, or by natural things, or by the superior Spirits with the divine assistance.
2. The second is, to be able to prolong life to whatsoever age we please: I say, a corporal and natural life.
3. The third is, to have the obedience of the creatures in the elements which are in the forms of personal Spirits; also of Pigmies,* Sagani, Nymphes, Dryades, and Spirits of the woods.

[* Spirits of the four elements. Paracels.]

4. The fourth is, to be able to discourse with knowledge and understanding of all things visible and invisible, and to understand the power of every thing, and to what it belongeth.
 5. The fifth is, that a man be able to govern himself according to that end for which God hath appointed him.
 6. The sixth is, to know God, and Christ, and his holy Spirit: this is the perfection of the Microcosmus.
 - 7 The seventh, to be regenerate, as Henochius the King of the inferiour world.
- These seven secrets a man of an honest and constant minde may learn of the Spirits, without any offence unto God.

The mean Secrets are likewise seven in number.

1. The first is, the transmutation of Metals, which is vulgarly called Alchemy; which certainly is given to very few, and not but of special grace.
2. The second is, the curing of diseases with Metals, either by the magnetick vertues of precious stones, or by the use of the Philosophers stone, and the like.
- 3 The third is, to be able to perform Astronomical and Mathematical miracles, such as are Hydraulick-engines, to administer business by the influence of Heaven, and things which are of the like sort.
4. The fourth is, to perform the works of natural Magick, of what sort soever they be.
5. The fifth is, to know all Physical secrets.
6. The sixth is, to know the foundation of all Arts which are exercised with the hands and offices of the body.
7. The seventh is, to know the foundation of all Arts which are exercised by the angelical nature of man.

The lesser secrets are seven.

1. The first is, to do a thing diligently, and to gather together much money.
2. The second is, to ascend from a mean state to dignities and honours, and to establish a newer family, which may be illustrious and do great things.
3. The third is, to excel in military affairs, and happily to achieve to great things, and to be an head of the head of Kings and Princes.
4. To be a good house-keeper both in the Country and City.
5. The fifth is, to be an industrious and fortunate Merchant.
6. To be a Philosopher, Mathematician, and Physician, according to Aristotle, Plato, Ptolomy, Euclides, Hippocrates, and Galen.
7. To be a Divine according to the Bible and Schooles, which all writers of divinity both old and new have taught.

Aphor. 25.

We have already declared what a secret is, the kinds and species thereof: it remaineth now to shew how we may attain to know those things which we desire. The true and onely way to all secrets, is to have recourse unto God the Author of all good; and as Christ teacheth, In the first place seek ye the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.

2. Also see that your hearts be not burthened with surfeting, and drunkenness, and the cares of this life.

3. Also commit your cares unto the Lord, and he will do it.

4. Also I the Lord thy God do teach thee, what things are profitable for thee, and do guide thee in the way wherein thou walkest.

5. And I will give thee understanding, and will teach thee in the way wherein thou shalt go, and I will guide thee with my eye.

6 Also if you which are evil, know how to give good things to your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give his holy Spirit to them that ask him?

7. If you will do the will of my Father which is in heaven, ye are truly my disciples, and we will come unto you, and make our abode with you.

If you draw these seven places of Scripture from the letter unto the Spirit, or into action, thou canst out erre, but shalt attain to the desired bound; thou shalt not erre from the mark, and God himself by his holy Spirit will teach thee true and profitable things: he will give also his ministring Angels unto thee, to be thy companions, helpers, and teachers of all the secrets of the world, and he will command every creature to be obedient unto thee, so that cheerfully rejoycing thou maist say with the Apostles, That the Spirits are obedient unto thee; so that at length thou shalt be certain of the greatest thing of all, That thy name is written in Heaven.

Aphor. 26.

There is another way which is more common, that secrets may be revealed unto thee also, when thou art unwitting thereof, either by God, or by Spirits which have secrets in their power; or by dreams, or by strong imaginations and impressions, or by the constellation of a nativity by celestial knowledge. After this manner are made heroick men, such as there are very many, and all learned men in the world, Plato, Aristotle, Hippocrates, Galen, Euclides, Archimedes, Hermes Trismegistus the father secrets, with Theophrastus, Paracelsus; all which men had in themselves all the vertues of secrets. Hitherto also are referred, Homer, Hesiod, Orpheus, Pythagoras; but these had not such gifts of secrets as the former. To this are referred, the Nymphes, and sons of Melusina, and Gods of the Gentiles, Achilles, Æneas, Hercules: also, Cyrus, Alexander the great, Julius Cæsar, Lucullus, Sylla. Marius.

It is a canon, That every one know his own Angel. and that he obey him according to the word of God; and let him beware of the snares of the evil Angel, lest he be involved in the calamities of Brute and Marcus Antonius. To this refer the book of Jovianus Pontanus of Fortune, and his Eutichus.

The third way is, diligent and hard labor, without which no great thing can be obtained from the divine Deity worthy admiration, as it is said,

Tu nihil invita dices facie sue Minerva.

Nothing canst thou do or say against Minerva's will.

We do detest all evil Magicians, who make themselves associates with the devils with their unlawful superstitions, and do obtain and effect some things which God permitteth to be done, instead of the punishment of the devils. So also they do other evil acts, the devil being the author, as the Scripture testifie of Judas. To these are referred all idolaters of old, and of our age, and abusers of Fortune, such as the heathens are full of. And to these do appertain all Charontick evocation of Spirits the works of Saul with the woman, and Lucanus prophesie of the deceased souldier, concerning the event of the Pharsalian war, and the like.

Aphor. 27.

Make a Circle with a center A, which is B. C. D. E. At the East let there be B.C. a square. At the North, C.D. At the West, D.E. And at the South, E.D. Divide the Several quadrants into seven parts, that there may be in the whole 28 parts: and let them be again divided into four parts, that there may be 112 parts of the Circle: and so many are the true secrets to revealed. And this Circle in this manner divided, is the seal of the secrets of the world, which they draw from the onely center A, that is, from the invisible God, unto the whole creature. The Prince of the Oriental secrets is resident in the middle, and hath three Nobles on either side, every one whereof hath four under him, and the Prince himself hath four appertaining unto him. And in this manner the other Princes and Nobles have their quadrants of secrets, with their four secrets. But the Oriental secret is the study of all wisdom; The West, of strength; The South, of tillage; The North, of more rigid life. So that the Eastern secrets are commended to be the best; the Meridian to be mean; and the East and North to be lesser. The use of this seal of secrets is, that thereby thou maist know whence the Spirits or Angels are produced, which may teach the secrets delivered unto them from God. But they have names taken from their offices and powers, according to the gift which God hath severally distributed to every one of them. One hath the power of the sword; another, of the pestilence; and another, of inflicting famine upon the people, as it is ordained by God. Some are destroyers of Cities, as those two were, who were sent to overthrow Sodom and Gomorrha, and the places adjacent, examples whereof the holy Scripture witnesseth. Some are the watch-men over Kingdoms; others the keepers of private persons; and from thence, anyone may easily form their names in his own language: so that he which will, may ask a physical Angel, mathematical, or philosophical, or an Angel of civil wisdom, or of supernatural or natural wisdom, or for any thing whatsoever; and let him ask seriously, with a great desire of his minde, and with faith and constancy and without doubt, that which he asketh he shall receive from the Father and God of all Spirits. This faith surmounteth all seals, and bringeth them into subjection to the will of man. The Characteristical maner of calling Angels succeedeth this faith, which dependeth onely on divine revelation; But without the said faith preceding it, it lieth in obscurity. Nevertheless, if any one will use them for a memorial, and not otherwise, and as a thing simply created by God to his purpose, to which such a spiritual power or essence is bound; he may use them without any offence unto God. But let him beware, lest that he fall into idolatry, and the snares of the devil, who with his cunning sorceries, easily deceiveth the unwary. And he is not taken but onely by the finger of God, and is appointed to the service of man; so that they unwillingly serve the godly; but not without temptations and tribulations, because the commandment hath it, That he shall bruise the heel of Christ, the seed of the woman. We are therefore to exercise our selves about spiritual things, with fear and trembling, and with great reverence towards God, and to be conversant in spiritual essences with gravity and justice. And he which medleth with such things, let him beware of all levity, pride, covetousness, vanity, envy and ungodliness, unless he wil miserably perish.

Aphor. 28.

Because all good is from God, who is onely good, those things which we would obtain of him, we ought to seek them by prayer in Spirit and Truth, and a simple heart. The conclusion of the secret of secrets is, That every one exercise himself in prayer, for those things which he desires, and he shall not suffer a repulse. Let not any one despise prayer; for by whom God is prayed unto, to him he both can and will give. Now let us acknowledge him the Author, from whom let us humbly seek for our desires. A merciful & good Father, loveth the sons of desires, as Daniel; and sooner heareth us, then we are able to overcome the hardness of our hearts to pray. But he will not that we give holy things to dogs, nor despise and condemn the gifts of his treasury. Therefore diligently and often read over and over the first Septenary of secrets, and guide and direct thy life and all thy thoughts according to those precepts; and all things shall yield to the desires of thy minde in the Lord, to whom thou trustest.

The Fifth Septenary

Aphor. 29.

As our study of Magick proceedeth in order from general Rules premised, let us now come to a particular explication thereof. Spirits either are divine ministers of the word, and of the Church, and the members thereof; or else they are servient to the Creatures in corporal things, partly for the salvation of the soul and body, and partly for its destruction. And there is nothing done, whether good or evil, without a certain and determinate order and government. He that seeketh after a good end, let him follow it; and he that desires an evil end, pursueth that also, and that earnestly, from divine punishment, and turning away from the divine will. Therefore let every one compare his ends with the word of God, and as a touchstone that will judge between good and evil; and let him propose unto himself what is to be avoided, and what is to be sought after; and that which he constituteth and determineth unto himself, let him diligently, not procrastinating or delaying, until he attain to his appointed bound.

Aphor. 30.

They which desire riches, glory of this world, Magistracy, honours, dignities, tyrannies, (and that magically) if they endeavour diligently after them, they shall obtain them, every one according to his destiny, industry, and magical Sciences, as the History of Melesina witnesseth, and the Magicians thereof, who ordained, That none of the Italian nation should for ever obtain the Rule or Kingdom of Naples; and brought it to pass, that he who reigned in his age, to be thrown down from his seat: so great is the power of the guardian or tutelar Angels of Kingdoms of the world.

Aphor. 31.

Call the Prince of the Kingdom, and lay a command upon him, and command what thou wilt, and it shall be done, if that Prince be not again absolved from his obedience by a succeeding Magician. Therefore the Kingdom of Naples may be again restored to the Italians, if any Magician shall call him who instituted this order, and compel him to recal his deed; he may be compelled also, to restore the secret powers taken from the treasury of Magick; A Book, a Gemme, and magical Horn, which being had, any one may easily, if he will, make himself the Monarch of the world. But Judæus chused rather to live among Gods, until the judgement, before the transitory good of this world; and his heart is so blinde, that he understandeth nothing of the God of heaven and earth, or thinketh more, but enjoyeth the delights of things immortal, to his own eternal destruction. And he may be easier called up, then the Angel of Plotinus in the Temple of Isis.

Aphor. 32.

In like manner also, the Romans were taught by the Sibyls books; and by that means made themselves the Lords of the world, as Histories witness. But the Lords of the Prince of a Kingdom do bestow the lesser Magistracies. He therefore that desireth to have a lesser office, or dignity, let him magically call a Noble of the Prince, and his desire shall be fulfilled.

Aphor. 33.

But he who coveteth contemptible dignities, as riches alone, let him call the Prince of riches, or one of his Lords, and he shall obtain his desire in that kinde, whereby he would grow rich, either in earthly goods, or merchandize, or with the gifts of Princes, or by the study of Metals, or Chymistry: as he produceth any president of growing rich by these means, he shall obtain his desire therein.

Aphor. 34.

All manner of evocation is of the same kinde and form, and this way was familiar of old time to the Sibyls and chief Priests. This in our time, through ignorance and impiety, is totally lost; and that which remaineth, is depraved with infinite lyes and superstitions.

Aphor. 35.

The humane understanding is the onely effector of all wonderful works, so that it be joyned to any Spirit; and being joyned, she produceth what she will. Therefore we are carefully to proceed in Magick, lest that Syrens and other monsters deceive us, which likewise do desire the society of the humane soul. Let the Magician carefully hide himself alwaies under the wings of the most High, lest he offer himself to be devoured of the roaring Lion; for they who desire earthly things, do very hardly escape the snares of the devil.

The sixth Septenary.

Aphor. 36.

Care is to be taken, that experiments be not mixed with experiments; but that every one be onely simple and several: for God and Nature have ordained all things to a certain and appointed end: so that for examples sake, they who perform cures with the most simple herbs and roots, do cure the most happily of all. And in this manner, in Constellations, Words and Characters, Stones, and such like, do lie hid the greatest influences or vertues in deed, which are in stead of a miracle.

So also are words, which being pronounced, do forthwith cause creatures both visible and invisible to yield obedience, aswel creatures of this our world, as of the watry, aëry, subterranean, and Olympick supercelestial and infernal, and also the divine. Therefore simplicity is chiefly to be studied, and the knowledge of such simples is to be sought for from God; otherwise by no other means or experience they can be found out.

Aphor. 37.

And let all lots have their place decently: Order, Reason and Means, are the three things which do easily render all learning aswell of the visible as invisible creatures. This is the course of Order, That some creatures are creatures of the light; others, of darkness: these are subject to vanity, because they run headlong into darkness, and inthral themselves in eternal punishments for their rebellion. Their Kingdom is partly very beautiful in transitory and corruptible things on the one part, because it cannot consist without some vertue and great gifts of God; and partly most filthy and horrid to be spoken of, because it aboundeth with all wickedness and sin, idolatry, contempt of God, blasphemies against the true God and his works, worshippers of devils, disobedience towards Magistrates, seditions, homicides, robberies, tyranny, adulteries, wicked lusts, rapes, thefts, lyes, perjuries, pride, and a covetous desire of rule; in this mixture consisteth the kingdom of darkness: but the creatures of the light are filled with eternal truth, and with the grace of God, and are Lords of the whole world, and do reign over the Lords of darkness, as the members of Christ. Between these and the other, there is a continual war, until God shall put an end to their strife, by his last judgement.

Aphor. 38.

Therefore Magick is twofold in its first division; the one is of God, which he bestoweth on the creatures of light; the other also is of God, but as it is the gift which he giveth unto the creatures of darkness: and this is also two-fold: the one is to a good end, as when the Princes of darkness are compelled to do good unto the creatures, God enforcing them; the other is for an evil end, when God permitteth such to punish evil persons, that magically they are deceived to destruction; or, also he commandeth such to be cast out into destruction.

The second division of Magick is, that it bringeth to pass some works with visible instruments, through visible things; and it effecteth other works with invisible instruments by invisible things; and it acteth other things, aswel with mixed means, as instruments and effects.

The third division is, There are some things which are brought to pass by invocation of God alone: this is partly Prophetical, and Philosophical; and partly, as it were Theophrastical.

Other things there are, which by reason of the ignorance of the true God, are done with the Princes of Spirits, that his desires may be fulfilled; such is the work of the Mercurialists.

The fourth division is, That some exercise their Magick with the good Angels in stead of God, as it were descending down from the most high God: such was the Magick of Baalim.

Another Magick is, that which exerciseth their actions with the chief of the evil Spirits; such were they who wrought by the minor Gods of the heathens.

The fifth division is, That some do act with Spirits openly, and face to face; which is given to few: others do work by dreams and other signs; which the ancients took from their auguries and sacrifices.

The sixth division is, That some work by immortal creatures, others by mortal Creatures, as Nymphs, Satyrs, and such-like inhabitants of other elements, Pigmies, &c.

The seventh division is, That the Spirits do serve some of their own accord, without art; others they will scarce attend, being called by art.

Among these species of Magick, that is the most excellent of all, which dependeth upon God alone. The second, Them whom the Spirits do serve faithfully of their own accord. The third is, that which is the property of Christians, which dependeth on the power of Christ which he hath in heaven and earth.

Aphor. 39.

There is a seven-fold preparation to learn the Magick Art.

The first is, to meditate day and night how to attain to the true knowledge of God, both by his word revealed from the foundation of the world; as also by the seal of the creation, and of the creatures; and by the wonderful effects which the visible and invisible creatures of God do shew forth.

Secondly it is requisite, that a man descend down into himself, and chiefly study to know himself; what mortal part he hath in him, and what immortal; and what part is proper to himself, and what diverse.

Thirdly, That he learn by the immortal part of himself, to worship, love and fear the eternal God, and to adore him in Spirit and Truth; and with his mortal part, to do those things which he knoweth to be acceptable to God, and profitable to his neighbours.

These are the three first and chiefest precepts of Magick, wherewith let every one prepare himself that covets to obtain true Magick or divine wisdom, that he may be accounted worthy thereof, and one to whom the Angelical creatures willingly do service, not occultly onely, but also manifestly, and as it were face to face.

Fourthly, Whereas every man is to be vigilant to see to what kinde life he shall be called from his mothers wombe, that every one may know whether he be born to Magick, and to what species thereof, which every one may perceive easily that readeth these things, and by experience may have success therein; for such things and such gifts are not given but onely to the low and humble.

In the fifth place we are to take care, that we understand when the Spirits are assisting us, in undertaking the greatest business; and he that understands this, it is manifest, that he shall be made a Magician of the ordination of God; that is, such a person who useth the ministry of the Spirits to bring excellent things to pass. Here, as for the most part, they sin, either through negligence, ignorance, or contempt, or by too much superstition; they offend also by ingratitude towards God, whereby many famous men have afterwards drawn upon themselves destruction: they sin also by rashness and obstinacy; and also when they do not use their gifts for that honor of God which is required, and do prefer ~~their own~~ their own.

Sixthly, The Magitian [sic] hath need of faith and taciturnity, especially, that he disclose no secret which the Spirit hath forbid him, as he commanded Daniel to seal some things, that is, not to declare them in publick; so as it was not lawful for Paul to speak openly of all things which he saw in a vision. No man will believe how much is contained in this one precept.

Seventhly, In him that would be a Magician, there is required the greatest justice, that he undertake nothing that is ungodly, wicked or unjust, nor to let it once come in his minde; and so he shall be divinely defended from all evil.

Aphor. 40.

When the Magician determineth with himself to do any incorporeal thing either with any exterior or interior sense, then let him govern himself according to these seven subsequent laws, to accomplish his Magical end.

The first Law is this, That he know that such a Spirit is ordained unto him from God; and let him meditate that God is the beholder of all his thoughts and actions; therefore let him direct all the course of his life according to the rule prescribed in the word of God.

Secondly, Alwaies pray with David, Take not thy holy Spirit from me; and strengthen me with thy free Spirit; and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: I beseech thee, O heavenly Father, do not give power to any lying Spirit, as thou didst over Ahab that he perished; but keep me in thy truth. Amen.

Thirdly, Let him accustome himself to try the Spirits, as the Scripture admonisheth; for grapes cannot be gathered of thorns: let us try all things, and hold fast that which is good and laudable, that we may avoid every thing that is repugnant to the divine power.

The fourth is, To be remote and cleer from all manner of superstition; for this is superstition, to attribute divinity in this place to things, wherein there is nothing at all divine; or to chuse or frame to our selves, to worship God with some kinde of worship which he hath not commanded: such are the Magical ceremonies of Satan, whereby he impudently offereth himself to be worshipped as God.

The fifth thing to be eschewed, is all worship of Idols, which bindeth any divine power to idols or other things of their own proper motion, where they are not placed by the Creator, or by the order of Nature: which things many false and wicked Magitians faign.

Sixthly, All the deceitful imitations and affections of the devil are also to be avoided, whereby he imitateth the power of the creation, and of the Creator, that he may so produce things with a word, that they may not be what they are. Which belongeth onely to the Omnipotency of God, and is not communicable to the creature. Seventhly, Let us cleave fast to the gifts of God, and of his holy Spirit, that we may know them, and diligently embrace them with our whole heart, and all our strength.

Aphor. 41.

We come now to the nine last Aphorismes of this whole Tome; wherewith we will, the divine mercy assisting us, conclude this whole Magical Isagoge. Therefore in the first place it is to be observed, what we understand by Magitian in this work.

Him then we count to be a Magitian, to whom by the grace of God. the spiritual essences do serve to manifest the knowledge of the whole universe, & of the secrets of Nature contained therein, whether they are visible or invisible. This description of a Magitian plainly appeareth, and is universal.

An evil Magician is he, whom by the divine permission the evil Spirits do serve, to his temporal and eternal destruction and perdition to deceive men, and draw them away from God; such was Simon Magus, of whom mention is made in the Acts of the Apostles, and in Clemens; whom Saint Peter commanded to be thrown down upon the earth, when as he had commanded himself, as it were a God, to be raised up into the air by the unclean Spirits.

Unto this order are also to be referred all those who are noted in the two Tables of the Law; and are set forth with their evil deeds.

The subdivisions and species of both kindes of Magick, we will note in the Tomes following. In this place it shall suffice, that we distinguish the Sciences, which is good, and which is evil: Whereas man sought to obtain them both at first, to his own ruine and destruction, as Moses and Hermes do demonstrate.

Aphor. 42.

Secondly, we are to know, That a Magitian is a person predestinated to this work from his mothers wombe; neither let him assume any such great things to himself, unless he be called divinely by grace hereunto, for some good end; to a bad end is, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, It must be that offences will come; but wo be to that man through whom they come. Therefore, as we have before oftentimes admonished, With fear and trembling we must live in this world.

Notwithstanding I will not deny, but that some men may with study and diligence obtain some species of both kindes of Magick if it may be admitted. But he shall never aspire to the highest kindes thereof; yet if he covet to assail them, he shall doubtless offend both in soul and body. Such are they, who by the operations of false Magicians, are sometimes carried to Mount Horch, or in some wilderness, or desarts [deserts]; or they are maimed in some member, or are simply torn in pieces, or are deprived of their understanding; even as many such things happen by the use thereof, where men are forsaken by God, and delivered to the power of Satan.

The Seventh Septenary.

Aphor. 43.

The Lord liveth, and the works of God do live in him by his appointment whereby he willeth them to be; for he will have them to use their liberty in obedience to his commands, or disobedience thereof. To the obedient, he hath proposed their rewards; to the disobedient he hath propounded their deserved punishment.

Therefore these Spirits of their freewil, through their pride and contempt of the Son of God, have revolted from God their Creator, and are reserved unto the day of wrath; and there is left in them a very great power in the creation; but notwithstanding it is limited, and they are confined to their bounds with the bridle of God. Therefore the Magitian of God, which signifies a wise man of God, or one informed of God, is led forth by the hand of God unto all everlasting good, both mean things, and also the chiefest corporal things.

Great is the power of Satan, by reason of the great sins of men. Therefore also the Magitians of Satan do perform great things, and greater then any man would believe: although they do subsist in their own limits, nevertheless they are above all humane apprehension, as to the corporal and transitory things of this life; which many ancient Histories, and daily Examples do testifie. Both kindes of Magick are different one from the other in their ends: the one leadeth to eternal good, and useth temporal things with thanksgiving; the other is a little sollicitous about eternal things; but wholly exerciseth himself about corporal things, that he may freely enjoy all his lusts and delights in contempt of God and his anger.

Aphor. 44.

The passage from the common life of man unto a Magical life, is no other but a sleep, from that life; and an awaking to this life; for those things which happen to ignorant and unwise men in their common life, the same things happen to the willing and knowing Magitian.

The Magitian understandeth when the minde doth meditate of himself; he deliberateth, reasoneth, constituteth and determineth what is to be done; he observeth when his cogitations do proceed from a divine separate essence, and he proveth of what order that divine separate essence is.

But the man that is ignorant of Magick, is carried to and fro, as it were in war with his affections; he knoweth not when they issue out of his own minde, or are impressed by the assisting essence; and he knoweth not how to overthrow the counsels of his enemies by the word of God, or to keep himself from the snares and deceits of the tempter.

Aphor. 45.

The greatest precept of Magic is, to know what every man ought to receive for his use from the assisting Spirit, and what to refuse: which he may learn of the Psalmist, saying, Wherewith shall a yong man cleanse his way? in keeping thy word, Oh Lord. To keep the word of God, so that the evil one snatch it not out of the heart, is the chiefest precept of wisdom. It is lawful to admit of, and exercise other suggestions which are not contrary to the glory of God, and charity towards our neighbours, not inquiring from what Spirit such suggestions proceed: But we ought to take heed, that we are not too much busied with unnecessary things according to the admonition of Christ; Martha, Martha, thou art troubled about many things; but Mary hath chosen the better part, which shall not be taken from her. Therefore let us alwaies have regard unto the saying of Christ, Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you. All other things, that is, all things which are due to the mortal Microcosme, as food, raiment, and the necessary arts of this life.

Aphor. 46.

There is nothing so much becometh a man, as constancy in his words and deeds, and when the like rejoyceth in his like; there are none more happy then such, because the holy Angels are conversant about such, and possess the custody of them: on the contrary, men that are unconstant are lighter then nothing, and rotten leaves. We chuse the 46 Aphorisme from these. Even as every one governeth himself, so he allureth unto himself Spirits of his nature and condition; but one very truly adviseth, that no man should carry himself beyond his own calling, lest that he draw unto himself some malignant Spirit from the uttermost parts of the earth, by whom either he shall be infatuated and deceived, or brought to final destruction. This precept appeareth most plainly: for Midas, when he would convert all things into gold, drew up such a Spirit unto himself, which was able to perform this; and being deceived by him, he had been brought to death by famine, if his foolishness had not been corrected by the mercy of God. The same thing happened to a certain woman about Franckford at Odera, in our times, who would scrape together & devour mony of any thing. Would that men would diligently weigh this precept, and not account the Histories of Midas, and the like, for fables; they would be much more diligent in moderating their thoughts and affections, neither would they be so perpetually vexed with the Spirits of the golden mountains of Utopia. Therefore we ought most diligently to observe, that such presumptions should be cast out of the minde, by the word, while they are new; neither let them have any habit in the idle minde, that is empty of the divine word.

Aphor. 47.

He that is faithfully conversant in his vocation, shall have also the Spirits constant companions of his desires, who will successively supply him in all things. But if he have any knowledge in Magick, they will not be unwilling to shew him, and familiarly to converse with him, and to serve him in those several ministeries, unto which they are addicted; the good Spirits in good things, unto salvation; the evil Spirits in every evil thing, to destruction. Examples are not wanting in the Histories of the whole World; and do daily happen in the world. Theodosius before the victory of Arbogastus, is an example of the good; Brute before he was slain, was an example of the evil Spirits, when he was persecuted of the Spirit of Cæsar, and exposed to punishment, that he slew himself, who had slain his own Father, and the Father of his Country.

Aphor. 48.

All Magick is a revelation of Spirits of that kinde, of which sort the Magick is; so that the nine Muses are called, in Hesiod, the ninth Magick, as he manifestly testifies of himself in Theogony. In Homer, the genius of Ulysses in Psigiogagia. Hermes, the Spirits of the more sublime parts of the minde. God revealed himself to Moses in the bush. The three wise men who came to seek Christ at Jerusalem, the Angel of the Lord was their leader. The Angels of the Lord directed Daniel. Therefore there is nothing whereof any one may glory; For it is not unto him that willeth, nor unto him that runneth; but to whom God will have mercy, or of some other spiritual fate. From hence springeth all Magick, and thither again it will revolve, whether it be good or evil. In this manner Tages the first teacher of the Magick of the Romanes, gushed out of the earth. Diana of the Ephesians shewed her worship, as if it had been sent from heaven. So also Apollo. And all the Religion of the Heathens is taken from the same Spirits; neither are the opinions of the Sadduces, humane inventions.

Aphor. 49.

The conclusion therefore of this Isagoge is the same which we have above already spoken of, That even as there is one God, from whence is all good; and one sin, to wit, disobedience, against the will of the commanding God, from whence comes all evil; so that the fear of God is the beginning of all wisdom, and the profit of all Magick; for obedience to the will of God, followeth the fear of God; and after this, do follow the presence of God and of the holy Spirit, and the ministry of the holy Angels, and all good things out of the inexhaustible treasures of God. But unprofitable and damnable Magick ariseth from this; where we lose the fear of God out of our hearts, and suffer sin to reign in us, there the Prince of this world, the God of this world beginneth, and setteth up his kingdom in stead of holy things, in such as he findeth profitable for his kingdom; there, even as the spider taketh the flye which falleth into his web, so Satan spreadeth abroad his nets, and taketh men with the snares of covetousness, until he sucketh him, and draweth him to eternal fire: these he cherisheth and advanceth on high, that their fall may be the greater. Courteous Reader, apply thy eyes and minde to the sacred and profane Histories, & to those things which thou seest daily to be done in the world, and thou shalt finde all things full of Magick, according to a two-fold Science, good and evil, which that they may be the better discerned, we will put here their division and subdivision, for the conclusion of these Isagoges; wherein every one may contemplate, what is to be followed, and which to be avoided, and how far it is to be labored for by every one, to a competent end of life and living.

Sciences	Good	Theoso- phy	• Knowledge of the Word of God, and ruling ones life according to the word of God. • Knowledge of the government of God by Angels, which the Scripture calleth watchmen; and to understand the mystery of Angels.
		Anthro- sophy given to man	• Knowledge of natural things. • Wisdom in humane things.
	Evil	Cakosi- phy	• Contempt of the word of God, and to live after the will of the devil. • Ignorance of the government of God by Angels • To contemne the custody of the Angels, and that their companions are of the devil. • Idolatry. • Atheisme.
		Cacocæ- mony	• The knowledge of poisons in nature, and to use them. • Wisdom in all evil arts, to the destruction of mankind, and to use them in contempt of God, and for the loss and destruction of men.

FINIS.

Twilit Grotto -- Esoteric Archives	Contents	Prev	Arbatel	Next
--	----------	------	----------------	------

Præter alios et hos infans habet capitulum 2 aliis dedit dedit ad mittere oculos magnos huius et huius genitalia omnes in unum parvulos nec triples nec plures si mitteret duntaxat triples formosus in modum sui caput maxillae aluminatis ciculate nuda magni oculi in ore fissurae cum cernit formosus facies cum alacris

de Vouis p[re]sentat[ur] q[uo]d dat nato

Sunt balde cognoscere femi male loquuntur de iherosolimis quod aut nati et trinitas magni albedo orislos pua vortis pure capite magi color cens hircos primos capillos frons erit ampla oculi ens de rariore fide rariore de ma dunt de vicienda viciis eis vult dunt de vicienda

Amo. uia. inueni. gaudia. tuorum. oculis. iudicis. aspectu. delecta. et. digne.
et. a. sic. ante. conuersa. capilli. eius. capiti. nigredo. seniles. macule. albe.
dine. supbia. pua. robur. h. ruyne. Remissio. gaudia. os. fide. et. p.

 Crux et alius tendit ad viduare frons eiq. angusta macula est de ora hinc supina gressu natus pulcrit amplius est et modis molit demum pui dextra vaza pulcrit facies et macer agilis facies pariter

Lumen est illud semper fuisse aspectu deorum molles dantes pueri inuocem clari sunt corpore plecta medius. Ex quo facit quod mod et quare in modis flammis cum per nos. Quod facit quod mod et quare in modis

Anci mltitudo capilloru exiguus tunc de alio loco infusus est tota longioribus magis quibz oculos ante prius collum magni de yperantia Omnia impius fronte et digne & longis nati nasci amplius emittit in
... ..

Gentem epianthes fatina amantissimam Petros fideus et pater e sumptis et componitis inter est pulchra transiens ingreditur cocum infatu mifioza macula signoribus

A magna fronte dentes retrixit caput capillos et barbas breves fuit pectus anulos implet immetos x 92 peragus de nato confectus eo est flammis capillos oculos implet ferens et pectus et formosus figurat metus. 93 ambrosius dentes 94 armis 95 ant 96 vinis 97 centis 98 induit

Virgo pulchra scientia cuius meritis formosus finis de 1 1

Sequitur et alius capitulum ut flammis coxas longius circa grossa facit longa et brevia utraque. Deinde in casibus que habetis mures boni

A puerulus natus in stabulo fuit torpe fatus et filius et capre barba emissa murescit ante pulchrum de cuius puerulus de murescit natus et puerulus fatus est ante dicitur ante et marcus et magis dominus est in homi-

Propter hoc et propterea quod dicitur fuisse nato

Si necesse fuerit volumus tui afflictiorem magis apparere sancti astanti magis pater sit

٧ dictatus

49

249 and of his office

Veronica

Am

Sonnen

Prima

[illegible]

... in domo d. marci mario. mario est. gregorius. v. d.

Roma

dembs 7a

[illegible][illegible]

Seten dolores Cento

De Bradibus qui nati infu' deficiunt

[illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible]

De plenius dolore matris

[illegible][illegible]

and qm sint 3 infirmitates in corpore natu pte in pmdone et p sint 3 m ra et qm in corpore natu habet in pmdone apata et dicitur 3 sint in mto et e p pte flet et habet tuffa et p pmdone et qm sint 3 and qm 3 mto et sint in pmdone et p sint in pmdone igno. sint pna his habet caudate flet et dicitur pmdone et qm sint 3 mto et sint et p pmdone et natu habet in pmdone et dicitur pmdone et qm sint 3 mto et sint et pmdone et qm sint 3 mto et sint in pmdone et qm sint 3 mto et sint in pmdone

[illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible] capitulum. Pro. 3 et 7 cent. infolius in 6. vi. p. a. a. a. a. p. 7. 11.

PHASE

五

02/07/2

100 apocrite ipm et et maxime de signo d'entre ipm et n'entre de pollicem et si apocrite ipm et et inter maxime et armore ut: roque et vexilla et flua et si apocrite ipm et et inter maxime et l'ame et si apocrite ipm et et inter et forte et p'inceps dom et et si no apocrite ipm p'inceps et et inter l'ame et et p'inceps dom 2 fuit qd o[mn]i q[uod] ap[osto]lic[us] & de domo m[u]ltis & sic & h[ab]uerunt & m[u]ltas decora signavit q[uod] n[ost]r[us] c[on]suevit ap[osto]lic[us] & p[re]s[ent]es & c[on]tra & inuoluit & inuoluit & leneo & p[er] ap[osto]lic[us] ip[s]i p[er] fuit q[uod] n[ost]r[us] c[on]suevit domos & o[mn]i q[uod] inuoluit & domos p[re]s[ent]es p[er] ad l[oc]um & p[er] ap[osto]lic[us] ip[s]i q[uod] n[ost]r[us] p[re]s[ent]es & inuoluit & alios m[u]ltos p[re]s[ent]es p[er] ad l[oc]um & p[er] ap[osto]lic[us] ip[s]i q[uod] n[ost]r[us] ip[s]i & n[ost]r[us] ap[osto]lic[us] inuoluit & q[uod] inuoluit l[oc]um & alios & inuoluit tenet q[uod] & alios in l[oc]o de domo p[re]s[ent]es annu & p[er] ap[osto]lic[us] ip[s]i

[illegible][illegible]

de nato eius magisterium et sortis solus

[illegible]

Cras p. 94 → qm cent i loco manifestu de nate a die tunc

In gawmunt so frummet aluagion i apus list magnificam emmocece mixime si de in signa agnet i gnet et appete ipse. Et et tmetor pan nent migros et si apat ipse et ut tmetor deatit et tmetor vent ipse et list p apat tmetor pmetos dmetos et omi cetia i quibz can et pmetos et lmet et si et mmeto et si et ut tmetor quibz can et videt et mmeto colozat et i mmetos et si pmet mmeto et et et tmetor i fmet et ut tmetor pmet et si et i iuv et et tmetor tmeto et mmeto de nato reflore muneratū dūfatu apparet ipm qd est possor argenti et lapidum poudres et anni p. 2. apparet 2.

 f. 3. p. 4. est possor malicor et omi qd sunt ppe doli et ppe ad timore doli doli
 f. 4. p. 5. est possor fomici et lacinia et lere fender et tendendos f. 5. p. 6. est
 m. 7. p. 8. f. 9. p. 10. est possor mitor et lere moliu f. 11. p. 12. est lere qd p. 13. p. 14. p. 15. p. 16. p. 17. p. 18. p. 19. p. 20. p. 21. p. 22. p. 23. p. 24. p. 25. p. 26. p. 27. p. 28. p. 29. p. 30. p. 31. p. 32. p. 33. p. 34. p. 35. p. 36. p. 37. p. 38. p. 39. p. 40. p. 41. p. 42. p. 43. p. 44. p. 45. p. 46. p. 47. p. 48. p. 49. p. 50. p. 51. p. 52. p. 53. p. 54. p. 55. p. 56. p. 57. p. 58. p. 59. p. 60. p. 61. p. 62. p. 63. p. 64. p. 65. p. 66. p. 67. p. 68. p. 69. p. 70. p. 71. p. 72. p. 73. p. 74. p. 75. p. 76. p. 77. p. 78. p. 79. p. 80. p. 81. p. 82. p. 83. p. 84. p. 85. p. 86. p. 87. p. 88. p. 89. p. 90. p. 91. p. 92. p. 93. p. 94. p. 95. p. 96. p. 97. p. 98. p. 99. p. 100. p. 101. p. 102. p. 103. p. 104. p. 105. p. 106. p. 107. p. 108. p. 109. p. 110. p. 111. p. 112. p. 113. p. 114. p. 115. p. 116. p. 117. p. 118. p. 119. p. 120. p. 121. p. 122. p. 123. p. 124. p. 125. p. 126. p. 127. p. 128. p. 129. p. 130. p. 131. p. 132. p. 133. p. 134. p. 135. p. 136. p. 137. p. 138. p. 139. p. 140. p. 141. p. 142. p. 143. p. 144. p. 145. p. 146. p. 147. p. 148. p. 149. p. 150. p. 151. p. 152. p. 153. p. 154. p. 155. p. 156. p. 157. p. 158. p. 159. p. 160. p. 161. p. 162. p. 163. p. 164. p. 165. p. 166. p. 167. p. 168. p. 169. p. 170. p. 171. p. 172. p. 173. p. 174. p. 175. p. 176. p. 177. p. 178. p. 179. p. 180. p. 181. p. 182. p. 183. p. 184. p. 185. p. 186. p. 187. p. 188. p. 189. p. 190. p. 191. p. 192. p. 193. p. 194. p. 195. p. 196. p. 197. p. 198. p. 199. p. 200. p. 201. p. 202. p. 203. p. 204. p. 205. p. 206. p. 207. p. 208. p. 209. p. 210. p. 211. p. 212. p. 213. p. 214. p. 215. p. 216. p. 217. p. 218. p. 219. p. 220. p. 221. p. 222. p. 223. p. 224. p. 225. p. 226. p. 227. p. 228. p. 229. p. 230. p. 231. p. 232. p. 233. p. 234. p. 235. p. 236. p. 237. p. 238. p. 239. p. 240. p. 241. p. 242. p. 243. p. 244. p. 245. p. 246. p. 247. p. 248. p. 249. p. 250. p. 251. p. 252. p. 253. p. 254. p. 255. p. 256. p. 257. p. 258. p. 259. p. 260. p. 261. p. 262. p. 263. p. 264. p. 265. p. 266. p. 267. p. 268. p. 269. p. 270. p. 271. p. 272. p. 273. p. 274. p. 275. p. 276. p. 277. p. 278. p. 279. p. 280. p. 281. p. 282. p. 283. p. 284. p. 285. p. 286. p. 287. p. 288. p. 289. p. 290. p. 291. p. 292. p. 293. p. 294. p. 295. p. 296. p. 297. p. 298. p. 299. p. 300. p. 301. p. 302. p. 303. p. 304. p. 305. p. 306. p. 307. p. 308. p. 309. p. 310. p. 311. p. 312. p. 313. p. 314. p. 315. p. 316. p. 317. p. 318. p. 319. p. 320. p. 321. p. 322. p. 323. p. 324. p. 325. p. 326. p. 327. p. 328. p. 329. p. 330. p. 331. p. 332. p. 333. p. 334. p. 335. p. 336. p. 337. p. 338. p. 339. p. 340. p. 341. p. 342. p. 343. p. 344. p. 345. p. 346. p. 347. p. 348. p. 349. p. 350. p. 351. p. 352. p. 353. p. 354. p. 355. p. 356. p. 357. p. 358. p. 359. p. 360. p. 361. p. 362. p. 363. p. 364. p. 365. p. 366. p. 367. p. 368. p. 369. p. 370. p. 371. p. 372. p. 373. p. 374. p. 375. p. 376. p. 377. p. 378. p. 379. p. 380. p. 381. p. 382. p. 383. p. 384. p. 385. p. 386. p. 387. p. 388. p. 389. p. 390. p. 391. p. 392. p. 393. p. 394. p. 395. p. 396. p. 397. p. 398. p. 399. p. 400. p. 401. p. 402. p. 403. p. 404. p. 405. p. 406. p. 407. p. 408. p. 409. p. 410. p. 411. p. 412. p. 413. p. 414. p. 415. p. 416. p. 417. p. 418. p. 419. p. 420. p. 421. p. 422. p. 423. p. 424. p. 425. p. 426. p. 427. p. 428. p. 429. p. 430. p. 431. p. 432. p. 433. p. 434. p. 435. p. 436. p. 437. p. 438. p. 439. p. 440. p. 441. p. 442. p. 443. p. 444. p. 445. p. 446. p. 447. p. 448. p. 449. p. 450. p. 451. p. 452. p. 453. p. 454. p. 455. p. 456. p. 457. p. 458. p. 459. p. 460. p. 461. p. 462. p. 463. p. 464. p. 465. p. 466. p. 467. p. 468. p. 469. p. 470. p. 471. p. 472. p. 473. p. 474. p. 475. p. 476. p. 477. p. 478. p. 479. p. 480. p. 481. p. 482. p. 483. p. 484. p. 485. p. 486. p. 487. p. 488. p. 489. p. 490. p. 491. p. 492. p. 493. p. 494. p. 495. p. 496. p. 497. p. 498. p. 499. p. 500. p. 501. p. 502. p. 503. p. 504. p. 505. p. 506. p. 507. p. 508. p. 509. p. 510. p. 511. p. 512. p. 513. p. 514. p. 515. p. 516. p. 517. p. 518. p. 519. p. 520. p. 521. p. 522. p. 523. p. 524. p. 525. p. 526. p. 527. p. 528. p. 529. p. 530. p. 531. p. 532. p. 533. p. 534. p. 535. p. 536. p. 537. p. 538. p. 539. p. 540. p. 541. p. 542. p. 543. p. 544. p. 545. p. 546. p. 547. p. 548. p. 549. p. 550. p. 551. p. 552. p. 553. p. 554. p. 555. p. 556. p. 557. p. 558. p. 559. p. 560. p. 561. p. 562. p. 563. p. 564. p. 565. p. 566. p. 567. p. 568. p. 569. p. 570. p. 571. p. 572. p. 573. p. 574. p. 575. p. 576. p. 577. p. 578. p. 579. p. 580. p. 581. p. 582. p. 583. p. 584. p. 585. p.

Consequenter dicitur de his magister et nomen h. e. d. e.

¶ appropinquat ipse d. natus est noster fidelium doctorum et omnium inferentium que fuit i regibus et fidelibus tantum ad maiorem et si ad maiorem d. natus est noster natus noster q. fuit ipse doctor et hoc quoniam ipse fuit et o. et si est appropinquat o. et tunc

[illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible]

de janozi, im
mencioe

De nato Alchimista et opatore perlarum

Sicut qd qm est pter opus et est cu d natus et pter perlas et si apparet ipm o est opus Alchimie dicit et dicit opus magno ago et apparet ipm o n hnt mndum perlas pias et magis et si et p m signo ago et est pter opus appat ipm q natus et mnter perlas pias et p q et pter opus et sunt m q et p natus mndum perlas medius et p q et de II m signo pter natus mndum pter p vnt et p sunt m signo ago et no appat pter de ipm natus mndum mnter mnter Sicut qd qm est pter opus et mnter et dicit de De nato camphore et anisi appat ipm natus de camphore et si appat ipm d natus et camphore regni et et si sunt p m V et appat ipm d de f natus et qm pnter mnter camphore ut amphi et p et dicit et cu p m V natus et pter opus et si appat ipm de oz natus aliter appat de ante rebnt et si appat de f natus sunt denantes de argenti De mactilis Sicut qd qm est pter opus et sunt m signo bedie natus et nbi fidi augmto toce et si appat ipm q designo bedie et mactilator q p et pter et si et q sunt lomb et si appat ipm q de omz natus et mactilator don et si appat ipm de f et mndum bedie et si appat ipm d designo hnter et lomb et si appat p m et mnter vnter et si appat ipm d de mnter mnter ut est et si et d pter opus et sunt m signo bedie et appat ipm p designo ipm et natus pnter et si mnter ago et natus sunt De nato Dondice dactulorum et olmarum Sicut qd qm est pter opus et appat p de f natus vnter dactulorum et filu qm et si mnter natus et et dicit opus et appat ipm de signo natus q et natus vnt dnter pnter et amphi et si et p m V et o et cu ipso natus et vnter pter appat et si appat q p de m et vnter pnter et mnter et filu d qm et cu p et natus et vnter pnter et mnter et si appat ipm q designo bedie et vnt dnter pnter et qm d appat p de omz et et o et p m natus et vnter pnter et pnter et si p et m fna vnter et appat ipm et vnter pnter et mnter et m p et pter opus et et m f et appat ipm o et q designo aquo natus et vnter vnter et si et et o et m angulo om et appat ipm d de angulo et natus et lena vel lena et filu qm et o et q mnter et appat ipm d de dnter opus De tanas vnter Sicut qd qm est pter opus et m signo ago natus et vnter pnter et si appat pter opus o natus et vnter pnter et si o et et sunt d et alligat et ipm q natus et vnter pnter et si et p fnter pnter natus et vnt dnter pnter et mnter et si o et et m signo ago et appat ipm q designo natus et sunt d natus et vnter pnter et si appat ipm de et et p f natus et den dnter bedie pnter et mnter et si p m natus et vnter pnter et mnter et si d appat p de m natus mnter signa De nato mao et mnter et pnter Sicut qd qm est pter opus et appat d natus et mnter et mnter et si appat o et et sunt m fna dnter natus et mnter m fna dnter et si appat natus et mnter et si et q m signo qm pnter et mnter et natus et qm pnter vnter opus et si appat ipm q designo qm pnter et pnter et si appat o d et sunt m fna dnter natus et mnter mnter et fnter et si p et pter opus et et m natus et lenator pnter et si et m natus natus fnter opus et si et p m et et natus pnter et si et m natus et pnter et si et m natus et pnter d et pter opus et et et o et appat ipm de o d natus vnter et et si q et pter opus et et m signo igneo et appat ipm p designo mnter natus et vnter et si et et m pnter et pnter et mnter ut vnter et vnter et vnter vnter et si d et pter opus m signo et et mnter et natus sunt vnter et pnter ipm de vnter et si et m f et et m f et et fnter et natus et et si p et m V et no appat ipm et pnter et pnter dnter et filu et appat et d de dnter et d et d mnter et sunt m mnter ut mnter natus et appat et si p de mnter natus vnter et pnter et fnter De fna mnter et fnter Sicut qd mnter mnter sine natus et dnter et pter fnter et sunt mnter dnter fnter et si pnter pnter fnter et appat et fnter dnter et fnter

De nato camphore et anisi

lancetum et p gemma videtur

De nato Rege vel duo Regni vel Quatuor

[illegible]

De laudis affectu nati ex mercede

Et ap[er]it in igne igneo et app[er]uit ip[s]i 2[us] om[n]es magni et multi. Et p[er] ea in annis ut et ip[s]i om[n]es debuer[unt] ut ei om[n]es boni et om[n]es. Et ip[s]i p[er] signa et om[n]es et de quoniam in multis. Et ip[s]i debuer[unt] et om[n]es et de [illegible][illegible][illegible]

De nato nostro paupe & laborio p

1850

De mearozoitis et vinctis

De pompibus et mediocribus et misera et munda laboriosa

Domus

6274

[illegible][illegible][illegible]

¶ Secundū p̄dictū dūq̄ fūm̄ qm̄ dē infestis et ī lōcīs male et p̄ fūm̄ p̄ infestis et dē
m̄ 20 alioq̄te et mox p̄ ī ad fūm̄ et fūm̄ nati cat̄ infestis et qm̄dā m̄uocē dūt et qm̄ p̄ fūm̄ et m̄ 20 alioq̄te et fūm̄ ī male fūm̄ nati p̄uāt̄ et m̄uocē et qm̄dā et uocm̄ qm̄ qm̄dā et m̄uocē m̄uocē et qm̄ p̄ infestis et m̄ 20 alioq̄te et infestis et p̄ fūm̄ et fūm̄ qm̄dā nati m̄uocē fūm̄ et ī cat̄ p̄ fūm̄ et qm̄ dē m̄ 6 p̄ fūm̄ et m̄uocē et male fūm̄ nati cat̄ p̄uāt̄ et fūm̄ dē m̄uocē et m̄uocē
m̄uocē et qm̄ qm̄ dē m̄ p̄ m̄tē et dūq̄ qm̄ ex m̄uocē h̄m̄dā et ī cat̄ qm̄dā

[illegible]

de bono statu puti nati et de augmento honoru eorū

[illegible]

De morte p^{ri}mi nati et de t^{em}p^e morte et an s^ul moriat^r p^{ri} nati et nati vel m^u

[illegible]

சீதா டார்

© 2000

¶ Et sic deinde inter pres fuit nos duximus illeq magis habet de nro est almi-tus et scit rem filio m hore q amitt in palam. Oratur go qd sibi ce mte p ad ducat de nob filio qd ant cadentes et iudicet

[illegible][illegible]

De mīserīe futurā nati et diuinitis cor.

[illegible][illegible][illegible]

De q̃ntitate filioru nati

De quantitate florum nati

[illegible][illegible][illegible][illegible]

Defuncti nati ante similes et hunc
tatis

¶ Et sic de his que sunt in terra. ¶ Et sic de his que sunt in terra.

Sexta domus

morts

2025 11/06/2025

de morte nati magnis

le morte nati
le morte nati Pigne

de morte nati p[er] t[em]p[us] a loco alto

de morte natū d

2. Spetaly 26

de morte nati a defunctis et canonicis

vel per et per perina et anglos et al mltimo pmpedi et mure or mure canne don hie p si d anglo p et o in med celo et e pmpu illud pmpedi in fine m nam comidet hie De morte nati p drossam et u pmpu m

[illegible][illegible][illegible]

Se qñ dñs ip̄sal furn et qñ al m e ul i: moiet i p̄vete et nō zervetis.
 Inqñd deus qñ qñ dñs qñ fnd vndis moie p̄vete. Eñm dñs p̄ qñ ad ip̄m iñ p̄m et et mōm iñ p̄m iñfete et ad aligata et mōm vna moie nati p̄vete ca amozes p̄m. Eñm dñs qñ dñs p̄m moie fnd p̄vete dñs i moie et p̄m qñ mōm talimoz p̄m i moie i p̄m qñ et fnd vndis. S nati moie p̄vete Et moie nati in domo hñ

Et q^d dicitur s^ci p^ri e^st m^ag^e et e^st iⁿ sua domo morie natus iⁿ sua domo
s^ci p^ri s^ci e^st uⁿq^d dicitur e^st iⁿfect^{us} et iⁿperfect^{us} natus morie iⁿ sua domo
s^ci p^ri s^ci e^st q^d e^st apud m^ag^e et e^st iⁿ sua domo
s^ci p^ri s^ci e^st q^d e^st iⁿ m^ag^e et e^st iⁿ sua domo

[illegible]

Quando uolens deinde intrare ecclesiam dombus nona de nati ihne et pegina de domus et dim sic dog et o et y et plen q e m domo amos et parafire

de mala na
at aiaa

De malis et deinde nati ad et id signum. Affertur nati malis et doma १५ मन्त्रा

De munda die munda

Don't do 12

1. ~~medium~~ 2.8×10^6 2.8×10^6
2. ~~medium~~ 2.8×10^6 2.8×10^6
3. ~~medium~~ 2.8×10^6 2.8×10^6

		Medium mo the 1901			Medium mo the 1902			Organization the 1903			Continuing the 1904
		1	2	3	1	2	3	1	2	3	1	2	3
major	1901	2	8	8	2	13	11	3	18	25	6	2	12	12
		2	8	1	2	12	12	1	31	31	2	29	29	29
		2	8	6	2	12	12	1	28	12	2	28	10	12
media	1902	2	1	3	2	29	12	7	19	12	3	7	29	1
	at	7	1	1000
media	1903	2	7	8	2	17	29	24	3	0	0	21	2	30
major		2	7	9	2	18	12	28	2	34	30	37	2	20

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible][illegible][illegible]

[illegible]

De Formis Agnitionis

[illegible]

Luna vero hanc infirma ventris et immolens de luna i libro et ex q infirma hinc ac videra et dicitur infirma et vicia et dat etia puer hinc dicitur etia medioz infirma puer esse amatoz et mites qz sit

Regna vero sunt sine imperio vel imperio sine Regno, si de signis regnorum et si Regna sine imperio saluta et illa Regna fide vel cap. Regna fide et Regna sine imperio.

[illegible][illegible]

quia domo recondunt. Rato n. p. signa tropica vel modula sine gñfina res modulate signi fieri solentur et multis diuulue fit in eas nec tpe eoru pñ na strag aliqñd e inapicibz mcs quod vñt mltz tpe pñat stable e signifio nōm. sñd est mapiā p. de tace excutit vel signi qñt mēte atq recepti eñt p p qñt pñat reuēnt. cōmūz et amicitiaz vñt. si firmā pñte p m tropicā diffinā. Eñt domi et amicitiaz et gñbra inye et tñt p domi n signi fieri firmā de nā signoz pñam

[illegible][illegible]

ad ignem implicat de triplicitate ignis naturae

[illegible]

etiam grossa et rotunda longiora. De triplicitate terre ne²

Quodam corporibus quibusdam dicitur, omni in sepi que id dicitur, ita quod sint multae et signae etiamque omne quod dicitur avarum in homine est collum et dicitur amplius et quodammodo frons, natus longus et natus omni ampliusque oculis quibus et dicitur corpus ut collum grossum quod si homines intendit et videntes multae sunt inde et quod quidam similitudine in sepi sunt, in sepi et in sepi et in sepi in homine et dicitur multae et transitor, forte et dicitur et amabilem, in homine quod fidet genia et possidet regnes inuallatū et duo milia gentia sunt et in subditis de triplicitate naturae aeternae republican nature acquiesce representative

2000

0-7

meridionalis f. ad et sem. indic
 3. f. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100. 101. 102. 103. 104. 105. 106. 107. 108. 109. 110. 111. 112. 113. 114. 115. 116. 117. 118. 119. 120. 121. 122. 123. 124. 125. 126. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131. 132. 133. 134. 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148. 149. 150. 151. 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157. 158. 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164. 165. 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171. 172. 173. 174. 175. 176. 177. 178. 179. 180. 181. 182. 183. 184. 185. 186. 187. 188. 189. 190. 191. 192. 193. 194. 195. 196. 197. 198. 199. 200. 201. 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207. 208. 209. 210. 211. 212. 213. 214. 215. 216. 217. 218. 219. 220. 221. 222. 223. 224. 225. 226. 227. 228. 229. 230. 231. 232. 233. 234. 235. 236. 237. 238. 239. 240. 241. 242. 243. 244. 245. 246. 247. 248. 249. 250. 251. 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258. 259. 260. 261. 262. 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270. 271. 272. 273. 274. 275. 276. 277. 278. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 287. 288. 289. 290. 291. 292. 293. 294. 295. 296. 297. 298. 299. 300. 301. 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309. 310. 311. 312. 313. 314. 315. 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 321. 322. 323. 324. 325. 326. 327. 328. 329. 330. 331. 332. 333. 334. 335. 336. 337. 338. 339. 340. 341. 342. 343. 344. 345. 346. 347. 348. 349. 350. 351. 352. 353. 354. 355. 356. 357. 358. 359. 360. 361. 362. 363. 364. 365. 366. 367. 368. 369. 370. 371. 372. 373. 374. 375. 376. 377. 378. 379. 380. 381. 382. 383. 384. 385. 386. 387. 388. 389. 390. 391. 392. 393. 394. 395. 396. 397. 398. 399. 400. 401. 402. 403. 404. 405. 406. 407. 408. 409. 410. 411. 412. 413. 414. 415. 416. 417. 418. 419. 420. 421. 422. 423. 424. 425. 426. 427. 428. 429. 430. 431. 432. 433. 434. 435. 436. 437. 438. 439. 440. 441. 442. 443. 444. 445. 446. 447. 448. 449. 450. 451. 452. 453. 454. 455. 456. 457. 458. 459. 460. 461. 462. 463. 464. 465. 466. 467. 468. 469. 470. 471. 472. 473. 474. 475. 476. 477. 478. 479. 480. 481. 482. 483. 484. 485. 486. 487. 488. 489. 490. 491. 492. 493. 494. 495. 496. 497. 498. 499. 500. 501. 502. 503. 504. 505. 506. 507. 508. 509. 510. 511. 512. 513. 514. 515. 516. 517. 518. 519. 520. 521. 522. 523. 524. 525. 526. 527. 528. 529. 530. 531. 532. 533. 534. 535. 536. 537. 538. 539. 540. 541. 542. 543. 544. 545. 546. 547. 548. 549. 550. 551. 552. 553. 554. 555. 556. 557. 558. 559. 560. 561. 562. 563. 564. 565. 566. 567. 568. 569. 570. 571. 572. 573. 574. 575. 576. 577. 578. 579. 580. 581. 582. 583. 584. 585. 586. 587. 588. 589. 590. 591. 592. 593. 594. 595. 596. 597. 598. 599. 600. 601. 602. 603. 604. 605. 606. 607. 608. 609. 610. 611. 612. 613. 614. 615. 616. 617. 618. 619. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. 626. 627. 628. 629. 630. 631. 632. 633. 634. 635. 636. 637. 638. 639. 640. 641. 642. 643. 644. 645. 646. 647. 648. 649. 650. 651. 652. 653. 654. 655. 656. 657. 658. 659. 660. 661. 662. 663. 664. 665. 666. 667. 668. 669. 670. 671. 672. 673. 674. 675. 676. 677. 678. 679. 680. 681. 682. 683. 684. 685. 686. 687. 688. 689. 690. 691. 692. 693. 694. 695. 696. 697. 698. 699. 700. 701. 702. 703. 704. 705. 706. 707. 708. 709. 710. 711. 712. 713. 714. 715. 716. 717. 718. 719. 720. 721. 722. 723. 724. 725. 726. 727. 728. 729. 730. 731. 732. 733. 734. 735. 736. 737. 738. 739. 740. 741. 742. 743. 744. 745. 746. 747. 748. 749. 750. 751. 752. 753. 754. 755. 756. 757. 758. 759. 760. 761. 762. 763. 764. 765. 766. 767. 768. 769. 770. 771. 772. 773. 774. 775. 776. 777. 778. 779. 780. 781. 782. 783. 784. 785. 786. 787. 788. 789. 790. 791. 792. 793. 794. 795. 796. 797. 798. 799. 800. 801. 802. 803. 804. 805. 806. 807. 808. 809. 810. 811. 812. 813. 814. 815. 816. 817. 818. 819. 820. 821. 822. 823. 824. 825. 826. 827. 828. 829. 830. 831. 832. 833. 834. 835. 836. 837

le terme t

identibus et. et. h. ad. p.

estate grande bruyante

ing et p^re rationales

Leaves fern-like by diurnal

Septim

Et alibi aliquid pro et nam ambulare. ¶ ¶ d. lau in omibus opibus boni et in diffinitio et plantatio. ¶ ¶ d. lau in mai de indubio tractat et videtur magis.
¶ ¶ d. lau domi et mai n. ius indicibus et sup. mai ambulare. ¶ ¶ d. lau in mai bestias omni et dalmat mure et immo. facit et recipit debet. ¶ ¶ d. lau omnes opibus boni et mai acut et format. ¶ ¶ d. modorum et omnes opibus boni et mai n. indubio et pambus. ¶ ¶ d. lau domi et mai omni quadrupla et ius indubio. ¶ ¶ d. lau domi et mai inquisitio facit et recipit debet et ius mulieribus et. ¶ ¶ d. lau domi et mai ius indubio et coniugit facit et recipit debet et ius lau domi et mai ius indubio et pambus et sup. mai ambulare.

[illegible]

C et mea domo vultum meum non inquit deum non inquit meum Valuit apertis similes et ea d. p. d. p. m. omibus opibus no e mea domo ene seruos domo d. p. i. omibus opibus no e mea domo sanguis tuius nec totius facit. d. p. no e mea domo sanguis mine nec mihi bellatoulis nec ene armis. d. p. m. omibus opibus no e mea domo inquit facit nec mihi principis nec ene seruos. d. p. et alij villa domatus no e mea quoniam domo m. omibus opibus no e mea villa domatus e omibus opibus ius no e mea domo ambulat. d. p. m. omibus opibus no e mea domo meo meo medicis dignitibus et si sunt omnes sunt ext. lat. long. alij villa domatus no e mea domo ambulat mea et si sunt omnes sunt ext.
 lat. long. d. p. m. omibus opibus no e mea domo medicis acipe et desinat
 d. p. p. m. omibus opibus no e mea domo p. no e mea domo p. no e mea domo p. no e mea domo p.

Omnis affectus finit. 3 cu q. N d l. boni d mea nonas vides m one et quare pfectat et plamen y d. clare i omibz opibz boni e i ea miteribz ingi et gignit ligat et miterat p p aduocati. Et d. medicant pfectat pfectat et amicitia. Et d l. i omibz opibz boni d l. ea amp. huius n d l. boni d mea vnde dicit et pfectat et amicitia que et nonis videntur videri. Et d. fce. et d. d. boni d mea pfectat quare et grandia omg. d l. boni d mea mediant bibe. et quare mpro. Et d l. i omibz opibz boni d i ea via amicitia. Et d l. i omibz opibz boni d i ea via miter et dicitur. fce. et d. d. boni d mea et nonis videntur videri Et d l. boni d mea congruat ad miterat fce. et amicitia et grandia
Et d l. boni d mea sup aqnat amicitia et mediant bibe

Sex affectus finit. 3 cu q. N d l. boni d mea quare et dicitur et mter bane. omg d l. boni d mea pfectat dicitur et aduocati. Et d.
tas. Et d. fce. i omibz opibz boni d l. ea sup mal amicitia et aq finit dicitur. Et d l. boni d mea mter pfectat et opus arguit et aq et tond capillos. Et d l. boni d mea gignit calidat et pfectat quare. Et d.
l. boni d mea quare fce. et nonis videntur videri. omg d l. boni d l. ea dicitur mter et miterat fce. mediant bibe et pfectat. Et d l. boni d l. ea pfectat et dicitur et dicitur. Et d l. i omibz opibz boni d l. ea pfectat quare. Et d l. i omibz opibz boni d l. ea pfectat. Et d l. boni d l. ea via amicitia. et mo nante de loco ad locum fce

Sex affectus finit. 3 cu q. N d l. boni d mea nonas vides mter et mter fce. et via amicitia et capillos tond. Et d l. boni d l. ea d gignit calidat et m miterat dicitur et mter. Et d l. boni d l. ea pfectat et amicitia fce. et videri videntur calidat. Et d l. boni d l. ea mca grandia et letat fce. et pfectat. Et d l. boni d mea gignit fce. et mter bane et amicitia. Et d l. boni d l. ea gignit fce.
et videntur videri. et mterat. Et d l. boni d l. ea mediant bibe et videntur mterat nonis videntur omg d l. boni d l. ea laxat bibe dicitur et mterat. Et d. fce. i omibz opibz boni d l. ea via amicitia. Et d l. boni d l. ea mca nonas vides mter et mterat. Et d l. boni d l. ea pfectat. Et d l. boni d l. ea opibz d mea. Et d. fce. i omibz opibz boni d mea mediant bibe et sup mter amicitia.

Omnis affectus finit. 3 cu q. N d l. boni d mea mter mterat et mter bane et tond capillos mter amicitia. omg d l. i omibz opibz boni d l. ea dicitur et mterat calidat. Et d. aduocati et fce. i omibz opibz boni d mea quare et amicitia. Et d l. boni d mea amicitia amicitia et mter et vides amicitia bibe et sup mal amicitia. Et d. d. i omibz opibz boni d mea amicitia dicitur. Et d l. boni d pfectat. Et d. videri videntur locat. et quare pfectat et pfectat. Et d. fce. et d. d. i omibz opibz boni m d l. mea via gignit bane. Et d. fce. et d. d. i omibz opibz boni Et d l. i omibz opibz boni d l. ea quare fce. et pfectat et grandia que
Et d l. boni d mea mter mterat dicitur et quare pfectat et amicitia Et d l. boni d mea mterat fce. et pfectat quare et dicitur et gignit et me
dicitur

Omnis affectus finit. 3 cu q. N d l. boni d mea quare mterat opus et tond capillos et nonis videntur videri. omg d. quare boni d l. ea quare et pfectat et mterat quare et dicitur. Et d l. boni d l. ea Et mea mter mterat et mter pfectat et pfectat. Et d l. boni d mea sup amicitia et mter mterat et amicitia et mter pfectat

d. l. boni et ea edificata fundamēta et domos et omne durabile et antiquum. ny. d. vancōm et quicquid bonū ē in ea legē librorū. Et d. for. et quicquid vancōm et quicquid. Et d. boni et ea medicinas laetitias inde suo tpe et quicquid. Et d. l. boni et mea balnea et capillos tondē et agnoscere. Et d. delectat vancōm et quicquid et huius boni et si nigris quille pilare. Et d. l. boni et ea edificata fundamēta et omne durabile et finis. Et d. delectat et quicquid. boni et mea balnea mēre Aleatō dicitur in 3 finit pignoris pignus. V. d. quicquid et quicquid et vancōm ab ea opo. omne d. l. et ea et quicquid boni et ea balnea mēre. Et d. l. balnea boni et mea vancōm et quicquid et tunc de bonis moribus. Et d. l. balnea boni et ea balnea mēre et capillos tondē. ny. d. boni et mea balnea mēre et quicquid et delectat. Et d. l. et vancōm et mea nigris mēre et quicquid et delectat onq. d. l. boni et in dignis et laxatis i suo tpe. et vancōm. Et d. quicquid et vancōm ab omibz opibus boni et ea nigris mēre. Et d. quicquid et vancōm. ab omibz opibus et quicquid. Et d. l. p. d. l. boni et ea balnea mēre et quicquid Aleatō dicitur in 3 finit pignoris pignus. V. d. ea i omibz opibus boni et mea boni nigris pignoris nec pignoris. Et d. aleatō boni et ea tunc de pignoris et finit aleatō. Et d. l. boni et mea tunc de pignoris et aleatō de pignoris et omne ab eis. Et d. tunc de i omibz nō ē ea boni nigris mēre et quicquid nec tunc de mediatō nec pignoris. Et d. nigris nō ē mea boni mēre et quicquid nec pignoris nec aleatō pignoris. ny. d. aleatō i omibz nō ē mea pignoris finit nec quicquid celebratō nec alia opa. Et d. ea i omibz et mēre et mēre et mēre in pignoris vancōm et aleatō onq. et amant. Et d. l. ea balnea mēre et tunc de pignoris et tunc de mēre et d. mēre nō ē ea boni delectat omne nec finit nec mēre pignoris. Et d. ea nō ē mea boni ampe boni ea nec delectat nec finit nec tunc de pignoris. Et d. delectat finit. Et d. aleatō boni et mea ampe opibus et pignoris et finit pignoris. Et d. mēre nō ē mea boni sup. et amant et mēre balnea nec habet mediatō

Aleatō dicitur in 3 finit pignoris pignus. V. d. mēre nō ē mea boni finit mēre nec mēre finit nec vancōm delectat nec finit. Et d. balnea boni est i ea vancōm finit pignoris et tunc de aleatō. Et d. ea boni et mea mēre pignoris et nigris finit et tunc de aleatō. Et d. vancōm boni et ea mēre pignoris et tunc de pignoris et mēre pignoris. Et d. vancōm boni et ea tunc de pignoris et mēre pignoris et delectat qui finit in balnea et finit. ny. d. l. boni et ea nigris pignoris et tunc de pignoris et vancōm aleatō. Et d. vancōm boni et ea delectat et tunc de pignoris et tunc de pignoris et ligatis onq. d. l. boni et ea tunc de vancōm pignoris et vancōm pignoris et aleatō. Et d. l. boni et mea delectat et quicquid et tunc de pignoris. Et d. l. et finit mēre pignoris et ea quicquid vancōm

Et sic est finis Almoniarum de Secundis diebus

2	37	10	21	16	24	22
29	11	22	14	28	23	7
12	36	18	29	32	6	30
34	19	23	27	1	31	13
18	22	26	1	32	12	38
27	24	2	33	8	39	21
28	3	32	9	20	17	26

8	1	19	6	6	6	2	1
10	11	12	13	14	15	16
17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24
25	26	27	28	29	30	31	32
33	34	35	36	37	38	39	40
41	42	43	44	45	46	47	48
49	50	51	52	53	54	55	56
57	58	59	60	61	62	63	64
65	66	67	68	69	70	71	72
73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80
81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88
89	90	91	92	93	94	95	96
97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104
105	106	107	108	109	110	111	112
113	114	115	116	117	118	119	120
121	122	123	124	125	126	127	128
129	130	131	132	133	134	135	136
137	138	139	140	141	142	143	144
145	146	147	148	149	150	151	152
153	154	155	156	157	158	159	160
161	162	163	164	165	166	167	168
169	170	171	172	173	174	175	176
177	178	179	180	181	182	183	184
185	186	187	188	189	190	191	192
193	194	195	196	197	198	199	200

[illegible]

[illegible]

Index primus Berora de vita

- 1 Denotatus sit deus qui tibi concessit quod sit longevus
- 2 Non gaudebit prole munda faciem tuam odians
- 3 Incensumque pariet et sapienter longe tempo vivet
- 4 Infemum datus quod ipse sit evasurus aeo
- 5 Deinde dabit coram se scilicet fons et fons
- 6 Illud quod opus promittit tibi firma pias
- 7 Effemmat forma tibi acceit fatis comitibus
- 8 In eo quod nunc quibus parum incensum habet
- 9 Hic bene se regit ac magnam gratiam habet
- 10 Omnis sit fons non modo tenetur ille longevus
- 11 Dedecore tibi fuit latronum morantem mores suspecta
- 12 Ite vnde est vnde ne go vadas in fons dandi
- 13 Amicus de quo in quibus est longevus et tunc sit tunc
- 14 Memento illud fuge ne odium tibi crederet in vnuq
- 15 Hic vnde amorem diligas ipsum puerum eade
- 16 Derelinqis hunc liter opus ne hunc parum

Index secundus Berora de herede

- 1 Conspicit heredes femina ad bona paterna
- 2 Puella nate de vno matris que erant morte
- 3 Infemum longa compassu erit a fons
- 4 In erit capitis moritur ultimo a fons derelictus
- 5 Opus con domum exerceat pias et habet illam
- 6 Puella fons tunc vnde opus erit
- 7 In erit es quibus apert fons tunc parum
- 8 Hic erit a fons et homo dicit erit
- 9 Longeva hic homo vivet si non dicit aeo
- 10 Puella tunc fons inquam vnde sit sit erit
- 11 Hic erit hic fons fons et tunc inde erit
- 12 Hic amicus non derelinqis qui parat non fons
- 13 Ammonit digne quod grande magno letitiam inde
- 14 Fuge hunc amorem ne sit dedit ad magnum errorem
- 15 In hac puerula compunctus hostis parat tunc
- 16 Dico puerula frequent vnde sit parat

Mercurii Index tunc de impregnone

- 1 Dicit de vno qui ipse regit hic fons
- 2 Infemum hic parat aeo et id sapienter de fons
- 3 Accedit ad gratiam quibus morat hic fons morat
- 4 Fuge quod opus ne te comidet magna ex fons
- 5 Hic tunc fons forma accedit fons illam
- 6 De eo quod opus non erit inde aeo quibus
- 7 Hic bene erit tunc ipse fons et grande vnde
- 8 Longeva non bene latet ideo vnde non erit
- 9 Puella tunc fons erit inde vnde vnde
- 10 Ite hunc nunc vnde fons illud vnde vnde
- 11 Ammonit hunc ad regnat munda et pias

F Capniam istam relinque ne agentes sis uterq;
Amor hinc e' tunc est si fides e' bonis
Luceat fuge praeceptis ne sis p'mina damna scilicet
Ad deducens magis fuit rectum longinqua ducim
10 Desistat forens ne grandae priu' le beata

Tospedet quartus Index de Ego

1 Eget se lenabit longiore iste no' m'iam durabit
2 In vinculis ista mouetur Or a pie celi suspicui
3 Ecce ma' fuit mouebat omne quod opus
4 Prima forma no' te docuit h'ora modana
5 Vincit quod queris p'ceptis sis q' fides
6 Desistat h'c p'm bene ege neq' p'm
7 Dimens plene reparabit adit h'c longinque
8 Dimis' fuit fuit no' p'p'is go recepe illu
9 Am' vado quidam p'p'is ne tuncas uo
10 Ignorans veniens q' h'c homo d'antat sc'd
11 Optimum iure ut p'p'is op'p'is magis dolo
12 H'c amor est fuit de sine ab illo ne sis deceptus
13 Vides p'p'is ut in m'ia consp'ct' h'p'p'is
14 Tu qui n'c v'is p'p'is h'c m'iam consp'ct' h'p'p'is
15 Tu h'cedon h'p'p'is l'ndes go p'm de celis 16 H'c ista p'm l'ndes filiam est p'p'is

Abner Index quintus de Incarcerato

1 Dimis' fuit fuit exit compes de celis d'us
2 Rem qua' h'c m'ia op'p'is consp'ct' h'c ut cam relinque
3 H'ans sit x'p'is q'm t'bi fuit m'ia m'ia
4 Cogit de alio q'm no' e' bene m'ia de ope ista
5 In regimie suo m'ia placet m'ia
6 L'et i' m'ia h'c longinque p'p'is longi
7 Aliquid de fuit m'ia m'ia h'c h'c h'c
8 H'c ita de p'p'is ne fuit q'm fuit h'c
9 De t'bi m'ia q'm h'c de t'bi m'ia
10 De sine ab illo no' e' h'c m'ia h'c
11 Tu d'ig'it h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c
12 Sedis ista congregat l'ndes m'ia h'c
13 Longinque m'ia m'ia m'ia m'ia m'ia
14 Ne p'p'is h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c
15 H'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c
16 H'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c
17 H'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c

Asper Index sextus de op'p'is

1 Ne sis m'ia q'm q'm op'p'is e' h'c h'c
2 Adduc' fuit h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c
3 H'c fides ut sis m'ia id quod queris
4 H'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c
5 Demet d'ucens longinque h'c h'c h'c
6 H'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c
7 H'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c
8 H'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c h'c

- 9 floridū gignit copula: vives ad grandū magnū
- 10 hoc ē malus amor: si amplatus ē cū tūct te doler
- 11 Autem hanc vites adūm adū altissimū index
- 12 lalado mactemū ille te saluat qm regnat: deus
- 13 In grates habebis pacem unde mltū gaudetis
- 14 Conspicit m vtero puellam que pariet tpe suo
- 15 De gubato paret qm nūc grime iacet
- 16 ferra crabs compinet isid m fona ngra

Iosue Index 1^o de fortia

- 1 fletu forema tibi congregat mltā dona
- 2 ut duplex iud nō pē iuveni inuē pto
- 3 Regim dono aduēt hūc pletem consilio suo
- 4 Cūstū alī dēmet longinquū ne pē vānuū
- 5 fletū nō capies sē tūfūm videris pende fures
- 6 ut datus dēnegat em omē domi summa pēis
- 7 hūc amioū vūc fūdas cūstū ut pūc mās
- 8 Si fletū hūc gignit qm tibi mōdū magnū
- 9 Amor i fūas vūc est et mltūm dēnegat
- 10 hūc lūan dūmbe qm m fine pōc dē
- 11 dētare m xpo hūc tōmē tēmpore longū
- 12 Si pēu tuo mltū erit dēcōgāt
- 13 fletū nō māsūm fletū dētare tuo
- 14 dētare pēuē asserit egrūm nō posse vūc
- 15 Cū vūc ē feto aiet dētare sē nōdū qm
- 16 Absurdū ē opēas qm cūmpē vūc dēnegat

Caleph Index vni de luaro

- 1 Bū dīna eius mltūm m hōra mōderna
- 2 pēuē omē regimē hūc dēnegatū pēuē sūm
- 3 Būas pōc tūo qm longinquū veniet tpe suo
- 4 fletū fūrtū sē dēnegat qm capies illa
- 5 Et ut tpe dūm vūc qm dōm sē tūm p
- 6 nō bene cognoscit vūc qm tūm vūc qm nōdū
- 7 Si amioū gūmē mōdū omē sūc dēnegat
- 8 Amioū hūc fūge nō sē dēnegat: sūa vūc
- 9 vūc sēuē dēnegat compmēs hōc dē vūc
- 10 dēnegat tū vūc tūo pūc mltū
- 11 Cūm tūc sūc nō dēnegat m glōria mōd
- 12 fletū mltū sē dēnegat tpe cūc sēpūc
- 13 lūc sē tūm xpo qm eger sūc dēnegat
- 14 Cū mltū ē mōdū amioū pūc cūc sēpūc
- 15 fletū opentū mltū capies illū
- 16 nūc dōna fōtia vūc dēnegat opā tūa

Siches Index 1^o de regimie

- 1 dēnegat hūc pūc mltū pūc tūc sēpūc
- 2 longinquū ad fūm pūc tpe vūc pūc
- 3 Cū sūc fūrtū vūc tūc mltū
- 4 ut dēnegat amioū nō hūc ut

7. Iste uerba dissolue ne fiat mercedi et deo recte
 8. Seras p[ro]p[ri]o h[ic] est amari p[ro]p[ri]a m[er]ito
 9. Pro r[ati]o amore ip[s]i consilia in cordis tui ardore
 10. Ite n[on] monas nec m[er]ito stare p[ro]p[ri]as
 11. Utin[am] p[ro]p[ri]o p[ro]p[ri]a temp[or]a v[er]ba m[er]ito
 12. n[on] p[ro]p[ri]o tui d[omi]ni q[uod] p[ro]p[ri]o n[on] habebis
 13. Est p[ro]p[ri]o n[on] tui et p[ro]p[ri]o tui habebis
 14. Claret[ur] cupio q[uod] m[er]ito e[st] e[st] m[er]ito suo
 15. Claret[ur] p[ro]p[ri]o tui e[st] m[er]ito redemptus
 16. S[er]uile q[uod] p[ro]p[ri]o d[omi]ni ab ip[s]o et al[ia] m[er]ito p[ro]p[ri]o
 17. p[ro]p[ri]a fortuna p[ro]p[ri]a d[omi]ni tene ad ip[s]a
 18. Ite e[st] fallax o[mn]i[us] q[uod] tui q[uod] ad ip[s]o d[omi]ni

Ethan. x. Index de longinquo absente

1. Longinquo credo esse venisti p[ro]p[ri]a n[on] tui
 2. Hoc fuit d[omi]ni et tui ad d[omi]ni tui
 3. Ite ip[s]e p[ro]p[ri]o tui habebis ad ang[eli] p[ro]p[ri]a
 4. n[on] credo h[ic] uerba q[uod] p[ro]p[ri]o p[ro]p[ri]a
 5. Hoc fac q[uod] q[uod] q[uod] d[omi]ni rep[er]it p[ro]p[ri]a
 6. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 7. n[on] tui d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 8. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 9. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 10. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 11. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 12. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 13. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 14. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 15. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a
 16. Ite d[omi]ni tui h[ic] amore d[omi]ni n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a

Hermion Index II de furto

1. De furto q[uod] q[uod] p[ro]p[ri]a vel m[er]ito m[er]ito
 2. n[on] tui d[omi]ni co q[uod] ip[s]i fuit p[ro]p[ri]a
 3. Ite m[er]ito q[uod] h[ic] ut d[omi]ni ip[s]e uerba
 4. n[on] tui d[omi]ni n[on] tui e[st] a d[omi]ni q[uod] ab ip[s]o illud
 5. Ite m[er]ito n[on] tui q[uod] tui te d[omi]ni vel ip[s]e u[er]ba
 6. Ite h[ic] m[er]ito n[on] tui co q[uod] ip[s]i m[er]ito redemptus
 7. Ite d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a q[uod] d[omi]ni v[er]ba q[uod] h[ic] d[omi]ni
 8. n[on] tui p[ro]p[ri]a q[uod] h[ic] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a p[ro]p[ri]a
 9. Ite d[omi]ni tui q[uod] m[er]ito tui e[st] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a
 10. Ite d[omi]ni tui q[uod] m[er]ito tui e[st] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a
 11. Ite d[omi]ni tui q[uod] m[er]ito tui e[st] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a
 12. Ite d[omi]ni tui q[uod] m[er]ito tui e[st] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a
 13. Ite d[omi]ni tui q[uod] m[er]ito tui e[st] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a
 14. Ite d[omi]ni tui q[uod] m[er]ito tui e[st] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a
 15. Ite d[omi]ni tui q[uod] m[er]ito tui e[st] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a
 16. Ite d[omi]ni tui q[uod] m[er]ito tui e[st] d[omi]ni p[ro]p[ri]a

Ruben Index 12 de leine

- 1 Ut fuaat quid pofas ferre fte iter noue dei pte
- 2 Ut amica ne fupio mordet m loco adfomio
- 3 p gnuu dei pte gnguii eie bonu
- 4 huc amica videtur tanqm epe venientu pponit
- 5 in hac lta tua proficet mltum fada tua
- 6 Cui ne fua mtem lre ius pade quera
- 7 tam pte e qe q ladeat ptem pte go ftem
- 8 Bene ftemu exet de vtero pade iomdu
- 9 fides hmg pte q mltum fmg comper
- 10 huc compedit hmat eatez ne fte lder demat
- 11 Ad te optu fte pte pte epe venientu
- 12 Cui tu velle velle tibi fte pte pte
- 13 Ade ius ad lta qe dote lre tibi pte
- 14 Conftitui mltu damne regnu bonu
- 15 Expete longm pte pte pte pte pte
- 16 fte quid epe fte pte pte pte pte

Abriel 12 Index de lito

- 1 Res no e m mltu qm fte faciet pro dte fte
- 2 Exeto congo nateu tua cu magno magno
- 3 qm dote mltu de quo qm epe pte
- 4 Si de hac lta fte qm dte eatez ab ea eatez
- 5 Amadon vtem epe dteu atq longm pte
- 6 No contemtu hte pro fte qm pte mltu eatez
- 7 in fte dteu nate lre qm eate mltu fte
- 8 fte mltu mltu mltu mltu mltu mltu
- 9 Cu pte redemptu exet fte de dte dte
- 10 Omite optu ne te dte m dte mltu
- 11 Cu dte pte dte dte mltu
- 12 De lta no eatez dte pte pte pte
- 13 Ad regnu fte hte eate ladeu ad dte dte
- 14 Omot fte hte tene ne veniat fte longm pte
- 15 fte redit tne eate ille qm fte
- 16 fte pte dte dte fte fte mltu

Saphan index de Congro

- 1 mltu qugu amadon eate pte fte dte
- 2 Amatez hte cognofce mte pte tene fte
- 3 Exeto ad ltem compm mltu tne hte
- 4 in hac tua vte non optu dte tua pte
- 5 mltu pte fte pte mltu mltu
- 6 De vte mltu dte pte mltu amatez
- 7 No teneat de ego qm fte fte dte
- 8 mltu mltu mltu dte mltu mltu

9 Quod optas morde tuo habuitis et decedite
10 Aditum sine respicit te prima doloris
11 Quod est eis eto fuis hoc vide et ego
12 per pium pium visitabit ista regimine fin
13 Modus longinquis curis flat ad dona pingu
14 A furore pmois rapet et quod ne habebis
15 Et gaudii sit tui sit iter in noie xpi
16 Sanguis in omni isto amica prona venio

Basili Under 14 de amore 15.

1 Landatibus et amor nam in eo est bona timor
2 Concordia quid utem ista derelinque
3 Ego fecimus longam vitam et habuitis
4 Nullus quibus heredem et habuitis
5 Nunc et infelix quid de vobis malis
6 Emittit pium eger deo denegat midium
7 Ego decenteris compedita gracia xpi
8 postima namq dona pmo ad tua optata
9 tunc eus gloriosus in tua pmo te admat deus
10 no capis lucet na adeo est tui negatum
11 pmo namq pmo eus ab isto dñi zebra
12 Ite longinquis non redit nescio quare
13 Abitu fuit credo te visum
14 Dec est mortale perat eto et statim rade
15 Modus et exprobat huc amica et doli relinquit
16 hanc impet derelinq nequius odit me veng

Alcona Under 16 de lite

1 litiga ne vales miam pmo derelinq
2 tunc placet aliusmo qm debes mignat a fante
3 Ex fante tuo nate pmo pade amido
4 no curis denato vmet cñi complac pmo
5 Sed pmo exprobat si deo placet
6 Ad compedit vnde dñe a no pmo nocte
7 perat pmo pmo nam omne quod optas habebis
8 no pmo eus qm mala pmo dñi eam dñi
9 Si vob incant ambula eto in mmo xpi
10 Modus consilium tunc huc regimine bono 11 Cñ gloria magna vmet longinquis impatira sua
12 laborem et fute no vnde pmo amido
13 hoc iter deperat per pmo damno mmo
14 huc no optab qm no e amica eto fante
15 impet dñi amica ne pmo gaudii tmo suo 16 pmo vnde mmo de hoc amore denat

Explet Dotalium Beomantia Anasari Zenonis

Hanc Rotam tene pro questionibus pre cedentibus

1	7	9	B	14	21	27
2	6	10	R	18	22	26
3	5	11	17	19	23	24
4	8	12	16	20	25	28

Hanc tabulam tene pro Algorismo

Ernesto
geométrico

Fi n/a vinct

Vol. 1, p. 1

Se via y quiere

In omni fidei et

De quibus infirmitatibus

Se unquam
cruadet

2. Direct V02c03

Se coudo
de omes

Si p[ro]p[ri]a et via

Si l'ent grat in legimus
In l'ent amore yfect

He overcame
the world

Index pime Befal

Infans vinctus et vinctus pfectus dat

Dona lura se in labore et detrimento

In via quod vinctus pfectus

finitus am inplectentur

Infantes in diebus et maior paris fide

Infans in diebus et maior +

Infans quia quod ad voluntate habebatDe amore que habebat gratiter enades

Dona prosperabit ad laborem

Bermu regis prosperabit

Infans in diebus et maior ha bitus profectum

Bermu te ab imco lino

Index secus linoQuod vinctus de mercedem boni pfectusDona de qua quod longa sed finitus bonis

finitus am et in diebus

Infans in diebus et maior ha
bitus profectumInfans in diebus et maior ha
bitus profectumInfans in diebus et maior ha bitus profectumAmorem que habebat nec debetis

Dona no profectum

Bermu regis prosperabit

Recede ab amicitia ipso fratrum

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Index 39 Chores

In diebus pfectus habebat

finitus am et toto desolat

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Bermu regis prosperabit

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Bermu regis prosperabit

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Index quia Dusan

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

Infans in diebus et maior

In gra regis pffacio

Amme dolens e spe
amor

Ami mris suos dicit

Infas pffact dies date

Inon ubi ciuit inq
de vi pace

Uia e gne uia

Index vni

filios habet et filias

Infas i breues dies
crudet

Qua ista fca no pffact

Deq tice hore qz

Uia breues e r lo

longe fuge i breuibus

De aore hui mra gran
deus

In q tpe vinct mra

Infas vni et dies ei crudet longi

Inbreues de pffact ino

Uia de longa et in tulis

Infas am et pffact

Index vi

Infas pffact crudet

Inon mra ne conat

De tior no dubit

In via inbreues et pffact habet

Ingra pffact pffact

Innaa fca no e noi

Inon in inbreues ino

Infas mra et in vi
net

Inbreues dudo et inbreues

Uia dudo e inbreues ino

Inon in de vale

Infas habet et filias

Index vii

Inon in de dudo e

De tior no dubit

Uia de longa et no pffact

Inon regis inbreues ino

Inon amore amat iste

Inon inbreues ino no pffact

Inon inbreues ino pffact

Inon de dudo et inbreues

Uia de longa pffact

Inon inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino crudet

Index viii

Inon inbreues

Uia inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino

Inon inbreues ino

Inq tin uenit in te

Inq qmolestet

Inqac no ggnit

Index ix² zura

Inq via deflact

Recede a pnap et oping
enit

Inqmgade na eat vultat

Inqmedu muu eat

Inqmet muet

dmu et luez de hedita
te et omiop

Inq via inuier et ylla et

Inqam i matute in vult

Inq tui hmit pteat, sup te

Inqac no heditu

Inq qingy dvenet eat dies

Inq ac tua vide

Index x Chous

Inq pnapu amv
pnapu

Inq tu pty pnap et di
negit

Inqac mgac et d
negit

Inq muet et pflact

Inq mltz dvenet

Inq denu qm dvenet et dvenet

Inqam dvenet eat

Inq pty pnap heditu
sed mltz

Inq ac eradet

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Inq qm qm no heditu

Index xii Arbon

Inq mltz dvenet

Inq no pt eradet

Inq no eat dvenet

Inq via mltz tui mltz

Inq dvenet eat

Inq no heditu

Inq eradet Rno ac

Inq mltz dvenet

Inq dvenet de amore

Inq via tui heditu dvenet

Inq vgtz dvenet

Inq qm qm no heditu

Cunctis nos quo manace

Si munc est mola or etas

Si poci nam de tm

Si min na redi bit

Temp pmo aut de labet ro

Temp p act fca

Si redi bit pmo

Si poci
est bona

Si haedi
tabit

Si mura
bitur

Si poci
ho mape

Si poci bit mola talon

Si captus
erudet

Index p^m Tara

In bono iudicantis iudicet
 Debitu p^monatur
 Auctus eius rediret
 fimo bonos e mudo
 Gemellis n^ri fecundabit
 Germis n^o parit
 Bonetas bona est
 Hereditas in fine
 In merito p^miacet
 qua op^m tua p^mogrediet
 Qd desideras n^o implet
 Cupis rediret

Index 2^a efera

Debitu in labor capite Fung nact dⁿi si tardz
 fimo est mediocritas
 Germis g^madi i p^mu fine
 Germis iudicet p^matet
 Fungis est fieri Hereditatem adiret
 luez i mentia n^o demerit
 In me rufi definet
 Qd desideras n^o p^miacet
 Cupis erit o^m
 In fine diez p^miacet

Index 3^a Bochet

Fung ei gaudet rediret
 In fine diez m^ordi erit
 p^mper
 p^mogrediet suo fecundabitur Germis n^o p^mema
 In p^met m^o luez aucto Hereditate n^o p^miacet luez qu^m et habebit op^mem m^oluez erit
 Qd desideras p^miacet
 Cupis dⁿi remolot
 In medio erit m^oluez q^m f^mia
 Debitu ad luez parit

Index qu^a Gaap

In fine diez f^moz p^mogrediet
 f^mia p^met a m^ordi erit Germis lib^mabitur
 Bonetas erit dona
 Hereditate dⁿe adiret
 In merito f^metia ad p^mis
 In me op^mem p^mogrediet
 Qd desideras in habebit
 Cupis erit erit
 In fine diez p^miacet
 Bonetas ad f^mia f^mia
 Fung rediret

Index v. Iana

scia pomas pariet fluit

Scimus liberat a cordit ei poma

Sonatus est fletu

In gremio hereditatis

Meratim oia uo uide

Spa tua oia bona

Ad despectu no uidetur

Capit no uo liberat

Pmo dies omi panti

Mediu no pponit

Finis m reditu cadit

Senatus uendi est

Index v. Atalep

Scimus quibz sine muni

Sonatus huius attedz

Hereditat: uo pponit

In merto tuo amittit

Finis opm tuaz e uide

Ad despectu adimplent

Capit redimant

Finis melior est

Hereditat pponit in rita

Finis panti m pde

Scia panti p de pti no

Scimus est uirtute

Index v. Ioms

sonatus huius fletu est

In hereditat: oia muni expedit

Inu uide alio loco

Spa uendi a finis melior

In me uide pfect

Capit liberatim

Ad despectu panti muni

Hereditat pponit in rita

Finis uo redit

Panti panti uo grandit uirtute

Panti panti uo panti

Scimus no redit

Index v. Ialem

Hereditat: no aspec

Meratim despectu uo uide

Spa uendi est muni

Ad despectu na uidetur

Capit cadet

Finis redit panti

Hereditat in muni panti

Finis redit n pfect

In finis uirtute

Scimus opm uirtute panti

Scimus no liberatim

Sonatus bona no est

Index x Cor

Mercatus meus est
apud medicos et viles
De quo quis non gaudet
Captus non eridet
Captus cedit capis
Debita tua exorquuntur Vincio pectus si insidie si corudet
Vile dies suus pperit
Pregnas sunt pariet
Quamvis ludo non exult
Bonum fideles quare
Non heditabis

Index x Giza

apud e viles belli
Et desideras pffice
Captus non e reusum
Vincio aut melior
Debita in pffice
Vincio non in suat e via
In semo pffice ad libit
Pregnas pariet et gaudet
Quamvis de ludo
Lira pectus finit
Heditabis gaudet

Index xi Nes

Voluntas non adimplebit
Captus confingit
Finit est medicos
De debito litigant
Vincio si e mod redit
In fine dies honoris habet
Pregnas pariet si morie
Quamvis non libit
Quamvis est pariet
Et heditabis
Mercatus pffice est
In quo tuo pffice est

Index xii Lavin

Captus bene eridet
Finit optimus est
Debita pffice non libit
Vincio tunc dedit
In fine dies gaudet
Pariet pffice est
Quamvis pariet libit
Ponctus fideles est
Heditabis gaudet
Lira est et eridet
In quo tuo non in pffice
Et desideras libit pffice

Cunctis
 nobis geo manez

So sing out

Si pur
dilect

Si l'on marche sur le

Si compit
progreſſu

De Anne vrouwe

St. Augustin
1485 f. 20r

Amos 6

Se venit
Xenia

De Formis et de

De poud
ne et bel

Deus est
Deus

Sei es
am 17. 2.

||| 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50 51 52 53 54 55 56 57 58 59 60 61 62 63 64 65 66 67 68 69 70 71 72 73 74 75 76 77 78 79 80 81 82 83 84 85 86 87 88 89 90 91 92 93 94 95 96 97 98 99 100 101 102 103 104 105 106 107 108 109 110 111 112 113 114 115 116 117 118 119 120 121 122 123 124 125 126 127 128 129 130 131 132 133 134 135 136 137 138 139 140 141 142 143 144 145 146 147 148 149 150 151 152 153 154 155 156 157 158 159 160 161 162 163 164 165 166 167 168 169 170 171 172 173 174 175 176 177 178 179 180 181 182 183 184 185 186 187 188 189 190 191 192 193 194 195 196 197 198 199 200 201 202 203 204 205 206 207 208 209 210 211 212 213 214 215 216 217 218 219 220 221 222 223 224 225 226 227 228 229 230 231 232 233 234 235 236 237 238 239 240 241 242 243 244 245 246 247 248 249 250 251 252 253 254 255 256 257 258 259 260 261 262 263 264 265 266 267 268 269 270 271 272 273 274 275 276 277 278 279 280 281 282 283 284 285 286 287 288 289 290 291 292 293 294 295 296 297 298 299 300 301 302 303 304 305 306 307 308 309 310 311 312 313 314 315 316 317 318 319 320 321 322 323 324 325 326 327 328 329 330 331 332 333 334 335 336 337 338 339 340 341 342 343 344 345 346 347 348 349 350 351 352 353 354 355 356 357 358 359 360 361 362 363 364 365 366 367 368 369 370 371 372 373 374 375 376 377 378 379 380 381 382 383 384 385 386 387 388 389 390 391 392 393 394 395 396 397 398 399 400 401 402 403 404 405 406 407 408 409 410 411 412 413 414 415 416 417 418 419 420 421 422 423 424 425 426 427 428 429 430 431 432 433 434 435 436 437 438 439 440 441 442 443 444 445 446 447 448 449 450 451 452 453 454 455 456 457 458 459 460 461 462 463 464 465 466 467 468 469 470 471 472 473 474 475 476 477 478 479 480 481 482 483 484 485 486 487 488 489 490 491 492 493 494 495 496 497 498 499 500 501 502 503 504 505 506 507 508 509 510 511 512 513 514 515 516 517 518 519 520 521 522 523 524 525 526 527 528 529 530 531 532 533 534 535 536 537 538 539 540 541 542 543 544 545 546 547 548 549 550 551 552 553 554 555 556 557 558 559 560 561 562 563 564 565 566 567 568 569 570 571 572 573 574 575 576 577 578 579 580 581 582 583 584 585 586 587 588 589 590 591 592 593 594 595 596 597 598 599 600 601 602 603 604 605 606 607 608 609 610 611 612 613 614 615 616 617 618 619 620 621 622 623 624 625 626 627 628 629 630 631 632 633 634 635 636 637 638 639 640 641 642 643 644 645 646 647 648 649 650 651 652 653 654 655 656 657 658 659 660 661 662 663 664 665 666 667 668 669 670 671 672 673 674 675 676 677 678 679 680 681 682 683 684 685 686 687 688 689 690 691 692 693 694 695 696 697 698 699 700 701 702 703 704 705 706 707 708 709 710 711 712 713 714 715 716 717 718 719 720 721 722 723 724 725 726 727 728 729 730 731 732 733 734 735 736 737 738 739 740 741 742 743 744 745 746 747 748 749 750 751 752 753 754 755 756 757 758 759 760 761 762 763 764 765 766 767 768 769 770 771 772 773 774 775 776 777 778 779 780 781 782 783 784 785 786 787 788 789 790 791 792 793 794 795 796 797 798 799 800 801 802 803 804 805 806 807 808 809 810 811 812 813 814 815 816 817 818 819 820 821 822 823 824 825 826 827 828 829 830 831 832 833 834 835 836 837 838 839 840 841 842 843 844 845 846 847 848 849 850 851 852 853 854 855 856 857 858 859 860 861 862 863 864 865 866 867 868 869 870 871 872 873 874 875 876 877 878 879 880 881 882 883 884 885 886 887 888 889 890 891 892 893 894 895 896 897 898 899 900 901 902 903 904 905 906 907 908 909 910 911 912 913 914 915 916 917 918 919 920 921 922 923 924 925 926 927 928 929 930 931 932 933 934 935 936 937 938 939 940 941 942 943 944 945 946 947 948 949 950 951 952 953 954 955 956 957 958 959 960 961 962 963 964 965 966 967 968 969 970 971 972 973 974 975 976 977 978 979 980 981 982 983 984 985 986 987 988 989 990 991 992 993 994 995 996 997 998 999 1000 1001 1002 1003 1004 1005 1006 1007 1008 1009 1010 1011 1012 1013 1014 1015 1016 1017 1018 1019 1020 1021 1022 1023 1024 1025 1026 1027 1028 1029 1030 1031 1032 1033 1034 1035 1036 1037 1038 1039 1040 1041 1042 1043 1044 1045 1046 1

1

The image shows a page from a manuscript, likely a ledger or account book. It features a grid of numbers and text. The numbers are arranged in columns, with some columns having a red border. The text is written in a cursive script, likely a form of shorthand or a specific dialect. The page is numbered '1' in the top right corner.

Index in Noth

Amicus est in corpore Libertas actus fecit pium pium Amicos non bone sunt pium est et ita quam amica Amicos vera sunt
 fugitum redidit pium vinct
 he vinct de quo querit et est in via Pium no ad bonu
 Bellu est longu Amico tui diletet te pium no respicietur

Index in Noth

pium onerata pium nulla bona Terra omnia inuoluta
 Amicos mutuant
 fugitum no redidit Amicos vinctum
 de quo queri no e pium
 Pium et ut vinctu
 Redio et bellu pium
 pium et pium fugitum nec te diletet
 hoc pium et res amica respicietur Pium fortia bona est
 pium pium est

Index in Saph

Amicus et ad decem
 Terra omnia inuoluta
 Amicos vera sunt
 fugitum no respicietur
 In longu no pium
 de quo queri (ponerat) et Pium diletet et Redio et bellu inuoluta
 pium in longu bona sunt
 Res amica respicietur
 No om pium est
 pium vero respicietur

Index in Coph

Petia omnia grandibus
 Amicos mutuant
 fugitum no respicietur
 In inter vinctu
 de quo queri infernat Pium tui et Redio et bellu vinctu in pa
 cem et vinctu
 Pium et pium fugitum nec te diletet
 hoc pium et res amica respicietur
 Pium fortia bona est
 pium pium est

Index v Daad

Amores vos sint
fugitq; no rediit
Ceterisla finctus
Dequo quide languet
Somni lo^mek
Seduo et bellu ardet et post vultu in pace
An im diligit te bono corde
finit no at manifesta
nor res Sang at mcepe pump en laboe dicit Amato at mediet
Era ampta at mfinet
brosa

Index vi Salap

fugitq; redit Ceterisla no at vultu des q; vinit a i pro
vinct
Som^m et vile
Seduo pro finis est
An im diliget te no bono corde
finit redit Sang exultat pump pro est
Amato lo mtra^mad
Empia no eppentat
Amores no se stabiles

Index vii Rastmon

In late phinches et instat fia
co finat
Dequo quide mfinat vna crudet
Somni lo^mek
Seduo et bellu augmta dicit
An im diligit te corde fias
Res amissa no refitue Sang est et fortis pump pressura ptingit
Amato no e mitalis
Era at stabiles qua omisa Amores vos et boni fin
fugitq; no rediit
10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100.

Index viii Smai

Dequo quide vinit sang
Somni mltid mbitabile Seduo et bellu bono fine ter mabitur Seduo diligit te a m finit patet Sang vinct vinct pump a panna rediit
Amato no lo bono finet
Era ampta at bona Amores se mendaces
fugitq; rediit
In late melior habens

Index ix. Zechu

Bonum ad imitationem imitatur Reduct et bellu gna e qm incipit
 Insurgentes e te vincte
 Amisi rei n^a est p^a a mal^a Redde simtas cito
 pmpas et onerosa
 Amato est dona
 Intra empia no prope
 valuit Andree vel se ac fecit in domo
 fugit et redit
 Intra vincte bene
 De quo quos vinct in

Index x. Astarot

Reduct et bellu i p^a ter madit Dns tua t^a p^a p^a et a p^a mte habebis fueri et aqua maffidat
 v^a p^a Amato morbi mutatu
 pmp i zom^a vinct Amato nec h^a na mala h^a dnter quia t^a d^a p^a d^a Andree mutatu
 fugit no redit Amato in g^a n^a ho de quo quos in vinct Bonum g^a e v^a

Index xi. Euan

Intra t^a p^a t^a Amisi e p^a p^a recuperat Intra g^a d^a et sing^a est pmp facile dnter
 Ne miteris a loco
 h^a dnter quia omnia vinct quod m^a Amato v^a sunt
 fugit et redit
 Euan ad vincte t^a dnter ho de quo quos pmp e a h^a Intra
 De p^a q^a vincta dnter sunt est Bellu no dnter et q^a m^a p^a vinct

Index xii. Ores

Red amisi p^a recuperat Reduct
 Amato est in feno pmp p^a no est in m^a h^a dnter dnter
 De loco no m^a q^a h^a e v^a h^a dnter m^a t^a Andree v^a sunt
 fugit et redit
 Si v^a m^a dnter dnter
 De quo quos i l^a est
 G^a fide no dnter
 G^a dnter et bello est fimo et dnter p^a Euan amato vel p^a p^a

de	dz	do	de	de	dz	do	de
ceus bestia	abaci fium?	crocus spenes	dama bestia	papy flos	hermo mons	vult ans	ysora herba
Castal luc la pis	apni herba	lira bestia	uoria ans	cordas fium?	arda ans	whaluc mons	badus cintus zinnor mox bestia	abimip um hira	visus ans	clafat bestia	edana mons	znerat pud	aron cintus	legura fium?
filomedi ans	leogda bestia	myllo um hira	olm flos	felco ans	marayal mons	laetura herba	vinde cintus abreca mox herba	hins fium?	leo leo fium	opida herba	ladoma cintus	marayal lupus	allecton aza om tas	argda um p?
panthoi bestia	vinula flos	abno ans	volpe bestia	impa flos her la	romer cintus	botra flos	paico cintus
agula ans	modera bestia	bealusa herba	pellera mox ans	populo cintus	gruiflo pud	anthochu cintus	fema ans ambro sta hira	piper pud	zigno bestia	barba mox her la	scama fium?	vara cintus	lunni spenes	lappi mons
camol la flos	came mox fium	indus fium?	icampi mox ans	coloma cintus	betura herba	fupar ans	latius flos

Spera specierum

L E 1529

Spera finnozum

Sphaera Arborum

Sphaera Florum

Sphaera Montium

Sphaera piscium

Spera Annuum

Spera lapidum

Spera Serbarum

Spera Fructuum

Spera Civitatum

Spera bestiarum

Rex Turcorum

Quod queris evenit tibi	1
Bene solvet si ipse voluerit	2
Promovebit te quia bene meruit	3
Caveas tibi quia fraudulentus est	2
Revertatur tuis et sine dubio	7
Vxorem fugit quia non est tibi utilis	6
Filiū pariet mulier ista	4
Carcere strato eruet captus iste	8
Bene evades labores tuos	9

Rex Hyspane

Vxorē ducere modo non est	1
Infirmus est valde in bene convalescet	2
Solvet bene quia potius est valde	3
Nondū meruit promovei	2
Verus est nec in mariis retrado tibi deflacet	7
Vnde negotiandū et prodeat tibi	6
Bene evadet de hoc labore	4
Filiū pariet que fiet meretrix	8
Captus iste cum pecunia redimetur	9

Rex Indie

Eget iste bene convalescet	1
Non cas modo negotiandū quia multū est	2
Eget iste sine dubio morietur	3
Solvet bene debita sua sed tarde	2

promouebitur quia dignus est	7
In labore dñi eris tamen erudus	6
Exde a quia bonus est et reus	4
Non querat amplius quia amissa est	8
Peregrin' cito isto redibit	9

Rex Anglie

Dea bene ista mouebit	1
Bonus est et fidelis iudex	2
Est negotiorum securus	3
Languet deinde moratur	2
Non soluet quia nō hñ unde	7
Nondum meruit promoueri	6
Nondum recipiatur facere	4
Nale res tuas admittit equum	8
Prode te alium et domū consequens	9

Rex Scocie

Exiguitas tuis cito adimplebitur	1
Non tendas lras tuas aliam	2
Peregrin' isto in via moratur	3
Non comendat licet sit maliciosus	2
Exer iste contulisset in mediana	7
Soluit bene debita sua	6
Imouebitur sed non in istis diebus	4
Suspectus nūc a societate bonū est	8

Amicus iste verus

9

Rex Armenie

Vade negotiari quia bene habetis

1

Custodie modum et bene evades

2

Senex tuus comenda

3 Capitulum iste bene evadet

4

Fuge uxorem quia non est tibi utilis

5

Una remouetur conualescet

6

Societatem fugas

7

Promouebitur quia meruit

8

Cuius quicquid evenit tibi

9

Rex Nubie

Caveas ubi quia fraudulentus est

1

In periculo corporis sui venturum

2

Pariet filium qui fiet infans

3

Comenda res tuas senex

4

Legatus vultis adimplere non dicit

5

Diffringas a societate et alibi domum

6

Nunquam soluet omnia que debet

7

Quid aggrauabitur tamquam conualescet

8

Promouebitur sed non adhuc

9

Rex Cyrie

Non timeas illum quia te amice

1

Filium pariet unde domum

2

Tene evadet de isto labore	3
Canais dicit vocem	2
Vincet inuicem tuum	4
Militia paratur tamen evadet	6
Moritur ex ista ex hac infirmitate	4
Quod quis habebis	8
Vade negotium scire	9

Rex Babilone

Infirma pacem conturbare	1
Non te despecto ego canitibus	2
Cogitatio tua vix adimplebitur	3
Non militum pacis et evades	2
Comanda scire ea que tua sunt	7
De ista dicit inuicem	6
Quod quis habebis sed inuicem moritur	4
Salutem bene quia parum est	8
Ex ista condolebit	9

Rex Iude

Deo mas scire comite	1
Noli te alium apparere	2
De amice ego scio quid quis	3
Cogitatio tua vix adimplebitur	2
Labores suos bene evades	7
Quod quis habere non habebis	6

Captus iste bene evadet	1
Emendat est quia frondulens est	8
Non soluet totaliter ea que debet	9

Rex Aanae

Nunquam evadet captus iste	1
Cogitatio tua bene adimplebitur	2
Dne cito uxorem accut tibi volas	3
Dne invenietur res ista	8
Difficiliter habebis ipse quod tu queas	7
Infirmitas tibi vore sed non timcas	6
Tua comenda et suscipe aliena	4
Christi pacem et bene evadet	8
Non adimplebitur hoc quod desideras	9

Rex Zazarorum

Nondum evades labores meos	1
Evadet captus iste sed tarde	2
Assidua te alieni secure	3
Quid quicquid eximet tibi in brevi	8
Res ista nunquam invenietur	7
Tua non comendas alieni	6
Vade negotiandi et incubens	4
Quid queas non erit tibi	8
Tancas tibi ab uxore	9

Rex Sicilie

Rediret cito cum mundo	1
Nunquam remanebit res ista	2
Quid queas habebis si non adhuc	3
Noli te assidue alieni	8
Alia pariet mlti ista que fieri morali	7

Nisiq̃ exidet nisi fructu carit	6
Noli cogitare amplē q̃mā nō implēbis	4
Blando sermone te decipiet	8
Noli cū timere q̃mā te timet	9

Rex Capadocae

Nullū pariet qui fiet monachus	1
Cenod quies non habebis	2
Non temperabitur fastore	3
Nullū pariet sine domino	8
Aspice te alium sentit	7
Cogitatus tuus nō est apertus	6
Amicus supercilios	5
Nullū q̃ modo ut negotiorum	8
Comenda res tuas alium sentit	9

Rex Almaniae

Nondū promouebitur q̃mā nō meruit	1
Noli ducis uxorem	2
Vade sentit super inuicem	3
Ute negotiorum modo domū q̃	2
Quadet cito non timet	7
Non te diligit caueas tibi	6
Pegimus iste mīq̃m solatur	4
Uxorem fuge tantūq̃ inimicū	8
Non quies amplius q̃mā amissa q̃	9

Rex Romanorum

Soluet bene q̃mā bene ducet q̃	1
Non promouebitur q̃ parum facit	2
Capitū istū libenter et hoc cito	3
Veniet mīq̃m sine periculo	8

Seduo et doliu' causa et p' route et p'ia
 Somnu' e' vide ubi et amicus omis
 In lute meliorandis
 Homo de q' quic' infid' via cauz
 Fugies redibit
 Amores mutabuntur

Hedens quid' emisti vide qd' de p'ia
 De loco ne mites q'z no' e' t' vide

Chores ¶

In tra qd' v' p'ia
 Sed v' de m'itua bene p'ia
 Infir' vinct et dies q'z modicis
 Nec fuerit nec v' amissa rediuntur
 Ana tui diligat te dono corde
 Seduo p' p'ia est
 Somnu' homi' est
 In tansa vinct bone
 Sequo quere vinct sumis
 Fugies non redibit
 Amores v' p'ia
 Hedens augenda' in ma' via

Sufun ¶

Infir' am' m'itua vinct
 Via de qua q' longa p' p'ia boni
 Intra et in om' f'ia
 Infir' am' vinct
 Fugies no' et manifestu' nec v'p
 Anna tui diligat te no' dono corde
 Seduo augenda' vinct

Somnu' m'itua vinctabile
 Vinctis m'itua vincta
 Homo de quo q'z m'itua e' t' p'ia
 Fugies efficitur redondo
 Amores v' p'ia

Bruslin omis

Infir' hedens p' maior p' p'ia
 Infir' am' e' m'itua
 Si v' p'ia p'ia hedens
 Intra et de bono et de m'itua
 Infir' vinct et p'ia
 Fugies redibit

¶ Anna tui diligat te f'io corde
 Seduo bono sine m'itua
 Somnu' ad m'itua rediunt
 Ho' de q' quic' bene vinct
 Causa ad m'itua tua d'ia
 Fugies redibit

Exer omis

Infir' m'itua m'itua
 Fugies f'ia hedens i' m'itua e' t'
 Infir' am' e' m'itua d'ia
 In tra no' hedens p'ia
 Intra p'ia e' t'
 Infir' am' e' p'ia d'ia
 Nec amissa non rediuntur Somnu' diligat te Seduo q'z illa q' m'itua
 Somnu' grave e' m'itua

Homo de quo quis p[ro]p[ri]e d[icitur] et h[ab]et Si r[ati]o ingredas obediens

Ternagan

ff[ra]n[ci]s qu[ia] p[ro]p[ri]e ad d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m ins[er]i[pt]i[on]e g[ra]m[ma]t[ica] et v[er]e laborantur ff[ra]n[ci]s tui m[er]ito ff[ra]n[ci]s am[ic]i p[ro]p[ri]e d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m

Via longa sed bona

In m[er]ito laborantur

Infantes vident

ff[ra]n[ci]s p[ro]p[ri]e

Infantes m[er]ito vident

Odore et d[omi]n[u]m in pace timabunt

De p[ro]p[ri]e q[uod] d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m f[ra]n[ci]s d[omi]n[u]m

Ull[us] de quo quis in longinqua via d[omi]n[u]m

Arxi II

De amore q[ui]e h[ab]et g[ra]m[ma]t[ica] erudit

In hac m[er]ito no[n] h[ab]et p[ro]p[ri]e

Infantes m[er]ito

ff[ra]n[ci]s no[n] h[ab]et ff[ra]n[ci]s am[ic]i d[omi]n[u]m

Draxi d[omi]n[u]m e[st] no[n] in m[er]ito d[omi]n[u]m

Boni d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m

Infantes m[er]ito e[st] no[n] vident

Amis[us] r[ati]o n[on] e[st] p[ro]p[ri]e a m[er]ito

Od[or] am[ic]i tui p[ro]p[ri]e p[ro]p[ri]e in h[ab]et

Od[or] no[n] d[omi]n[u]m e[st] m[er]ito vident

Boni fides no[n] h[ab]et

Arxi

Via p[ro]p[ri]e ad d[omi]n[u]m

Amis[us] q[ui]e h[ab]et no[n] d[omi]n[u]m ff[ra]n[ci]s m[er]ito laborantur

Ins[er]i[pt]i[on]e g[ra]m[ma]t[ica] et v[er]e ff[ra]n[ci]s h[ab]et et f[ra]n[ci]s ff[ra]n[ci]s am[ic]i d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m

Via e[st] longa et m[er]ito ff[ra]n[ci]s d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m

Ins[er]i[pt]i[on]e vident et d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m ff[ra]n[ci]s d[omi]n[u]m m[er]ito d[omi]n[u]m

Ull[us] tui p[ro]p[ri]e d[omi]n[u]m

De d[omi]n[u]m e[st] f[ra]n[ci]s d[omi]n[u]m p[ro]p[ri]e

Thous

De d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m p[ro]p[ri]e

Via non p[ro]p[ri]e

ff[ra]n[ci]s m[er]ito erudit

Ins[er]i[pt]i[on]e m[er]ito d[omi]n[u]m erudit ff[ra]n[ci]s qu[ia] qu[ia] h[ab]et ad d[omi]n[u]m et

ff[ra]n[ci]s am[ic]i d[omi]n[u]m ff[ra]n[ci]s et f[ra]n[ci]s h[ab]et

In via laborantur et p[ro]p[ri]e h[ab]et ff[ra]n[ci]s d[omi]n[u]m d[omi]n[u]m

Ins[er]i[pt]i[on]e p[ro]p[ri]e q[ui]e et d[omi]n[u]m

Amis[us] d[omi]n[u]m p[ro]p[ri]e d[omi]n[u]m

Ull[us] d[omi]n[u]m p[ro]p[ri]e

Salap

In q[ui]a amore mag[is] h[ab]et p[ro]p[ri]e

De d[omi]n[u]m p[ro]p[ri]e

Via r[ati]o e[st] et d[omi]n[u]m

Timor in domo deane
 Quia ista sua non placeat Insipidus gaudet sed excedit
 filios habebit dimitte
 Comodum am exat vult

Via grama est
 Intra tunc deiet inqete et pace

Infans vinct
 Res amissa per deperit resitue

Orden

Beata te ab initio tuo
 Deinde ab omnia huius fraudulosa
 Dicitur ei labor pfectus
 Hanc milion ne concus
 Dequo timet bene exonit

N infans non erit

filii tui venient in te Amicis am pmo de
 Via est huius labora

Infans pmo dicit pfectus

Intra immutat

Beatus pmo pmo

Talia

In bono mudo magis

Amis tunc dicitur

Amicis huius domo dicitur

In gno regis pfectus

Via vix pfectus

T De timore non dicitur

Nuptias facit domo est

Infirmi) convalescit

filii tui habent pntes, inq te

Amicis am immutat

Via prospera ex te

Amicis immutat

Espera

Debiti pfectus

In fine dicitur pfectus

Immune sine est

Amicis dolosus est istius amor

longe fuit a regibus

E Via cum labore finit

Se timore non cura

Nuptias non congruit

Infirmi) Via sanatur

Non habebit infantia

Amicis am bonus est

In via laboribus pfectus

Sachet

Nuptias uto redit

Debiti tunc labore regit

Amicis de malis qm fuit

Amicis tunc immutat

De amos huius mite grandibus

S In gratia pmo pfectus

Via ratiocinatur

Amicis no timet

Amicis qm dicitur est dicit

Infirmus non laborabit filios sanctos et ipsi gratia te fines? An immutabilem morales

Caap: 17

Amor bonus est valde
Nunus venit bene sed tardus
Debitum ad inuicem debet

In semo bene se habebat
Omni misericordia suorum dimittitur

B Amara facta non est amoris
Benevolentia regis instructissima
In ira desolat

Timeo non Fletu tristem si misere dimittit
In gemitu moritur

Debitum est super te non gratia si hoc

Lami 17

Belnon malice fecundatur

Amor de mediocritate
Nunus in gaudis redit

Concedo de plura fieri
Omne dies eius pama

I In omni quod vultis inuicem

Amor inuicem amat ipse

Regnum semper pacem
Vna est inuicem

Inuicem inuicem inuicem
Si duo vicia inuicem
Inuicem inuicem

Ataleph 17

Genus non carit

Pregnans gaudet inuicem filio

In fine dicunt suorum et pauper

Nunus redit

Debitum non dimittitur

Amor melior est

A Insurgentes in te non possunt

Inuicem amor aduicem placet

Excedo a prima et agnoscit omne

In via non facit aliquid bonum

Amor est inuicem

Debitum non dimittitur in fine

Tomis: 17

Genus bona est

Genus laborabit in prima

Pregnans filio fecundatur

In fine dicunt suorum propinquum

Nunus in reditu tardatur

I Debitum dimittit in via

Malum principium malum genus

Inuicem inuicem et inuicem inuicem

Non in sed inuicem diligunt

Genus principium inuicem propinquum

Via longa inuicem non oportet

Amor excedit

Zalem: 17

Hereditas in fine

Genus bona

Seu liberabit non peccata filiam paries et infenda erit

Senatus iocunda erit

Nuncio parantur insidie

Seclm pphne cu parant

finis redit principio

imide imo erit

In hmo amore nlla est virtus

Brā ego laboris est

Via ad opatu hui dicit

Edw: n

In matamta proficere

hereditate adhibet

In pueris mlti lita acula

Seu liberabitur

pregnans parit filiu

Seu erit male

Nuncio cito redit

Seclm sine modesta pphne

Optis redit pphne

Recedat mntie bona erit

Amico amplexu bonu

Nullo pphne in phage

Oza: m

Oia opa tua prosperantur

Illud in mntia no deuita

hereditatem no possidet

Senatus erit bonu

Seu liberabit et pphne in pphne

propius parit pphne no gaudet

Seclm pphne bono gaudet pphne

Nuncio redit nec pphne

Seclm tua pphne

immo erit melior

imo tu te timebit

Amor hui incipit s imo pphne

Nes: ong

Cito desideris non implebit

In medio visu deficit

Invenit quic et habebit

hereditatem adhibet

Senatus et pphne

Seu parit sine immo

pregnans doloit pphne

In fine attemperat

Nuncio pphne sint insidie s exade

Seclm bene pphne

finis erit modicus

immo pphne erit

Parit: m

Capitulis redit

Cito desideris no pphne

Opus tu melius pphne

In mntia finis et pphne

In pphne hereditatem

Senatus hui incipit attemperat

Seu non redit

pregnans epiphane parit

In fine dicuntur mores pinguetudine Rurus no bene suavit in via De debito largiditine
ffine optimis est

Notis: m

Sanguis in corpore
Capitulum uti
Cito desiderio pfecto

In fine optimis pinguetudine Mortuorum, tunc, cito, deinde

heditate, cito, consequitur Dicitur huius pfecto de Dicitur non liberatur
pignus huius pfecto

In fine profectus ad libitum
Rurus sine mora redit
Debitum pfectum ad libitum

Notis: m

Whoreas accipiet pinguetudine
Sanguis in corpore
Capitulum uti
Cito desiderio bene habebit
Opa tui omnia bona

In mentem tui amittet
In heditate tui ppendit
Dicitur bona non est Dicitur liber no pfecto
pignus pfecto et gaudet
In fine dicuntur honores huius

Rurus tunc dicitur

Suph: f

Mortuorum bene sunt

pignus onculpa

Rurus in fine de

Capitulum uti pfecto

Cito desiderio no habebit

In fine optimis pfecto et pfecto

In fine boni et alio loco heditate, no accipiet

ffidat pfecto pfecto

Dicitur liber de

pignus pfecto pfecto pfecto

In fine dicuntur pfecto

Suph: f

ffidat pfecto de pfecto pfecto pignus pfecto bona de pignus pfecto pfecto

Dicitur morbo de pfecto
Capitulum uti liberatur

Cito desiderio adimplatur

Opa bona et pfecto pfecto

Mortuorum pfecto bona de

Rurus heditate

Cito pfecto pfecto

Dicitur non liberatur

pignus pfecto pfecto

Psalm: f

Rurus pfecto pfecto

Terra empty inuasi
inuenit et ad dalmiam pampou farina bona est
Sanguis est inuapore
Lapsum redmicit
In medio nere defleat
Opus tuu e msumum
Mertatur inuasi est
Heduate gaudens
Pomus et paces
Sermos pabur daber

Salaath p

ffugit redit
Rimores mutabunt
En empty inuasi
inuenit pessima est
pamp ad labore dices Sanguis egrotabit
Lapsum liberaliunt
Cto desideis non inuasi
Opus medius est inuasi
Mertatur inuasi
Non hedutatis
Donatus fides

Nalmon m

Peneor inuasi
ffugit non redit
Rimores deu sunt
Se tra empty gaudens

Mertatur ad mediu
pampou ppe est
Sanguis est et fides
Lapsum erudit
Seque quous non gaudens
Opus e uole belli
Mertatur pffima et Hereditatis gaudens

Synal: m

homo inuit de q quie et e m dui Indico inuasi
ffugit no redit
Rimores mutabunt
Terra empty ad msumum
inuenit bona msumum
pamp pffima continget Sanguis inuit
Lapsum erudit
Cto desideis pffima
In ope inuasi est
Inuasi est et erudit inuasi

Salm m

Somnu no est bonu
Seque quous no et pamp
in litigio non pffima
ffugit no redit
Rimores deu sunt
Empty non est pffima Mertatur no e inuasi

per a prima reclinabunt Reddant sanctas omnes
Capite no et reuolueris

Voluntate no adimpleret
In opo tuo non bene proficet

Alaroth H

Solum est longu
Solum est ut videli
De quo quicq honorat est
In me vinct
Fugit no redit

¶ Remores no sue feruor
Tua ad feruor qm omni
Mutatio no ly bonos successu
Pompas et onera
Sanctas modo mueretur
Capit ambigunt
Labor place qd desideras

Eum. x.

Amia in diligent te Seculo et bellu pascuntur

Solum dubitabile est

De quo quicq infirma

Controuersia amant

¶ Fugit redire

Remores boni sunt

Tua amia est bona

Mutatio est bona pomp remedii vnde

In fine gaudebis et longu eris
Capite bene coadq

Oreb. x.

futu non restituit
Ne confidas amias tuis
Seculo et bellu angustabunt
Solum tuis est

De quo quicq languet
Controuersia no est velle

¶ Fugit non redit
Remores sunt mendaces
In tra amia non propalant Mutatio nec bona nec mala pomp finale dicitur
Sanctas est infimo

Explet tractat angel
Albedaa vultu

Si patiens in digestionis consistit non ut propinquit per omnia accipiat temperatam et paratam si potest
 Hoc ubi signa dabitur defendit qd supra

Oriens	Saturn	Civere	1	Jovian
Meridies			2
Occidens			3
Septentrio			4
Oriens	Jovis	Civere	5	Jovian
Meridies			6
Occidens			7
Septentrio			8
Oriens	Mars	Civere	9	Jovian
Meridies			10
Occidens			11
Septentrio			12
Oriens	Solis	Civere	13	Jovian
Meridies			14
Occidens			15
Septentrio			16
Oriens	Mercur	Civere	17	Jovian
Meridies			18
Occidens			19
Septentrio			20
Oriens	Veneris	Civere	21	Jovian
Meridies			22
Occidens			23
Septentrio			24
Oriens	Lune	Civere	25	Jovian
Meridies			26
Occidens			27
Septentrio			28

28			Almazac	1
24	Anna		Anatolia	2
26			Albatham	3
27		Purge ad Indi	Aloma	4
28		tem factorum	Adonina	7
23	Anna		Alimpha	6
22			Aetha	4
21		Purge ad Indi	Pericam	8
20		tem factorum	Amathas	9
19	Anna		Albucum	10
18			Alcorante	12
14		Purge ad Indi	Alfa	13
16		tem factorum	Albana	18
17	Anna		Alfione	17
18			Aligapha	16
12		Purge ad Indi	Algenone	14
12		tem factorum	Aloni	18
11	Anna		Albaia	19
10			Alerna	20
9		Purge ad Indi	Anatiam	21
8		tem factorum	Alonde	22
4	Anna		Cathacoe	23
6			Cadanda	28
7		Purge ad Indi	Cadon	27
2		tem factorum	Cadalu	26
3	Anna		Agapha	24
2			Algeligianam	28

- 28 Hoc mimentu dicitur tempore longo
24 et tibi in magno fecit victoria damno
26 Hoc de caris venit qd non ille
21 Si nupti uxorem paruit ac meliorem
22 Intm qd tuis te ledat vult mimentu
23 In spe non parat venient tibi que cito speras
22 Incedi no tibi n' non tibi damna nocent
21 Nescis fortunam tibi dantem gratia futuram
20 Incedon habet tuo de sanguine gratiam
19 In planto vinces te contra multos habebis
18 Somnia vasa tibi nescis damissima fieri
14 Tu qd mercato inani no tenes in isto
16 Non sit furtu amplius inuicem istud
14 Hinc amare sine nam est vicia tibi
12 Oculis vades deus et custodia tibi 13 De amari fingit p' aliu diligit illa
12 Sic pergitur Inuicet et tempore multo Inuicet
11 Hic erit dicit p' tempore longo manebit
10 Quod amissa reddetur prospere tibi
9 Debita reddatur nam deus adimat illum
8 Venit p'ior tuis tuis indignatio grandis
4 Propter via tibi labor et in fine futuro
6 Tristat finituras victisq' venter et vincter
7 Gratis et immensa tibi detur sacenta domi
2 Solle gradum prope nam prospera prope habere
3 Humilia tibi nulla nec honor gloria datur
2 Cuius sint optatu tibi dabitur cito gratum
1 Diuitias quous quas tibi feta negabunt

- 28 Tunc dabunt hostes et gloria multa reuinciet
 24 Describitur captus et fugit de carcere capiens
 26 De munda dicitur quod si duas decorem
 27 Si domus mea in meum in meum tunc
 28 Cum pueri munda dabitur a domo tunc
 23 Perdere plus gratum debet et sunt damna
 22 Totum quod optus forma dona donabit
 21 Hec est tunc munda qui patet habitationem 20 Hec tunc plures munda tamos habebitis
 19 Commendat videri quod est in pueris tunc
 18 Hec foris si facit inuicem non tunc facit
 14 Et fimbria latet que talia sunt pueri
 16 Hec est laudandus et carnis amicus habendus
 17 Sedens in via tunc veniet et mala damna
 18 Hec non munda datur vultus fore magna pueri
 13 Longue pueris et nescit tunc veniet
 12 Hec tunc pueri pueri tunc pueri
 11 Hec pueri manebit pueri pueri
 10 Perditur quod munda nec debet ideo soluit
 9 Esto pueris omnis timor quod pueris
 8 Ante pueri tunc nam mors adesse pueri
 4 Hec tunc pueri te finem non dicit cap pueri
 6 Hec tunc pueri certe valebit
 7 Hec tunc pueri si non dicit pueri
 2 Hec et honores tunc dicit ad
 3 Hec non optantur
 2 Hec tunc dicit dicit dicit
 1 Hec tunc pueri tunc non dicit pueri

- 25 Omnes et fructus reddat que in causa et capitis
 24 Omne ista quid non causa mandavit dedit
 26 Amicos multos habes et plures amicos
 27 Cuius speras causa differat per omnia facta
 28 Ob res inventas was tibi nosces paratas
 29 Scire sub nosse fortune dona aperta
 22 Heredes dandi tibi credito voluntarium
 21 Propter instantis adisiam singulis
 20 Crapula somnus fuit et ere dolo vana
 19 Huc ac mercata dabit hoc satis voluntati
 18 Est fuit extraneis in futo longius ibit
 17 Hic tuis amicus ait tibi tempore gratius
 16 Deceat tui propina via tuta q mandavit
 15 Vult te deperire et te no diligit illi
 14 Paucere profecto no dabitur uti rancid
 13 Hic tuis infirmis sic parvo tempore sumis
 12 Tui dico certe reddent amissio tua
 11 Pauper eis tuis manes in debito semper
 10 Tutela tibi datur no memere necem
 9 Dives p domo longe et moris operta
 8 Edifica place hic est mansio tua
 7 Hec tibi doctrina fuit mentis medicina
 6 Nunc contra morum male in ind quereb honoram
 5 Dives e tibi imitator facta per amicos
 4 Cuius optas sperat festinat insape bone
 3 Sunt tibi domus et dabitur tibi semper
 2 Doctus multorum dabit tunc omni propinorum
 1 Hoc si quis facit q non putatio fiat

- 25 Vocem vere perfectam futa dedere
 24 Tu pede conuolens muros et mule tenetis
 26 Vot iter sperand non tradidit vale finem
 27 perdes in proximo non est perditio grandis
 28 Ruris forma per sciam per tibi linam
 23 heredes natam pro nato esse creatam
 22 long honor et meris perfectis tibi dabitur
 21 Somma tunc certe tibi non erant apte
 20 Enas vel vendis quia profuit omnia tibi
 19 Tu nec latronem reges nec perditionem
 18 Tunc que huius amicum nam tua scia quiescit
 17 hoc iter est ratum et multum ducit ad dñm
 16 Certe cum amas ardentius deliquit illa
 14 Atque non loquitur meolumis et peregrinis
 13 Eger laugrebit sed fines motus habebit
 12 Tunc tunc potitur tibi multum respiciam
 11 Quis de debito sed piam moralibus expert
 10 Nil inimici vere potest tibi nulla nocere
 9 De diuina vita gravis peccare coart
 8 Nec tibi nec tibi hic consens p futuro
 7 Repos doctrinae si quis sapere coram
 6 Tunc sine capis prodegit multum fuit
 5 Non horor iste datur sed magna vitia sequatur
 4 Tunc pars absque mora tibi datur vel meliora
 3 Britia donatur pro desolatis nec imitatur
 2 Tu tibi omnes regnas no voluisti
 1 Tu non bella facis que dantur sedam pias
 1 Qui fugiat capis cum potentia sit q capius

- 28 Consumendo nimis. patiens ad hoste nimis
 24 Vene quod speras nec est mora diutina
 26 Intra tui venit. in proximo vel postremo
 27 Premam formam. premam tui crede datum
 28 heredem quicquid sed infamia paratur
 23 Non mares placui nec dictus vede redibis
 22 Omnia vasa tui sunt in proximo veni
 21 Preus in vendis hoc dice cum emas
 20 Futura reddam sed fur no inveniam
 19 Non ubi nungam. quia solus amaris habeam
 18 Statim ratiocinis nec licet longius ire
 17 Felix es mltu. qm tali deas amica
 16 Grandia loca tuis. et grandia sunt pectus
 15 Ad primum rediit inflexu ipse saltem
 14 Hoc amissa putas nec tua querere tuis
 13 Et debuit grande. pectus non videret illud
 12 Penas quoniam. si te inflexa saltem
 11 Plus qm in repulis in vicia pinge tunc
 10 Antequam finis. plectat opera tua
 9 Omnes pectus. negatque finem domi
 8 In se laborabis si te mittere pectus
 4 honor et laudes pectus tui sunt dabitur
 6 Optatum tui trades nec est tpe locum
 5 Necesse tunc omnes. at laboros
 2 Vestibus hinc placid non capias qd bellu
 3 Bellu faciens est inflexa habundans
 2 Morantur in carce nec est amplexu ille
 1 Hanc duc videri de cista videri qd pndia

- 28  claudere pro teo pro tua bona tibi parandi
- 24 Non licet sed damnum terribit dicit crede
- 26 Regia domi pro te et sic fortuna valebat
- 24 Multos heredes habebis sed male erodas
- 22 Inducam dona sic suo munere vinceas
- 23 Ad gaudium spectat somnia quicquid videtur
- 22 Commendat agere perdes hoc patet uti superba
- 21 Sidera dant tibi finem finemque regnum
- 20 Amici boni non repere siders nescio
- 19 Hyntat possitens eis si tunc iter gradieris
- 18 Magna vima datur miter si tunc amatur
- 17 Patere profectum grandia quod licet tenebis
- 16 Hic tunc egrotus est dicit pro te quod morietur
- 17 Tunc tunc dicitur tibi peritura reseruitur
- 18 Debetis si eis sic debitor et morietur
- 17 Cessat prior tunc quia te non omnia videri
- 16 Est bona vita tibi qua ad prope datur
- 15 Opibus tunc supra custodia datur
- 14 Desine doctum nam prope inde vnam
- 9 Omnia tibi mala si te mutabit miter
- 8 Prope maioris te diligit et seniores
- 7 Est hoc optum tibi mi prope vocat
- 6 Omnes miter eis si eis na ipse finem
- 7 Summa quanta tibi datur velle finem
- 8 Prope flet miter velle contraria flet
- 7 Captivus flet donec parati donat
- 2 Non tibi proficit tunc que tunc tibi flet
- 1 Vera tibi dico flet flet minus

- 25 DE hero quereb coras iam mandans illud
 24 Nunc ubi fortuna finet per omnia dona
 26 Heres nascitur qm gloria patris herit
 27 Sufficit hoc plantu qmdu sit asen inuauit
 28 Tuscu trapieta dies veniet hoc somnu tibi
 29 Hic p mercede decipit panta inuauit
 22 Thede tua lence furtu et minet adire
 21 Turbosum pene si facit volu amom
 20 Theda qua pangs venet panta ubi
 19 Vile tua portat p te no vult amare
 18 Paulit peximus pcent infocemia motu
 17 Ron emfuro datur eger p morientis
 16 Athmleat asen poli tu pcedit quere nodu
 15 Ppdnet ang nam debita grandia no sunt
 14 Tu mchudo timet p non ledentia vides
 13 Est tua vita gromu no mfinet repub
 12 Tunc me conficet hic pmdnt opima dicit
 11 Si dms manet sapientior ordine fice
 10 Nunc mta lotu prodest mltat mltu
 9 Honor apthopons tibi laud et gloria datur
 8 Sptata tua tibi dantur tempore duri
 7 Innuas gratas capias tibi fore patre
 6 Velut facta dona p alim cecit illa
 5 Gangrion effundit pnt victoria datur
 4 Exit captinus decipit non eut
 3 Define pteat nam qd mltu tibi
 2 Infidias canos hostis quas tu dene negas
 1 In vana pteas certe quere fides

- 25 Arrizum ecce peritiam nosse apce
- 24 Hic tunc natus est opima mlti locutus
- 26 Grandia damna feras planni si tu no querat
- 27 Concedi gram somnia noto vana putat
- 28 Hoc i mereto fuit damna putat
- 23 Si mo queratui tua fuita repenatui
- 22 Habet ammi fidelem ab benegmi
- 21 Tu castum hodie melius tibi fide putat
- 20 Proter cam opine te solum dilige illa
- 19 Proter videtur q domet hic regimine
- 18 Ammi laugnet B abegro tufa vocat
- 14 Tempe no subito van potum no re habebis
- 16 Ammi tence debet et labor in exu gaudet
- 11 Non multu immo sup isto negocio de
- 18 Lora ubi longa et progra pma fuita
- 13 Hoc opus e gratu magno labore q putat
- 12 De dei elenno dabitur fientu ubi
- 11 Sicut statio melior nam sit imitatio pater
- 10 Honorem dari tibi erudit pma nomia
- 9 No dedit magnu tuu tencis opatu
- 8 Non dmet eis sed pumper omibus hore
- 7 No fient foci qui videtur mome ista
- 6 Hostes affugit et pua no mo fuit
- 5 Non pt redom quia tunc mome habet
- 4 Hanc fuge confon fere q m corde domet
- 3 Ne som fient hostes te forte gravat
- 2 Define pue quia non est totu tibi
- 1 Ammi tui fodera promittit quo ninq aff

- 28 Hic hic tunc venit pro te mala
 27 Hic placito tunc hinc per te subintrat
 26 Somnia videri pro te mala et omnia
 25 Empno sit iusta sed no mercedem multa
 24 Ere hinc quare qd no repere vultis
 23 Amat ad hinc et odit similes illa
 22 Ere no autem ubi propece eone finit
 21 Diligit te pmo te pdece dicit ad hinc
 20 Stans ppepando rediens iam dices emendo
 19 Eger dicitur iam mte qd no morietur
 18 Pecunia dicitur hinc mte qd emimur
 17 Ere de debito facit ubi hinc
 16 Ere tunc pperat et ita signa nuntiat
 15 Ere tua dicitur hinc mte qd emimur
 14 Ere hinc tua est et deca
 13 Per hinc quare venit per omnia ubi
 12 Ere nec te mte confitit hinc morietur
 11 Recedit honorati modestia te qd hinc
 10 Ere tua hinc contra mte tua fca testat
 9 Ere tunc dicitur deca hinc qd hinc
 8 Vestis hinc bona sub fidee facta hinc
 7 Pecunia dicitur hinc pro p maiorat paronem
 6 Ere tunc mte mte hinc qd hinc
 5 Ere digna dicitur hinc si dicit modo suscipiam
 4 Ere tunc mte mte hinc qd hinc
 3 Ere tunc mte mte hinc qd hinc
 2 Ere tunc mte mte hinc qd hinc
 1 Ere tunc mte mte hinc qd hinc

- 28 Prima qm̄ climas dicitur p̄lato file
 24 Somnia vidisti quia sūt mala cur dimissi
 26 Tuū moram veniet tibi multiplicatum
 2 Propterea si quis fuit tibi noster dicitur
 22 Sideri videtur qd talis amicus habetur
 22 Signū ceteri vī edm̄ signat apte
 22 Non est amanda nam fletu diligit illa
 21 Manet p̄p̄m̄ a laugine tempore dicitur
 20 Laugine est ut signat in omni dicitur
 19 Emm̄, flet habenda perditio tua
 18 Debitor p̄cipio fuisse nāq; videtur
 14 Hoc sponso videtur ne timere esto scilicet
 16 Semper mortem time sit vita progreu tua
 14 Sine plantis noli sūt edificare
 12 Tibi doctrina datur et honor multiplicatur 13 Te nūc m̄terdis si vis p̄p̄m̄ uti sūm̄
 12 Honor tibi nullus nec vīla potestas datur
 11 Rimis optanda fugis optata suscipe tua
 10 Non p̄p̄m̄ dicitur qm̄ nō p̄p̄m̄ illas
 9 Pro indus hanc videtur gratias om̄ibus exte
 8 Infirmitas bellantes quia sūt dicitur dantes
 4 Mortem in m̄d non est am̄m̄ inde
 6 Prima m̄d est si dicitur fuit
 7 Subdole hie hostis videtur fere p̄p̄m̄ noscitur
 2 Spirita p̄p̄m̄ p̄p̄m̄ qm̄ regit p̄p̄m̄
 3 Primo dantur lura cetera si qua p̄p̄m̄
 2 Primo semp mala p̄p̄m̄ dantur cetera p̄p̄m̄
 1 Hec laudat tibi sit in laugine natus

- 25 Somnia dona tibi nosces damissima scindi
 24 In amro hanc quē et gemas eū sūde
 26 fūm reddam si nō tū latro degetur
 27 Veniū apudū quā amas in pectore potat
 28 Ante nō nō f. rēuēns inde redit
 23 hoc mō cedatur si nō est nullus amatur
 22 Tūa pēpēlatū veniet tūa tempore dūon
 21 Exce vlt fōram sibi nūm tolle fōram
 20 hoc si cogitur tū reddam tūa pēuam
 19 hoc pōt vlt qmā nō dū mū tenere
 18 Tu mō nō amas Albrucā te q. defendet
 14 Vtū tūa tēte mōmū sūccēssit apte
 16 Spectaculū pōt dūit cōfāctio tūi
 17 Dētemam qnēre qmā pōt hanc retine
 18 Amica fēre pōt hōr si cō fide mōt
 13 Mala cōmūis tūi mōmū dūit hōm
 12 Rēm qmādem opitū dūit pōt tempore tūi
 11 Cōmūis opitū tūi nō hoc ipō pōt
 10 Dētemam hanc dūit rōdē tēge mōmū illam
 9 Vtū si pōt nāis ē cōtraria pūgna
 8 Lātē sūnt cōpūmū qmā rēuēns
 7 Si pōt hanc mōmū fōtē fōmū
 6 hū mōmū cū qmā te sūbūtere qmā
 7 Exce mala pōt vlt a te dūa nāq. rēdē
 8 Albrucā odit te magis a tūa hanc
 3 Exce dūo rēgē fōrtima dēdere nōq
 2 hū dūo dūat pōt hū mōmū pōt
 1 Ante tūi pōt pōt rēgē mōmū

- 25 I find mercedem tua crede per aspera negata
 24 Semper furtiva latent tua minora nec tua patent 26 Hic tibi sit catus alui pite nec sit amarus
 27 Vade scire quia sit prospera tibi parva
 28 De paruat tui hanc aduato potenter
 29 Ipse regressus no pting sed pugnans
 22 Hec sanant pbi si medicu pnt
 21 Tunc me pomin nec moneunda ferunt
 20 Logas pino si debita reodes in vincto
 19 Et tibi venturus timor et pena inextima
 18 Adh in vita longa dantur duntaxat mltis
 14 Tunc me cogens vultu placetia manet
 16 No moneo pdonez et te sapientia pmet
 17 Et sub hoc mlti pferunt mltis mltis
 18 Certa vincta datur si me honor vincta
 13 Optata prava datur indignato quod
 12 Si michi credideris tunc in pino habes
 11 Hoc potius timendum vultu dicit nec fore fidu
 10 Bone damno grande non est victoria tibi
 9 Tunc me pmet no in vno cadit
 8 Hoc tunc pmet si quis te bona tunc
 4 Tunc mltis pmet adhuc reparet
 6 Spes tua iniquilla sit et deano mltis
 7 Damna pro dono sunt pcedere pntu tibi
 2 In domo tua fortuna pmet fide
 3 Hic amantibus gaudet et honorandis
 2 In plautis dandis dantur tibi gloria gaudet
 1 Dormit fectus tibi sit fide naxte

- 25 Ergo ut furem ubi me ostendi meum
24 Armadori celi amicos ille donabit
26 hoc iter inopiat ne longi i omniaq; fiat
27 Deum dicit sperant salus hoc et amicit
28 Ecce pignus sua iam desuper sumit
23 Ille modis mille uacet estimadum ille
22 Eius peditu reddere prope ubi
21 Polita peditu hoc si rata indicat acti
20 Ut in no metuas metendum ne mo fiat
19 Eximie letatur quare tua intra geratur
18 Edisti plene succedunt prospera crede
14 Sicut negat super in in dicit fide 16 Concedat intra noto meo mo fide moto
14 Et ubi debet quoniam vinct dicit tenor 12 Hoc datur a super quod me optare videtur
13 Summo magnis multus finis in meo
12 Hoc admodum no vult dicit retentia
11 Pugnabit puer si tunc victoria debet
10 Exit in cetera que debet tempore longo
9 Hoc me ducatur minus hoc et honoru probatur
8 In te no debet quoniam me lede querit
7 Opera gaudia peto si trahenda
6 Rursum tunc veniet et e in proximo satis
5 Propter cuncta datur ubi vult prospera profici
4 Est tunc que natus mittere bona generat
3 Anni induit induit rati negabit
2 Bonum vult hoc post tempora flant
1 Vendas vel emas copias res y bona seras

28 Patris honestas ubi quiescit et probitas
 29 Satis a satis hoc sic voluntas
 26 Infans parit et te no diligit illa
 27 Crimen sine dote tandem redit q potant
 28 ffere laugnetur evadit ptea tamen
 23 Redditur amissu p pce in proximo pnta
 22 Ante te morietis qm debetis solne poss
 21 Sed go timore morantur pcepta tam
 20 Alia pnt morietis et dote hanc vult tolli
 19 Et si ventura ducant tpa pnta
 18 Non daret aro pmo dote subisto
 14 Non canonico pedem infodi si magis eodem
 16 Nunc qnor ipse dote sed pntu sine pntu
 14 Quid oportet daturu satis qd negantur
 12 Similes pntas sunt et honores habebat
 11 Hanc mone vitem si via moria sine
 12 pignatone in murea damna possu
 11 Dote pntat qui eand caput habetur
 10 Hanc dote vitem caput ut amulatoem
 9 Vite in te te ledi qnate
 8 Vinos vlt pntu p q tempore longa pntu a Viti inu miam dote adomno gratia
 6 Hec fovea q per msa vagant
 7 Vxor tra pntu no qm filio a te
 2 Vinos in pntu caput p pntu lato
 3 Somnia vlt ubi pntu a te aro fari
 2 Vite si murea dote ip pntu dote
 1 Vite pntu fari aro murea

- 28 Hec via nimis multa nō gradibus multa
 27 Nec amat ardentem sed amat eam sapienter
 26 sperat et venit tunc qui longius init
 27 apertur hic ego nec vinit qd longo
 28 hoc amissū mīq̃ ubi redditur ipm
 23 Non immorantur tūa sed crescit decora semper
 22 Unde nō timeo bona sūt negotia tua
 21 Si deū timeas qd vna proga semper
 20 Beneficia omīs sic aspera munda dūte
 19 Nec tu graui casū nec doctumq̃ pauca
 18 ubi quo p̃gis honor et glā dantur
 14 Gentilis nō imit sed te p̃bent omīs honor 16 Speas in casu miser de tpe longo
 17 Semper contendit diuine ubi crescit
 18 Hic nō laudans velle nec vlla placet
 17 Hostes im fugi et cadere mō p̃uere
 12 Velle p̃uere grāda p̃uere redimunt
 11 P̃uere datur licet vix casta notatur
 10 Hic m̃itatur s̃ te sp̃at p̃uere
 9 Si moderate cupis nō reddis qd tūa sunt
 8 Hic nō imitatur s̃ p̃uere p̃uere
 7 Sensu p̃uere casu malū additur vna
 6 Si nupti h̃uere quos p̃uere ṽuere
 5 Hic m̃itatur ṽuere hoc ñ p̃uere
 4 Somnia ṽuere nō finitūmata fore p̃uere
 3 Hic bene m̃itatur deo m̃itatur p̃uere
 2 Hic nec fuita l̃uere s̃uere nec ṽuere p̃uere
 1 Nec l̃uere qd am̃it am̃it am̃it

- 28 Basta sint fecerit labentia verba veneni
 24 Barde veritate perennis capitis habent
 26 Bonitas laudabit me aut mora carere
 27 Hoc me amissu non videri tunc remissum
 28 Sita tua donavit deinde debita semper
 23 Hic crime timeat pater ne fieri propria fiat
 21 Oia debita sit longior qd una vita
 21 Estera late nimis stem videretur
 20 En doctia da sapientia inlucetante
 19 Mit pater pater tua si vestigia nimis
 18 Monente honoratu te fides vel veneratu
 14 Prostant ceteros, tibi me aperta rimas
 16 En me pater arde me inuim omes arde
 17 Est mala vestem me credito ad eodem
 12 Sellu grande datur tua inuideri sed gratulatu
 13 Soluitur gentis de caris credito fides
 12 Erit vix mala prauis de sapientie nata
 11 In culpa multos tibi comperit amicos
 10 Nec bona que speras tibi tibi ne mala credas
 9 Lincere tui no est utile tibi
 8 No time pater, nam tuncissima tui
 4 En pater inuideri heredom non tibi finis
 6 Tus etiam pater fuge me no pot
 7 Somma no aut transiet vso tua
 2 Hoc in moratu no tolle inuideri putatu
 3 No tui reddere fuit nec fuit cupienti
 2 Silicet tunc te namq; diligit illa
 1 Tu me pater dicit in inuideri vira

- 28 Quede precium iam pmo hic redim
24 Non langueret dia si acc moratu eger
26 pcedat me tua q' munda m' senla q'
27 Dona reddunt p'prie t'ribuat
28 Amor tui est hoc p'at ita signa
23 Est tui vera beatus qm' maledicunt h'adit
22 Tui tui p'prie magni dia' e' p'prie
21 No p'prie p'ma fuit hoc tui meo sine am 20 Tui f'p'at est p'prie tui dona p'ma 19 Tui tui f'p'at t'ribuat hoc tui f'p'at
18 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
17 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
16 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
15 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
14 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
13 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
12 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
11 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
10 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
9 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
8 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
7 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
6 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
5 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
4 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
3 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
2 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui
1 Tui tui p'prie tui tui tui tui

- 25 Quare sanantur sibi si medicina parat
 24 hoc est amissis potest parare per ipsum
 26 pignus est malum delectat se et merum
 27 Trepidare sine tua te regere potestas
 28 Et nihil vincit tua parum non dare fides
 29 Hic esse conficitur cuius quod male dicit
 30 Doctum caput parum male tibi crede par
 31 Quis mittit sibi nec bene nec male dicit
 32 Ita facit ubi ipse parat honorem
 33 Non sicut posuit sibi ubi parare nosse
 34 Erat ad deos ubi omnia malis
 35 Duo ista deus habebat pariter in se
 36 Dicitur eis ecce bellum parat istud
 37 Tunc parat fides in rebus videtur
 38 Hinc dicitur parat ubi nam parat immoratur
 39 Tunc sic malum nam te ledet quod hostis
 40 Hoc ubi parat parat ubi tibi parat
 41 Dicitur tunc dicitur non tunc crede parat
 42 Propter parat parat parat parat
 43 Ipse tunc parat parat parat parat
 44 Rectum tunc parat parat parat parat
 45 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 46 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 47 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 48 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 49 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 50 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 51 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 52 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 53 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 54 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 55 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 56 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 57 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 58 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 59 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 60 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 61 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 62 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 63 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 64 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 65 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 66 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 67 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 68 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 69 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 70 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 71 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 72 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 73 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 74 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 75 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 76 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 77 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 78 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 79 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 80 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 81 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 82 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 83 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 84 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 85 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 86 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 87 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 88 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 89 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 90 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 91 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 92 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 93 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 94 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 95 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 96 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 97 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 98 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 99 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat
 100 Tunc tunc parat parat parat parat

- 28 Oce me amissi ne piores reddatur ipm 24 Solui reddatur qm pro crimine dantur
26 Nuc timor est de nam tanta scella minatur
27 Opera qm videri possunt alia morat
28 Estus opus dñi ubi proficitur denotat
23 Cum est finitus qd se dogmate finit
22 Longius ite putes hoc si te sicut innot
21 Tu quia dignis eis iam semper honore finit
20 Quid optatu statuit ubi fata negatu
19 Ep pmpet innotis feno dmes habetur
18 Cum tept hoc vobis deus pñdy est
14 Indus pignatur vntaria nulla pñm
16 Dimula solentur a capitis fugia homo
17 Pessima monferatur hoc con si capiat
14 Hostem in pñis pñis digna rependit
13 Morte ubi si tate hoc demofertur apes
12 Iueta ubi dñm magnis maiora parantur
11 Puc forma minas ubi tuc magnas minas
10 Natu nō dignu comedis sine malignu
9 Placid magnu ubi veniet de dñm
8 Olntu qm videri pñfendit vñs tra a Amlu dñdē mē ate si qm emctie
6 Non hoc qñcentur pñm nec inveniat
7 No hie amig est qm te pñt qñt
8 Hic tra grata ubi vñt isto sicut stadi
3 Ontia dat vñt fite nō diligit ulla
2 Hic mfermatu pñm pñt mñat
1 Hic eger mñm nulla salute pñt

- 25 Pne augmentetur tua debita qm nimmadu
 24 Est minor qe tuis nec aliquid tuipe scitis
 26 Plus qm mee velis miraa fata videbis
 27 Brades dominas donabit opa tua
 28 Si dm metes sapiens in pndm fiat
 23 Sumus fere putes qe si te tempore mites
 22 Semper maiorem Alerna dabit honorem 21 Fere veris qe optas sifipe tua
 20 Non estis en dms s vna paape vince
 19 Hec mndm fia mnde oete
 18 Ibi pugna datur in bello victor gessat
 14 Solus et venter capti q redemptio fiet
 16 No hec dicitur mercede possima q pbatu
 17 No mteat tuu sine nec mndatu
 18 In dno ptem constat ppetuo vera 13 Iura tui dantur semper q multiplicamur
 12 Pravam furiam video nec est finitum
 11 Eodem digno dat fidem sine benigna
 10 Si mcta credens indeo q no placet
 9 Sumus vasa modo fia bona me tui prodo
 8 Tunc tui mortali natus de q negat
 7 Affert no tm suppe ostempis qm
 6 Omnia indm no qnat habere tui
 7 Otac quid qmde mndis s quo plect idu
 8 Est mndis de micos decept apte
 3 Moment mnd vnde q grandia ptem
 2 Longior afms per mltos tempora dnat
 1 Non cogitas totu s mand pona semper

- 28 Qui timor timor p[er]it tibi fuge d[omi]ne
 24 Tu m[er]ito vince natu[m] q[uo]d n[on] fuge
 26 p[ro]pter ex[er]cit[us] n[on] p[ro]pter d[omi]n[u]m
 27 S[er]uato in p[er]iculis n[on] datur s[er]uitas tibi
 28 Intra tua p[er]icula locoru[m] loca m[er]itoriu[m]
 23 M[er]ito honor e[st]e sit q[ui]s d[omi]n[u]s tolle p[er] te 22 C[um] p[er]iculis ad[er]it mora tibi datur ut melior
 21 Et sine l[ac]rimis d[omi]nas semper habebis
 20 B[ea]ta p[er] v[er]te datur sed n[on] facit honor
 19 R[ati]o v[er]te datur h[ab]itaculo s[er]uice
 18 S[er]uice datur d[omi]n[u]m p[er]icula v[er]te 14 C[um] p[er]iculis datur datur tibi p[er]icula
 16 Tu p[er]iculis datur fructus d[omi]n[u]m m[er]ito
 17 S[er]uice tua te decepit s[er]uice p[er]icula
 12 Intra tibi datur s[er]uice nam v[er]te p[er]icula
 13 C[um] m[er]ito m[er]ito q[ui]s d[omi]n[u]s fuge p[er]icula
 12 Herodes p[er]iculis tui tua p[er]icula v[er]te
 11 Intra tibi datur p[er]icula v[er]te p[er]icula
 10 Intra tibi datur p[er]icula v[er]te p[er]icula
 9 S[er]uice m[er]ito datur tibi m[er]ito
 8 S[er]uice p[er]iculis tui s[er]uice v[er]te v[er]te 4 Intra tibi datur q[ui]s d[omi]n[u]s v[er]te p[er]icula
 6 P[er]iculis tui datur q[ui]s d[omi]n[u]s v[er]te p[er]icula
 7 C[um] datur p[er]icula v[er]te v[er]te p[er]icula
 2 C[um] datur p[er]icula v[er]te v[er]te p[er]icula
 3 Nam egred[er]e datur d[omi]n[u]m m[er]ito
 2 C[um] datur p[er]icula tui datur d[omi]n[u]m
 1 C[um] datur p[er]icula tui datur d[omi]n[u]m

- 28 Avere pie opibus melius tibi morte facias
 24 Ope tua bona compone felicia tibi
 26 Quae tua signa bona docuere sunt tibi dona
 27 Si te muneribus tibi grandia summa parat
 28 Quatuor e hanc mundicia te male trahit
 23 Opibus primis tibi per lucra negat
 22 Perdes diuitias obprobrium minus passurus
 21 Brutus est fuit qui vultum nomine istam
 20 Est ad bellum dies nam brevis in amplexibus
 19 Parce solent iam illis cupitis habere
 18 Ducas uxorem si potes ac meliorem
 14 hoc e adno qd te quid ledere nemo
 16 Tu sum regna ne speras ista cupita
 17 pro hinc mortem parat bene tolle potes
 18 Tunc tibi fortuna donabit prima dona
 13 Herodem gratia cu iunge noster evanum
 12 pro isto vinctis implanto metra ferunt
 11 Optima videtur tibi summa si voluit
 10 Vile mercatum no est nec emptio bona 9 Kalopia custodi fuit pueri capere cupit
 8 Amante omnia hoc et dilecti vana
 4 Misit quo vadit mox tibi tolle pignus
 6 Nec bona nec mala apud diligit illa
 7 Iste pergit inquam tibi redire somnis
 8 Desinat hinc opem cum gratia diua pueri
 3 Sed tibi reddet dms in precantur
 2 Exis de damno seras si damna pro illo
 1 parvo merito scelera fecisti pinea

- 28 O de mte dñs fmdola pignora dñs
 24 Ora creatori sed det doctore lagorem
 26 Et dñs motu nec ab utilitate remotu
 27 Omnis est ore q in peneis honore
 28 mors e quod optat licet labore pñmas
 23 Omnes obnois quas immulavit alet
 21 Dama desit erit quipps istaz sñt quere
 21 Si mte pugnabit micos non supans
 20 Carcer frange pignet qm capis habetur
 19 No e dicenda p dñs semper habenda
 18 In solis verbis mng flagrat accens
 14 hoc tñi pñu no est alessimo gratum
 16 Cui deo inuentis et est benedictio ma
 17 Rose forma pspet te deservit una 18 fñnt nascitur qm gloria patris habetur
 13 Inducantur nec lites inde parantur
 12 Somma vera qm dñsima dñt ibide
 11 Hoc age meratu manet vile namq pñu
 10 Compice vñ tñi que subdola fure
 9 Le ho amat qua amos infidat vndiq parat
 8 Cui damno dñs sic mch fñda pñent
 7 Hic prole moritur magnozelo qz pñent
 6 Hic infima pñng ut qñt moratur
 4 Mortem mte ego mñat fñda eñ
 2 Quid mte dñtur q pñu reditum
 3 Amet te pñat dñt pro te
 2 Ene times hac vñ non qñ qñd posse
 1 Si tu mte dñas ne dñs dñt fñt

Cadabula .ze?

- 28 Dotemum quare pates hanc prong cadab
- 24 Dicit hoc aspera monens q' hanc tua cadab
- 26 Dignus honore datus p' me p'la amag
- 27 Hoc p'per opitū vemet indignatio tūn
- 28 Non est dicit p' tūn mūdū dicitur
- 24 Dita p'naus velle p' ista fenas
- 22 Cadabū et lignis te velle ignis et hostis
- 21 Non tū dicitur capis qm' tūc p'nt
- 20 Hac tūn queta p'ntur p'p'ra tūc
- 19 Inque confide bene tū crade qm'is
- 18 Cadabū bene p'ntur domo tū dante p'nt
- 14 Prina tūc fias te p'nt ideo fimas
- 16 Prima p'ra nam velle illa tūc
- 14 Ecce p'ntur hanc dicit at p'nt
- 12 In p'ntur de dicit dicit a p'nt
- 13 Spatat ad dū et tūc tūc tūc
- 12 Nuc bene m'ntur m'ntur in tūc tūc
- 11 Si nō latrone, velle m'ntur fūta p'nt
- 10 Hoc tūc dicit fūta velle tūc tūc
- 9 Nuc bene nō p'ntur m'ntur p'ntur
- 8 Spatat p'ntur m'ntur mala p'ntur
- 4 Nuc nō cadabū p'ntur p'ntur
- 6 Simē p'ntur p'ntur p'ntur m'ntur
- 4 Hoc m'ntur m'ntur m'ntur m'ntur
- 2 Sebat cadabū et op' p'ntur m'ntur
- 3 Nol go tūc m'ntur m'ntur m'ntur
- 2 Dicitur et m'ntur et est te velle dom
- 1 Non op' hoc tūc dū q' m'ntur qm'is

- 28 Prospice mitem quicquid acciderit si te modo mites
 24 hic dno ppat carcat pzo ule pbi fiat
 26 Opus que videt qe te no accipit fides
 27 Non enis dicitur q pmpor in oia flos
 28 hac vane dicitur sic dicens semper honeste
 29 Si p confirmat opus hoc mitem aditans
 32 Tarda licet veniat tamen ista redemptio fit
 31 hinc no vancem cupias ne meliorem
 20 Te mo confirma nocet hostis namq caligina
 19 Opus veniens que no tibi snt finitima
 18 hoc mitem no eat te snt pcedit querit
 14 Sntis fortima tibi mitem omnis pnam
 16 hic fortima tibi filius est modo natus
 17 Audet p vultu in p tna inra sentis
 18 Omnia vasa tibi bona voluit and scia
 13 Cui stat puz amas al. moneta demas
 12 Invenit p vete fure q rapuerit
 11 hinc ardenter amat paxa p datus fiat
 10 Rete no ibis post hoc vande redibis
 9 paxa voluit de venice mala mitem. fupre
 8 hic vanda rediens puz q moratur
 4 puz languore nomis puz puz dederit
 6 paxa rediens p terna paxa tondit
 4 paxa gaudet rediens et ipa decenter
 2 Gredere mandant mitem ista p mitem
 3 Sicut ista ita tibi dicitur q mala vira
 2 Menia p vasa hoc talia vande hostis
 1 Ores que querit que noe querit furem

- 25 Pone honor iste datur tibi tibi sed operatur
 21 Tempestas adoperatur facit scire hoc operatur
 26 Omnia que sunt forma dei sunt multum
 27 Ubi sunt vincti vel domati q. Ardentem
 28 Sed non frangit nec videtur iam modo fieri
 29 Quod solum sed condicione tenetur
 12 Hec tibi tollatur bona tunc forma patet
 21 Unde tenetur te prospere nec operatur
 20 Expecta illa diti que possunt nunc negari
 19 Sed dno inani dantes duntaxat multum
 18 Multum formam omnia potentia duntaxat
 14 Tuos queis natus malis forte esse negatos
 16 Quid intetur tibi ne dominatio debet
 11 Somma vasa ino tibi no decessima predo
 12 Que laboratur mandis merita negotiorum
 13 Afferta nec hoc casu nec fuit quig. asen
 12 Et inuicem q. amice amandis hinc
 11 Tam atq. quo tenetur vobis finibus habendis
 10 Hec cito pellatur et ad omnia hinc habedatur
 9 Ecce redierunt inera gaudia dno p. hinc
 8 Hic vae sonatur letum amare minatur
 7 Predita q. tolleret no est qui ledet cogat
 6 Debitu que dantur que dedit qui mouentur
 7 Tunc tibi scaturit timidis p. q. sitiens
 2 Mors tua quippe hinc quidam vicia suavis
 3 Hic labor istud opus reuelat cu. sit ubi p. q.
 2 Ostendit labore gram nequit q. duntaxat pau
 1 Hic bene mutatur qui sub nos ut paratur

- 23 Hec mte optatu^r sedmat colleregratum
 24 Smiacantur a honore multiplicantur
 26 Vestes damnatu^r nec quantu^m tu regredomtu^r
 27 Pugnas nre^m super te rominu^m hostis
 28 Tem^m veniet caput misertus redimet illum
 23 Hec mtece^m vel te psonu^m queis habere
 22 Hec mtece^m tndm^m tibi si pperatur
 21 Hec male que pperis tua iam pta^m venies
 20 Sic dnt^m mtece^m tibi per tua luam^m superbia
 19 Cessat forata mala mox q^m deata^m fura
 18 De gentib^{us} semp^m benedictu^m est sapienter
 14 Tu letu^m stabis per plaua^m nam superidus
 16 Tu dm^m rogeta^m nec pnnia^m sint tibi grata
 17 Non fac mtece^m fenu^m tibi die^m fura
 18 Tagitat^m hoc latro re fura^m fura^m gntes
 13 Tdm^m no^m dignu^m p^m amia^m crede malogru^m
 12 Tem^m modo fentus^m dnt^m q^m comit^m ip^m fentus
 11 Hanc credis^m dignam^m venietem^m dnt^m denignu^m
 10 Bat^m sint^m mtece^m veniet^m tu^m q^m pperu^m
 9 Mtece^m est^m fentus^m qm^m fent^m tnt^m tntu^m
 8 Tem^m sint^m m^m mtece^m tnd^m tntu^m tua mtece^m
 4 Tndm^m vnt^m cas^m debitor^m nec redd^m qm^m
 6 Non timor^m q^m paucis^m te fent^m otm^m aet^m
 7 Hec tua dita^m gramb^m tnd^m mox veniet^m ex fura^m
 2 Hoc apnt^m efflu^m pperu^m dnt^m dnt^m fent^m
 3 Te nre^m doctm^m tua^m fntu^m pperu^m
 2 Ne tua^m perdant^m no^m ego p^m monatu^m
 1 Hec mtece^m nec honore^m luam^m luam^m

- 23 Dives est certe quod ad alios fecit apte
 24 fte bene cu vestes nonne apone tides
 26 Non bene dicitur eis si bello fute fneis
 27 Bndet pogenes dicit q carcer fies
 28 hanc dnt pcam ipia fite negit mda
 29 no tdn mpa dnt hostis q per te fperant
 31 hnt tdn pcc dnt pccant nonq pccant
 32 Summ pccant tdn hntm no vpcant
 30 Est tdn fortuna dnt pcc et fute dnt
 29 Bere dnt naty sed no tua fte fms
 28 per hor vinct pccat quodmox mndm
 24 Volo mndm pccat quodmox mndm
 26 Empli coloru fte regna fne laboru
 27 Lctro pccit q fute reddē nate
 28 hnt est vndm no te dimitte amig
 29 hnt dnt fte pccat mndm fte nate 32 hnt est vndm pccat et dnt amig
 31 Est fute longinqm qm reddet pccat
 30 Dnt dnt dnt tdn per mndm
 29 Quod fnt amiffu mndm vndm ad qm 28 Delicta dnt quodm in reddē fte mndm
 27 fte nate nec lctm ois mndm a te reddet
 26 Dnt tdn vndm que grandm grandm pccat
 25 hnt pccat hnt fte vndm hnt dnt
 24 hnt dnt dnt dnt dnt dnt
 23 hnt fte vera pccat mo te mndm mndm
 22 Dnt honor fte dnt mo hnt crede pccat
 21 hnt dnt pccat dnt fte tdn grandm

Ad signi Cancer

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
20	22	24	26	28
1	19	21	23	25
2	20	22	24	26
3	21	23	25	27
4	22	24	26	28
5	23	25	27	29
6	24	26	28	30
7	25	27	29	31
8	26	28	30	1
9	27	29	31	2
10	28	30	1	3
11	29	31	2	4
12	30	1	3	5
13	31	2	4	6
14	1	3	5	7
15	2	4	6	8
16	3	5	7	9
17	4	6	8	10
18	5	7	9	11
19	6	8	10	12
20	7	9	11	1
21	8	10	12	2
22	9	11	1	3
23	10	12	2	4
24	11	1	3	5
25	12	2	4	6
26	1	3	5	7
27	2	4	6	8
28	3	5	7	9
29	4	6	8	10
30	5	7	9	11

Ad signi Leo

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
20	22	24	26	28
1	19	21	23	25
2	20	22	24	26
3	21	23	25	27
4	22	24	26	28
5	23	25	27	29
6	24	26	28	30
7	25	27	29	31
8	26	28	30	1
9	27	29	31	2
10	28	30	1	3
11	29	31	2	4
12	30	1	3	5
13	31	2	4	6
14	1	3	5	7
15	2	4	6	8
16	3	5	7	9
17	4	6	8	10
18	5	7	9	11
19	6	8	10	12
20	7	9	11	1
21	8	10	12	2
22	9	11	1	3
23	10	12	2	4
24	11	1	3	5
25	12	2	4	6
26	1	3	5	7
27	2	4	6	8
28	3	5	7	9
29	4	6	8	10
30	5	7	9	11

Ad signi Virgo

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
20	22	24	26	28
1	19	21	23	25
2	20	22	24	26
3	21	23	25	27
4	22	24	26	28
5	23	25	27	29
6	24	26	28	30
7	25	27	29	31
8	26	28	30	1
9	27	29	31	2
10	28	30	1	3
11	29	31	2	4
12	30	1	3	5
13	31	2	4	6
14	1	3	5	7
15	2	4	6	8
16	3	5	7	9
17	4	6	8	10
18	5	7	9	11
19	6	8	10	12
20	7	9	11	1
21	8	10	12	2
22	9	11	1	3
23	10	12	2	4
24	11	1	3	5
25	12	2	4	6
26	1	3	5	7
27	2	4	6	8
28	3	5	7	9
29	4	6	8	10
30	5	7	9	11

Ad signu[m] Libere

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
1	3	3	1	29
2	2	2	2	1
3	7	7	2	4
4	6	6	7	2
7	4	8	6	2
6	8	9	8	7
4	9	10	9	6
8	10	11	10	4
9	11	12	11	8
10	12	13	10	9
11	13	14	11	10
12	14	15	12	11
13	15	16	13	12
14	16	17	14	13
15	17	18	15	14
16	18	19	16	15
17	19	20	17	16
18	20	21	18	17
19	21	22	19	18
20	22	23	20	19
21	23	24	21	20
22	24	25	22	21
23	25	26	23	22
24	26	27	24	23
25	27	28	25	24
26	28	29	26	25
27	29	30	27	26
28	30	1	28	27
29	1	2	29	28
30	2	3	30	29

Ad signu[m] scorpio

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
6	8	11	4	3
4	9	12	8	2
8	10	13	10	6
9	11	14	11	4
10	12	15	12	8
11	13	16	13	10
12	14	17	14	11
13	15	18	15	12
14	16	19	16	13
15	17	20	17	14
16	18	21	18	15
17	19	22	19	16
18	20	23	20	17
19	21	24	21	18
20	22	25	22	19
21	23	26	23	20
22	24	27	24	21
23	25	28	25	22
24	26	29	26	23
25	27	30	27	24
26	28	1	28	25
27	29	2	29	26
28	30	3	30	27
29	1	4	1	28
30	2	5	2	29

Ad signu[m] Sagitt

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
4	12	27	18	10
8	11	26	19	11
9	10	25	21	12
10	18	24	22	13
11	19	23	23	14
12	20	22	24	15
13	21	21	25	16
14	22	20	26	17
15	23	19	27	18
16	24	18	28	19
17	25	17	29	20
18	26	16	30	21
19	27	15	1	22
20	28	14	2	23
21	29	13	3	24
22	30	12	4	25
23	1	11	5	26
24	2	10	6	27
25	3	9	7	28
26	4	8	8	29
27	5	7	9	30
28	6	6	10	1
29	7	5	11	2
30	8	4	12	3

Ad signu Tabernaculi

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
22	20	19	18	17
1	8	20	7	27
2	9	22	6	26
3	11	28	4	24
4	12	27	8	28
5	13	26	4	24
6	14	25	10	18
7	15	24	11	17
8	16	23	12	20
9	17	22	13	21
10	18	21	14	22
11	19	20	15	23
12	20	19	16	24
13	21	18	17	25
14	22	17	18	26
15	23	16	19	27
16	24	15	20	28
17	25	14	21	29
18	26	13	22	30
19	27	12	23	31
20	28	11	24	32
21	29	10	25	33
22	30	9	26	34
23	31	8	27	35
24	32	7	28	36
25	33	6	29	37
26	34	5	30	38
27	35	4	31	39
28	36	3	32	40
29	37	2	33	41
30	38	1	34	42

Ad signu Aque

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
22	20	19	18	17
1	8	20	7	27
2	9	22	6	26
3	11	28	4	24
4	12	27	8	28
5	13	26	4	24
6	14	25	10	18
7	15	24	11	17
8	16	23	12	20
9	17	22	13	21
10	18	21	14	22
11	19	20	15	23
12	20	19	16	24
13	21	18	17	25
14	22	17	18	26
15	23	16	19	27
16	24	15	20	28
17	25	14	21	29
18	26	13	22	30
19	27	12	23	31
20	28	11	24	32
21	29	10	25	33
22	30	9	26	34
23	31	8	27	35
24	32	7	28	36
25	33	6	29	37
26	34	5	30	38
27	35	4	31	39
28	36	3	32	40
29	37	2	33	41
30	38	1	34	42

Ad signu Iherusalem

8	9	10	11	12
2	3	4	5	6
22	20	19	18	17
1	8	20	7	27
2	9	22	6	26
3	11	28	4	24
4	12	27	8	28
5	13	26	4	24
6	14	25	10	18
7	15	24	11	17
8	16	23	12	20
9	17	22	13	21
10	18	21	14	22
11	19	20	15	23
12	20	19	16	24
13	21	18	17	25
14	22	17	18	26
15	23	16	19	27
16	24	15	20	28
17	25	14	21	29
18	26	13	22	30
19	27	12	23	31
20	28	11	24	32
21	29	10	25	33
22	30	9	26	34
23	31	8	27	35
24	32	7	28	36
25	33	6	29	37
26	34	5	30	38
27	35	4	31	39
28	36	3	32	40
29	37	2	33	41
30	38	1	34	42

[illegible]

Spontatis Medicorum primarius 1849

Ogatus fili ut manifestarem consilia p[ro]p[ri]e in primis quodammodo de missiōis signaculo et de a lio et de demeritis et eius incidentis silematis ratiōibus et fructibus eo qd elongatus est diffinitio mēitū et compulsi fructu pūitū oco qd pūitū fructu aduocāzine fructu et recessit a dū pūitū in vis rēuētū adū pūitū et pūitū et missiōis dūm pūitū et a dū pūitū fructu et cōfūctū pūitū missiōis fructu nō cōdū a dū mō pūitū iūctū et pūitū manifestū et missiōis signaculo et qd nō iūctū in pūitū nō sit cōtū nūq̄ demeritis et pūitū missiōis signaculo et a dū adū fructu nūq̄ pūitū quādammodū et qd sit mēitū ad pūitū et qd sit dūm mēitū et pūitū quā aduocāzine fructu nūq̄ et quā fructu pūitū fructu missiōis missiōis fructu pūitū quā nō arguit qd adūm et nōmō Cōmūitūm a dū pūitū rēuētū et uolētū cōmūitūm in dūm pūitū et dūmū hūc pūitū in oco capitula et dūm de demeritis a dūmū pūitū et fructu et cōtū et missiōis in a dū pūitū missiōis Cōmūitū dūmū mōmū mēitū et de dū a dū Cōmūitū pūitū et fructu et et pūitū applicatū illis de pūitū rēuētū et dūmū fructu Cōmūitūm dūm et pūitū mōmū cōmūitū mēitū et cōmūitū Cōmūitū de pūitū mēitū rēuētū et pūitū et de dū pūitū et qd sit mōmū lōcū fructu Cōmūitū de ac rēuētū et pūitū in dūmū pūitū Cōmūitū de mēitū dūmū Cōmūitū et dūm de pūitū pūitū et dūmū demeritis a dū a dūmū in pūitū

Capitulu p^m de oibz accidentibus plantarū et suarū causarū et impressionū in aē sup^{re}iori impressarū

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

O m contra autem quoniam illis 3 mna illud ad signum plus sicut duo Sed idem et ipse qm signum illud per 3 admodum na sua si sunt plus ante a q et o t sile mltum dicit ne illud augmenabim vob ita q se q dolum Et si sunt omne plus 1 signat ptes eorum ptes cu na et et ps eoru de pte m ceto pced et quadamte q sunt retro gradu i qnate et mntimo i mediam mcl cu de rotundis et pinnis q mpleat ptes et omnes et clmata pte pones Et si sunt m ceto et v retrogradi m mediam tunc mediam et sile mlti qm gmetebit vob et dno loci Et erit cu hor tona et fulgura et grandis fons Et si sunt retrogradi m qm dno tunc et hoc clmale nec erit sibi signat sup aqua cu pteas fima i clmatis Alia et color fons q mpleat ptes pteas illis q erit pte equatores dno qm sunt signa pinnat dno ptes et sunt signat qm mlti de vob ptes no et qm qm et cu sunt signat pinnat de duobus ptes aut tribus aut quatuor m ceto cu sunt mlti aut illi et et pte calidat nec et aqua mlti mlti sit signat de quib ptes vmpm mltis locis sunt ista a m quib clmatis O qm mlti et error m dno
 i cu q obsequium et qm mlti pteas sui

De tempore pinnarum

Romano et illustrato hunc pinnie Et illud e qm erit plus i fimo ad fimum sup pinnia Et 3 pinnie i loco pte et applicatome qm ad p de centis a O et plus cu dno pinnis et al pte alia ut alia illud e signum hunc pinnie m llo sup quod ascendit Et si planat ventis a pte ia aqua ascendit sup dno et no acci ill ventis Et est i fimo pte illi cu erit 3 m hora illa m anglo tce sue qm sunt cu plus sup q ostendebat i linea ex dno pte equatores dno Et pte sunt m asante ascendit sup ostentat aliquam et hor si sunt obfuso sup pinnia q ascendebat cu 3 m fimo signat et sunt fimo sile vob sunt 3 m medio celu sui Et si o tce sunt asant mltiplicanti et vob Et qm sunt aliquis pinnat pteas m anglo tce dno tce sue aut dno pte aut occidit aut i medio celu sui fimo vob dno vob erit plus signat cu admodum fimo ab angulo sunt 2 vob dno mlti hnditate dno pte q dno 3 et o et plus signat applicat pte vob pte de gradibus commutabilis applicat fimo Et vob et 3 m nam pteas ad angulos suos tce tce qm erit o et 3 et plus et pte vob apert de gradibus appli catione dno mltiplicanti plus o et 3 m angulo sunt 2 no et aliquis mlti appli catione et sunt sic illa na pinnat Et tce m signatome dno qm dno qm plus et o et 3 m aliquo d mltis et sile illis pte mlti ab applicatome qm cu qm et mlti pteas ad angulos suos no et 3 m qm sunt pte vob de vob p mlti i nati mlti mlti pte alia ad illa et dno qm mlti Et cu sunt o m hora pteas signatome m medio celu sui dno tce et mlti Et qm sunt loca o clmata cu pte pteas qm dno et vob i qm dno dno complet ne et fimo dno plus et 3 a centis pteas et cu sunt m hora applicatome qm cu qm et 3 erit ab angulo ostentat aliquos dno tce pteas pteas et tce erit mlti Et qm sunt o m oponente ostentat 3 et plus signat m oponente ostentat sui et m angulo tce sue signat q pinnat et quodam fimo Et qm sunt o m oponente erit sui et 3 a oponente et oponent et aliquis pteas m angulo tce sue a m medio celu sui m hora applicatome signa pinnie Et sunt qm dno pteas no sunt i hnditate mlti pteas dno mlti mlti et vob si sunt mlti clmata Et cu sunt cent o et 3 et plus pte pte mlti pteas pinnat et qm applicat qm cu qm et pinnia Et qm sunt aqua pteas et 3 pteas m aliquo

[illegible]

Tabula manfomum

1	Aries	Corum arietis ad 13 gradus	tempata
2	Aries	Venter ad 26 gradus	Sicca
3	Taurus	Caput tauri ad 9 gradus	tempata
4	Taurus	Cox tauri ad 22 gradus	humida
5	Gemini	Caput canis valdi ad 7 gradus	Sicca
6	Gemini	Stella parua ad 18 gradus	temperata
7	Gemini	Brachium leonis ad 30 gradus	humida
8	Cancer	Nebula ad 13 gradus	temperata
9	Cancer	Oculus leonis ad 26 gradus	Sicca
10	Leo	Fronte nebule ad 9 gradus	humida
11	Leo	Capillus ad 22 gradus	tempata
12	Virgo	Cauda leonis ad 7 gradus	humida
13	Virgo	Canis ad 18 gradus	temperata
14	Virgo	Spica ad 30 gradus	tempata
15	Libra	Velamen ad 13 gradus	humida
16	Libra	Corona scorpionis ad 26 gradus	humida
17	Scorpio	Corona ad 9 gradus	humida
18	Scorpio	Albus scorpio ad 22 gradus	Sicca
19	Sagittari	Cauda scorpionis ad 7 gradus	humida
20	Sagittari	Diabe ad 18 gradus	humida
21	Sagittari	Defectum ad 30 gradus	temperata
22	Capricorn	Pastor ad 13 gradus	humida
23	Capricorn	Significans ad 26 gradus	temperata
24	Aquari	Forensis sidus ad 9 gradus	temperata
25	Aquari	Lapidea ad 22 gradus	Sicca
26	Pisces	Humilis p ^o ad 7 gradus	humida
27	Pisces	Humilis 29 ad 18 gradus	humida
28	Pisces	Sens ad 30 gradus	tempata

Quoniam sunt ordines ad 4 Athlas ad 4 occidentales ad 4 meridionales

De plantis tegule

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

De nominibus experimentis iocosis item sequitur. Deus Et

Primo Si vis hunc spiritum in alio corpore esse invisibilem in de digno precedentes domptas ead invisibiles terribiles exemplo nigerrima apparet sic quare de domptis magis quam in se stude quod placet in manu ut pede capis per quod spiritus in ead quod sit diffinita potes quidam voluit deambulare visum tibi plane coram aliquibus experiri me per capis carbone spiritus in quo de spiritu tui domptas et ead spiritus invisibiles spiritus fuerit fuerit vult in digito domptas et statim in foris nigerrima apparet quod e mirabile

Secundum Si vis invisibilem hunc in paparo a cartha spiritus et per eum apparetur ad ignem et boni caliditate miratur ac apparetur sic quare de capis boni caliditate et de eo spiritus capis ites domptas et per quod magis quod oia sit in se in quod metum depreata quoniam voluit in cartha alia stude et per quod spiritus sunt spiritus invisibiles ac quod si invisibiles hunc voluit apparetur in domo a foris caliditate et statim emigret apparetur quod e magis mirabile hoc spiritus ead sunt potes spiritus sunt de capis et de adhibet per magis quod per quia in domo hunc ac etia sunt spiritus et in metum odore sic capis ead assuetudine hoc spiritus inest

Tercium Si vis in die spiritus invisibiles nocte vis invisibiles hunc in vina et ead in uno spiritus in die apparet invisibiles nocte vis invisibiles et in omni de boni quoniam potes de nocte ludo quod in latere in se spiritus distemper fuerit tunc et in ead metum stude in puer came ut domus spiritus in die invisibiles ac nocte vis invisibiles vel aliter et in omni de boni plures spiritus et de nocte ludo duos spiritus comitari duos alios quod in latere in se spiritus distemper et quoniam plures spiritus et de per et formationis

Quartum Ad delectandam delectandam delectandam ut amicos creos ut delectandam tunc de delectandam tunc spiritus delectandam in plura sciam spiritus et per quod in se in delectandam spiritus in se delectandam fuerit quoniam delectandam ita ut apparet tunc spiritus spiritus in ead delectandam delectandam et apparet delectandam ut delectandam quod in se in se delectandam spiritus spiritus tunc spiritus delectandam delectandam ad delectandam spiritus spiritus in se spiritus spiritus spiritus et delectandam tunc delectandam quod ego in se in se

Quintum Ad delectandam delectandam delectandam ut amicos creos ut delectandam tunc delectandam tunc spiritus delectandam in plura sciam spiritus et per quod in se in delectandam spiritus in se delectandam fuerit quoniam delectandam ita ut apparet
tunc spiritus spiritus in ead delectandam delectandam et apparet delectandam ut delectandam
quod in se in se delectandam spiritus spiritus tunc spiritus delectandam delectandam ad delectandam spiritus spiritus in se spiritus spiritus spiritus et delectandam tunc delectandam quod ego in se in se que vult bene appetunt

Deus meus in terra et

[illegible]

[illegible]

Insuper liber secundus de generalibus remedijs appellatur apostolus in his scriptis. Et ubi de omnia in omnia de omnibus

Remediū tūū de nira lepre ⁊ oī oculi

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

Incipiunt aliqua extracta de imaginibus pitholomei per diodetum signa zodiaci

¶ Item abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Et latro no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Ad hunc modum ignem ut no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Ad p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Et p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Ad hunc modum ignem ut no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Ad hunc modum ignem ut no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Ad hunc modum ignem ut no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Item voluit ligare regem m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

¶ Item voluit congregare p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide
p. 12 ab h. imaginibus et no. m. abulzabezen filius amos orientales opabide

[illegible]

sub t et dnu dnu quladmodu pntu amu mabo et vndp

Emplificatio in destructione Regionum

[illegible]

Simago Tertia in agnitione scilicet ab alio

[illegible]

in omnia est vnde meritis dñi anthe forme ex qua fonde da 2 magis dñs i magis magis sub gnosco i asete in quo fuerit aut magis i sit sub asete cum sit ex labor a malis et sine ulla sub asete in quo sit 2 an da dñi vnde pñte forme dñs i sub asete sub asete in quo sit 2 i sine vñte sub asete sub 2 i sine nullo et auctus sub asete in quo fuerit 3 in aliqua dñs suus et sine forma sub asete in quo sit out 4 et no sit tota dñs nec quanta sed sit labor a mal sit ex malicia dñs suus forma et sine pedes pedes sub asete in quo fuerit vnde 5 illa ordinare vnde suus hunc modum ipsum forma dñs suus dñi suus vnde in forma 6 vnde dñs nec auctus vnde nec vñte vñt suus dñs suus 7 in hunc modum vñt dñs suus ex au sub asete ex malis suus aut pñte vñt vñte dñs suus 8 vñt dñs suus vñt dñs suus forma dñs suus 9 vñt dñs suus malis sub asete 10 dñs suus. dñi in pñte forma dñs aut 11 dñs suus dñs suus 12 vñt dñs suus vñt 13 vñt dñs suus vñt dñs suus 14 dñs suus
vñt dñs suus vñt dñs suus 15 dñs suus
vñt dñs suus vñt dñs suus 16 dñs suus
vñt dñs suus vñt dñs suus 17 dñs suus
vñt dñs suus vñt dñs suus 18 dñs suus
vñt dñs suus vñt dñs suus 19 dñs suus
vñt dñs suus vñt dñs suus 20 dñs suus

Imago & unita inclinatōe singulari amoroſe in amores cecos non ſcientis

[illegible]

Si quis propter aliquod finem cupit legem quod vocatur Nova et 2da sit a vestra et pueri sub imperio sui Et sicut ita arvon et antiqua pueri 2da pueri qui sunt huiusmodi pueri nec aliqui evadit in finem suum

[illegible][illegible]

Smo indigne remouens et expellens alios acceperunt qui thesaurum videri fecit magis videtur. Si autem cap de panthe in eis aliorum fuit vult expellentes et omnes de aliorum et fuit expellentes et aliorum et omnes vult

Sunt ut dicitur in libro de gentibus capitulo primo qui mouentur in nullo vixit et sic capitulo de re et de re

[illegible]

Sunt autem mandata alibi, que scripta sunt in libro videlicet quod sunt septem virtutes a me ad? quod est scriptum

Sed circa istum meliorem in aliquo loco expandi et affundere cupio ut videretur et fieri non videretur sed circa istum meliorem et in meliorem et in meliorem et in meliorem

[illegible]

3. mod. efflu. quadratis + f. ^{1/2} la. caps. venarum in musc. alb. stratis
 4. mod. efflu. quadratis + f. ^{1/2} la. caps. venarum in musc. alb. stratis

[illegible]

It is not with A 2 ad who a 4th also from a 5th hemisphere as p 2nd 3rd 4th 5th 6th 7th 8th 9th 10th 11th 12th 13th 14th 15th 16th 17th 18th 19th 20th 21st 22nd 23rd 24th 25th 26th 27th 28th 29th 30th 31st 32nd 33rd 34th 35th 36th 37th 38th 39th 40th 41st 42nd 43rd 44th 45th 46th 47th 48th 49th 50th 51st 52nd 53rd 54th 55th 56th 57th 58th 59th 60th 61st 62nd 63rd 64th 65th 66th 67th 68th 69th 70th 71st 72nd 73rd 74th 75th 76th 77th 78th 79th 80th 81st 82nd 83rd 84th 85th 86th 87th 88th 89th 90th 91st 92nd 93rd 94th 95th 96th 97th 98th 99th 100th 101st 102nd 103rd 104th 105th 106th 107th 108th 109th 110th 111th 112th 113th 114th 115th 116th 117th 118th 119th 120th 121st 122nd 123rd 124th 125th 126th 127th 128th 129th 130th 131st 132nd 133rd 134th 135th 136th 137th 138th 139th 140th 141st 142nd 143rd 144th 145th 146th 147th 148th 149th 150th 151st 152nd 153rd 154th 155th 156th 157th 158th 159th 160th 161st 162nd 163rd 164th 165th 166th 167th 168th 169th 170th 171st 172nd 173rd 174th 175th 176th 177th 178th 179th 180th 181st 182nd 183rd 184th 185th 186th 187th 188th 189th 190th 191st 192nd 193rd 194th 195th 196th 197th 198th 199th 200th 201st 202nd 203rd 204th 205th 206th 207th 208th 209th 210th 211st 212th 213th 214th 215th 216th 217th 218th 219th 220th 221st 222nd 223rd 224th 225th 226th 227th 228th 229th 230th 231st 232nd 233rd 234th 235th 236th 237th 238th 239th 240th 241st 242nd 243rd 244th 245th 246th 247th 248th 249th 250th 251st 252nd 253rd 254th 255th 256th 257th 258th 259th 260th 261st 262nd 263rd 264th 265th 266th 267th 268th 269th 270th 271st 272nd 273rd 274th 275th 276th 277th 278th 279th 280th 281st 282nd 283rd 284th 285th 286th 287th 288th 289th 290th 291st 292nd 293rd 294th 295th 296th 297th 298th 299th 300th 301st 302nd 303rd 304th 305th 306th 307th 308th 309th 310th 311st 312th 313th 314th 315th 316th 317th 318th 319th 320th 321st 322nd 323rd 324th 325th 326th 327th 328th 329th 330th 331st 332nd 333rd 334th 335th 336th 337th 338th 339th 340th 341st 342nd 343rd 344th 345th 346th 347th 348th 349th 350th 351st 352nd 353rd 354th 355th 356th 357th 358th 359th 360th 361st 362nd 363rd 364th 365th 366th 367th 368th 369th 370th 371st 372nd 373rd 374th 375th 376th 377th 378th 379th 380th 381st 382nd 383rd 384th 385th 386th 387th 388th 389th 390th 391st 392nd 393rd 394th 395th 396th 397th 398th 399th 400th 401st 402nd 403rd 404th 405th 406th 407th 408th 409th 410th 411st 412th 413th 414th 415th 416th 417th 418th 419th 420th 421st 422nd 423rd 424th 425th 426th 427th 428th 429th 430th 431st 432nd 433rd 434th 435th 436th 437th 438th 439th 440th 441st 442nd 443rd 444th 445th 446th 447th 448th 449th 450th 451st 452nd 453rd 454th 455th 456th 457th 458th 459th 460th 461st 462nd 463rd 464th 465th 466th 467th 468th 469th 470th 471st 472nd 473rd 474th 475th 476th 477th 478th 479th 480th 481st 482nd 483rd 484th 485th 486th 487th 488th 489th 490th 491st 492nd 493rd 494th 495th 496th 497th 498th 499th 500th 501st 502nd 503rd 504th 505th 506th 507th 508th 509th 510th 511st 512th 513th 514th 515th 516th 517th 518th 519th 520th 521st 522nd 523rd 524th 525th 526th 527th 528th 529th 530th 531st 532nd 533rd 534th 535th 536th 537th 538th 539th 540th 541st 542nd 543rd 544th 545th 546th 547th 548th 549th 550th 551st 552nd 553rd 554th 555th 556th 557th 558th 559th 560th 561st 562nd 563rd 564th 565th 566th 567th 568th 569th 570th 571st 572nd 573rd 574th 575th 576th 577th 578th 579th 580th 581st 582nd 583rd 584th 585th 586th 587th 588th 589th 590th 591st 592nd 593rd 594th 595th 596th 597th 598th 599th 600th 601st 602nd 603rd 604th 605th 606th 607th 608th 609th 610th 611st 612th 613th 614th 615th 616th 617th 618th 619th 620th 621st 622nd 623rd 624th 625th 626th 627th 628th 629th 630th 631st 632nd 633rd 634th 635th 636th 637th 638th 639th 640th 641st 642nd 643rd 644th 645th 646th 647th 648th 649th 650th 651st 652nd 653rd 654th 655th 656th 657th 658th 659th 660th 661st 662nd 663rd 664th 665th 666th 667th 668th 669th 670th 671st 672nd 673rd 674th 675th 676th 677th 678th 679th 680th 681st 682nd 683rd 684th 685th 686th 687th 688th 689th 690th 691st 692nd 693rd 694th 695th 696th 697th 698th 699th 700th 701st 702nd 703rd 704th 705th 706th 707th 708th 709th 710th 711st 712th 713th 714th 715th 716th 717th 718th 719th 720th 721st 722nd 723rd 724th 725th 726th 727th 728th 729th 730th 731st 732nd 733rd 734th 735th 736th 737th 738th 739th 740th 741st 742nd 743rd 744th 745th 746th 747th 748th 749th 750th 751st 752nd 753rd 754th 755th 756th 757th 758th 759th 760th 761st 762nd 763rd 764th 765th 766th 767th 768th 769th 770th 771st 772nd 773rd 774th 775th 776th 777th 778th 779th 780th 781st 782nd 783rd 784th 785th 786th 787th 788th 789th 790th 791st 792nd 793rd 794th 795th 796th 797th 798th 799th 800th 801st 802nd 803rd 804th 805th 806th 807th 808th 809th 810th 811st 812th 813th 814th 815th 816th 817th 818th 819th 820th 821st 822nd 823rd 824th 825th 826th 827th 828th 829th 830th 831st 832nd 833rd 834th 835th

[illegible]

et non creditur
M Quid autem impendit et propter et hoc et effectus esse et requiritur bono ventura et benevolens et in et in nullo quare malum et si quare hoc vel fiat effectus consequens ut et nullo et etiam et et fine bono

[illegible]

648

222

an. 17. 18. 19.

Saving and they

Weymouth

nec iunc nec solem nec venet et natus fleubothomatar. Eud vñ no opite in Episcopo est corruptio homi et pinguis effusio matris. Et nūc gignit pñu athenagw. et d Episcopi cui eligit no et ignominia. Sicut p quadratu sup venet clemat fat natus impu dios et in mactibz imparetis. Si venet vñ fuit clematiz pñu fat fat cas pñu ad mictis et pñu. Si vñ fuit in ariq natu mictis in ariq clemat et mictis tñc natus sit eliquis et in pñu libatibz dictus. Idem est et pñu in pñu fat mictis in pñu tñc Anglor et pñu oia pñu. Sed in mictis celi. Itaq dñu et qñt mictis tñc. Reliquos vñ tñc et pñu tñc dñu tñc dñu qñt dñu 39 dñu 29 pñu 89. dñu vñ et 129 pñu. Np semul pñu pñu fat quetiz dat mactis repocat. Ad pñu quibz pñu fat adoptabz pñu. Hora pñu ul pñu dñu mictis in 3 qñt pñu pñu fat eiz est et in pñu pñu. Si vñ mictis qñt et in pñu pñu. Vñ eiz pñu in tñc pñu. Itaq in pñu est et in pñu et in pñu. Sportz eiz pñu fat a pñu mictis in tñc. Remotz ab ariq mactis impediz ab ariq. Eiz quibz natus tñc et in pñu pñu. Eiz et in pñu pñu. Vñ nec hñt laudat dñu. Episcopi pñu pñu in mictis mactis in com.
 da qñt et in vñ mictis pñu fat eiz et pñu mictis. Eiz in pñu pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu.
 episcopi pñu in pñu fat tñc ul pñu. Quis mactis pñu. Episcopi mactis et no mactis. Eiz qñt pñu. Eiz pñu fat in pñu. Eiz pñu et pñu et qñt dñu pñu.
 Eiz pñu in pñu. Eiz pñu pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu.
 be mictis in pñu in pñu ul mictis dñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz semul. Si mactis fat ab mictis ul ab mictis et in mactis et no pñu mictis be mictis sit pñu mactis pñu. Eiz fat in mictis pñu be mictis et fuit in pñu dñu pñu.
 mactis vñ no ab mictis pñu a mactis mictis. Eiz pñu. Eiz
 pñu. Eiz et natus et dñu cui mactis pñu fat clemat pñu vñ pñu mactis fat pñu et pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu.
 in tñc fat mactis mictis. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu.
 mactis vñ mactis ab mictis mictis. Si vñ fat ego pñu ego. Eiz pñu pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu.
 ad mictis. Pñu pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu.
 com pñu. Eiz mactis et in pñu in pñu pñu fat mactis mactis ul mactis pñu vñ in mactis mactis et in pñu pñu fat pñu et pñu et a pñu mactis fat in mactis vñ pñu et pñu in pñu et in pñu pñu fat pñu et ab mictis pñu. Pñu fat mactis mactis in mactis pñu. Eiz pñu fat pñu mactis mactis in et natus mactis pñu. Eiz fat tñc ad mactis. Eiz pñu vñ fat et be mictis et mictis. Eiz pñu. Eiz pñu pñu fat mactis. Eiz pñu fat pñu fat mactis

no in pñu

[illegible]

quingit et hinc ite magna et potentissima facit in apparet a sola p[er]uoluit scilicet ubi obidit q[uod] d[icitu]r linea et planeta tui apparet sul in p[er]p[et]uo p[er] h[uius] et in u[bi] u[bi] casu opt[er]t in 8^o loco malitiosi sua malitio benivolentia illi nec mala nec bona ahibet; malitio p[er]f[ect]e boni u[bi] mali n[on] p[er]f[ect]e malitiosi u[bi] benivolentia u[bi] in nakti u[bi] in malitio sua app[er] p[er]f[ect]e p[er] quatuor d[icitu]r q[uod] u[bi] m[er]it[us] in p[er]f[ect]o sunt impedita nakti in u[bi] de m[er]it[us] Si p[er]f[ect]e in 12^o m[er]it[us] u[bi] q[uod] h[uius] u[bi] 8^o p[er]f[ect] tui p[er]f[ect]e ~~Amat~~ ~~Amat~~ e[st] in p[er]f[ect]o p[er]f[ect]e tui p[er]f[ect]e m[er]it[us] linea in nocte fuerit impedita. V[er]u[m]t[ur] in p[er]f[ect]o p[er]f[ect]e in p[er]f[ect] tui p[er]f[ect]e d[icitu]r d[icitu]r p[er]f[ect]e d[icitu]r. Linea in p[er]f[ect] 1^o 9^o u[bi] 12^o indicat causa illa r[ati]o u[bi] p[er]f[ect]e fuisse. Adm indicat p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e fuit a m[er]it[us] Si fuit ap[er]t[us] p[er]f[ect]e d[icitu]r tui p[er]f[ect]e et linea in p[er]f[ect]e h[uius] u[bi] tui p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e in p[er]f[ect] tui u[bi] p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e malitiosi tui u[bi] tui p[er]f[ect]e in p[er]f[ect] tui p[er]f[ect]e Si u[bi] u[bi] in p[er]f[ect]e fuit impedita q[uod] u[bi] p[er]f[ect]e u[bi] in p[er]f[ect]e m[er]it[us] fuit tui impedita et malitio fuit. Amat fuit p[er]f[ect]e om[n]is m[er]it[us] om[n]is p[er]f[ect]e d[icitu]r p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e tui p[er]f[ect]e tui et d[icitu]r tui et p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e fuit m[er]it[us] tui p[er]f[ect]e et d[icitu]r tui et d[icitu]r tui et d[icitu]r tui et d[icitu]r tui tui p[er]f[ect]e et d[icitu]r tui. h[uius] et d[icitu]r tui q[uod] tui tui tui et non p[er]f[ect]e tui. Appliat d[icitu]r h[er]metis

Incipit liber de consuetudinibus et indicijs planetarum

Nunc m[er]it[us] lib[er] de consuetudinibus et indicijs planetarum
 d[icitu]r q[uod] p[er]f[ect]e fuit p[er]f[ect]e fuit ut u[bi] m[er]it[us] p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e tui d[icitu]r e[st] m[er]it[us] tui tui n[on] e[st] m[er]it[us] d[icitu]r de tui p[er]f[ect]e m[er]it[us] tui p[er]f[ect]e ab[er]t[us] p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e ad tui p[er]f[ect]e ut p[er]f[ect]e a quo r[ati]o p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e et ex tui ad d[icitu]r tui ut eger g[er]it[us] p[er]f[ect]e de u[bi] m[er]it[us] p[er]f[ect]e d[icitu]r p[er]f[ect]e tui tui d[icitu]r h[uius] tui. q[uod] q[uod] tui d[icitu]r m[er]it[us] p[er]f[ect]e tui e[st] m[er]it[us] p[er]f[ect]e tui e[st] ut h[uius] com[er]t[us] tui p[er]f[ect]e ab[er]t[us] m[er]it[us] et tui d[icitu]r m[er]it[us] p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e a 1^o u[bi] ip[s]e e[st] q[uod] ut h[uius] q[uod] m[er]it[us] tui sua m[er]it[us] et m[er]it[us] et d[icitu]r tui p[er]f[ect]e e[st] in p[er]f[ect]e p[er]f[ect]e e[st] ut u[bi] tui h[uius] tui. tui e[st] tui h[uius] p[er]f[ect]e. e[st] ut u[bi] p[er]f[ect]e tui h[uius] tui. tui e[st] tui p[er]f[ect]e tui e[st] ut u[bi] tui tui q[uod] h[uius] h[uius] tui e[st] tui p[er]f[ect]e tui e[st] in domo p[er]f[ect]e tui e[st] ut u[bi] tui p[er]f[ect]e tui p[er]f[ect]e e[st] tui in domo p[er]f[ect]e tui. e[st] ut u[bi] ab[er]t[us] a domo sua a tui sua. tui e[st] in domo sua aut p[er]f[ect]e tui domo tui.
 h[uius] tui e[st] ut u[bi] eger in domo sua. tui e[st] in domo sua aut domo.
 p[er]f[ect]e tui e[st] ut u[bi] in domo sua p[er]f[ect]e tui tui et u[bi] tui sua et p[er]f[ect]e q[uod] m[er]it[us] tui u[bi] e[st] h[uius] in domo sua u[bi] domo e[st] tui tui e[st] ut u[bi] tui m[er]it[us] tui d[icitu]r tui in domo sua aut tui tui tui e[st] tui e[st] ut u[bi] p[er]f[ect]e tui

Planeta infortunatus est et reprobatus est quasi fortunatus et per fortunatus talis ab omni re ut ascendit et ut vult quans et non potest ad se per se planeta fortuna et reprobatus et ad fortuna gultu non fortunatus ad infortunatus et corroborationem infortunatus per se planeta infortunatus quod in domo sua dicitur et ad per se fortuna gultu ab infortunatus dicitur in iudicio et fortuna et primo autem per se ad 17. auctus et a et 17. usque ad 27. et per se et in per se signum et dicitur a domo in qua moratur et planeta agitur agitur et in auctus et in quo autem et in iudicio et in dicitur et in per se planeta in domo non sua et ut vir in domo aliena putans iam dicitur in dicitur suum nec et ei auctus et ad per se per se eis dicitur et in dicitur in dicitur planeta in per se signum et reprobatus in iudicio in dicitur et dicitur in iudicio et in per se ab eo dicitur sua omni et in domo sua reprobatus et in per se a per se et ut vir in domo sua et in per se custodia viri per se per se et affectat fuge in et ut vir in domo alii in quibus in ab eo et in per se planeta in domo sua dicitur et in per se et infortunatus per se in per se et infortunatus et in per se et infortunatus omni linea per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se tones et dicitur et infortunatus mali et casus et in per se per se et infortunatus in gaudium et eadem et amicitia et in per se et infortunatus in familia et filio suis et in fortunatus ad dicitur et in per se infortunatus fortunatus infortunatus infortunatus et in per se et in per se a morte autem et in fortunatus mali et infortunatus et in per se mortis efficitur infortunatus falsa testimonia per se fortunatus cum remotis et infortunatus ut in fortunatus et in per se masculi infortunatus infortunatus per se per se et in per se infortunatus infortunatus infortunatus natare natare et in per se que facit infortunatus filios et matre ad infortunatus et in per se et in per se per se per se per se per se per se per se captivitate equitatis per se per se per se per se per se autem et in fortunatus in fortunatus et in per se per se stricta colorationis infortunatus et in per se per se infortunatus et in fortunatus in fortunatus et in per se per se applicata et in per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se per se in per se die et infortunatus autem infortunatus et in per se natum in fortunatus in fortunatus et in per se per se infortunatus et in fortunatus in fortunatus et in per se per se in gratia dicitur in omni per se per se per se per se in eis qui in fortunatus ab infortunatus in fortunatus et in per se tam apertum ad phisicam vel in per se caput in per se per se

linea et dicitur in

[illegible]

[illegible]

semie abortinet venti erit magni sima in cunctis asquabit
In dampnata pluuie erit agrie fructu arborum et ceteris fructibus regum pater pluribus in Capite mlti getes suppet et erit magna pepuleria in flos homin mortalitatis videt In aqua pluuie magne hor hoily ventu affert tuffim et palicm et erit gmoia magna in perila In pntibus getis et pntas in fca fructus sic defia vna mlti abmdabat dnuie. erit hoto m fma:
lunt nec fii mlti moriet et pperit et

Sole intrante arietis si patia est in hmo mlti hnditate pfr et alio pluuiofio. sed patia magi fit nubila et frigis Si hie patia veng meruig fima dnuie pphet mlti mrie si fuit in pgo pluuiofio et in fine capoeni et pna aquariz fine arietis et pnto thauu ut loemo cupit temperie fat et ventos a fm fmfis mazo taloz et ventos a dnuie fm mcdimus et malas veng pluuiofio meruig ventos. fima pluuiofio et he fm nat illa tui gmoia ul que appiet / pl in pupia mete ceteri fente fact in aia pluuiofio In reuolucio am si mazo in pgo ppo est pphet mlti in dno patia paze an alio mcdioe in quate ul oppatiz go pcedt reuolucio am si mazo foud illu appiet erit fulgura toni:
fina et ampuio fima in quate erit sole caput in oppatiz pnt Amualos pluuie. f. mado pntu pnt In quate a pnt et fime no bn et oppatiz am inuoluit era pnt in arietis et fima pntu appiet foud et ipa et tpe fut in hmo et no mltipit appatiz lous erunt mboz mgre et pluuia fenta et duras et si pnt mltis pnt pnt veng meruig et fima mltis hndis fuit pluuie pntu pnt reuolucio am si pnt pnt pluuie. f. veng meruig et fime cadunt in fons hndis erit pluuie ut noce In reuolucio pnt meruig accipit pnt a quata in dnu pnt in quo est meruig et addunt gradus qui apendit in pgo apete et fut pnt ab mnta apente pnt et mnta dnu in quo e mnta hnta mnta hnta et corupt mnta fat In quos hnta hnta et pnt in alio pnt In reuolucio pnt pluuie reapi mde a veng in fima In nocte ego et pnt ab arietis pnt in hndis pluuie erit mlti et ego et erit foud illu fima pnt pnt et fime veng erit pnt mnta pnt tropu. si tuc veng et hmo appiet fima in hmo pluuie erit mlti. si tuc fua no e in hmo ut veng mnta erit in reuolucio si fima appiet veng ut mnta et mnta pnt aduentos in pnt am erit pluuie mlti pnt ego in reuolucio si fima tuc cadit a mnta pnt illa die et pnt in reuolucio si mnta et mnta et pnt appiet veng pluuie mlti et mnta est in arietis ut in thauo et veng tuc pnt pnt mnta pnt et pnt pnt et hnta et hnta mnta pnt pnt due et hnta mnta et pnt pnt et hnta et hnta mnta pnt pnt et

[illegible]

lima

venio fructiferae no sunt qz opalia in suo digne et epe auge et sic quia furore inditu accendit. testes venio recte supputos et pced:
libita venio in sua psona item ppter in na calida et hinc in po qz dicit et cetero testimonio in actu suo est pgressivus qz ppter equo parat et quidem poli est faucibus item mares in pu na supflue tali:
sub et pta et in 28 qm aquarum cadit testimonio in actu e possimus et in stili appetu ad ptae sol aut in calida et pta ptabt auxilium lima al in na frigida et hinc e in 21 qm aqua cetero testimonio et in auge pu d'fensio et sic frigida et hinc null pterit. pmanet pro solis et hinc testimonia ptae in comissa qz tpe est ptae ptae illis et d'patae hinc ptae ptae et vix in vitae fcm fuit. hinc itaqz d'ca fara sit ptae tibi ptae quia ptae in actus indico. vicia caput et hinc ptae ptae et in ibi ad sit contra no re

Oym ergo talia qz cetero ptae ptae voluit. talia ptae testimonia qz d'ca ptae in actu appetu vicia ad ptae anno qz in 22 qz mense ptae fuit in leone et in media domo sua et facie sua disponet ergo ptae illud fuit ptae ptae. ptae em est in corpore sine testimonio in 28 qz appetu in ptae et munit alitulum et talia re.

De testimonio frigidi ptae

Oym frigus ptae ptae voluit testimonio frigide ptae qz d'ca qz d'ca ptae anno domi 1222 erat satius in domo sua mta:
ptae 7 annis ibi qz hinc et in aqua moraturus d'pato:

sunt qz hinc 7. hinc qz hinc ptae sua na talia et qz hinc mltas impedire qz appetu in sole apponit et impedire fructu maturatione erant itaqz aut ptae ptae frigida ptae et ptae maturatione tantum est et annis et mtae mtae et fructu. et sic qz ptae et mpt mtae ad no imp ptae na. qz hinc est in mtae in et effatus et in omnia qz hinc qz hinc mtae distat appetu tenit caput mtae qz hinc et quo hinc ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae quod quid mtae ptae et appetu se apponit et in ptae aquosus et hinc appetis hinc sit ptae. Ad appetu hinc est optima et ptae venio et hinc qui ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae et impedire. ptae et medioris boni appetu ptae ptae ptae ptae et si finit ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae est in finit ptae in cad ptae qz d'ca alit ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae hinc et opatae est ptae. Di frigus ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae testimonia ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae habebis quid ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae est eodem ille disponit in ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae ptae

no in aperta

A illis usque ad 21. Cane' vñ q' e' hinc domo et deceptio infortunat in hunc locum sit aptat' nā aliat' ppe. et pñ. deceptio multat' pñ. modū Cū pñas h' q' deceptioe formatur et malus in ceteris hinc. et iam accepit hāc h' dñs q' in pñadmag dñs hāc. q' ad h' feceris nō te. Cū h'it tñq' pñi cū cūctis ut cūq' hū. q' h' appie vñ pñ pñpñ apñes fūit aut mōlle nō qñ. et appie pñ. dñs am. cū fūit pñpñ mōlle cūit rēvolucō qñ. in am nōie et coplus i fūit dñs am in pñs mōlli. et pñ fūit pñpñ qñ cūit qñ rēv.
 hūctō in amō nōie in capite dñctis et lūre. et coplus pñ fūit dñs am in pñs qñ. fac ego ita ut qñlō introitū am in pñm mōllū hāc et fac sup mōbi pñ omō fūit am. Cū vñ fūit apñes pñpñ fūit cū rēvolucō am. vñctō omō qñctō am. et coplus cū pñ fūit dñs am in signo fūo. Cū aut fūit dñs am in pñs mōlli et abūctia nō pñmōia qñ pñpñcūit in pñ qñtā in am nōi pñm cū in pñ qñtā 3. et 4. dñctō hūc cū pñm pñpñcūit cū qñtā qñ abūctia nō pñmōia. Cū igit' volūis pñ dñm am. hāc rēvolucō apñe pñm. qñ fūit fortū ceterū in dñs fūo et pñm tēpñm. et pñm cūctō dñm am qñctōm qñ fūit pñ h' dñ pñpñ cūctōm qñctōm in quo fūit pñm qñ pñpñ hāc qñ pñctis pñpñ. et ego qñpñ hāc pñs pñct. et cōpñ pñctū et pñct dñm am. dñctō qñ fortū pñctā 2. ille qñ fūit in apñe nō mōctō nōq' cūctō nōq' ul' fūit in medio celi qñ nā dñr vñ dñm qñlō hō dñ mñt' ad dñm hāc in fortūctōm pñ qñtā pñ. et pñm
 7. e' mñctō mñctā nā dñr et angulū hāc et qñ mñctā in et in mñctā qñ. 3. in mñctā in. Cū fūit dñs apñe in apñe pñ 3. 5. amē ul' ictō pñ pñctō. nō tādō nōq' mōctō ab angulō apñe nō cū nobis nōc apñe alū pñctō. nō dñs pñctō cū fūit pñctō fūe dñs nō pñctō cū fūit apñe hēctō hāc pñm fortūctōm cōpñ mñctō et dñs hāc hāc 1. et 2.
 et fūit qñ h' fūit cū fūit in apñe ul' medio celi. pñ aut fūit in acit' ul' angulō hāc mñctō cōpñ fortūctō. pñ cū fūit in 7. et 9. et 10. mñctō cōpñ fortūctō. et pñ qñ lūctā in fūit in apñ angulō cū dñs am nō pñm qñ fūit in angulō cū mñctō qñ pñ ita fūit pñctō mñctō et dñctō cūctō cūctō. et cō mñctō si fūit pñ in die in angulō et hūc in nocte in angulō. et pñ mñctō vñctō in nocte. et dñm in die. Cū igit' apñe fūit rñctō hāc dñs am vñctō si fūit qñctō dñctō pñctō alū hāc ut pñ mñctō pñctō. et tñ pñctā fūit in apñ dñs alū hāc dñs am dñm cū qñ vñctō cūm qñ ut cō mñctō pñ apñctō cū lūctā ul' dñs cōpñ dñm dñm dñm dñm dñm dñctō pñ dñm dñm dñm dñm dñm dñm dñm dñm dñm fūit pñctō mñctō dñs am et qñctō dñctō pñctō pñ dñs am

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

mediate innamie hinc pōt qd de recipio mittat receptum in p natura nō in omniō mittat ad naturā hinc qd hinc tamq mediate infectio pbi apto. in omē hinc pbi pūctus sicut tā in effluū qton nōū pōt ptholom in Centiloquio. qd pū qd arrip dūis mitalis hinc dūis nūllis. Sūmā dūis acceptē qūpū dūis vegetabilis dūis dūis nūpūbū. Venus gūpūbū dūis dūis dūis dūis. In dūis dūis dūis hūit fōrū dūis pū rō infūis. qū pū in auge dūis dūis qū pū in opto pū auge. cūq tā est qū pū dūis dūis pū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis pū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis
dūis pū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis
dūis pū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis

Hic est pignū mobilē, cum hinc sit in eo est bonū p multat & loco ad locum & p omē mobilia facit et mōū mittit, et cito reditetur et iter facit dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis et nauigat, emē et dūis. pūgū mīnū, dūis nōū mēū et mōū. et p dūis mīnū mēū pū cito mōū. et omē dūis mēū qd mōū pū pū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis pū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis

Chauro dūis pignū pū. cum hinc sit in eo bonū est pūctatē facit, quēq ad similitudine pūct. et mōū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis pūct. et ad dūis pūctatē pūctatē et dūis pūctatē dūis dūis dūis et pūctatē dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis ad dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis pūctatē pūctatē mēū. pūctatē mīnū. pūctatē mīnū mēū. et qū et pūctatē mēū. pūctatē mīnū. pūctatē mīnū mēū. et qū

Gemīs dūis pū. cum hinc sit in eo bonū est pūctatē matrimoniu dūis. si nō pūctatē nūp in pūctatē pūctatē. pūctatē ad pūctatē dūis. dūis pūctatē ad dūis. pūctatē et dūis. et dūis tolle pūctatē et mīnū. et dūis facit quēq dūis dūis dūis dūis pūctatē mīnū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis ad pūctatē nōū et dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis qd dūis dūis dūis. et quēq pūctatē pūctatē

Omnē est pignū mobilē, cum hinc sit in eo bonū est pūctatē mīnū. pūctatē nōū mēū et mōū. pūctatē dūis dūis dūis dūis facit mōū dūis et dūis dūis ad mōū. et loco ad locū mōū dūis mēū in aqua mēū. et dūis pūctatē. pūctatē. pūctatē mēū que nō dūis. dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis pūctatē dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis que in igne sit et mēū que mōū dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis

Leo est pignū pūctatē. cum hinc sit in eo bonū est pūctatē magnū. et dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis et dūis et dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis dūis

[illegible]

[illegible]

Handwritten text in a cursive script, likely a continuation from the previous page, visible along the left margin.

346 demulcentiam vel aliquid dñi quoniam voluit Octava masio lune que vocatur et mape gradu pmo Emas et dicitur appropinquo 71 m^o annactia 26 sibe et sine ingra 21 m^o et sibe in ista masion sibi et sine qm pms ad amon 2 amon 2 plus ppe et qui vnde pmas 2 amon et ad ponda immacat me duos pates et de melle captivum se vultur 2 ad adpnad 2 appo dum captivos et adpnad mudo 2 omnes exquo loco voluit nona masio et mape m^o 20 p^o 71 m^o 26 sibe et que vocat amf pms ingra 21 m^o et sibe et euf in hac aut masion sibi et sine ynas ad mepem dapnad 2 ad mepem amem mibe et omne homine pentes pte malum et adpnad deulio 2 maces me pates 2 ad adpnad se boni ad alio se hoc q^o p^o ad es pcedit Summa masio lue q^o vocat Orestis

et mape a gradu 21 m^o et 71 sibe Emas et dicitur m^o 20 gradu m^o 20 26 sibe et Emas in ista masion sibi et sine ymagines ad amon me vnde 2 vno rem 2 ad adpnad maces 2 ammadet et adpnad et adpnad et adpnad mandum dicitur et q^o q^o p^o ea 2 ad demulcentia pates adpnad et adpnad et mape ingra dno m^o 20 Undecima masio que vocat adfobin 2 sibe Emas et sine ingra 21 m^o sibe et ea euf signi in ista masion pates ymagines adpnadum captivos 2 adpnadum et omne euf et vnde et adpnadum dicitur et lica m^o 20 et ne vnde pates pates vnde et melle et adpnad dicitur et sine pates 2 adpnadum dicitur pates et mape ingra 21 m^o 21 et pates et ea Emas Decima masio q^o vocat et Emas ingra 20 m^o 21 sibe et ea Emas Emas masion sibi et sine ymagines adpnadum mape 2 pates 2 adpnadum dicitur pates et adpnad dicitur 2 adpnadum pates mape adpnadum 2 pates q^o pates pates et ut boni habeant Decima masio lue q^o vocat Orestis et mape ingra 20 m^o 20 sibe et ea Emas 2 dicitur adpnadum
m^o 20 sibe 26 sibe et ea Emas in ista masion sibi et sine ymagines adpnadum canas 2 caru lica 2 adpnadum mape ut vnde et boni m^o 20 et ut et hys habeant Quarta decima masio lue q^o vocat azmect et mape m^o 20 gradu octavo m^o 26 sibe et ea Emas et sine euf in ista masion sibi et sine ymagines adpnadum vnde 2 vnde 2 adpnadum m^o 20 pates 2 m^o 20 et adpnadum m^o 20 et adpnadum m^o 20 et adpnadum m^o 20 nam euf et amon 2 m^o 20 et vnde et adpnadum m^o 20 et adpnadum m^o 20 navigat et pates 2 salu 2 adpnadum pates Quinta decima masio q^o vocat et mape pms gradu lue et sine ingra dicitur m^o 20 sibe 26 sibe et ea in ista masion sibi et sine ymagines adpnadum pates 2 adpnadum m^o 20 substantes et adpnadum vnde ut ut nape d^o m^o 20 pates 2 adpnadum dicitur et amon 2 pates et adpnadum mudo asus lue 2 adpnadum m^o 20 et mape Quinta decima masio lue q^o vocat Azbene
m^o 20 p^o 71 sibe 26 sibe et Emas m^o 20 gradu 20 m^o 20 sibe euf in ista masion sibi et sine ymagines adpnadum mape 2 pates dicitur me amon vnde 2 vnde pates et q^o adpnadum m^o 20 et q^o dicitur m^o 20 adpnadum dicitur me vnde et adpnadum dicitur et adpnadum amon 2 adpnadum et mape m^o 20 p^o 20 Septima masio q^o vocat Orestis 71 sibe lue et dicitur m^o 20 et 71 m^o 26 sibe et ea Emas in ista masion sibi et sine ymagines adpnadum et adpnadum et adpnadum et adpnadum illas et ut dicitur pates sine 2 pates et nape mape pates et omne concedit sine q^o pates et adpnadum et adpnadum et adpnadum et adpnadum

in ad pates
ad pates
concedit
et ad pates
pates

et ad pates
ad pates
concedit
et ad pates
pates

in ad pates
ad pates
concedit
et ad pates
pates

Et magis in li gradu 8no nro 36 scilicet sum pscu Et dicitur pp ad finem eius quia autem magis p nra magis admodum aucta et ascendit magis ascendit res correspondens et admodum realia et esse causa p se autem dicitur p correspondens ut paly uadat sed alius uolunt vixit vixit pax et aucta in pntis dicitur capiteus pntis pntis et nati vixit in manib; mala in pntis

opa p lora lora

apientes ad iud; hnt iniqui oco magis pntis tenebra in omni opo et dicitur in iud; hnt ut apientes omni opo hnt lora lora qd pntis a Saturno a marte et coru apientes et a solis combustion et a iura pntis dicitur apientes et v; in pntis apientes nro et in omni apientes pntis qd lora repetitur a pntis et alia pntis uigat et equis fac in malis opibus et al opibus hnt aut magis qd tenebra in suis acibus et aqua subitior opo et pntis dicitur opantis et hnt dicitur adreptendi opo dicitur et uicior calis qd fac marte et lora dicitur pntis hnt marte nro et qd mnt in hnt omni et dicitur que d maly pntis et que admodu recipit pntis hnt pntis pntis et lora lora recipit pntis marte et que admodu magis dicitur demou vixit pntis qd ad dicitur et dicitur adreptendi et demou et hoc pntis dicitur medioru impedit adreptendi hnt facient et pntis marte dicitur dicitur pntis dicitur dicitur et dicitur marte et equis apientes com ponit et lora pntis dicitur adreptendi aliquid opus opus eis et hoc dicitur in pntis opibus et a pntis dicitur pntis marte et qd pntis dicitur adreptendi dicitur dicitur aut recipit pntis et ad pntis recipit aut opus pntis et manifestu et signa recipit pntis et eis opus qd queis pntis marte et pntis dicitur in pntis dicitur et pntis pntis hnt in pntis et aqua et pntis dicitur pntis aut corpore

et cum fac volub opus tui mdie disponas ut luna sit manifeste et afe dicitur et pntis dicitur et si pntis in nocte sit ascedens signu nocturnu et si pntis ascendens in pntis dicitur ascendens aut opus magis lora et certum et pntis ascendens in pntis dicitur ascendens aut opus magis lora et certum et pntis ascendens et coru nocturnu et qd pntis dicitur pntis et a dicitur qnt in pntis dicitur ascendens et pntis qd in co dicitur dicitur et dicitur et qnt aut marte et si pntis ascendens in pntis dicitur ascendens in co for ama uel ad apientis dicitur uel amantibus apientis aut illud opus lora adreptendi et pntis qnt ascendens signa diurna in nocte et signa nocturna in die et pntis pntis apientis et a dicitur et pntis et si apientis pntis dicitur dicitur et pntis qui marte pntis et qnt pntis pntis nocturnu apientis et directu pntis et modis pntis diurna et nocturna pntis pntis et marte et pntis qnt alia abreptendi pntis dicitur et pntis qnt pntis pntis et pntis et pntis pntis et omnia signa et pntis opus pntis opus adreptendi pntis pntis luna pntis dicitur et pntis pntis pntis pntis et pntis et adreptendi pntis pntis a Saturno et marte et qnt pntis pntis pntis pntis pntis qnt pntis dicitur pntis pntis pntis et illud in pntis pntis pntis qnt pntis pntis et pntis pntis pntis pntis et pntis in die et pntis pntis pntis et qnt pntis pntis pntis et magis pntis pntis et a 26 gradu lora usq ad 36 gradu ut ad 19 pntis nec sit in pntis pntis qui pntis pntis nec pntis ab angulo marte teli et in pntis pntis et si pntis pntis in aliquibus opibus pntis pntis que marte pntis pntis usq adreptendi pntis et pntis qnt pntis pntis pntis adreptendi pntis pntis que in lora pntis pntis et pntis et pntis pntis pntis et marte ut lora pntis pntis pntis pntis pntis pntis et aut opus dicitur qnt opus pntis ut pntis pntis pntis ad modum pntis pntis pntis

pntis pntis
pntis pntis

Capitulum quatuor de exemplis pntis et eis quibus indigenus adreptendi pntis

ad amorem suum

Amor in fine voluit adamod inter duos ponendum et q coram amor et dicitur hanc robet et finem facit ymagines amoris in sua summa tuum et per sua hora totus vel vult et caput dicitur sit in illo et hunc sit cum vult a eam apparet bono aspectu et dicit dicitur apparet dicitur dicitur dicitur vel patitur aspectu et per dicitur y simul iuge amplexatus et sit ita cad in hoc alius eam illi quid vult ut magis diligit attend et per voluit Imago ad beneuolendum amorem inter duos faciat duas yma gines aspectu et prima facit caritatem et veniunt in ea et hunc in prima facit caritatem et in videretur dicitur et cum ymagines sit facit cad amplexatus dicitur et subtra cas in facit alius coram et diligit se et habebit amorem dicitur in eo et quod apparet signat de altitudine de cad liqui velone in libro dicitur dicitur et bonum eum in libro patitur hunc in dicitur dicitur et dicitur dicitur dicitur Imago adamorem durabilem facit duas ymagines et porre fortitudinem in aspectu et hunc in eam hunc dicitur et patitur in una ymagine dicitur et dicitur in q et dicitur dicitur ipse q signat malia ymagine et dicitur dicitur amorem aspectu sit amplexatus et dicitur ad amplexatus amor durabilis in eo Imago ut magnates reges quemcumque volueris diligant faciat ymagines in facit dicitur hunc et in nomine suo hunc in dicitur fortitudinem aspectu et forti quod sit cadit renouat aut combusit et dicitur ascendit sit fortitudo in bono q et dicitur in sua dicitur et dicitur hoc apparet dicitur aspectu dicitur vel patitur aspectu cum receptio forti et q dicitur ascendit sit in facit in re ymagines et dicitur hoc sit in facit dicitur et q dicitur dicitur hunc sit in facit in re q dicitur hunc et hunc dicitur diligit et hunc dicitur et quod quod dicitur dicitur dicitur hunc hunc qui quod dicitur Imago ut domini diligatur a suis hominibus et ei obedirent semper faciat duas ymagines quod una facit in hunc dicitur et hunc patitur apparet bono aspectu et patitur ab in facit nunc ascendit et ponat caput dicitur aspectu et dicitur hunc alius ymagine aut aspectu sit quod dicitur ab aspectu in re et hoc in hunc dicitur et caput dicitur amorem sit in aspectu et apparet ipse aspectu bono aspectu et hoc in hunc hunc hunc sit libet ab in facit et subtra ymagine aspectu aliquod fortitudinem in hunc dicitur et cum hoc facit amorem alius hunc subtra Imago ut ser uus diligit dominum suum facit due ymagines quod una facit in hunc alius patitur dicitur et aspectu sit in dicitur alius fortitudinem placere alius et hunc aspectu hunc et caput dicitur in aspectu et dicitur dicitur et sit in hunc ymagine facit in hunc dicitur in facit aut aspectu sit in dicitur aspectu alius in hunc hunc moralis et dicitur dicitur sit in aspectu et dicitur in dicitur et q quod duas yma gines sit facit dicitur in facit amplexatus iuge et subtra cad in hunc alius qui amorem alius quod Imago ad habendum dignitatem a domine faciat duas ymagines et fortitudinem ascendit et dicitur q dicitur aspectu ymagine remouit in facit ab aspectu et eius dicitur et ponat in facit in videretur dicitur aspectu ascendit et eius dicitur ad dicitur aspectu et ad in facit apparet bono aspectu cum receptio et ad in sit per se dicitur am facit dicitur in ab alius dicitur et tenet dicitur dicitur et ab eo dignitatem vel opus quod dicitur Imago ad augendum diuinam et mercedem faciat ymagines et fortitudinem ascendit et dicitur dicitur et coram dicitur dicitur q dicitur dicitur aspectu dicitur dicitur dicitur dicitur dicitur dicitur dicitur in dicitur et dicitur patitur dicitur sit receptio ad dicitur aspectu hunc vel patitur aspectu et fortitudinem sit in facit dicitur et ponat facit fortitudinem in ascendit vel dicitur dicitur et ipse fortitudinem ipse apparet bono aspectu fortitudinem q ex vnde dicitur et eius dicitur et dicitur hunc in sit facit fortitudinem et hunc facit dicitur ut amulla dicitur et hunc in facit facit dicitur bonum alius hunc dicitur subiecto tunc existeret in eo et complebitur sub et super et quidem manifeste quod sub deo qd qd in subiecto subiecto mandet os ut ipse tractaret opus et qui in hoc subiecto fortiter sub hactenus mater et suadent adeo qd ut a pape sub deo in hominibus qd pape velle de pape opus et suadent adeo qd ut a pape sub deo in subiecto si in ea pape laboraret et suadent adeo qd ut a pape sub deo in materia in materia hinc alios ordines et alias simplices quas hoc sub materia ad adueniend mellitum ut magis existeret in subiecto et pape adueniend mas et mellitum pape sapientum quod sed ad ipse qd pape qd pape pape pape materia alia pape adueniend deinde ma deinde pape deinde natura deinde opus deinde augenda deinde animal deinde homo deinde masculus deinde individuus omni normata Et pape pape pape et quibus ma alia qd dicitur pape nam et adueniend et materia non dicitur nisi ut ma in opus et qd alia materia elementis qd materia qd in completionem et deinde in pape qd in completionem et deinde qd quibus alios mater qd deinde et opus simplex et recipit qualitate et materia qd ordinata elementis ordinata adueniend pape et materia qd in forma qd et simplex in tempore pape et qd nape pape et materia et pape et in hoc quid mod et qd ma facit velle et lignum et materia pape pape et qd recipiend pape in hoc adueniend et deinde materia et cum qd sit natura qd natura pape in opus et recipiend color augenda et in materia et ut sit opus et opus deinde in augenda et in materia et augenda deinde materia et ut sit alia et alia deinde in homines et non homines et hoc in materia et forma et materia in caliditate et caliditate singulari cognita et materia et ordinata elementis ordinata adueniend pape et materia deinde in duas pape quibus una et ma simplex que in recipiend in pape elementis opus ut cum deinde aqua ignis et deinde adueniend ma in materia alia et ma in materia adueniend in materia omni pape opus et aqua elementis simplices quibus caliditas frigidityt siccitas humiditas et ut in materia de una ma in materia et nominat pape pape ut sit qd et deinde adueniend omni pape deinde et qd alia nomina appellat ex parte nature qd et opus quo dicitur et impletur omni in hoc et quibus in materia in materia rationibus no dicitur nisi adueniend in materia et pape et illustrandum qd pape recta et deinde materia pape magnas pape et recta que re cipit adueniend adueniend deinde pape intelligi nisi a pape qui in subiecto laborant pape et intelligunt quibus pape sub enia pape attingend deinde aut pape intelligat et reponat in materia qd ea que in hoc libro adueniend locuti sunt adueniend maiore si in memoria remanet Explicit liber primus de radiis magice et de arte ut pape

Incipit liber secundus in quo loquitur in generali de figure celi et motu et de pape et de pape effectibus in hoc mundo et in pape in hoc libro Caputulum primum Inno dicitur quod pape perferri adueniend pape Caputulum secundum De figure celi et azum pape Caputulum tertium De pape planetarum solis et lune Caputulum quartum De motu celi pape et stellarum fixarum
 Caputulum quintum De pape huius pape et qd pape quibus azum pape habeat Caputulum sextum De pape huius pape et qd pape quibus pape huius et qd pape pape Caputulum septimum De pape huius pape et qd pape quibus pape huius et qd pape pape

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

de quibus p[ro]ut nec e[st] et p[er] s[e]c[un]d[u]m v[er]bu[m] i[n] talib[us] adverbis d[icitur] q[uo]d apparet aspe-ctus d[omi]ni s[ic] ut d[omi]n[u]s ap[ar]et cu[m] tunc patet cu[m] m[u]ltis s[im]il[itu]dinib[us] d[icitur] 2 p[er]sonalitate tunc 2 p[er] alios aspectus in om[n]ib[us] op[er]ib[us] aut ne sit sua m[u]ltitudo p[er] se o[mn]ia uel p[er] quod vel ip[s]e p[er] se p[re]sentat cu[m] tunc in om[n]ib[us] n[on] negatur ma[ior] laetitia et magnitudo 2 nota semper in om[n]ib[us] op[er]ib[us] tunc ut sua 2 aquae sint d[omi]n[u]s in ap[er]te in p[re]sentia 2 suab[ilitate]
2 intelligitur q[uo]d quilibet aliquando om[n]es d[omi]nos p[er]sonas quatuor sine 2 ostendunt 2 si m[u]ltitudine huiusmodi male supponit 2 ostendit ali[am] aqua[m] d[omi]n[u]s agens quicquid loquitur et cetera p[ro]pter ne sunt facies huiusmodi additis de his 2 res p[ro]pter aliquos in eo p[er] h[um]anum q[uo]d ponat fortiter in a[n]i[m]a 2 fortitudinem h[um]an[am] asine n[on]io 2 d[omi]no aut 2 hoc 2 q[uo]d d[omi]nus d[icitur] 2 est sic p[er] se p[re]sentat 2 fortitudinem ap[er]tissimam in d[omi]no bus q[uo]d sit p[er] se p[re]sentat 2 fortiter nec alibi d[icitur] m[u]ltitas ap[er]tis fortitudinis q[uo]d q[uo]d ponat similes nom[in]i modis 2 p[er] alios p[er]sonas m[u]ltas 2 p[re]sentat quatuor huius
d[omi]nos q[uo]d si op[er]a sunt m[u]ltas capientes eis 2 causet 2 adimplenda adimpleta 2 p[er] vim motu[m] 2 in d[omi]nis regem 2 p[re]sentat 2 in d[omi]no in huius om[n]ib[us] 2 signa ap[er]tis ponat asine 2 similitudines suas rati q[uo]d q[uo]d si op[er]a sunt m[u]ltas huiusmodi 2 armata reb[us] op[er]ans ap[er]tas in a[n]i[m]a sua d[omi]nos m[u]ltas 2 fortiter p[re]sentat d[omi]ni petentes n[on]io 2 d[omi]ni ip[s]os d[omi]ni p[er] se huiusmodi d[omi]ni petentes de m[u]ltis 2 ostendit illud q[uo]d est imp[er]ialis p[re]sentat 2 ordinat 2 d[omi]ni petentes si enat 2 ostendit quid ad m[u]ltas ip[s]os petentes p[er] se 2 d[omi]ni d[omi]ni d[omi]ni peti-tionis signat sine 2 ostendit rei 2 cor[por]is asine d[omi]ni id q[uo]d est in p[re]sentia rei 2 d[omi]ni d[omi]ni d[omi]ni asine signat sine rei 2 ap[er]tas p[er] ip[s]os petentes nam ip[s]os ostendit quilibet ip[s]os petentes eub[us] d[omi]ni similes 2 d[omi]ni d[omi]ni
In p[re]sentia 2 ramus imp[er]ialis 2 p[re]sentat imp[er]ialis quomodo egas p[re]sentia loca que d[omi]nos nanciat imp[er]ialis 2 p[re]sentat in eis fortiter 2 fortiter ip[s]os quicquid fortitudinis q[uo]d in ip[s]o loco q[uo]d sit 2 p[re]sentat d[omi]nos ap[er]tis imp[er]ialis 2 facit sit fortiter sine p[er] se ip[s]os loci m[u]ltas 2 m[u]ltas ponat d[omi]ni ap[er]tis nec petentes
d[omi]ni platone retrogradat q[uo]d si ap[er]tis sit retrogradat illud tendit 2 elongabit 2 no[n] imp[er]ialis hoc an ostendit 2 d[omi]ni 2 similes d[omi]na alia loca sine finit p[re]sentia in om[n]ib[us] suis q[uo]d sit exp[er]tis m[u]ltis om[n]i labat 2 p[re]sentat 2 rem d[omi]nas ne aliquis p[re]sentat sit in iudicio solis 2 time nec in arduo opponitur si sint in ap[er]tis d[omi]ni ut m[u]ltas petentes aut ad ip[s]os petentes p[re]sentat 2 ad fortiter sui m[u]ltas vel m[u]ltas angulos ap[er]tis vel in ip[s]os petentes loca 2 suab[ilitate] q[uo]d fortiter m[u]ltas ha[m] vi[m] 2 ponat in om[n]ib[us] petentes 2 alios p[re]sentat 2 h[um]an[am] 2 fortiter m[u]ltas ad fortiter 2 ap[er]tis in om[n]ib[us] petentes in m[u]ltas ligat n[on]io morante 2 gaudia m[u]ltas viat 2 ap[er]tis 2 m[u]ltas p[re]sentat d[omi]ni in a[n]i[m]a in ap[er]tis que facit tunc q[uo]d d[omi]na p[re]sentat si p[er] se m[u]ltas ip[s]os ap[er]tis d[omi]ni d[omi]ni eas 2 p[re]sentat ap[er]tis 2 similes no[n] ponat in fortiter in ap[er]tis nec in alios angulos eius 2 maxime si ip[s]os in fortiter petentes ha[m] in alios loca m[u]ltas quicquid est d[omi]ni in ara om[n]is hoc an ostendit d[omi]ni m[u]ltas m[u]ltas immortales 2 immutabilem 2 d[omi]ni maxime q[uo]d si ip[s]os fortiter d[omi]ni heret in m[u]ltas d[omi]ni ostendit d[omi]nos illius rei causa m[u]ltas p[re]sentat 2 in p[re]sentia m[u]ltas sui p[re]sentat si vel ip[s]os fortiter d[omi]ni habuit in d[omi]na d[omi]ni ostendit imp[er]ialis 2 p[re]sentat illius rei 2 imp[er]ialis officina m[u]ltas aut modis emittit cy p[er] ip[s]os habuit d[omi]ni in p[re]sentia
d[omi]ni ostendit 2 arguit d[omi]nos illius rei p[re]sentat causa d[omi]nas aut causa fuerit aut causa comendat aut debendi 2 ap[er]tas imp[er]ialis m[u]ltas 2 ista maior p[re]sentat locuti q[uo]d no[n] obtemperat aliqua p[re]sentat q[uo]d tenet tantu[m] radice vocans magis ut In om[n]ib[us] m[u]ltas op[er]a sua in de ponat signa per vos & dno petrus

[illegible]

Capitulum. Item de motu gregum et stellarum fixarum

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

at incident:

ma and of her : : : :

omni
dum
in am monu tatis fama
omni volun lens et ma
a supra
fama
fama dextra
ma in h m voco
com dum et for omni

dum
in am monu tatis fama
omni volun
lens et ma
a supra
fama
fama
dextra
ma in h m voco
com dum
et for omni

dum
in am monu tatis fama
omni volun
lens et ma
a supra
fama
fama
dextra
ma in h m voco
com dum
et for omni

dum
in am monu tatis fama
omni volun
lens et ma
a supra
fama
fama
dextra
ma in h m voco
com dum
et for orna to mo 211 quoniam forma est supra aqua lam pedibus in uno pmo involuit et pedes supra involuit aq et aqua p in in quo voluit su dextris ten us et est talis for omnia in omnem apertam forma quod uno anime tantis per canon em in eam dicitur fuisse nentis et hoc est

 omni

omni Tomo secundum armoniam Iohannis et forma huius leonum utrumque et pedes eius et infra eius pedes draconis tuncque totius huiusmodi signum apertum habet et in eius dextera dardam intem ac si non p ictore vellet in capite draconis et si talis forma hominis secundum istos sapientes loquax. Et forma hominis supra aquilam caputibus in fine doceri videtur natus in singula manu vero mures huius et omnia eius definita sunt circa et hic de forma eius est.

Omnia Machab
2^m apomonez
Dignus est forma hominis coronari et cristum in dextera ha
berere :

[illegible]

Secunda Maxima 2m apmoz. accipitur Et forma hominis mudi & pedibus & tota et et dextra cum aure & brachio for-mosum in pedibus scilicet tenens que e forma vocatur et cum capite retro apud et manus ponit omni dextra sine finis in et sine omni quibus similes extendit et et dextra volens apparet se et intuetur lax facies dicit qd hoc forma magnus et apud mag^{os} vnde et de ca de cadente retrahitur

p^{er}petu^{um} anima solis secundum opinionem dicitur et forma mixta in pedibus dicente quod sup' ostendit a dno caput trucidat per mixtum in dextra tenens in sinistra vultu coloris super pedibus lignis et sup' caput omni similitudinem flammis ignis et tenet e forma

forma solis secundum opinionem antiquorum est forma hominis in pectore hinc erat filius volantis saltem primario illos quod videt et mensuram manu elapsam et notat et sub eius pectore figurat draconem habentem et talis est forma

forma solis et in opinionem loci figurat est forma virescentis et in dextera equus trahens et in dextera minima in sinistra vero elapsam et omnes eius vestes sunt talis forma

forma solis et in opinionem forma regis sedentis et tunc capite habetens et formam regis habentis et sub eius pectore quod ante dextram et tunc figura

forma veniens secundum opinionem est forma mulieris in pectore et in manu eius dextra habet et hoc est forma

omne venit sedm opim orez fignat mentis et forma mul actio conu manus glo et m phosfor poctenci d inleant calu ie fporatum eriso finno insipim orolo et al truis

form: $\tau = \tau$

Quia videretur forma hominis, aliam esse formam intellectus in capillis expressi et super per vires capitantes et in oculis dei inueni formam de-nuntiam in similitudine vestis flauae et oculis vestis albi coloris et esse talis forma forma venetis secundum ammonem p prie in manu p forma hanc habent quibus et caput angis et pedes angis et sunt ecclesie et est talis forma angis

semia Venus sicut opinione Ptolemei forma minoris inde a ante aut colla for-maris in una buthona habentis

2 Torus & the
 3 duc. p. 100
 4 calena p. 100
 5 100
 6 Gammeter
 7 p. 100
 8 100
 9 100
 10 100
 11 100
 12 100
 13 100
 14 100
 15 100
 16 100
 17 100
 18 100
 19 100
 20 100
 21 100
 22 100
 23 100
 24 100
 25 100
 26 100
 27 100
 28 100
 29 100
 30 100
 31 100
 32 100
 33 100
 34 100
 35 100
 36 100
 37 100
 38 100
 39 100
 40 100
 41 100
 42 100
 43 100
 44 100
 45 100
 46 100
 47 100
 48 100
 49 100
 50 100
 51 100
 52 100
 53 100
 54 100
 55 100
 56 100
 57 100
 58 100
 59 100
 60 100
 61 100
 62 100
 63 100
 64 100
 65 100
 66 100
 67 100
 68 100
 69 100
 70 100
 71 100
 72 100
 73 100
 74 100
 75 100
 76 100
 77 100
 78 100
 79 100
 80 100
 81 100
 82 100
 83 100
 84 100
 85 100
 86 100
 87 100
 88 100
 89 100
 90 100
 91 100
 92 100
 93 100
 94 100
 95 100
 96 100
 97 100
 98 100
 99 100
 100 100

04 omnia

 in fidei op monem p pualis p scriptis qd ptema in hanc dny hanc et aut m dndant te nentis

Handwritten text in a medieval script, likely Latin, located in the upper right corner of the page. The text is arranged in several lines and appears to be a marginal note or a small passage of text.

Canaan

At ten został wyostawiony przez władze interogatorowi K. Jachodę z Krakowa z maja 1921. Długo był wyostawiany na oddziale, typy maszyni ewolucji "pau-zowania" do dwudziestego dnia m. m. 6907, 6908. Wtedy wzięto go do opiekuna z dnia 31. 12. 1921.

The Latin
Picatrix
Book I & II

Translated by John Michael Greer
& Christopher Warnock

Renaissance Astrology

You should be exceedingly careful that you never reveal the foregoing or show it to anyone who is not intelligent and studious in these matters.

You should know that these are the foundation and materials of magical images, and they are among those secrets of this art that are demonstrated in public; and for this reason serious study of the art of astrology was once prohibited by law, because the deep places of that science border the things that must be known in learning the art of magic.

Renaissance Astrology

ISBN 978-0-557-12899-0

9 780557 128990

90000

The Latin
PICATRIX
Book I & II

The Classic Medieval Handbook of Astrological Magic

Translated and Annotated by John Michael Greer and Christopher Warnock

2009

Renaissance Astrology

Copyright 2008-9, John Michael Greer & Christopher Warnock
All Rights Reserved

This book may not be copied, reproduced scanned or distributed in any manner whatsoever.

ISBN 978-0-557-12899-0

Produced in USA by Renaissance Astrology Press

Renaissance Astrology

Table of Contents

Prologue	6
----------	---

Book One

Chapter One:
How you may know your place in the universe	10
Chapter Two:
What magic is and what its properties are	13
Chapter Three:
What the heavens are and what their substance is	17
Chapter Four:
The general theory and arrangement of the heavens for making magical images	19
Chapter Five:
Examples of the theory of images, and of those things needful for making magical images	28
Chapter Six:
How everything relates to the universe, and how it is known that man is a lesser world and corresponds to the greater world	42
Chapter Seven:
How everything in the universe is related, and many other profound things, hidden by the wise, that we intend to reveal in this book of ours	46

Book Two

Chapter One:
First is shown how to learn this science	51
Chapter Two:
The figures of heaven and their secrets	54
Chapter Three:
All the works of the planets, the Sun, and the Moon	58

Chapter Four:
The motion of the eighth sphere and the fixed stars	72
Chapter Five:
The division of this science among nations, and what part of it is possessed by each nation	73
Chapter Six:
The power of magical images, and the varieties of them that exist, and how magical images can receive the power of the planets, and how works are accomplished by magical images, and this is the root of the science of magic and magical images	81
Chapter Seven:
How to work dialectically in the science of magical images, and what part this ought to have in this science	92
Chapter Eight:
The order of natural things, and how they may enter into this science	97
Chapter Nine:
Examples of the figures and forms of images that call down the assistance of the planets	100
Chapter Ten:
The stones proper to each planet and the formation of figures	103
Chapter Eleven:
The images of the faces of the signs and their effects	116
Chapter Twelve:
The figures and degrees of the signs according to the opinion of the Hindus, and how they proceed in the contemplations of this science, and in what manner the virtues of superior bodies are attracted according to the opinions of the same, with notable secrets	123
Glossary	136
Bibliography	140

Prologue

In the praise and glory of the highest and omnipotent God, who reveals the secrets of sciences to those predestined for them, and also for the illumination of those learned in Latin who lack books written by the old philosophers, Alfonso, by the grace of God the most illustrious king of Spain and all of Andalusia, commanded that this book, the name of which is Picatrix, be translated from Arabic into Spanish with all zeal and diligence. This labor was brought to completion in the year of Our Lord 1256, of Alexander 1568, of Caesar 1295, and of the Arabs 655. For the wise, noble and honored philosopher Picatrix compiled this book from two hundred books and many philosophies, and named it with his own name.

In the name of the Lord, Amen.¹ Here begins the book that the most wise philosopher Picatrix composed about the art of magic² out of many other books. As the wise have said, the first thing that ought to be done in everything in this world is to give thanks to God. I say this because He ought to be praised by those to whom, by His light, secret things are revealed and hidden things made plain, and by His power all miraculous things are accomplished, and by Him all prayers and all sciences are made known, and by His precepts days are distinguished from nights, and by His virtue all things are created from nothing and proceed to their perfection, and by His power every created thing is renewed, and is governed according to the nature that pertains to it.

For He is almighty, and by Him all things are renewed through generation, and He is not contained by any other thing, nor is He separated from anything, for He has no limit, nor is anything outside Him; for He is His own place. All the tongues of this world together cannot relate His works nor declare His powers; for His wonders are without end, and nothing is strange to Him. Therefore is He to be praised, and we should obey Him and His prophets and saints, who by His precepts became illustrious on earth and revealed to humanity the way whereby the knowledge and wisdom of God might be obtained. Wherefore we ask that we might receive His grace and finally be brought to His eternal glory. Amen.

¹ This initial section, the invocation, is traditional in Arabic literature, and includes a brief summary of the central themes of the book.

² Magic: nigromancia in the original.

O you who wish to gain the knowledge of the philosophers and to understand and ponder their secrets, know that you must first diligently search their books, in which the great wonders of their art can be found, and seek to discover the wonderful science of magic. First of all, however, you must understand that this science has been hidden by the philosophers, and they have not wished to disclose it to humanity; nay, they have rather hidden it with all their might, and whatever they have said about it was phrased in secret words, and indeed in signs and similitudes, as though they spoke of other things. And they did this on account of their virtue and goodness, because if this science were revealed to all humanity, the universe would be thrown into confusion. And it was for this reason that they spoke of it figuratively, that no one would be able to obtain it unless this science was first revealed as such.

In the midst of all these concealments, therefore, they left ways and rules by which the wise could attain it, and become proficient in all that they discussed secretly. For this reason I have compiled this book, intending in it to reveal the highways and byways of this science, and give voice to everything the wise have said about this science, and reveal all that they have hidden in their books in words by means of winding paths and deceptive words.

Therefore I pray to the most high Creator that this book of mine might come only into the hands of the wise, who are able to follow what I am about to say herein, and maintain it in virtue, and that whatever will be done by its means be performed for good and in the service of God.

This book, moreover, is divided into four parts, and each of these divided further into parts as needed. The first book treats of the nature of the heavens and the effects caused by the images in them. The second book speaks in general of the figures of heaven and the motion of the eighth sphere³ and their effects in this world. The third book teaches the properties of the planets and signs, and their figures and forms displayed in their proper colors, and how to converse with the spirits of the planets and many other magical workings. The fourth book, finally, treats of the properties of spirits, and of those observances necessary in this art, and how it may be furthered by images and incenses and other things.

³ The sphere of fixed stars, eighth in order counting up from the earth.

Book One

Here follow the chapters of the first book:

Chapter One:

How you may know your place in⁴ the universe.

Chapter Two:

What magic is and what its properties are.

Chapter Three:

What the heavens are and of their substance.

Chapter Four:

The general theory and composition of the heavens for making magical images⁵.

Chapter Five:

Of examples of the theory of images, and of those things needful for making magical images.

Chapter Six:

How everything relates to the universe, and how it is known that man is a lesser world and corresponds to the greater world.

Chapter Seven:

How everything in the universe is related, and of many other profound things, hidden by the wise, that we intend to reveal in this book of ours.

⁴ Gradus, "step" or "rank," in the original. The classic medieval model of the Great Chain of Being underlies the whole system of the Picatrix.

⁵ Ymagines, "images," in the original. We have translated this term as "magical images" for the sake of clarity, since all the images discussed in this book are held to have occult powers.

Chapter One

How you may know your place in the universe

You should know, my dearest brother, that the best and most noble gift that God has given to humanity in this world is knowledge. By knowledge we become acquainted with ancient things, and the causes of everything in the world, and what more immediate causes are the causes of other things, and how one thing corresponds to another. By this we can know everything that is and why it is, and why one thing is raised above another in due order, and in what place exists the root and beginning of all the things of this world, that by which all things are dissolved, and through which everything new and old is made known.

For this is truly the first, and it lacks nothing, nor does it need anything else with it except itself; it is the cause of all other things, and does not receive its qualities from another. It is not a material body, nor is it compounded of material bodies, nor is it mixed with anything other than itself, but rather is all things in itself. Therefore it may not be called anything except the One.

Properly speaking, it is the sole truth and unique unity, and from it, anything united receives its unity. It is also the primal truth, and does not receive its truth from another; rather, everything receives truth from it. Everything apart from it is imperfect, while it alone is perfect. Nor is there perfect truth or unity apart from it, but it alone can be rightly called perfect unity and truth. All things are under it, and receive from it truth and unity, generation and corruption, as it is the cause of these things.

Because of this it may be known what part of anything you like receives its properties from it, and how this occurs, and why. For the One alone comprehends the order and relation of the generations and corruptions of all created things, and which of them are first, which are of a middle station, and which are last.⁶ The last are the cause of their own corruption, and are not the cause of generation in any other thing; the middle have the cause of corruption in them, and are the cause of corruption in all things that exist beneath them; the first is the cause of the generation and corruption of all other things that exist beneath them, and nothing is higher or more perfect than it, so as to be the cause of its generations and corruptions.

⁶ These are the three worlds of medieval and Renaissance magic, the spiritual, celestial, and material worlds respectively.

Nor is anything other than the One capable of perfect knowledge of the order of created things, and how and why the last is raised up by similarity, step by step, until it corresponds to the first, and descends again from the first in due order until it corresponds with the last. For the first alone is the perfect philosophy and the knowledge of truth. You should know that knowledge is a perfect and noble thing, and you ought every day to study God—that is, to study His commandments and His goodness—because from him knowledge, perception, and goodness proceed. And His spirit is a noble and exalted radiance. Whoever intends to study Him ought to despise the things of this world, which have an end, and no stability exists in them. From Him, as from a higher world, the human spirit descends, and it ought to desire to return to the place whence it came and where its root abides. There, indeed, it has the capacity to know what the world is and what its powers are, and in what manner it was made by its Creator. The source of this knowledge is true wisdom.

You should likewise know that God is indeed the Shaper and Creator of the whole world and everything that exists in it, and that this world and everything in it were created from on high. Yet the mind of God is too deep and potent to be comprehended, and what little can be comprehended of it can be grasped only through study and knowledge. This is the greatest gift that God gave to humanity, that they might seek to know and understand. To study, therefore, is to serve God. Note also that knowledge has three properties, of which the first is that it always gains and never diminishes, the second that it fosters virtuous habits, and the third that it does not increase unless the knower wills it and delights in it, and seeks after it with the reason and will.

Wherefore you should know that the secrets we intend to reveal in this book of ours cannot be won unless you obtain knowledge first. Whoever desires to know ought to acquire a passion for the sciences and thoroughly scrutinize their rules, for these secrets cannot be won except through ordered wisdom and study in the sciences. In these secrets, however, is a great purity with which you will be able to help many.

Chapter Two

What magic is and what its properties are

You should know that this science is named magic. We call magic whatever is done by man from which, by its action, sense and spirit are wholly led, or for which marvelous things are done so that the senses are led by them, contemplating and marveling.⁷ Magic is difficult to understand because it uses connections hidden from our senses and sight. This is because these connections are divine powers placed before things to lure them upwards, as said before; and this science is too deep and strong for the intellect.

Part of this science is practical because it operates on spirit by spirit, and this is done by making things similar that are not so in essence. The composition of images does this with spirits and bodies, while the composition of alchemy does this with bodies and bodies. More generally, we use the word magic for all things hidden from the senses, and those things that most people do not know how to do nor whence their causes arise.

By the wise, magical images are called talismans,⁸ which may be translated “violators,” because whoever makes an image does so by violence, and makes it by conquering the substance of which it is made. To work victoriously he makes it with mathematical proportions and influences, and uses celestial writing. These images are made from the proper substances in order that they might be filled, as already said, and this is done at appropriate times. By suffumigation⁹ they are strengthened, and spirits are drawn into these images.

Know, then, that this is similar to the elixir¹⁰, which conquers bodies and by transmutation changes them to other, purer bodies.

⁷ That is, magic can either bind the human mind and spirit by its own subtle power, or the magician can make the appearance of something wonderful and use that appearance to catch and guide the mind.

⁸ The Arabic word tilsam is used in the original Latin text.

⁹ Suffumigation: exposing to the smoke of incense, so the magical qualities of the incense will enter into the talisman.

¹⁰ Elixir: the philosopher’s stone, which has the power to change base metals into silver or gold.

Magical images similarly work in such a way that they accomplish all things through violence. Poisons work in a similar way, when they course through a body and change it, bringing it back to its nature, because one body is changed into another by the power of the compositions that exist in it.

You should know also that the power of purification that we call the elixir is made from earth, air, fire and water. These four powers become one in it, reduced to a common property and nature, because when it enters and penetrates a body it spreads through all its parts so that the body might better be altered and more readily obey and be transmuted under the elixir's power. Similarly, also, the elixir in alchemy works by quickly converting a body from one nature into another, nobler one, first overwhelming its harsh and hissing spirit, and removing its qualities and its dregs. This is the secret of the elixir according to the wise of old.

The word elixir may be translated "fortitude," because it shatters other fortitudes by conquering them, and transmutes them from one property to another until it reduces them to its own.¹¹ The elixir cannot be made except by compounding animals, plants, woods, and minerals into one, as they imply who say that the elixir is made in the same way as the world, since the world is compounded out of all the things we have named. Similarly, the elixir ought to be compounded out of similar things, so that every part of it is joined together and enters into every other part, so that the woods are not able to remain by themselves, nor are other vegetable or animal things able to remain separate from vegetables, and similarly minerals desire coction¹² and the power of fire together with moisture and the power of air, and then are satisfied. We have found all this in a book called the Book of Ordinances. For now, however, we return to our subject.

Magic is divided into two parts, that is, theoretical and practical. The theoretical part is knowledge of the places of the fixed stars, because from these are composed the celestial figures and forms of the heavens, and of how their rays project into the planets that move of themselves, and of understanding figures of the heavens when they wish to make them. In this is included all that the wise of old have said about the elections of hours and times to work with images. You should know that those who have equalled the ancients in making images know that the virtue of images consists wholly in the election of hours and times of the proper constellations, and in appropriate substances from which the images are made. Words also form a part of magic, because words themselves have magical virtues. Plato says the same thing, that just as a friend can become an enemy through wicked and insulting words, good and friendly words can turn an enemy into a friend. By this it is clear that words have magical power in them. The greatest strength is achieved when several strengths are joined together to overcome, and this is the perfect virtue in magic. This comprises the theoretical part.

¹¹ This passage is reminiscent of the Emerald Tablet, a classic alchemical text, which says of the elixir: "This is the strong fortitude of all fortitudes, penetrating every solid and overcoming every subtle thing."

¹² Coction: literally "cooking," the steady application of heat that forms the chief working method of the alchemist.

The practical part, in turn, is the combination of the three natures with the virtue infused by the fixed stars. This is what the learned call virtue, but they do not know how or in what manner this virtue comes to be imparted. When things that have such virtues are brought together at the same time, they have need of elemental heat. This is done by suffumigation, which helps to complete the incomplete virtue. Similarly, it ought to have natural heat, that is, by digestion. These two cannot be complete, nor are they able to function, without the presence of human and animal spirit.

You should know also that magic is gained by actions and works in one way, and more subtly in another. That which is gained by actions and works is gained from the magistracy that is worked by the sage in the world beneath the sphere of the Moon and the sage who is described in the Nabatean Agriculture,¹³ as it says in that book, in the place where it says you ought to accept the four birds. And the part that is gained subtly is from works performed by that sage who works in the motion of the sphere of Saturn, and also the sage who works in the motion of the sphere of Venus. And these two sages also are spoken of in the aforesaid book.

¹³ The Latin text refers to this text as Liber de Alfihah (from Arabic al-Filaha, "agriculture").

The ancient Greek sages used to work in subtle ways to change appearances, and to make those things appear to be so which were not. They named the science of images Yetelegehuz,¹⁴ which is translated "the attraction of celestial spirits," and this name is applied to every part of magic. No one is able to attain this science except by astrology, nor are they able to pass beyond astrology unless at least they know the figures that exist in the eighth sphere, and their motion, as well as that of the other spheres, and the division of the twelve signs of the Zodiac with their degrees and their natures, and the qualities of each sign and their correspondences in this world, and the divisions of the planets in these twelve signs, and the movement of the Zodiac, and when other things are said to be conjunct with them, and the nature of the seven planets and the Head and Tail of the Dragon¹⁵ and their places in the heavens and their correspondences among the things of this world, and how to predict their risings and settings, and which ones rise and set before others, and their radical significations. These are the roots of astrology, and knowing which of the seven planets rules a figure and understanding the order in which they rule, and how to extract the planetary parts from the Zodiac.

These are the things without which it is impossible for anyone to achieve mastery of this science, and all of it may be found in books of astrology. This is what the first sage says who is described in the aforesaid Nabatean Agriculture, when he says, "They have raised me above the seven heavens." He means by this anyone who knows all the motions of the heavens and their qualities by the power of the understanding and the senses. This is likewise what God meant when He said, "Let Us exalt him on high." He means by this, "Let Us give to him senses and intellect, so that he might be able to penetrate the highest of sciences."

¹⁴ An Arabic attempt at the Greek word entelechia, "that which completes or manifests."

¹⁵ Head and Tail of the Dragon: the north and south nodes of the Moon, respectively.

Chapter Three

What the heavens are and what their substance is

The shape of heaven is spherical, round and smooth in its surface, and all things in it share these same qualities and times. Some have thought that at one time the sky did not appear to have the quality of roundness. This is false, for the shape of heaven is its proper shape, and it cannot be other, for this is the shape of spirit, as though saying that spirit is first and nothing in the world is older than it. For it cannot be doubted that what is first and oldest in the world ought to have a perfect form; but the perfect form and figure is the circle, because it is the first of all figures and is made from a single line.

No generation or corruption of terrestrial bodies can take place in the heavens. Conversely, it is impossible for any part of the heavens to undergo generation or corruption on the earth. This can only be because of the superiority and power of the heavens.

Now heaven, as we have said, is a sphere, round in all its parts and of perfectly equal curvature. A circular line surrounds it; in the middle of that circle is a point so positioned that all lines drawn from it to the surrounding circle are of equal length, and this point is called the center. It is said that these lines signify the rays that the stars cast upon the earth, which is at the center. From these come the power and virtue of images, and they work in this way. Thus we say that heaven is a round sphere and contains the whole world within itself, that is to say, within its capacity. Such a sphere has no excess or lack, and is a figure permanent in itself; from it all the powers of spirits are summoned.

The heaven of the fixed stars is under it, and the center of this sphere is not a part of the sphere itself, for its center is the same as the center of the earth. The nature of the heavens is all one nature, and all the movements of nature and of material bodies follow the movements of the heavens. All heat comes from it, and by this we mean that whatever heat exists in the world exists because of the heavens.

The degrees of heaven are 360 in number, according to the first division, and there are exactly as many figures, and by them all judgments in astrology are distinguished, since judgments follow the images of heaven, and the heavens are the cause of all operations below them.

Now the work and potency when the planets are in these figures, either by aspect or conjunction, which they have one after another by every kind of conjunction, and the work of the planets that take place in terrestrial things in this world are according to this manner. For if it be Saturn, things that are cold and dry are affected, but by Jupiter things warm and moist, and by Mars, hot and dry. By Venus, things moderately hot but very moist, but by Mercury, things weakly hot and very dry, while by Luna things cold and moist are moved, and by the powers of the fixed stars the same things are moved as by Luna. When any planet is in any degree of heaven where it can be, and the planet be manifestly hot but weak in moisture or dryness, and the Sun attracts these virtues, we ought to judge that its effect grows and increases. Similarly, if we find that a planet acts to increase something by its nature and power, that thing will be stronger and more potent in its effect, while if the planet works against it, it weakens the effect according to its power in that work. Accordingly we may understand the planets' effects without error. You ought to study this in books of astrology.

Chapter four

The general theory and arrangement of the heavens for making magical images

While the wise of old desired to make images, it was not in their power to disclose the constellations which are the foundations of the science of images, and by which the effects of that science are made manifest. We, however, intend to speak of the roots of these constellations, with which you may help yourself in every working involving magical images; and these foundations are the means by which the heavens bring about the effects of the images. Those who seek to make images must first master the science of calculating the positions of the planets and the constellations, and also the motions of the heavens.

Furthermore, they ought to believe firmly in the works that they do with images, so that what they do will be true and without doubt, nor should they harbor doubts concerning its effectiveness, since this work is not done in order to test or prove whether it be true or not; rather, they should have faith in their desire that it be true. By this the rational spirit is strengthened, and joined to that virtue of the upper world from which proceeds the celestial spirit that acts in the image; and in this way, what is desired will come to pass.

Now, however, I wish to teach you one thing very necessary for this work, and that is working when conditions are best around this world.¹⁶ I say to you that you should not do anything in this work unless the Moon stands in a degree convenient and appropriate for the work you intend to do, because the Moon has powers and manifest works in all things that are beneath her, and none of them are hidden from her. And hereafter I will tell you the highest considerations in these processes that will produce much for you in this work, but for now I intend to speak of the effects and works of the Moon within the boundaries of her mansions, according to the consensus of all the wise of India about the 28 Mansions of the Moon.

¹⁶ That is, when conditions in the heavens that surround the earth are favorable.

The first Mansion of the Moon, then, is called Alnath. It begins at the first minute of Aries,¹⁷ and ends at 12 degrees 51 minutes 26 seconds of that sign. The wise of India begin journeys and take medicines when the Moon is in this Mansion. This Mansion also ought to be used as the root in every image that you wish to make in order to go on a journey, so as to travel safely and return in good health. It ought also to be used as the root to place discord and enmity between husband and wife, and between two friends so that they become enemies, and to sow discord between two allies; and you should do similarly when you wish to cause servants to flee. I will reveal to you also the roots and foundations that ought to be observed in all good acts and works, that is, you should see that the Moon is well dignified and that it is safe from Saturn and Mars and from the combustion of the Sun. Do the contrary in every evil work, that is, see that the Moon is combust or conjunct Saturn and Mars, or that she applies to an aspect with one of the latter.

The second mansion is called Albotain. It begins at 12 degrees of Aries 51 minutes and 26 seconds, and ends at 25 degrees 42 minutes and 52 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images to dig for streams and wells, to find hidden treasures, and for the planting of a great deal of wheat, for the destruction of buildings before they can be completed; and similarly to make images to enrage one man against another and to make stronger and firmer the incarceration of captives.

The third mansion is called Azoraya. It begins in the aforesaid degree¹⁸ and ends at 8 degrees 34 minutes and 2 seconds of Taurus. In this Mansion make images to sail safely on the sea and to return safely, and to firmly incarcerate captives, and to complete the works of alchemy, and all works done by fire, and to hunt in the country, and to cause love between man and wife.

The fourth mansion is called Aldebaran. It begins at 8 degrees 34 minutes and 2 seconds of Taurus and ends at 21 degrees 25 minutes and 44 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images for the destruction of cities and villages and for any other building which you wish not to endure, so that ¹⁷ That is, 0 degrees 0 minutes 0 seconds of Aries.

¹⁸ That is, 25 degrees 42 minutes and 52 seconds of Aries.

it proceeds to destruction, and to make a lord despise his servant, and to place discord between man and wife, and to destroy fountains, streams, and those that seek treasures underground, and to kill and bind all reptiles and venomous animals.

The fifth mansion is called Almices. It begins at 21 degrees 25 minutes and 44 seconds of Taurus and ends at 4 degrees 17 minutes and 10 seconds of Gemini. In this Mansion make images for youths to learn arts and occupations, and for the salvation of travelers, and to quickly return and for sailors to travel safely, and to improve buildings and to destroy the friendship between two people, and for favor between husband and wife, and do this when the Moon is rising in a humane sign, safe from Saturn and Mars and the combustion of the Sun, as we have described above in the First Mansion. These are the humane signs: Gemini, Virgo, Libra, Sagittarius and Aquarius.

The sixth mansion is called Athaya. It is from 4 degrees 17 minutes and 10 seconds of Gemini all the way to 17 degrees 8 minutes and 36 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images for the destruction of cities and villages, and to besiege them with armies, and for the enemies of kings to exact vengeance, and to destroy crops and trees, and to cause friendship between two people, to improve hunting in the country, and to destroy medicines so that when they are taken they do not work.

The seventh mansion is called Aldirah. It begins at 17 degrees 8 minutes and 36 seconds of Gemini and its boundary is the end of that sign. In this Mansion make images to increase merchandise and profit and to travel safely, and to increase crops, and to sail beneficially on the water, and to cause friendship between friends and allies, and to expel flies so that they will not enter where you wish, and to destroy officials, and it is good to go into the presence of the king or other high nobles, and to cause the king and other lords to be benevolent.

The eighth mansion is called Annathra. It begins in the first degree of Cancer¹⁹ and lasts for the next 12 degrees 51 minutes and 26 seconds. In this Mansion it is good to make images for love and friendship, and for the safe travel of those who travel in wagons through the countryside, and to cause friendship between allies, and to make the incarceration of captives firm, and for the destruction and affliction of captives, and to expel mice and bugs from whatever place you wish.

¹⁹ That is, 0 degrees Cancer 0 minutes 0 seconds.

The ninth mansion is called Atarf. It begins in at 12 degrees 51 minutes and 26 seconds of Cancer and ends at 25 degrees 42 minutes and 51 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion it is good to make to destroy crops, and to make unfortunate those who travel on journeys, to do evil to all men, and to cause division and hatred between allies, and to help a man defend himself from being attacked by another man.

The tenth mansion is called Algebha. It begins at 25 degrees 42 minutes and 51 seconds of Cancer and ends at 8 degrees 34 minutes and 18 seconds of Leo. In this Mansion make images for love between man and wife, and for the destruction of enemies, and to make firm the incarceration of captives, and for the strengthening and completion of buildings, and for the love of allies and for their mutual help.

The eleventh mansion is called Azobra. It begins at 8 degrees 34 minutes and 18 seconds of Leo and ends at 21 degrees 25 minutes and 44 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images to rescue captives, to beseige cities and villages, to organize trade and profit from it, for travelers on the roads to journey safe and unharmed, to strengthen buildings so that they are stable, and to increase the wealth of allies.

The twelfth mansion is called Acarfa. It begins at 21 degrees 25 minutes and 44 seconds of Leo and ends at 4 degrees 17 minutes and 6 seconds of Virgo. In this Mansion make images to increase harvests and plants, for the destruction of riches and of ships, and for the improvement of allies, officials, captives and servants that they will be steadfast and honest.

The thirteenth mansion is called Alahue. It begins at 4 degrees 17 minutes and 6 seconds of Virgo and last all the way until 17 degrees 8 minutes and 36 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images for the increase of trade and profit, the increase of harvests, for travelers to have good journeys on the roads, for the completion of buildings, for the freedom of captives, and the binding of nobles to have good from them.

The fourteenth mansion is called Azimech. It begins at 17 degrees 8 minutes and 36 seconds of Virgo and it terminates at the end of the sign. In this Mansion make images for the love of man and wife, to heal the sick with physic and medicine, to destroy harvests and plants, to destroy lust, for the destruction of those who go by roads, for the benefit of kings that they have good and ascend to their reign, for sailors to sail well and safely, and for the friendship of allies.

The fifteenth mansion is called Algarfa. It begins in the first degree of Libra²⁰ and ends at 12 degrees 51 minutes and 26 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images for the digging of wells, to seek underground treasure, to impede travelers to that they are unable to go on their journeys, and to separate husband and wife so that they never join with each other, to place discord between friends and allies, to scatter enemies from your area, and for the destruction of the house²¹ of your enemies.

The sixteenth mansion is called Azubene. It begins at 12 degrees 51 minutes and 26 seconds of Libra and ends at 25 degrees 42 minutes and 52 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images for the destruction of merchandise, harvests and plants, and to put discord between friends, and between man and wife, and the debauching of a woman you desire, for impeding those who journey that the end of their road is never reached, and to cause hatred between friends and liberate captives from incarceration.

The seventeenth mansion is called Alichil. It begins at 25 degrees 42 minutes and 52 seconds of Libra and ends at 8 degrees 36 minutes and 2 seconds of Scorpio. In this Mansion make images to improve deception that it is accomplished well, to beseige cities and villages, to make buildings more firm and stable, and to save sailors upon the sea. And everyone agrees that you should create friendship with a friend when the Moon is in this Mansion so that the friendship will be durable and never destroyed, and likewise in this Mansion all images for lasting love ought to be made.

The eighteenth mansion is called Alcalb. It begins at 8 degrees 36 minutes and 2 seconds of Scorpio and lasts until 21 degrees 25 minutes and 44 seconds of the same sign. In this ²⁰ That is, 0 degrees 0 minutes 0 seconds of Libra.

²¹ In medieval Arabic parlance the term "house" means also reputation and social standing, and this may be intended here.

Mansion make images for men to conspire against kings and vengeance against enemies and whatever else of this nature you wish, to build buildings that will be strong, to free captives from incarceration, and to separate friends.

The nineteenth mansion is called Exaula. It begins at 21 degrees 25 minutes and 44 seconds of Scorpio and ends at 4 degrees 17 minutes and 10 seconds of Sagittarius. In this Mansion make images to besiege cities and villages, and to enter and take them, and to do whatever else of this kind you wish, to destroy the wealth of whomever you please, to expel men from a particular place, to improve the lot of men traveling by wagons through the countryside, to increase harvests, cause captives to escape, to break and destroy ships, to separate and destroy the riches of allies, and to kill captives.

The twentieth mansion is called Nahaym. It begins at 4 degrees 17 minutes and 10 seconds of Sagittarius and ends at 17 degrees 8 minutes and 46 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images to tame wild and disobedient beasts, to bring those traveling in wagons swiftly back again, and for men to come wherever you wish, for good people to be joined together, to firmly incarcerate captives, and to bring evil and destruction to the riches of allies.

The twenty first mansion is called Elbelda. It begins at 17 degrees 8 minutes and 46 seconds of Sagittarius and it lasts until the end of the same sign. In this Mansion make images to strengthen buildings, to increase harvests, to make a profit and firmly keep money, to go safely through the countryside and to separate wives from their proper husbands.

The twenty second mansion is called Caadaldeba. It begins at the first degree of Capricorn²² and lasts until 12 degrees 51 minutes and 26 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images to cure illnesses, to put discord between two people, to make servants and captives flee, to cause goodwill between allies, and to make captives escape.

The twenty third mansion is called Caaddebolach. It begins at 12 degrees 51 minutes and 26 seconds of Capricorn and lasts until 25 degrees 42 minutes and 52 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images to heal illness, to join friends together, to divide husbands from their wives, for captives to escape and flee from their prisons.

²² That is, 0 degrees 0 minutes 0 seconds of Capricorn.

The twenty fourth mansion is called Caadacohot. It begins at 25 degrees 42 minutes and 52 seconds of Capricorn and lasts until 8 degrees 24 minutes and 28 seconds of Aquarius. In this Mansion make images to increase merchandise and make a profit out of it, to have goodwill between husband and wife, for soldiers to report victory over enemies, to destroy the money of allies, and to prevent an official from fulfilling his duties.

The twenty fifth mansion is called Caaddalhacbia. It begins at 8 degrees 24 minutes and 28 seconds of Aquarius and ends at 21 degrees 25 minutes and 44 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images to besiege cities and villages, to take enemies captive and do as much evil to them as you please, to make messengers convey their messages and quickly return, to separate wives from their husbands, to destroy harvests, to bind a man and wife or a woman and her husband so that they cannot copulate, to bind whichever part of the human body you wish so that it is not able to function, to strengthen the prison of captives; and it is good to secure buildings.

The twenty sixth mansion is called Almiquedam. It begins at 21 degrees 25 minutes and 44 seconds of Aquarius and ends at 4 degrees 17 minutes and 10 seconds of Pisces. In this Mansion make images to bind people in mutual love, to protect those who travel in wagons, to strengthen buildings and make the incarceration of captives firm and to cause evil to them.

The twenty seventh mansion is called Algarf almuehar. It begins at 4 degrees 17 minutes and 10 seconds of Pisces and ends at 17 degrees 8 minutes and 36 seconds of the same sign. In this Mansion make images to increase merchandise and to acquire profit, to unite allies, increase harvests, heal illness, to destroy the riches of whomever you wish, to impede the building of buildings, to put travelers on the sea in peril, to prolong the incarceration of captives and to do evil to whomever you wish.

The twenty eighth mansion is called Arrexhe. It begins at 17 degrees 8 minutes and 36 seconds of Pisces and lasts until the end of that sign. In this Mansion make images to increase merchandise, besiege cities, increase harvests, to get rid of things and to destroy an area, to make treasures be lost, to travel safely by wagon and safely return, to cause peace and concord between man and wife, to make the incarceration of captives firm and to inflict evil on sailors on the sea.

The foundation of all this is that you should see to it that in all good works, the Moon is safe from Saturn and Mars and their aspects, and from the combustion of the Sun, and is joined to the fortunes²³ by good aspects—that is, the trine and sextile aspects. In all these see to it that the Moon separates from one fortune and applies to the other. Do the opposite in works of evil.

One who practices magical arts ought to believe in his workings without any doubt regarding the work, because this is how the practitioner is well disposed to receive the aforesaid effects and the virtues from that which he intends to make. This disposition, achieved in this manner, cannot exist outside of man alone; but the disposition that is in other conscious beings is the way that they receive sensations according to their own proper nature, as wax easily receives forms impressed into it, just as demons receive their demoniac powers, because their bodies are disposed to receive what is suitable for demons; and this is because their feeble bodies are made impotent to resist this.

Similarly, a feeble disposition revealing itself in an otherwise strong place is the proper disposition for things out of which images are made; for everything is disposed to receive whatever work corresponds to it. This is a foundation of this work, and all accords with it. When something is disposed to receive an influence, the reception will take place; and when the reception has taken place, the effect will be open and manifest, and the figure receives strength. The effect will be as you desire insofar as the matter and the form are conjoined into unity, the way the figure of a man is united with a mirror or water, or as the unity of spirit and body.

When you wish to cause your effect in the daytime, dispose matters so that the Moon is ascending in one of the diurnal signs; and if you wish to do it in the night, she should ascend in a nocturnal sign. If she rises in a sign of short ascension, the effect will be more swift and certain; and if she rises in a sign of long ascension, the effect will be slower. This can be strengthened or weakened by aspects to the fortunes; for if the Moon ascends in signs of short ascension and an infortune²⁴ is there, it will overturn and destroy the effect and oppress it, while if she ascends in signs of long ascension and a fortune is there, or aspects her closely with a favorable aspect, the effect will be accomplished quickly; and similarly when a diurnal sign ascends at night or a nocturnal sign in the day, and a fortune is in aspect with it, the fortune guides and strengthens it, while if it is in aspect with an infortune, that destroys it.

²³ The fortunes in astrology are the planets Jupiter and Venus.

Those who intend to make images ought to make sure that they know the signs of long and short ascension; the fixed, mobile, and common signs; the diurnal and nocturnal signs; the fortunate and unfortunate planets; and when the Moon is safe from influences that interfere with her; and also which images are appropriate to the planets and to every sign. You should beware of trying to work magic to a good end when the Moon is applying to an eclipse, or under the rays of the Sun, that is, twelve degrees before or after.

In the same way you should preserve her from Saturn and Mars, and be careful that she not descend in southern latitudes beyond the twelve degrees mentioned above, or the same in northern latitudes. Similarly, you should take care that she not be of lessened course and slow, that is, when she moves less than 12 degrees in a day, because then she is assimilated to the motion of Saturn, and that she not be in the Via Combusta, which is most to be guarded against—that is, between the 18th degree of Libra and the 3rd degree of Scorpio—nor at the end of a sign, which are the terms of the infortunes, nor cadent from the midheaven—that is, in the ninth house.

If there should be some very necessary working that cannot possibly wait until the moon is free from all of the aforesaid debilities, place Jupiter and Venus on the ascendant or midheaven because they will rectify an unfortunate Moon.

You should know that all that we have said, we have said only to reveal the secrets that have been written in the books of the wise. We pray God Almighty that by his grace and mercy this book of ours may only come into the hands of wise and good men. You, then, ought to be the guardian of the aforesaid workings, and never reveal them to the unworthy.

²⁴ The infortunes in astrology are Saturn and Mars.

Chapter Five

Examples of the theory of images, and of those things needful for making magical images

When you wish to make images to cause love between two people, and make love and delight strong and firm between them, make images of the two in their likenesses. Let this be done in the hour of Jupiter or Venus, with Caput Draconis rising, and with the Moon making a good aspect to Venus, and let the lord of the seventh house apply to the lord of the ascendant by a trine or sextile aspect. Afterwards, join the images as if they were embracing, and bury them in the place of one of the two people, namely the person you wish to love the other more. And it shall be as you wish.

An image to generate peace and love between two people. Make two images under the ascendant of the question,²⁵ and make fortunate the ascendant and tenth house, and remove malefics from the ascendant, and make the lord of the tenth house fortunate and applying to the lord of the ascendant by a trine or sextile aspect.

Here, however, I wish to make clear what is necessary concerning aspects. I say that the trine is an aspect of perfect love, and the reason for this is that each sign of a fiery nature aspects one another with a trine aspect and signs of earthy nature aspect one another with a trine aspect, and you may understand similarly the aerial and aquatic signs; and this aspect causes perfect friendship. The sextile is an aspect of moderate friendship, because the signs that aspect each other by this aspect agree in their active but not passive nature,²⁶ and this is why this aspect is said to be of moderate amity. The square aspect is of moderate hatred, because they aspect each other from contrary natures. The opposition is an aspect of perfect hatred, because the signs that so aspect each other are contrary in all four natural qualities. But now let us return to our topic.

²⁵ This implies that the magician first casts a horary chart for the working, and uses that chart as the basis for the magical image.

²⁶ The elements share one of their two qualities but not both—for example, Aries (fire) and Gemini (air) share the quality of warmth, but one is dry while the other is moist.

Now I will explain how you should make a twofold image. If you do this for two friends, make the eleventh house of the first image the ascendant of the second image; and if you wish to generate friendship between man and wife, make the ascendant of the second image the seventh house of the first image. And make it so the lord of the ascendant of the one who will return the friendship makes a good aspect with reception to the lord of the ascendant of the other image. Then join the images and bury them in the place of the one who is to have friendship and they will be friends as before.

An image to place love between two people. Make two images with Venus rising in the first face of Cancer and the Moon in the first face of Taurus in the eleventh house. When the images are made attach them so they are embracing each other and bury them in the place of one or the other. There will be affection and durable love between the two of them. These are called figures of alteration, and Ptolemy speaks of them in aphorism 33 of his Centiloquium. We will speak of this in the fourth book of our work; there we will explain more about this, if God wills.

An image for enduring love. Make two images, and put one of the Fortunes at the ascendant and the Moon in Taurus conjunct Venus. Write on one image a number -- that is, a figure of al-Khwarismi, the sort that begin with 0²⁷ -- for 220 in the proper place, and on the other image write the same kind of figure for 284 in the proper place. Join the two figures together in an embrace, and then there will be perfect and lasting love between the two.²⁸

An image for kings and nobles to like whomever you wish. Make an image in the form and in the name of the person in this way. Make fortunate the ascendant with a fortune that is strong and not cadent, retrograde or combust, and make the lord of the

²⁷ The figures of Al-Khwarismi are the numerals we use today, as distinct from the Roman numerals still used in medieval Europe at the time this translation was made. The author means simply that you should write "220" on the figure rather than "CCXX."

²⁸ The numbers 220 and 284 are termed "amicable numbers" in Pythagorean numerology, because the factors of each one add up to the other ascendant strong and in good condition, and direct, and in his exaltation, and make the lord of the tenth house aspect the lord of the ascendant with a trine or sextile aspect with strong reception; and place the lord of the ascendant in a commanding sign and the lord of the tenth in an obedient sign. As long as the one for whom you make the image shall bear with him, he shall be loved and honored and whatever he requests of the king shall be given to him.

An image for a lord to be loved and for his men to always be obedient to him. Make two images, the first of them in the hour of Jupiter, and the Moon aspecting the Sun with a good aspect and separating from the infortunes, and place the Head of the Dragon in the ascendant. Then make the other image when its ascendant is the fifth house from the ascendant of the first image, and in the hour of Venus and the Head of the Dragon is in the ascendant or aspecting the ascendant with a favorable aspect, and do this in the hour of the Moon, when the Moon is free from the infortune. Bury the images under the ascendant of one of the fixed signs in the hour of Saturn. As soon as this is done all of your subordinates will be obedient to you.

An image to cause a servant to love his master. Let there be two images, of which one should be made in the hour of any of the superior planets and with the Moon waxing, with the North Node in the first, fourth, seventh or tenth house. Fashion the second image in the hour of any of the inferior planets, and the second image make in the hour of an inferior planet and make the tenth house of the first image the ascendant of the second image, and place the Tail of the Dragon in the first, fourth, seventh or tenth house. And when the images are made in this way, join them together embracing and bury them in the place of the person whose love the other desires.

An image to receive honor from a lord. Make an image and make fortunate the ascendant and tenth house and likewise the lord of the ascendant, and remove malefics from the ascendant and its lord, and place benefics in the eleventh house aspecting the ascendant and its lord with good and laudable aspects, and make the lord of the tenth house and the lord of the ascendant aspecting each other with a good aspect and mutual reception. When the image is complete keep it secret and don't let anyone see it and when you go into the presence of the lord, the office or honor you seek, you will have.

An image to increase business and trade. Make an image with the ascendant and the tenth and their lords fortunate, as well as the lord of the house of the lord of the ascendant and the lord of the house of the lord of the tenth; make fortunate the Moon and the lord of the house of the Moon, and the second house and its lord; and place the lord of the second house in reception with the lord of the ascendant by trine or sextile aspect, and place a fortune in the second house, and place the Part of Fortune²⁹ in the ascendant or tenth, with the lord of the Part of Fortune making a good aspect to it. Make fortunate the eleventh house and its lord. And when this image is made, guard it and keep it secret so that no one sees it, and you will make a great profit and succeed in all your undertakings.

An image to cause cities to grow and make them prosper. Make an image with the ascendant and the tenth house and their lords fortunate, with the fortunes aspecting them, and make fortunate the lord of the second house and the lord of the eighth house, and make fortunate the lord of the ascendant and have him aspecting a fortune, and make fortunate the lord of the house of the lord of the ascendant, and the Moon and the lord of the house of the Moon. And when the image is made as described, bury it in the middle of the city and it shall be as you wish.

An image to gain the love of another. Make two images; make the first in the hour of Jupiter with Virgo rising, and with the waxing Moon in the ascendant, fourth, seventh or tenth houses. Make the second image in the hour of Venus when Venus is aspecting Jupiter and the malefics are cadent from the ascendant, and make the ascendant of the second image the seventh [house cusp] of the first image, and make the lord of the ascendant of the first image apply to the lord of the ascendant of the second image with a trine or sextile aspect. When these images have been made in this manner, bind them together embracing each other, and bury them in the place where you wish to gain love and delight.

²⁹ The most famous of the Arabic parts, the part of fortune is calculated from the positions of the ascendant, sun and moon, and shows the location of good fortune in the chart.

An image for the destruction of an enemy. Make an image in the form and likeness of the one to whom you wish evil, in the hour of Mars, with the Moon in Scorpio; and if you are able, make the ascendant unfortunate, putting an infortune in the ascendant or forming a bad aspect to the ascendant, and put the infortune in aspect with the lord of the ascendant; and make unfortunate the lord of the ascendant and the lord of the fourth house, and make them aspect each other, or make unfortunate the lord of the ascendant in the fourth house, or have it received by a malefic in the fourth house or the ascendant. And when the image is made, bury it head downwards outside the city in which your enemy lives, and it shall be as you wish.

An image for the destruction of a city. Make an image in the hour of Saturn, which is an infortune, when the ascendant of the city is rising, with an infortune in the ascendant and as the lord of the ascendant³⁰ and the lord of the house³¹ of the lord of the ascendant as well, and keep the fortunes from the ascendant and from the lord of the ascendant and the lord of the triplicity of the ascendant, as well as the lords of the fourth, seventh and tenth houses. And when the image is made, bury it in the middle of the city and you will see miracles.

An image to hinder buildings so that they are not built. Make two images, one in the hour of the Sun, with Leo rising and the other in the hour of the Moon with Cancer rising; when the Moon is waxing and safe from the malefics and swift in course. And when they are made, bury them in the hour of Venus, and they will hinder buildings.

An image for the escape of those held in prison. Make an image in the likeness of the one whom you wish to be released in the hour of the Moon, when she is waning, swift in motion and separated from the malefics. Bury the image near the prison when the ascendant is placed as the Tenth house of the city where the prisoner is held.

An image for the destruction of an enemy. Make two images, the first in the hour of the Sun, with Leo rising and the Moon

³⁰ Lord of the ascendant: the planet ruling the rising sign in an astrological chart.

³¹ Lord of the house of the lord of the ascendant: the planet ruling the sign in which the lord of the ascendant is placed in an astrological chart.

cadent from the ascendant, and the other make in the hour of the Mars with Cancer rising and Mars cadent from the Moon, and make them in the form of one striking another. Bury them in the hour of Mars with the first face of Aries rising. When you have done this, you will be able to act against your enemy as you wish.

An image to chase any man from his place. Make an image with a tortuous sign ascending, and with the lord of the ascendant cadent from the ascendant, fourth, seventh or tenth house, and the Moon similarly cadent. Bury the image at a crossroad under the Via Combusta³², and make the face of the image look away from his place, and you will see miracles.

An image to separate two friends from each other. Make an image under the ascendant of whichever friend you wish, putting a strong malefic in the ascendant and tenth house; make unfortunate the lords of the ascendant and tenth house, make a malefic aspect them with a square or opposition, and make the benefics cadent from the ascendant and the tenth house and their lords. Make the other image the same in all respects as we have said above. And bury it in the place of the other image when a fixed and malefic sign and the Cauda Draconis or other malefic rises. When this is done, they will hate each other and never love each other.

An image for the anger of the king to fall on whomever you wish. Make two images according to the principles of talismans that we have already set forth; and make the lord of the ascendant cadent from the lord of the tenth house or afflicted by him, and aspecting the lord of the fourth house by a square or opposition. Bury the image with a fixed and malefic sign rising. When this is done, the king will hate the person.

An image to catch many fish. Make an image in the form of the fish that are in that particular river, and make the image with Jupiter rising in Pisces, in the hour of Venus. Make it in this way; first make the head and the body and then the tail, and join them together at the aforesaid hour. Next make a spike of pure silver and place the image on the head of the spike, and make a jug or vase of lead with a narrow mouth, and in the middle of the jug place the spike standing straight up with the image of the fish at the top of the spike. Then take the aforementioned vase and fill it with water and seal the mouth with wax so that no water leaks out. And all the fish will congregate there.

³² The Via Combusta extends from 15° Libra to 15° Scorpio.

An image to catch fish. Alhanemi says in his book that he tried this and found it to be true. He says to make an image in the form of a fish, and cast it with the second face of Pisces rising, and the Moon and Mercury rising, and make it in the hour of the Moon. When this image is made, throw it in the river where you wish to have fish, and you will see miracles because many fish will come to this place.

An image to chase away scorpions. Make an image of a scorpion in very pure gold in the hour of the Sun, with the Moon in the ascendant, fourth, seventh or tenth, in Taurus, Aquarius or Leo, but the best is Leo, because Leo is by nature more contrary to a scorpion; and let the Sun be in Leo, and Saturn retrograde. First make the tail, then the feet, then the claws, and last the head. There are many things to consider and you should understand them well because they will assist you in all of your works. When the parts are made, place the left claw in the place of the right claw and the right foot in the place of the left foot, place the head in its proper position and the tail similarly. After this make a stinger and put it upside down on the tail with the base of the stinger in its proper place, so the scorpion is stinging himself with his own tail. When the image is made in this way, bury it in a stone with a hole in it, and let this stone be a metallic ore. Then bury it in an important part of the city; and scorpions will flee from this place and they will not approach the place of the image or within 45 miles of the place.

Image to heal the sting of a scorpion. Make the image of a scorpion in a bezoar stone, and do this in the hour of the Moon, with the Moon in the second face of Scorpio, and Leo, Taurus or Aquarius rising. Fasten the stone in a gold ring and stamp the image in soft incense under the constellation³³ we have previously described. Give the person who was stung a drink made from the incense stamped with the seal and they will be cured immediately and their pain relieved.

³³ The word "constellation" literally means "combination of stars," and was used in medieval astrology as a term for a particular set of astrological conditions.

One who always used the aforesaid method and all these sciences, who came from the Black Land,³⁴ found that he could write a single name on a brass tablet and always carry it with him. Whenever anybody was stung by a scorpion, he bathed the tablet in water and had the water drunk by the person who was stung, who at once was healed and relieved of pain. He also said that when he did not have the brass tablet with him, he would write the name on a glass saucer with the kind of chalk that can be written with, or with saffron, or anything similar that can be drunk. He would bathe that in water and give it to the sick person, and at once the pain would depart.

If it were not for fear of going on at too much length, I could relate other marvels that he did with this name, because the people to whom he gave it to drink were a very great number, such that I cannot tell of them all briefly. Since I myself saw experiments with this name, however, I will forbear to relate more about this name in this book and the present chapter. This is the name:

zaare zaare raam zaare zaare fegem bohorim borayn nesfis albune fedraza affetihe taututa tanyin zabahat aylatricyn haurane rahannie ayn latumine queue acatyery nimiere quibari yehuyha nuym latrityn hamtaury vueryn catuhe cahuene cenhe beyne ☆.

The aforesaid name must be written in seven lines precisely, neither more nor less, with the Seal of Solomon at the end of the seventh line. It is said also that this should be written on the first Thursday in May, or that it should be written on the first Thursday of any month you wish; and I have seen it written in whatever day was convenient. Beware that you do not make a mistake in these names, neither in their form nor in their figure, that you not fall into error. The name that is written here bohorim I have seen the wise write nohorim, that is, with an initial n, but I myself recollect it beginning with b as I have said above. I say this to you so that the secret of this science may be revealed to you.

³⁴ In the Latin text, this is terra Nigrorum, the "land of black people," but Egypt was originally known as al-Kemi, the Black Land, and this may be the original meaning. The method of bathing an object covered with writing in water, and drinking the water as a medicine, was much used in Pharaonic Egypt.

An image for men to be loved by their wives. Make the image of a girl in a cold and dry metal, and make it when Mercury is rising in Virgo and increasing in the circle, or when it is the almuten figuris, and do this work in the hour of Mercury. Set it aside until the time when the image is completed. Make another image in the form of a youth and make it when Mercury is in Virgo, having returned to the place where you made the first image, or in Gemini, and beware of a diversity of ascendants; that is, when Mercury is in Virgo do not have Gemini rising, and when Mercury is in Gemini do not have Virgo rising, and whichever you have rising, place Mercury there. When the two images have been made in this way, attach them to each other as though embracing, and place the hands of each one around the sides of the other, and do all this work in the hour of Mercury with Virgo or Gemini rising. Make a band around the images using the same metal from which you made them, and bury them someplace in a city with many people. When you have done this men will embrace their wives and each hold the other dear. Similarly when someone seeks love from another, bury the images in the place where you wish them to be united.

An image for the destruction of cities, house and the like. Make an image under the ascendant of the city, if it is known, or under the ascendant of a horary question. Make unfortunate the ascendant and fourth house, and the lord of the ascendant, and the Moon, and the lord of the house of the lord of the Moon, and the lord of the house of the lord of the ascendant, and the tenth and its lord. When the image is made as has been said above bury it in the middle of the city and it will be as you wish.

An image to make a physician successful. Make on a sheet of tin the image of a man seated on a throne, doing the work of a physician. Make another image of a man standing on his feet holding a urine flask before him, and making a judgment on it.³⁵ Make both of these images with Taurus or Libra rising, Mars rising, and the Dragon's Head at the Midheaven. When you have made them, put the tin plate with the image in the place where you wish people to come, and you will see people drawn miraculously to this place.

³⁵ Diagnosis by the color, clarity, and odor of urine was important in both Arabic and European medicine in the Middle Ages.

An image for the growth of harvests and crops. Make the image of a seated man surrounded by harvests, trees and crops, on a silver plate; and make it when Taurus rises, when the Moon is in Taurus and the Sun is going towards Saturn. And bury it in the place you wish, and all seeds and crops will grow well and quickly without damage from beasts or birds or storms or anything else that is a nuisance at harvest time.

An image to heal illnesses involving stones.³⁶ Make the image of a lion on a sheet of the purest gold, holding a stone in its paw as if dancing with it, and make it in the hour of the Sun with the first degree of the second face of Leo rising. Whoever carries this image will be free from their illness immediately. This has been proven many times.

An image for removing illness, melancholy and spells. If you wish to remove mechanical³⁷ infirmities, to strengthen health and to return evil spells to their makers, make an image in the purest silver in the hour of Venus, when the Moon is in the ascendant, fourth, seventh or tenth houses and aspecting Venus with a good aspect, and the lord of the 6th house aspecting a benefic by trine or opposition, and the lord of the eighth squaring Mercury. Be sure that Mercury is not retrograde, combust or aspecting the malefics. Make this image in the final hour of Sunday, with the lord of the hour in the tenth or the ascendant. When it is made in this way the aforesaid infirmities will be removed.

You should know that the virtues of images and their power and the effect that they have only exist because of the heavenly bodies, and when these images are made according to the motions of heaven you will not find anything to impede or destroy them. It is necessary to observe, when casting images for love and friendship, that the Moon is fortunate and waxing and not when the Moon is afflicted and waning. Here is an example of this. Make images for love and delight and to visit kings and high lords in the day of the Moon, when she is waxing, and in Sagittarius, Taurus, Cancer or Pisces (and if she is with the ³⁶ Kidney or bladder stones.

³⁷ Infirmities mechanicas in the text; probably a misprint for "melancholic illnesses."

Dragon's Head it is powerful for workings), and always in a mansion fortunate and appropriate for the work, and when the Moon is joined to Venus in the hour of Jupiter, and Jupiter is in Pisces, Sagittarius and Cancer and the Moon is with him. Make images for evil conversely, that is, when the Moon is in a malefic mansion and conjoined to malefic planets, or aspecting them by square or opposition. When you do this, your work will turn out as you wish in all things. Note also that working with images is better done at night than in the daytime in all of the aforesaid.

What is necessary in these workings, and cannot be dispensed with, is the union of your whole will and belief in the work, so that the power of your spirit is united with the power of the heavens; then all things will be accomplished effectively. Plato says in his book of aphorisms that when someone speaks a word with intention, and belief concords with it, whoever hears it is moved; and the converse, if you wish to do the contrary. This is the root of uniting the will with belief in prayer, and this first of all in asking that which you wish to ask from that Lord to whom you ought to pray.

Next, it necessarily is required that the working of these operations be hidden from other people and from the light of the Sun, nor should they be done in any place where the Sun may enter, and no other person should learn about your workings, unless it be one who is faithful to you and believes in the work, neither a mocker nor a disbeliever in the work and the powers of the spirits of heaven, or in their powers having power in this world, or that the work is done by these spirits. To confirm this, Thabit ibn Qurra says in the book he wrote, On Images, where he says that the science of images is the nobler part of astrology. Further on he says that a body that lacks life is deficient in spirit. He says this concerning images that are not made in a proper and opportune time, are therefore not apt to receive the spirits of the planets, and therefore are similar to dead bodies in which the spirit is absent. When they are made in a proper and opportune time as they ought, they receive spirits and infused powers from the planets and are similar to living bodies, from which follow miraculous effects.

Aristotle says in his book of images that those who have images proceeding from the seven planets are better and higher, and when fortune smiles upon them, it is more durable. He means to say this about attracting heavenly spirits and virtues to earth. He also says concerning the names of spirits that, when anyone invokes them and wishes to draw down the corresponding spirits, that the latter descend with all their might in their hour, and they kill the one who invoked them, unless he is well trained and knowledgeable of the names of those spirits and the planets corresponding to their works, from which they have been drawn, and which conveys them to the world of matter.

This is what is said by some of those who work with the mighty names, who say that the virtues of them change according to the nature of the things proper to them, and accomplish miracles in the world. The greater part of those who work with the aforesaid names disagree with this. I have made a single book of these names and how we ought to understand them, and revealed this in the exposition of all of them.

I wish to return to the words of Aristotle, in the place where he says of magical words that they cannot pass beyond the circle of the heavens, nor is anything like them held to be able to command spirits, for words do not have such a power except by the command of God the glorious and exalted, who moves the spirits about by his command and sends them even to the center of the earth. Thus says Aristotle.

All the wise who have spoken of this science agree that in working with magical images, words and prayers help in combination with substances and actions. The sage Thoth says: words in images are as the spirit in a body, moving spirits and powers toward such a work, insofar as the words of the magus are joined with his will and certitude, because out of these latter factors is made noble that which completes the images and the words we say. Those that are here described are those who speak words corresponding to the works that are considered in our volumes.

For example, if you wish to work with an image for love and unity, speak in this way: "Let this man N. be joined to this woman N. as fire and air and water and earth are joined; and let his spirit be moved toward hers as the rays of the sun move the light of the world and its virtues; and let her and her actions be made in his sight like the heaven with the stars that compose it, or trees with their flowers. Let the spirit of each be raised up and subtilized by the spirit of the other as the waters flow over the earth, and let each of the aforesaid be unable to eat, or drink, or dance, or take pleasure in anything without the other."

If you perform a working to separate one person from another or to place enmity between them, say this: "I divide and tear apart this person from this person by the virtues of these spirits and planets, as the light is divided from the darkness;" and thereafter, "Let enmity and ill will enter between these two, just as fire and water are inimical to each other."

If you wish to join someone with some woman, or with many others, say this: "Let the will of such and such a woman (if you do this for one woman) or all of these (if you do it for all of them) be bound, and take possession of this work by the strength and power of the spirits and planets, as the masses and veins of the mountains bind together the stones thereof."

If you wish to dissolve this binding for someone, say this: "Let the binding of the will of such and such a man, which has been bound and constrained to such and such a woman, be unbound and dissolved and destroyed by the virtue of the spirits and planets, as wax is melted by the fire, and as the Sun destroys the shadows and their spirits, and as the snow is consumed by the heat of the Sun."

If you wish to prevent people from speaking ill³⁸ of you or of anyone else you wish, say this: "I cover this person with a cover of shining light, and I cut off the tongues of people from him, and I cover their eyes with a spiritual cover, drawing from them all evil enchantments; and I cut off their tongues and their evil wills."

Beyond this, if you wish to have people speak ill of someone and hate him, say this: "Let this person be broken up and destroyed by the virtue and power of these spirits and planets, as the rays of the sun break up and destroy the thickness and density of clouds, and let their spirits be affixed to the tongues of wicked men so that they will wound him as arrows and catapult stones wound the body."

³⁸ By "speaking ill" the author clearly means something more magically dangerous than spreading hostile gossip.

Be careful that when you do any of the aforesaid workings, you do not make any mistake in any of the aforementioned that is not in keeping with the working that you do; rather, say things that will strengthen your work and fill it out.

Keep the teachings of this chapter well and diligently, because they are of great advantage and usefulness in the image workings you do; proceeding and continuing as said here, you will be able to compose all the images in the world. For those things out of which images are constructed ought to be similar and proportionate to the nature of that for which the image is composed, whether for good or for evil. I intend also to explain hereafter those things belonging to every planet you like among the metals, animals, trees, colors, incenses and sacrifices. You may assist yourself thereby in all your workings, just as a physician works with many medicines and substances, and with the obedience of the sick person in observing diets and taking medicines; in this way the physician obtains his goal.

Now the whole foundation of these operations is in observing the motions of the planets and constellations. Thus the ancient Greek sages were accustomed to observe a planet, watching until it was in its proper *geuzahar*³⁹. They placed it in the degree of the midheaven, and burned an incense appropriate to the planet, and made sacrifices with prayers likewise corresponding to the planet, and asked that whatever they willed, they would obtain. They said also to work similarly with a planet when it was rising, and similarly accomplished what they willed. It should be noted that the aforesaid workings were more certain if the planet was strong in the natal chart of those people who performed the working. All this you should understand, for because of it you will be able to accomplish whatever you wish.

³⁹ A transliteration of the Arabic astrological term jawzahirr, or planetary node—the points at which the planet's apparent path seen from Earth intersect the ecliptic.

Chapter Six

How everything relates to the universe, and how it is known that man is a lesser world and corresponds to the greater world

You should know that knowledge is that which is truly noble and exalted, and whoever studies it and makes use of it receives its nobility and exaltation. Knowledge is what puts things in their proper order, because when one thing is known, another presently appears. He alone is perfect who attains the highest level of knowledge, and delights in and loves that level of knowledge. They were called “philosophers” in Greek and Latin, for this word is properly interpreted “lovers of knowledge.”⁴⁰ Whoever does not strive for knowledge is defective and weak in authority, and therefore ought not to be called human, despite having the name, form, and figure of a human being.

If such a person were to strive to learn knowledge, he would learn from it that he indeed is a human being, that he is a little world similar to the great world, and that he is a body together with a rational spirit, whole, animate, and reasoning, and that by these three spirits⁴¹ he is set apart from all other things in the world, and from all other living things, inasmuch as he has reason. This word “reason” denotes the capacity for knowledge, because he is able to recognize appearances, and determine that they are not realities, and direct his mind to whatever is in the world and in whatever place (that is, in the world) by his knowledge and his consciousness, and retain therein the power and potential of all that he hears. By this he experiences through his consciousness whatever happens in the world and in man, that is, in the little world, for this latter is similar to the greater world, with which it corresponds in its form and the things found in it.

He is similar to the animals in all natural things, but he is separated from the animals by his crafts and knowledge. He has six motions;⁴² he has hard bones, all ordered by nature in straight lines, which are moved by the parts beside them; he has fingers and hands composed of straight lines; and he has a round and valuable head. He receives knowledge and literacy and discovers crafts, and gives up all animal things; and these are not given up by any other animal. He laughs and weeps, and gives voice to his sorrow as he sheds tears. In him is God’s virtue and the knowledge of justice so that he might govern cities. There is an image in him, having light within it, of which his body is an image.⁴³ He is powerful in spirit and harmonious in his form. He knows what helps him, and what harms him. He perfects arts and professions, while arts and professions are not given to other living things. He discovers subtle crafts and subtleties in them, and makes miracles and wonderful images, and retains the forms of knowledge. By all these things he is separated by all other living things.

⁴⁰ In Greek philosophos means “lover of knowledge.”

⁴¹ the vital, animal, and rational spirits.

God made him the arranger and discoverer of His wisdom and knowledge, and the expounder of His qualities, and the receiver of all things in the world by the prophetic spirit or the treasury of wisdom, which comprehends all things and their combinations that exist in the great world. Man himself also comprehends all intelligences and compositions of things in this world by his senses, while none of these comprehend him; and all things serve him, while he serves none of them. With his voice he may imitate any animal he pleases, and make forms similar to them with his own hands, and count and describe them and explain their nature and works with his words. By contrast, no animal has the power to understand man, or to change its voice or imitate the voice of another;⁴⁴ for example, chickens, lions, and dogs cannot change their voices to one another’s, while man himself has the power in his natural voice to make all the other sounds of the animals, and to change their forms and similitudes as he wishes. He chooses useful habits, and directs other animals in them, and reveals them to animals.

⁴² That is, the ability to move forward, backward, left, right, up, and down.

⁴³ The augoeides, the luminous or celestial body.

⁴⁴ Apparently the author of the Picatrix had never encountered parrots, cockatoos, and the like.

Man has a dense body and a subtle spirit, for part of him is subtle and the other part dense. The subtle part belongs to life, and the dense part to death; the medium of the one is mobile, and of the other is fixed; the one medium is formed and the other formless; the one medium is night and the other day; one is light and the other darkness, one visible and the other hidden, one perceives and the other only exists in perception, one presses down and the other is pressed down. The one part is ashamed of evil works, and makes what it chooses, and repents of other works. It is composed of fine and subtle matter; it contains in itself the density of the earth, the subtlety of the air, the heat of the fire and the coldness of the water, out of which it is made equal in motion by its own vital power. It knows the heat of fire because of the heat that is in man, and the coldness of water by the coldness revealed in him; and in this way every element out of which he is made is known in him.

The form of his head is the form of heaven, and its figure is similar to heaven's rotundity. More generally, the form of every subtle thing is joined to him.

The universal form of man is the container of the form of the universal spirit, and the universal spirit is the container of the universal consciousness, and universal consciousness is the form of the light from which consciousness proceeds. Thus light is the material of universal consciousness, which is higher than all inferior things, and matter is always inferior to light and simpler than it. Thus man is completed out of the composite human form which is served by all other bodies, and itself is conjoined with other natures.

Whoever desires to know all this ought to be pure, inclined to virtue, clean and free from all bodily filth and all disturbing thoughts, because one who is thus disposed is able with his consciousness to seek and behold and attain certainty in this matter.

Now, though, in speaking of the foregoing we have deviated from the intent of this book, for it and its consciousness, are the roots of those things on which this book, which is about the science of magic, is grounded. If you labor unceasingly in knowledge and in matters of the intellect and in perception of those things that are, then no matter what happens, you will be able to search out and understand sorcery and magic. Plato says as much in the book he wrote called Timaeus, which goes on at great length in words and reasoning about forms. He expounded this reason very well where it says that in occult matters, it is the habit of the wise to cover up and conceal their knowledge in such a way that the foolish are not able to discover it. Another sage named Zadealis wrote something similar in his book, where it says in these matters to be hidden and profound.

The concealment and profundity of words is the subtlety of the wise in their reasonings, so that they cannot be understood without much contemplation. Their meaning lies hidden therein until intelligence extracts it from its concealments, and then it is extracted from a different meaning that is understood by the intellect at first glance. This science of magic is divided into two parts, of which one is manifest, and the other deeply hidden. The part deeply hidden is profound, and there are profound perceptions that cannot be grasped except with others that come before them through hard work, until their relationship becomes apparent and they are uncovered.

If anyone thoroughly studies this according to the dictum just given, he will have all that he desires, and secrets will be opened to him, and thereby he will attain what he wishes. The byways and highways leading to this attainment are many, however. Some of them are to take proofs from the manifest and apply them to the hidden, and returning the branches to the root in order to join them together, and to assemble in one's consciousness and thought the credible sayings of saintly men or of some particular saint. In this way you will reach completion and perfection, and you will attain what you wish, and the manifest and concealed meaning of these words will be revealed to you. Likewise, you will be granted the right to pass freely on the roads just mentioned, so that you will be able to attain knowledge and penetrate and uncover hidden things—because by each of the aforesaid roads you will be able to attain what you wish, and understand knowledge and its meanings, and understand all things, and perceive all things in their proper order.

Chapter Seven

How everything in the universe is related, and many other profound things, hidden by the wise, that we intend to reveal in this book of ours

All things in the world are ordered in grades according to the things that govern them. The first of all things of this world, nobler, higher, and more perfect than anything found in the world, is God Himself, who is the shaper and creator of all. There follow in order consciousness or intellect; after consciousness, spirit; and after spirit, matter; and this matter⁴⁵ is immobile, unalterable, and immobile. After this comes the sphere of nature, which is called the prime mover of all things moved, and is the source of all generation and corruption that happens in the world. Next comes the sphere of the fixed stars, and below this are found the other sphere in order down to the sphere of the Moon. Below this is found universal matter—that is, the first matter⁴⁶—in which is the pattern of all things of this world, which are within this first matter but are not apparent. After this matter come the elements, which are manifestations of this universal matter, for the elements do not have their operations or effects in matter.⁴⁷ After the elements in order come minerals, and after them plants, then animals, then rational animals. This order is found out of a diversity of other orders, for other orders descend from the intellect, which is nobler and higher than all other created things, and proceed from higher to lower until they reach the sphere of the Moon, and then proceed from the lower to the higher until they reach humanity, which is nobler than any other thing existing under the sphere of the Moon. For in humanity knowledge, wisdom, and inquiry are made complete in manifestation.

⁴⁵ The quintessence, the substance that in medieval physical theory forms the spheres of heaven. Later in this chapter it is termed materia alta, “high matter.”

⁴⁶ The first matter or prima materia of the alchemists.

⁴⁷ That is, matter is not a creation of the elements; the elements are processes within matter.

Because of this you ought to know that those who labor for knowledge should grasp how these proceed in order. Those who work at this gain a better fortune, and avoid that which the wise have said: there is nothing worse among human beings than a student who wants to look sophisticated but not to have knowledge. For they do not gain knowledge, unlike those who work faithfully at it, and one who has no knowledge is not human except in an equivocal sense.

You should know also that what is found in the world has other orders and other divisions than the one given here, intended to sharpen the intellect so that it may be more practiced in learning. Afterwards, direct your attention to these, and you will understand the secrets of the wise. The order thereof is as follows: first comes the principle, then the high matter, then the elements, then matter, then form, then nature, then body, then growth, then animal, then human, then male, then the individual person being named. The first principle is more universal than high matter, because it is said to be above matter and accident, and it is not called matter except as the basis of bodies. Matter is more universal than the elements, because matter is without combination, and the elements cannot exist without combination. The elements are more universal than other materials, because an element is a simple body and receives qualities, and matter is a coadunation⁴⁸ of the elements ordered to receive form. Matter is more universal than form, because it is simple before its reception of form, and when it receives form it becomes a combination of matter and form—for example, the way that clay is the material of a vase and wood is the material of a footstool. When they receive motion and adaptation, their virtue is mixed, and becomes nature. When natures are united and receive color, increase, and decrease, the result is a body. Bodies are divided between those that grow and those that diminish; those that grow are divided between animals and non-animals, and animals are divided between humans and nonhumans, and humans are divided between male and female, and males into individuals known one by one.

⁴⁸ A technical term of medieval physics, coadunation means “bringing together as one.”

Matter is a coadunation of the elements ordered for the reception of form. Matter is divided into two parts;⁴⁹ one is simple matter, which receives nothing except the form of the elements earth, air, water and fire, and is transmuted from one material substance to another. The other is universal matter disposed to receive all forms composed of the simple qualities heat, cold, dryness and wetness, and is not transmuted from one material substance to another. The wise have called the first of these, that which is disposed to receive all diverse forms, while the other is named for the part of nature which is the body by which all of it is directed and fulfilled.

All that we have said in this context we say only to sharpen the intellect and illuminate awareness, because the aforesaid words and reasons that we have stated are spiritual images and the word that Adam received from the Lord God. They cannot be understood except by the wise who have labored faithfully in knowledge and have understood how created beings attain truth. You should understand all of this and retain it in your intellect, because what we have said up to this point in this book of ours constitute the foundations of the art of magic, if you understand it well.

⁴⁹ These are respectively the lower and higher matter discussed earlier.

Book Two

Here begins the second book, which discusses the figures of heaven and the motion of the eighth sphere, and their effects on this world. Here are the chapters of Book Two:

Chapter One:

First is shown how to learn this science.

Chapter Two:

The figures of heaven and their secrets.

Chapter Three:

All the works of the planets, the Sun, and the Moon.

Chapter Four:

The motion of the eighth sphere and the fixed stars.

Chapter Five:

The division of this science among nations, and what part of it is possessed by each nation.

Chapter Six:

The power of magical images, and the varieties of them that exist, and how magical images can receive the power of the planets, and how works are accomplished by magical images, and this is the root of the science of magic and of magical images

Chapter Seven:

How to work dialectically in this science of magical images, and what part this ought to have in this science.

Chapter Eight:

The order of natural things, and how they may enter into this science.

Chapter Nine:

Examples of figures and the forms of images that summon the aid of the planets.

Chapter Ten:

The stones proper to each planet and the formation of figures.

Chapter Eleven:

The figures of the decans and signs and their effects.

Chapter Twelve:

The figures and degrees of the signs according to the opinion of the Hindus, and how they proceed according to the contemplations of this science, and in what manner the virtues of superior bodies are attracted according to the opinions of the same, with notable secrets.

Chapter One

How it is possible to learn this science

The wise, who are endowed by nature with intelligence, never cease nor neglect to seek and inquire that they might learn and understand the secrets of the wise, who sealed them up in their books and wrote them in hidden words, that the aforesaid might search them out by careful investigation until they attain what they desire; but those who are stupid and lacking in intelligence will never reach it or arrive at it. Yet the motive that drives me proceeds from magic and forbidden things, in which I prospered from the days of my youth. I studied Ptolemy's Centiloquium,⁵⁰ in which it is said that all things in this world obey the celestial forms. Indeed all the wise agree in this, that the planets have influences and powers in this world, by which all things in it are made and transformed by the movements of the planets through the signs. For this reason the wise understand that the foundation of magic is the movement of the planets.

I wish to present the following example, which I learned from a certain sage who labored in this science, who stayed in Egypt in the royal palace. There also dwelt a certain youth who came from a region in India, who had progressed far by much study in the aforesaid science.

This sage said to me that, while he and this youth were talking together, they heard the voice of someone lamenting that he had been stung by a poisonous scorpion and was about to die. When he heard this, the youth took a piece of cloth from his purse, within which were seals⁵¹ that smelled strongly of incense. He instructed that one of these be given to the man in a drink, and he would recover at once. The sage said that he rose up at once, desiring to learn more and find out the reason for this, received one of the seals from the youth's hands and gave it to the victim of the scorpion sting in a drink, as he had instructed; and at once the victim made an end to his cries of woe, and was saved.

⁵⁰ One of the classic handbooks of astrology used in the Middle Ages, the Centiloquium of Claudius Ptolemy consists of one hundred astrological aphorisms.

⁵¹ That is, pieces of wax or some similar substance in which a seal had been impressed.

The sage said that he then inspected the seal, and saw that it had the figure of a scorpion on it. When he asked the youth what had sealed it, the youth showed him a gold ring set with an engraved bezoar stone bearing the figure of a scorpion. The sage inquired of him what the figure was and by what secret influences it accomplished what I have described. The youth answered that the figure was made when the Moon was in the second face of Scorpio, and this was the secret of the power of the ring. This was what the sage said to me. I then made a figure of the same sort at the prescribed time, with which I sealed and suffumigated seals like the ones he described, and with them worked wonders at which everyone marveled.

For this reason you must realize and understand that no one can realize and understand the virtues and powers of the heavens in this little world unless they have studied the natural and mathematical quadrivium,⁵² and whoever is ignorant of this will be imperfect in his knowledge of the movements of heaven, nor will he be able to understand them, nor draw to himself what he wishes, because the compositions and foundations thereof are drawn from these subjects. Whoever is ignorant of arithmetic and geometry will be unable to calculate the motions of the celestial bodies, nor their returns and transits, nor to grasp the motions of those things by which the understanding is formed in arithmetic and geometry. Similarly you must learn music⁵³ to understand the proportions and numbers of things, and in what manner celestial things correspond in love and hatred with terrestrial actions, and why the effects of celestial bodies are more apparent in one earthly thing than another. Indeed, anyone who does not grasp these proportions lacks any understanding of how these effects come to be, nor will such a one be able to work out their correspondences or vice versa⁵⁴.

⁵² The four Pythagorean sciences of arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy.

⁵³ Music in medieval theory includes the study of proportions and ratios.

⁵⁴ That is, work out celestial relationships by comparing them with earthly phenomena.

Likewise he who neglects the natural sciences will not be able to understand the processes of generation and corruption, and their causes, because if he does not know these things, he will not be able to understand or apply the effects that celestial bodies have, or the powers they exert over terrestrial bodies. Similarly, one who is ignorant of metaphysics will be unable to learn or understand how celestial virtues are infused in some terrestrial places and not in others. Therefore it may be concluded that no one will be able to understand or apply this science perfectly except for one who learns its orders and foundations, which no one will be able to learn except a philosopher who has extracted everything from the parts of philosophy we have already named. For this reason no one will be able to attain to perfection in this science except a perfect philosopher.

Chapter Two

The images of heaven and their secrets

It must be known that to speak of the images of heaven is very difficult and profound, because all the wise have enclosed and concealed this work as far as they were able. I will explain to you the reason for this concealment. Inasmuch as many people seek and desire to study the aforesaid science, and to understand every form and image they have desired to attain, they may study the great book of images that was composed by the sage Rozuz, who in that book gave all the images and forms well and completely.

The ascensions of the images of heaven are of two manners,⁵⁵ of which one is the 48 forms drawn from the constellations. This is what we see changing according to the rising and setting of the fixed stars, which are changed from sign to sign, and other images of heaven such as the constellations of the Dog, the Bear, the Rooster, and the like. All these images change from sign to sign and from place to place, and do not simply move in accordance with the heavens as a whole.⁵⁶ The constellations in the signs of the Zodiac change much more than the others, because in a thousand years they move from face to face. Those constellations that are around the poles, on the other hand, do not move visibly in the same thousand years because they move together in a small circle, which is why, even in a thousand years, they do not appear to move. This manner is called the way of constellations.

The second manner calculates the images according to the opinion of the Hindus, who arrange them in this way: in the first face of Aries there rises a man with red eyes and a large beard, wrapped in a garment of white linen, seeming to make great gestures, and wearing a great white cloak tied around him with a rope, and standing on one foot as though regarding something in front of him. In the second face of Aries rises a woman wrapped in a linen cloak, clad in red garments, having only one leg, and with a face similar to that of a horse, full of anger, and seeking garments, ornaments, and sons. In the third face of Aries rises a man colored red and white, with red hair, angry and restless, having a sword in his right hand and a staff in his left, and clad in red garments; and he is learned, and a perfect master of ironworking, and desires to do good, but cannot. In this way they proceed to the last face of the signs.

⁵⁵ The apparent movement of the heavens can be tracked in two ways—first, by means of the constellations (patterns formed by the visible stars), and second, by means of the signs and decans (divisions of the ecliptic). The signs of the Zodiac, though they have the names of constellations, actually belong to the second category.

⁵⁶ This and the following passage refer to the precession of the equinoxes.

Next you should learn that they do not calculate these figures in any way except from the nature of the stars and signs. In this way you will be able to understand what was said above concerning the second face. All their sayings are of this sort. What I have said up to this point, you will be able to understand by using your senses and your imagination, and thus you will be able to make all things according to your wishes.

Abenoaxie said likewise in his book, which he translated from the language of Naption, which was called Timachanin, and speaks of the triplicities of the signs. One of them he named the watery triplicity, and wrote there what he said about the northern constellations. This is what he said: When someone wishes to speak of water, a river, a swamp, or any other thing similar to them, you ought to understand that its work is in water. In the same way, all the other figures of the triplicities that are assigned to fire, earth, or air, should be understood in the same way. This is the way that Tumtum⁵⁷ proceeded, along with all the other sages who discussed the figures and degrees of heaven.

This is what they said about the names of the degrees, and they also said this about examples of their forms in their places, because all these are signs by which you will be able to understand the powers and workings of the degrees. Thus you ought to interpret them in the same way. As an example of the foregoing, when someone refers to a mutilated head and mutilated hands, it means by this phrase death and weakness and the way of one planet with others, because all these are ways to understand the effects of the planets, and how other bodies are strengthened by them, so that marvels, and the effects of the planets in these bodies, become apparent. In this way you should understand the whole art of magic.

⁵⁷ Texts on astrology and geomancy attributed to the legendary astrologer Tumtum al-Hindi, or Tumtum the Hindu, were much circulated among Arabic occultists in the early Middle Ages.

You should know that the effects of the planets are many and varied, and these effects are different in every degree of the heavens, that is, when a particular planet is in a particular degree, or when it is conjunct with other planets there. If you desire to know the sum of their effects, that is, of every planet in every degree of the heavens, multiply 360 seven times, and the product will be 2520; and every one of these aspects has diverse effects by itself. If you then multiply 360 six times, the result, the number of conjunctions of any two planets in a single degree, will be 2160; and these aspects similarly have power and effects miracles in this world. If, however, you multiply 360 five times, the result is the number of conjunctions of three planets in a single degree, or 1800, and these aspects similarly have power and effect miracles in this world. If you multiply 360 four times, the result is the number of conjunctions of any four planets in a single degree, or 1440, and these aspects similarly have power and effect miracles in this world. If you then multiply 360 three times, the result is the number of conjunctions of any five planets in a single degree, or 1080, and these aspects similarly have power and effect miracles in this world. If you multiply 360 twice, the result is the number of conjunctions of any six planets in one degree, or 720; and these aspects similarly effect miracles in this world like the ones already mentioned. If you multiply 360 once, the result is the number of conjunctions of all seven planets in a single degree, or 360; and these aspects similarly have power and effect miracles in this world. This is the way in which the sage first mentioned above⁵⁸ understood things, when it is written of the figures of heaven and their judgments, what a given figure signifies, and likewise about the motions of the seven planets and the degrees of the signs. The coadunated sum of these figures is 10,080, and each of these aspects has powers and accomplishes marvels.

After this, however, the same sage first mentioned above said that when you wish to make these aspects, you should do it in the following way. Put one of the seven planets in one degree and another in a different degree, and divide this over the seven planets, and then put them between any two degrees you wish; and do the same thing in every degree of the heavens, of which there are 360. This way is longer than the one already described, but more accurate, and thereby you will be able to understand the powers and effects of the aforesaid aspects in this world. When you have done this, you should calculate the conjunctions made by the seven planets, as they travel through the degrees, with the fixed stars, as well as their applications to the fixed stars, and the separations of their movements from them and the separation of the fixed stars from them. Then you should commit all this to memory, and understand it well, so that you will be able to calculate aspects. Be careful not to reveal the properties of these aspects to anyone, except those who are destined to receive them.

⁵⁸ That is, Abenoaxie.

Matter is a coadunation of the elements ordered for the reception of form. Matter is divided into two parts;⁴⁹ one is simple matter, which receives nothing except the form of the elements earth, air, water and fire, and is transmuted from one material substance to another. The other is universal matter disposed to receive all forms composed of the simple qualities heat, cold, dryness and wetness, and is not transmuted from one material substance to another. The wise have called the first of these, that which is disposed to receive all diverse forms, while the other is named for the part of nature which is the body by which all of it is directed and fulfilled.

All that we have said in this context we say only to sharpen the intellect and illuminate awareness, because the aforesaid words and reasons that we have stated are spiritual images and the word that Adam received from the Lord God. They cannot be understood except by the wise who have labored faithfully in knowledge and have understood how created beings attain truth. You should understand all of this and retain it in your intellect, because what we have said up to this point in this book of ours constitute the foundations of the art of magic, if you understand it well.

⁴⁹ These are respectively the lower and higher matter discussed earlier.

Book Two

Here begins the second book, which discusses the figures of heaven and the motion of the eighth sphere, and their effects on this world. Here are the chapters of Book Two:

Chapter One:

First is shown how to learn this science.

Chapter Two:

The figures of heaven and their secrets.

Chapter Three:

All the works of the planets, the Sun, and the Moon.

Chapter Four:

The motion of the eighth sphere and the fixed stars.

Chapter Five:

The division of this science among nations, and what part of it is possessed by each nation.

Chapter Six:

The power of magical images, and the varieties of them that exist, and how magical images can receive the power of the planets, and how works are accomplished by magical images, and this is the root of the science of magic and of magical images

Chapter Seven:

How to work dialectically in this science of magical images, and what part this ought to have in this science.

Chapter Eight:

The order of natural things, and how they may enter into this science.

Chapter Nine:

Examples of figures and the forms of images that summon the aid of the planets.

Chapter Ten:

The stones proper to each planet and the formation of figures.

Chapter Eleven:

The figures of the decans and signs and their effects.

Chapter Twelve:

The figures and degrees of the signs according to the opinion of the Hindus, and how they proceed according to the contemplations of this science, and in what manner the virtues of superior bodies are attracted according to the opinions of the same, with notable secrets.

Chapter One

How it is possible to learn this science

The wise, who are endowed by nature with intelligence, never cease nor neglect to seek and inquire tht they might learn and understand the secrets of the wise, who sealed them up in their books and wrote them in hidden words, that the aforesaid might search them out by careful investigation until they attain what they desire; but those who are stupid and lacking in intelligence will never reach it or arrive at it. Yet the motive that drives me proceeds from magic and forbidden things, in which I prospered from the days of my youth. I studied Ptolemy's Centiloquium,⁵⁰ in which it is said that all things in this world obey the celestial forms. Indeed all the wise agree in this, that the planets have influences and powers in this world, by which all things in it are made and transformed by the movements of the planets through the signs. For this reason the wise understand that the foundation of magic is the movement of the planets.

I wish to present the following example, which I learned from a certain sage who labored in this science, who stayed in Egypt in the royal palace. There also dwelt a certain youth who came from a region in India, who had progressed far by much study in the aforesaid science.

This sage said to me that, while he and this youth were talking together, they heard the voice of someone lamenting that he had been stung by a poisonous scorpion and was about to die. When he heard this, the youth took a piece of cloth from his purse, within which were seals⁵¹ that smelled strongly of incense. He instructed that one of these be given to the man in a drink, and he would recover at once. The sage said that he rose up at once, desiring to learn more and find out the reason for this, received one of the seals from the youth's hands and gave it to the victim of the scorpion sting in a drink, as he had instructed; and at once the victim made an end to his cries of woe, and was saved.

⁵⁰ One of the classic handbooks of astrology used in the Middle Ages, the Centiloquium of Claudius Ptolemy consists of one hundred astrological aphorisms.

⁵¹ That is, pieces of wax or some similar substance in which a seal had been impressed.

The sage said that he then inspected the seal, and saw that it had the figure of a scorpion on it. When he asked the youth what had sealed it, the youth showed him a gold ring set with an engraved bezoar stone bearing the figure of a scorpion. The sage inquired of him what the figure was and by what secret influences it accomplished what I have described. The youth answered that the figure was made when the Moon was in the second face of Scorpio, and this was the secret of the power of the ring. This was what the sage said to me. I then made a figure of the same sort at the prescribed time, with which I sealed and suffumigated seals like the ones he described, and with them worked wonders at which everyone marveled.

For this reason you must realize and understand that no one can realize and understand the virtues and powers of the heavens in this little world unless they have studied the natural and mathematical quadrivium,⁵² and whoever is ignorant of this will be imperfect in his knowledge of the movements of heaven, nor will he be able to understand them, nor draw to himself what he wishes, because the compositions and foundations thereof are drawn from these subjects. Whoever is ignorant of arithmetic and geometry will be unable to calculate the motions of the celestial bodies, nor their returns and transits, nor to grasp the motions of those things by which the understanding is formed in arithmetic and geometry. Similarly you must learn music⁵³ to understand the proportions and numbers of things, and in what manner celestial things correspond in love and hatred with terrestrial actions, and why the effects of celestial bodies are more apparent in one earthly thing than another. Indeed, anyone who does not grasp these proportions lacks any understanding of how these effects come to be, nor will such a one be able to work out their correspondences or vice versa⁵⁴.

⁵² The four Pythagorean sciences of arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy.

⁵³ Music in medieval theory includes the study of proportions and ratios.

⁵⁴ That is, work out celestial relationships by comparing them with earthly phenomena.

Likewise he who neglects the natural sciences will not be able to understand the processes of generation and corruption, and their causes, because if he does not know these things, he will not be able to understand or apply the effects that celestial bodies have, or the powers they exert over terrestrial bodies. Similarly, one who is ignorant of metaphysics will be unable to learn or understand how celestial virtues are infused in some terrestrial places and not in others. Therefore it may be concluded that no one will be able to understand or apply this science perfectly except for one who learns its orders and foundations, which no one will be able to learn except a philosopher who has extracted everything from the parts of philosophy we have already named. For this reason no one will be able to attain to perfection in this science except a perfect philosopher.

Chapter Two

The images of heaven and their secrets

It must be known that to speak of the images of heaven is very difficult and profound, because all the wise have enclosed and concealed this work as far as they were able. I will explain to you the reason for this concealment. Inasmuch as many people seek and desire to study the aforesaid science, and to understand every form and image they have desired to attain, they may study the great book of images that was composed by the sage Rozuz, who in that book gave all the images and forms well and completely.

The ascensions of the images of heaven are of two manners,⁵⁵ of which one is the 48 forms drawn from the constellations. This is what we see changing according to the rising and setting of the fixed stars, which are changed from sign to sign, and other images of heaven such as the constellations of the Dog, the Bear, the Rooster, and the like. All these images change from sign to sign and from place to place, and do not simply move in accordance with the heavens as a whole.⁵⁶ The constellations in the signs of the Zodiac change much more than the others, because in a thousand years they move from face to face. Those constellations that are around the poles, on the other hand, do not move visibly in the same thousand years because they move together in a small circle, which is why, even in a thousand years, they do not appear to move. This manner is called the way of constellations.

The second manner calculates the images according to the opinion of the Hindus, who arrange them in this way: in the first face of Aries there rises a man with red eyes and a large beard, wrapped in a garment of white linen, seeming to make great gestures, and wearing a great white cloak tied around him with a rope, and standing on one foot as though regarding something in front of him. In the second face of Aries rises a woman wrapped in a linen cloak, clad in red garments, having only one leg, and with a face similar to that of a horse, full of anger, and seeking garments, ornaments, and sons. In the third face of Aries rises a man colored red and white, with red hair, angry and restless, having a sword in his right hand and a staff in his left, and clad in red garments; and he is learned, and a perfect master of ironworking, and desires to do good, but cannot. In this way they proceed to the last face of the signs.

⁵⁵ The apparent movement of the heavens can be tracked in two ways—first, by means of the constellations (patterns formed by the visible stars), and second, by means of the signs and decans (divisions of the ecliptic). The signs of the Zodiac, though they have the names of constellations, actually belong to the second category.

⁵⁶ This and the following passage refer to the precession of the equinoxes.

Next you should learn that they do not calculate these figures in any way except from the nature of the stars and signs. In this way you will be able to understand what was said above concerning the second face. All their sayings are of this sort. What I have said up to this point, you will be able to understand by using your senses and your imagination, and thus you will be able to make all things according to your wishes.

Abenoaxie said likewise in his book, which he translated from the language of Naption, which was called Timachanin, and speaks of the triplicities of the signs. One of them he named the watery triplicity, and wrote there what he said about the northern constellations. This is what he said: When someone wishes to speak of water, a river, a swamp, or any other thing similar to them, you ought to understand that its work is in water. In the same way, all the other figures of the triplicities that are assigned to fire, earth, or air, should be understood in the same way. This is the way that Tumtum⁵⁷ proceeded, along with all the other sages who discussed the figures and degrees of heaven.

This is what they said about the names of the degrees, and they also said this about examples of their forms in their places, because all these are signs by which you will be able to understand the powers and workings of the degrees. Thus you ought to interpret them in the same way. As an example of the foregoing, when someone refers to a mutilated head and mutilated hands, it means by this phrase death and weakness and the way of one planet with others, because all these are ways to understand the effects of the planets, and how other bodies are strengthened by them, so that marvels, and the effects of the planets in these bodies, become apparent. In this way you should understand the whole art of magic.

⁵⁷ Texts on astrology and geomancy attributed to the legendary astrologer Tumtum al-Hindi, or Tumtum the Hindu, were much circulated among Arabic occultists in the early Middle Ages.

You should know that the effects of the planets are many and varied, and these effects are different in every degree of the heavens, that is, when a particular planet is in a particular degree, or when it is conjunct with other planets there. If you desire to know the sum of their effects, that is, of every planet in every degree of the heavens, multiply 360 seven times, and the product will be 2520; and every one of these aspects has diverse effects by itself. If you then multiply 360 six times, the result, the number of conjunctions of any two planets in a single degree, will be 2160; and these aspects similarly have power and effects miracles in this world. If, however, you multiply 360 five times, the result is the number of conjunctions of three planets in a single degree, or 1800, and these aspects similarly have power and effect miracles in this world. If you multiply 360 four times, the result is the number of conjunctions of any four planets in a single degree, or 1440, and these aspects similarly have power and effect miracles in this world. If you then multiply 360 three times, the result is the number of conjunctions of any five planets in a single degree, or 1080, and these aspects similarly have power and effect miracles in this world. If you multiply 360 twice, the result is the number of conjunctions of any six planets in one degree, or 720; and these aspects similarly effect miracles in this world like the ones already mentioned. If you multiply 360 once, the result is the number of conjunctions of all seven planets in a single degree, or 360; and these aspects similarly have power and effect miracles in this world. This is the way in which the sage first mentioned above⁵⁸ understood things, when it is written of the figures of heaven and their judgments, what a given figure signifies, and likewise about the motions of the seven planets and the degrees of the signs. The coadunated sum of these figures is 10,080, and each of these aspects has powers and accomplishes marvels.

After this, however, the same sage first mentioned above said that when you wish to make these aspects, you should do it in the following way. Put one of the seven planets in one degree and another in a different degree, and divide this over the seven planets, and then put them between any two degrees you wish; and do the same thing in every degree of the heavens, of which there are 360. This way is longer than the one already described, but more accurate, and thereby you will be able to understand the powers and effects of the aforesaid aspects in this world. When you have done this, you should calculate the conjunctions made by the seven planets, as they travel through the degrees, with the fixed stars, as well as their applications to the fixed stars, and the separations of their movements from them and the separation of the fixed stars from them. Then you should commit all this to memory, and understand it well, so that you will be able to calculate aspects. Be careful not to reveal the properties of these aspects to anyone, except those who are destined to receive them.

⁵⁸ That is, Abenoaxie.

Chapter Three

All the works of the planets, the Sun, and the Moon

Now some of the wise, speaking of the foregoing, have said that the effects of the heavens and their powers in this world are nothing other than the increase and decrease of heat. They have said this because they have not understood the wonderful occult properties of the planets. They have said that the effects brought about by the Sun, the Moon, and the other five planets operating in this world help and strengthen the overall effect of the heavens. They have also said that from the motion of the heavens, all over motions are revealed, that is, the motions of all seven of the planets individually, and from the qualities of the Sun individually may be known all the other qualities that arise.

They say that the Moon has qualities⁵⁹ from which it is possible to know and understand all her qualities and effects. The first of her qualities is her elongation from the Sun, that is, the period from the time she separates from conjunction with the Sun until her first square with the Sun. During that time her power increases moisture and warmth, but she affects moisture more than warmth. During that time her effects appear in the growth of trees and plants, and her power of increase is more apparent in herbs that grow in the ground than in trees that rise above the ground.

The second of her qualities is from the end of the first quarter until her opposition with the Sun. During this time her influence is more apparent in increasing heat and moisture equally. During this time her influence is well shown in the increase of moisture and heat in plants and minerals. When she recedes from opposition to her second square with the Sun, at that time her power increases moisture and heat, but heat more than moisture. Her influence appears more in increasing the bodies of animals, vegetables, and those minerals that grow, in all their parts; this is why at this time she works more by heat than by moisture.

⁵⁹ These "qualities" (qualitates in the original) are the four traditional quarters of the Moon's orbit, plus its exact conjunction with the Sun.

From her second square to her combustion by the Sun, the effects, motions, and results of her heat appear much abated, so much less than those of the three previous periods that the result is opposite in all its effects, being moderately drying and strongly cooling. This is said because of her influence, which at that time is moderate in humidity; for this reason we are able to say that this quarter is moderately dry and very cold.

When she is conjunct the Sun within one minute, then she has the fifth quality, which the Chaldean sages say is better than any other quality of the Moon, and is more powerful than all her other aspects. The sages of Persia,⁶⁰ however, say that the power and weakness, increase and decrease of the effects of this fifth quality depends on the nature of the sign in which the conjunction takes place. The sages of Greece and Egypt, meanwhile, agree with what we have already said, that the conjunction with the Sun is strongest, but deny what we have said, that this quality of the conjunction is better; they assign the latter to the opposition between Moon and Sun, that is, when her light is complete.

All our sages,⁶¹ however, are mutually in agreement that the better quality of the Moon is the aspect she makes when she is conjunct to the Sun within one minute, and they hold that this fifth quality belongs to the Sun and ought to have other interpretations, differing from the interpretations assigned to the other four qualities, because it is better and stronger than them in all their works. That interpretation is as follows: when the Moon conjoins the Sun, she rejoices and is glad, just as a wayfarer rejoices in his journey when he reaches his home or its neighborhood; this will be even more true of the shaper of all things, and most of all when she will perceive their effects beforehand. When she is conjunct with the Sun, she has completed her work, which is to diminish what is in excess and increase what is deficient.

Our sages say likewise that the virtue of the fifth quality has a similar effect to the effect of the Sun, and this is a very great thing and a noble quality. They say that all composite bodies receive from this the virtues that they ought to have, nor should it be understood from the foregoing that the Moon causes virtues and workings differing from those of the Sun; rather, the Moon reveals the Sun's influence and brings forth works accomplished by the Sun; nor do these appear until the Moon manifests those things that were previously concealed, and illuminates what had previously been in obscurity.

⁶⁰ Alfors in the original, from Arabic al-Fars, "Persia."

⁶¹ "Our sages" are the astrologers of the Arabic world.

These five qualities of the Moon, which she receives out of the aforesaid five aspects which she has with the Sun, accord with the qualities of all the living things that live within her orbit. Of such are the five ages, that is, infancy, childhood, youth, maturity, and age. Likewise are the four times of the year—that is, spring, summer, autumn, and winter—and similarly the four parts of the world—that is, east, west, south, and north, along the wind that is principally assigned to that quarter. The four humors in the body—blood, yellow bile, phlegm, and black bile⁶²—are similar.

These are the senses and interpretations in which the foregoing material ought to be taken, most especially because all the foundations of these operations derive from the power of the planets, the Sun, and the Moon, and from their motions according to the qualities of the degrees that receive the forces and powers of the planets in their courses, for the powers pass from planet to planet through their aspects. For this reason, one planet will receive qualities belonging to the significance of other planets according to the different aspects that are formed by their dispositions.

When this is the case, it is evident that all composite bodies are changed and altered in all their changeable qualities during that period of time, according to the interaction of the motions of the planets with the signs they occupy, and vice versa, and these changes are called separate changes. Other primary things, as we mentioned before, that are the foundations and properties of all things, are called universal and permanent changes, which are not changed or altered because, if they suffered any alteration or change, the whole universal pattern of things in this world would be corrupted and destroyed; for this reason they are permanent and universal.

⁶² The humors were the basis of traditional medicine in the Western world from the ancient Greeks to the end of the Renaissance. See "The Four Humors and Traditional Medicine" in the Commentary, pp. xxx-xxx.

The conclusion we ought to draw from all that we have said up to this point is that everything in the world, and all their qualities, orders and ends, come from the aspects of the Moon with the Sun, because this includes everything that is contained in trees and composite bodies because of the stars and the Moon. This is what causes the greater part of the influence and harm they receive from an eclipse of the Moon or other planets that are eclipsed. From the Sun, the Moon, and the fixed stars come lasting changes; from these, things suffer change, receiving benefits from good qualities and harm from bad ones. Eclipses affect the Sun and Moon and other planets, and influence them to the harm of other composite bodies. Do not believe for a moment that the Sun or Moon receive any harm in their nature or accidents thereby; and we will call this an impediment of the heavens, so that you will understand that the reason that harm comes to animals, trees, and other composite bodies from eclipses of the Sun, Moon, and the other planets happens because the four elements are altered, changed and damaged.⁶³

Next in order, you ought to search for a place⁶⁴ appropriate and suitable in all its effects and convenient for your workings, noting the true and false signs in things that influence this world both in generation and corruption, so that it is such as to have the most power in the world in all its qualities. Similarly, you should seek to make the Moon free from impediments and infortunes, and be sure it is not in the via combusta,⁶⁵ because all workings that are ordained when the Moon is in a good quality and rightly moving are completed and perfected for good; whatever you desire will appear with all its effects, and its duration will be according to whether the Moon is slow or fast, and whether it appears in the same sign together with one of the infortunes, or descending from the midheaven, or at the end of a sign or in the last or next to last degree thereof, for all these harm and weaken the Moon.

⁶³ One of the central principles of medieval cosmology was that destruction only happened in the realm of the four elements; the celestial realm was exempt from all generation and corruption.

⁶⁴ This is a celestial place, a part of the heavens where the Moon will provide the influence needed for the working. The author of the Picatrix says nothing about the physical place in which magic is to be done; his eyes are fixed on the heavens.

⁶⁵ The Via Combusta is the section of the Zodiac between 15° Libra and 15° Scorpio, which has a malefic influence.

The same is true if she descends to the descendant, or is cadent from the lord of her house⁶⁶ and does not aspect him, or is cadent from the ascendant or any other angle, or is conjunct the south lunar node, because the beginning will not be fulfilled, nor will it have any durability. The house of the Moon must not be governed by a planet from which the Moon is separating, or one to which the Moon applies from an angle or from a succedent house, because when the Moon is cadent from an angle or a succedent house, she is not suited to any working.

The descendant, because of the circle of houses, is opposite to the house that is rising. If the Moon is in the ninth house, and the lord of the ninth house is cadent from the ascendant, it will be similar to the situation described above. If you find the lord of the Moon's house on the ascendant or midheaven, or in the eleventh or fifth houses, oriental and direct, everything will be suitable and appropriate for whatever you intend to do.

Here is an example. Venus is favorable for all workings related to the activities of youth, happiness, and cosmetics, and Jupiter is assigned to the deeds of kings, prelates,⁶⁷ and lords. Similarly, Mercury is favorable for all things relating to messengers and scribes, just as the favor of the Sun is assigned to royal and great operations and to kings, and as the favor of the Moon is associated with learning and news. Thus, according to the aforesaid, you ought to examine all workings and relationships that you wish to put into effect: that is, you should consider the Sun and Moon and the lords of their exaltations, and also the lords of their terms.

Next you should consider the ascendant and midheaven, because when you find these free from the infortunes and untroubled, and with their lords in favorable positions, then the work will go well and be accomplished and its goal will be achieved. This will be even more so if the fortunes are shining⁶⁸ and appear from the right and are oriental⁶⁹ to the lord of the ascendant, because planets when they are oriental signify victory and the completion of things without difficulty or impediment, and when they are occidental, especially when in one of the four angles, they signify sluggishness, delay, and the postponement of things.

⁶⁶ The lord of her house: that is, the planet that rules the sign in which the Moon is located in a given astrological chart.

⁶⁷ Prelates: clergy of high rank.

⁶⁸ Lucentes in the original. The author may mean that they are increasing in light, that is, moving away from the Sun rather than toward him.

If you find the Moon favorably placed but the lord of its house is cadent, that shows that the matter under consideration will turn out good in the beginning and bad in the end. If you find both the Moon and the lord of her house favorably placed, the working will be good in all things and well completed, and you will obtain what you desire, and the end will be good. This will be even more so if the lord of the ascendant is a fortune and is in the ascendant or another of the angles, or if it is an infortune and favorably placed. Even better than this is to have Jupiter or Venus rising or in aspect with the ascendant, for then the business at hand will proceed easily and obtain a good result, and accomplish its goal easily and swiftly. This will be even more so if the Moon is conjunct with one of the fortunes, and that fortune is not diminishing in light or retrograde, because this is appropriate to any working except for captives who hope to escape from their masters, or workings to catch fugitives of any other kind.

You should pay attention to the Moon in all workings, as the foremost of the planets, because she has the most manifest effects and judges all things in this world, and to her belong the powers of generation and corruption, and she is the mediatrix of their effects; for she received the influences and impressions of all the stars and planets, and pours them down onto the inferior things of this world. For this reason you should pay attention to what we have said above concerning her fortunes and infortunes, and the waxing and waning of her light, because after she separates from the Sun her powers are balanced; thereafter they change when she is in sextile, square, trine, and opposite aspect. Her strength will accord with the nature of the planets and stars with which she is conjoined while in the aforesaid aspects.

⁶⁹ A planet is oriental to another planet if it rises after it, and thus appears further east in the sky; it is occidental if it rises before it, and thus appears further west in the sky.

If you find the Moon increasing in light, then her virtue and power are better and more useful in every working in which you desire to cause increase; if you find her decreasing in light, then she will be suitable and appropriate for all workings in which you desire to cause decrease. After the Moon separates from the Sun, until her sinister square,⁷⁰ and thence until she reaches opposition, she will always be good and appropriate for buying and selling, seeking judgments and loans, for disputations, and for seeking advice on any subject. After she separates from opposition, passing by the dexter square⁷¹ and thence to her conjunction with the Sun, she will be good and appropriate for seeking loans that we owe, for those who have the goods of others to return them, and for wisdom and seeking and inquiring after truth.

You should know that the ascendant is more fortunate and stronger if it has a fortune in the sign that is rising, and also in the second house. Furthermore, it should not be concealed from you that the mobile signs, especially Aries and Capricorn, are good and appropriate whenever you desire to overcome or obtain something; that the common signs are appropriate for sorcery and marvelous things; and that the fixed signs are effective in, and ordained for, binding and attracting and the performance of magical workings. All things that you want to be enduring, and especially great works, are suitable for the fixed signs, and likewise attracting spirits into things and binding them there. In these things, furthermore, it is best if the ascendant be in a common sign and the Moon in a mobile sign, forming an aspect to the ascendant. Similarly, in all things that are to endure, put the ascendant in a fixed or common sign, the Moon being in a fixed sign, applying by a trine or sextile aspect to the ruler of her house, which should be free from the infortunes, combustion, and retrogradation.

If it is not possible for all these things to be fully considered,⁷² then at least see that the Moon is applying to one of the fortunes and to the lord of the ascendant by a trine or sextile aspect, and always beware of the square or opposite aspect, because trine and sextile are the favorable aspects, while the unfavorable are square and opposition. Thus when the lord of the Moon's house regards the Moon by a friendly aspect, even if it is an infortune, it will be favorable for petitions and in all that you wish to do. In all your workings, be careful that the Moon is not conjunct the South Node or applying to a square or opposition with the infortunes, and always observe in your workings the waning of the Moon, for when she wanes, it shows and reveals destruction and detriment, slowness and weakness in all things of this world. This is the waning of the Moon: that is, when she decreases by light and the calendar,⁷³ and is slow in motion. The state and condition of the Moon is good when she is increasing by light and the calendar, and swift of course, nor is she regarding Mars by any aspect, because when the waxing Moon beholds Mars, this is considered to be a great affliction of the Moon, and when she beholds Saturn while waxing, this is a grave affliction. Yet she stands alone among the powers and virtues that are above the Earth in the night. You should know that it will be shown to be better and more useful, in all our workings according to the points just discussed, when the Moon and the ascendant are in signs of direct ascension; for when this is the case, the work will be completed more rapidly and with swifter effect, and most so when they are in common or fixed signs.

⁷⁰ A sinister, or left-handed, square is made when the swifter planet is in a later sign of the Zodiac than the slower one.

⁷¹ A dexter, or right-handed, square is made when the swifter planet is in an earlier sign of the Zodiac than the slower one.

⁷² Considerari in the original, a neat Latin pun suggesting con-, "with," and sideres, "stars."

Now of the mobile signs, the most mobile is Aries, then Cancer, and then Libra, which is stronger than all other enemies. In the same way you should understand that the angles are swifter in all operations, then the succedent houses, while the cadent houses are slowest. The swiftest of all is when a fortune is rising and the Moon is increasing by light and the calendar. Note also that the conclusions of things cannot be found out except by the triplicity of the Moon and the lord of the ascendant, and by the calculation of their places and qualities and aspects, and the aspects they make with the planets mutually over time. By the aforesaid the ending of things may be judged.

⁷³ The Arabic calendar uses lunar months; in the Middle Ages the calculated months were not always in step with the phases of the Moon, thus the author's injunction to check both.

Dorotheus in his instructions teaches us this, saying that in making judgments and elections of things it is necessary to observe the ascendant and its lord, and the Moon and the lord of the Moon's house. Be careful of the Moon in these elections and judgments, and see that it is not cadent from the ascendant⁷⁴ if you can possibly avoid this, and even more so, that the lord of the ascendant and that of the Moon's house not be the two infortunes, applying to an aspect with the Moon from the ascendant or the signs that they rule. Be sure in all judgments and elections that the Part of Fortune is not cadent from an aspect or conjunction with the Moon, and be careful that neither the lord of the Part of Fortune's house nor the part itself is cadent from the ascendant after making an aspect with the ascendant or Moon.

Now if the lord of the ascendant is conjunct the part of fortune, this is very good in all workings and all your elections. Take diligent care in all your workings that the Moon be not in the third, sixth, eighth, or twelfth houses from the Part of Fortune, because this will be ill and inappropriate for every manner of business. Note always in all your workings that the Moon and ascendant be in signs of direct ascension. You should likewise know and understand that the ascendant and fourth house signify and reveal all dispositions jointly. If you find the Moon badly placed, and it should happen that it is necessary for you to act, and you are not able to delay at all, make the Moon cadent from the ascendant, having no part in her, and put a fortune in the ascendant, with fortunes rising and ruling the ascendant. This is what Dorotheus says.

You should know that the strength and goodness of the ascendant consists of two things, that is, form and fortune, nor should you interpret the lord of the ascendant in any other way. Form means that you should put on the ascendant something of similar nature, proportion, and quality to the intention of your election. Similarity of quality is a condition such as this: if you wish to make things happen quickly and complete themselves, or put things in motion, or in the houses of kings, or with great sublimity, place the ascendant in the fiery signs. Along with this rule is the following similar to it, that is, if your working deals with warlike and military matters, put one of the signs ruled by Mars on the ascendant.

⁷⁴ That is, in the third house of the chart.

You should make fortunate the house of the petition as well as the lord of that house, because the place or house of the petition shows and reveals what is in the beginning and ordination of the matter, and the lord of the petition signifies and reveals the means by which the petition is resolved, and the lord of the house where the lord of the petition is found signifies the end and outcome of the matter. In the same way, the ascendant shows what is in the beginning of the matter, and the lord of the house where the lord of the ascendant is found signifies the end of the matter.

Look also to the part of the petition,⁷⁵ for this shows the nature of the petition, and also consider its lord, and the lord of the house where the lord of the part is placed. Diligently consider how you may position the house of the petition as we have described above, and make it fortunate by those fortunes that give strength when they are in that house, or applying to it with favorable aspects, while the infortunes are cadent from their houses. Never place a retrograde planet as the lord of the ascendant or the lord of the petition because, if either one is retrograde, the petition will be delayed and put at a distance and will not go forward; this is what a retrograde reveals and demonstrates. Similarly, all other places should be made fortunate in all their qualities. If any of them are retrograde, the effect of the working is destroyed at the beginning, and it may not be completed except with labor and peril. See also that none of the aforesaid be conjunct to the Sun or Moon, or in opposition to them, but rather on the ascendant or in the house of the petition or with the part of the petition, and a fortune should be rising, or in one of the other angles, or in the house of the petition.

You should know that the Greater Fortune⁷⁶ has greater strength and power in all petitions, in advanced knowledge, and in laws, while the Lesser Fortune⁷⁷ reaches out and works in all ⁷⁵ Arabic astrology includes a system of parts—points on the horoscope determined by the relative placement of two planets and one house cusp. The part of fortune is a familiar example, but Arabic astrologers used dozens of others, and most magical workings can be assigned to one part or another.

⁷⁶ The planet Jupiter.

⁷⁷ The planet Venus.

petitions concerning women's quarrels, as well as ornaments and the pleasures of women and their vices and the like. Never put the Moon on the ascendant of anything you wish to do, because she is the ascendant's enemy, but the Sun is not an enemy of the ascendant, for he uncovers things and melts what is frozen.

Similarly, do not put an infortune on the ascendant, nor in any of the angles of the chart, and especially not if the infortune has power in any malign place;⁷⁸ for example, if it be the lord of the eighth house, for this reveals loss of merchandise and of exchange and of great lordships; and if that infortune rules the sixth house, it shows detriment to the petition on account of enemies, servants, illness, imprisonment, or animals; while if that infortune rules the twelfth house, it shows impediment and damage to the petition on account of misery, conflict, enemies, or by means of imprisonment; while if the infortune rules the second house, it reveals and argues for loss in the petition from another person on account of wealth, or subservience, or because of eating and drinking.

In all the aforesaid, you should observe all that we have previously said and not forget any of these points, but consider them as the foundations of the entire magical art. In all workings you perform in the daytime, put a diurnal sign of direct ascension on the ascendant, and in workings at night put a nocturnal sign of direct ascension on the ascendant. Furthermore, pay heed to the Sun and Moon if you can, and see that their hours and lords are in strong and fortified places, and do this so that the superior powers and strengths are coadunated by contact together, and are joined. In this way you ought to consider and arrange the status of what the planets reveal and the significance of the work you wish to do, and put them together before you begin to work. Thus in all works that you wish to do for love and benevolence toward men or women, see that the Moon is received by Venus in a trine or sextile aspect, and this is better when in her house or exaltation.

Note that the trine aspect is that which joins an equilateral triangle, so that each side has 120° of the circumference of heaven. A sextile aspect is that which connects the six equal ⁷⁸ That is, the infortune should not rule a sign in the second, sixth, eighth, or twelfth houses of the chart, which are traditionally unfortunate.

